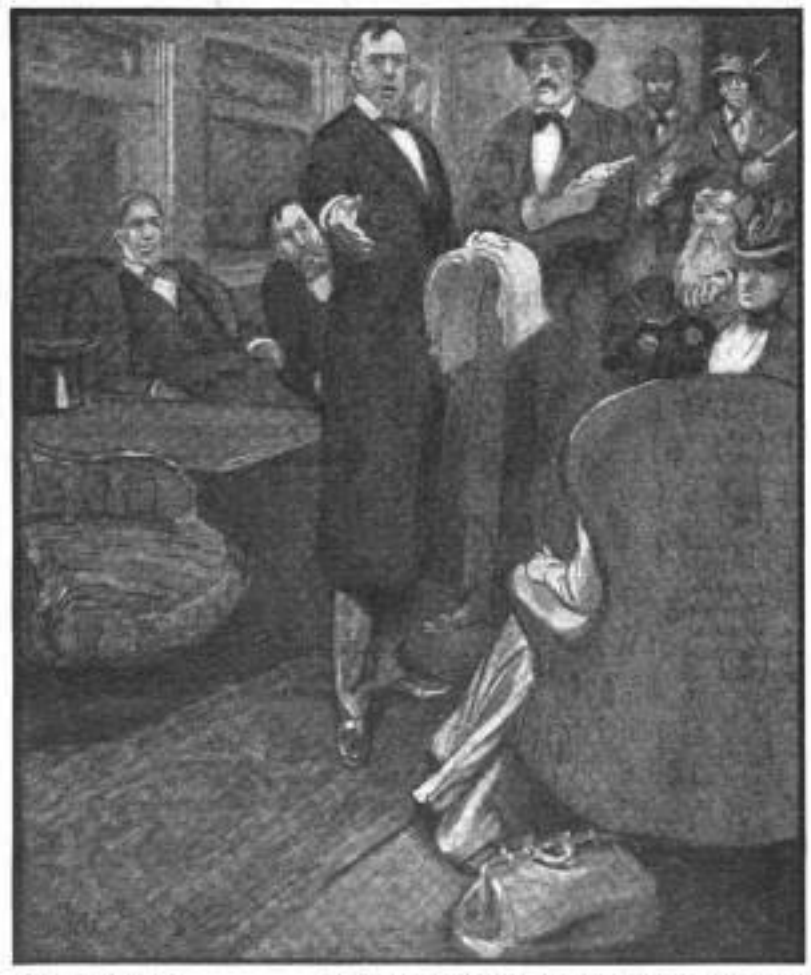
"But now, Senator," said he, leaning forward and laying one hand on the Senator's knee persuasively, "I will tell you what I come for. Over in that coach there is a party of regular parlor-car people—that concert company, three of 'em, and a professor with gold-rimmed glasses, and three maiden ladies tucked under his arm, taking 'em to Europe. The rest of the fellows in there is a regular swearing, spitting crowd, and those parlor-car people are mighty uncomfortable. Now, I hate the thought that them women should be uncomfortable—I don't mind the men so much—and it just occurred to me that if Senator Walford knew about it, with all these vacant seats"—here Mr. Smithers waved his arm around—"he'd ask them in. It's two hours now to Grand Junction, and I believe some of them women will faint if they have to sit in that place any longer."

The Senator was an American gentleman. The thought of women in discomfort gave him acute pain, and the reflection that he could relieve them gave him extreme pleasure. He rose at once.

"I thank you very much, Mr. Smithers," he said, "for telling me of this. Those ladies and their escorts are more than welcome to this car as far as Grand Junction, and as much farther as they need it. I shall have pleasure in inviting them in."



He got up, as did Mr. Smithers, who remarked quietly to the Representative from the Eighth District, "There speaks a man."

The two went forward to the end of the car. When they got to the door Mr. Smithers said:

"You had better let me go into that car, Senator. There's a pretty rough crowd in there; and if they heard you inviting those ladies and gentlemen in here, just as like as not they'll make a rush for the car. I think most of the passengers are going to a prize fight near Grand Junction."

As he spoke his eye caught sight of the poker party at the end of the car, and, laying his hand on the Senator's arm, he said anxiously:

"But, Senator, can you ask those ladies in here with that sinful game going on right in sight of 'em?"

DRAWN BY F. R. GRUGER

"WE HAVE BEFORE US THREE GREAT ISSUES"

The Senator looked a little embarrassed. "Ahem!" he said. "Those gentlemen are my guests, and——"

"That's all right," briskly responded Mr. Smithers; "but I reckon they can draw them green silk curtains around 'em."

"Certainly," said the Senator. And the porter, obeying a signal, concealed the group of sinners from the eyes of Mr. Smithers.

He went out, and in a minute or two came back accompanied by the party. The first to enter was the professor, with his spectacles. He introduced himself as Professor Carpenter, of Midland University, and the ladies under his charge—all of them well stricken in years—as Miss Thompson, Miss Carter and Miss Barr. They all thanked the Senator with sincere gratitude for his kindness. After them came the singer, a pretty little woman, who was billed under the name of Signora Bellini; her violinist, a gentleman who looked like a bandit, and hugged his precious fiddle-case to his breast; and the manager, a bow-legged little individual, but who had a pair of eyes that stamped him as an honest man and a gentleman. The little prima donna smiled into the Senator's eyes, gave his hand a tender squeeze, and thanked him in the prettiest manner possible. The manager, Mr. Solomons, alone of the party, quietly remarked to the Senator:

"I am afraid that we are imposing upon your generosity, thanks to our cheeky friend yonder; but these ladies, I assure you, were very uncomfortable in the car."

"Pray believe me," said the Senator, in his cordial, sincere way, "that I consider it a privilege to entertain these ladies, and a pleasure to have you and the other gentlemen in the party. There is, as you see, plenty of room for all."

The gentlemen in the Senator's party, except the poker players, all rose at the entrance of the ladies; and the car certainly had a livelier appearance after they came than before. Three of the delegates to the Republican National Convention surrounded the pretty prima donna. The other two were cut out and had to content themselves with the lady professors; but these latter turned out to be agreeable and well-bred women, and were a real addition to the party.

After seeing them all comfortably seated, Mr. Smithers turned to go out.

"My dear sir," said the Senator, taking him by the sleeve, "you surely do not mean to desert us now when you have been the means of bringing us all together in this pleasant manner?"

"Well, the fact is," said Mr. Smithers confidentially, "I am no parlor-car man, Senator. The day coach is good enough for me, and I feel more at home there. Now that I have done a kind action I am perfectly satisfied. I would like—er—however, one small privilege."

He drew a parcel of tracts from his pocket, and returning to where the beneficiaries of his appeal sat, he sorted over his tracts and then laid one gently upon the lap of Miss Thompson. It bore the title, Are You Ready for the Bridegroom? Miss Thompson colored, and said "Thank you!" in a faint voice. Next he selected one and gave it into the hands of Signora Bellini. This was entitled The Wise Virgin. And finally he handed the Senator one, asking him solemnly, "Can you answer this question?" The title of that one was, Do You Belong to the Devil's Party? To this the Senator casually replied that he didn't know; that he was a rock-ribbed Republican, and meant to vote the straight Republican ticket as long as he lived and moved and had his being.

Then, in spite of the Senator's detaining hand and a chorus of protests, Mr. Smithers modestly withdrew into the day coach with the party on their way to the prize fight.

Half an hour had passed pleasantly. Lemonade and cakes had been served to the ladies—the first call that had been made for either commodity since the party started for the convention—when the train suddenly began to slow up, and as suddenly came to a dead stop.

The Senator opened the window and put his head out. It was annoying to be delayed in that way and thereby miss catching the Chicago express. It was quite dark, and a fine, drizzling rain was falling. There was not a house in sight—only a narrow belt of woods on one side. There was evidently a commotion going on in the baggage and express car, and half a dozen men were passing about.

As the Senator drew his head back into the Pullman (where everybody had been inquiring what was the matter), he looked up and saw at the rear of the car a couple of men silently enter, each armed with a Winchester rifle, and a pistol which he held in his right hand. At the same moment two others, similarly armed, appeared at the door which led into the day coach; and then Mr. Smithers walked in. He did not have a Winchester, but carried in his right hand a small, self-cocking, six-chambered revolver. He advanced with the same easy, confident manner in which he had appeared half an hour before, but his errand this time was quite different. He walked up to the Senator and said to him:

Digitized by Google

"Senator, I hate to inconvenience you. You are a gentleman, and I will give my testimony to that any time you want it. If you are ever a candidate for President of the United States, and want my recommendation, you can have it. But at present I shall be compelled to relieve you of what extra cash you have and your watch. Every word I told you about these ladies and their escorts in that day coach was true. At the same time it was mighty convenient for us to have you all corraled in this Pullman. The fellows in the day coach haven't got anything better than a silver watch among 'em. They're not worth the time and trouble it would take to go through 'em; and so we've just locked the door on 'em and propose to devote our attentions to you. We're just going to take your superfluity—we ain't going to rob you of your credentials as a delegate to the Republican National Convention; but just hand over your wallet."

"Sir," said the Senator, as he felt the cold muzzle of a pistol at his ear, "you are a scoundrel and a deceiver. You passed yourself off as a minister of the Gospel."

"Never mind about that," said Mr. Smithers pleasantly. "It's the neatest job we ever done. It's just five minutes since the train was stopped. We have got the engineer and the fireman tied hand and foot in the cab, and gagged into the bargain. A couple of my lieutenants have got the express messenger sitting down on the floor of the express car with a pistol to each ear. The safe has got a combination that won't open it for an hour yet. We are going to give him that hour, and then, if we are compelled, we can use dynamite. I've got a couple of sticks somewhere about me now. You had better be a little careful jostling me. There isn't any danger of our being stopped. I telegraphed ahead from Wakefield that we had had a washout, too, and the train would be late. There ain't no block system on this line."

The Senator, meanwhile, had coolly taken out his wallet and laid it in Mr. Smithers' hand. Every one in the car had sat perfectly quiet, including the women.

Having disposed of the Senator, Mr. Smithers then walked over to the Representative from the Eighth District, who had quietly, and he thought unobserved, slid his pocketbook and watch down into his shoe. He put his hand in his pocket and drew out some change and handed it to Mr. Smithers, saying with a smile:

"I am not provided with funds, except a check-book. I am a guest on this occasion."

"Sir," said Mr. Smithers with withering scorn, "do you mean to insult me? Take off your shoe this minute."

"I will," replied the Representative; "but you must stop flourishing that —— pistol around my head."

"Sir," said Mr. Smithers indignantly, "how dare you use such language in the presence of ladies? I am ashamed of you, as an American. You beg their pardon or——"

At this he thrust the cold muzzle of the pistol into the Representative's ear, at which that gentleman shivered visibly, as he handed over his watch and money, and mumbled, "I beg pardon!"

"Ladies," said Mr. Smithers, "I apologize for this gentleman's unbecoming and profane language. I have never become accustomed to the sound of blasphemy, and I never shall. No unbecoming word ever passes my lips in the presence of man or woman."

The other men of the party, seeing they had to deal with four Winchesters and five pistols, had quietly taken out their purses. The green silk curtains that screened off the poker party had been drawn aside, and five nervous gentlemen sat, perfectly still, inside, with the muzzle of a Winchester pointed straight at them through the open door. It took a very short time to go through the rest of the party, including the poker players. When Mr. Smithers appeared at the door of the compartment a neat pile of greenbacks and gold lay on the table.

"Is that all, gentlemen?" asked Mr. Smithers, looking around. "On your honor, now!"

And so potent is the word "honor" that those five men each showed unmistakably in his face that he had more money on his person—which Mr. Smithers promptly proceeded to relieve them of, saying meanwhile:

"I haven't the slightest sympathy for you, gentlemen—not the slightest. Poker is a nefarious game. The only difference between you and me, gentlemen, is that I have the winning hand."

And with this he slipped the collection of gold and notes into his capacious pocket.

The whole operation had not consumed fifteen minutes. Mr. Smithers took Senator Walford's watch out of his pocket, and glanced at it, and remarked:

"We have got three-quarters of an hour now to wait for that combination of the safe in the express car to open, and we must pass away the time, if possible, in some instructive and amusing manner. Perhaps Mademoiselle Bellini will oblige us with a song."

"What," cried Signora Bellini, bursting into tears, "I—I—sing, when you have one hundred and forty dollars of my money in your pocket. Oh, you ruffian! Oh, you wretch!"

"Come, now," said Mr. Smithers soothingly, "I have only taken your superfluity. I haven't taken your railroad passes from you."

"That is true," said Signora Bellini with a sigh of relief.

DRAWN BY F. R. GRUGER

—"BE VERY MUCH ON YOUR GUARD WHEN YOU ARE INTERVIEWED CONCERNING THAT HOLD-UP"

"You are very kind to have left us those, and I am very much obliged to you."

"Well, then," said Mr. Smithers with an appreciative grin, "perhaps you will oblige me. My pardners over there are just as fond of music as I be, and them poor fellows are just as tired as they can be. There they have got to stand for forty-five minutes yet, and it would be a charity to the poor souls to sing 'em a little song and remind 'em of the early days of their youth."

The manager, at this, laughed. He was the only man on whose face a smile had appeared during the whole course of the affair, and had given up his money like a man.

Signora Bellini cleared her throat nervously.

"What shall I sing?" she said. "Do you like Faust, or Carmen?"

"No, no," promptly replied Mr. Smithers. "My early education prevented me from ever going to any of them sinful operas; but, if you can, give me something like the New Bully, or the Georgia Camp Meeting."

Signora Bellini, unfortunately, was not acquainted with either one of these classic airs, but agreed, on her manager's suggestion, to sing Home, Sweet Home, which she did standing in the aisle, and her voice echoing tremulously through the car. When the chorus came Mr. Smithers joined in it vigorously, and, in return for Signora Bellini's accommodating spirit, handed her back her watch, a dainty trifle which had cost three hundred dollars.

It was now the Professor's turn.

"May I ask, Professor," said Mr. Smithers, "what is your specialty?"

"Ge—ge—geology," faltered the Professor.

"Very well, sir," said Mr. Smithers. "Now, will you kindly tell me what is your opinion, as a geologist, upon the probable age of this planet? I desire to ask the categorical question as to how old you think this old world is."

The Professor cleared his throat. He was used to talking, and finding his voice was composing to him.

"I should say," he remarked, in his most professorial tone, "after having devoted more than twenty-five years to the subject, that it is conclusively proved that the earth is between fifteen and sixty thousand years old."

"You do, hey?" said Mr. Smithers. "Well, I call that a pretty wide margin. I have often noticed one thing about you fellows that are down on Moses—that you don't seem to agree among yourselves; and if one of you is right, all the others are apt to be wrong. Now, if you asked me for an exact statement of how far this pistol would shoot"—here he gently rumpled the Professor's carefully brushed hair with the point of his pistol—"and I said anywhere between fifteen and sixty yards, you would think I was a very inexact fellow; and geology is an exact science, isn't it?"

"It is," responded the Professor.

"Well, then," said Mr. Smithers, "if the science of my profession was as inexact as yours, I would probably be languishing in the penitentiary now."

With this he approached Miss Thompson.

"Madam," he said, "what I demand of you is a thing it will make me very happy to receive, and cost you nothing to give—a kiss."

Miss Thompson screamed and fell back into the arms of Miss Barr and Miss Carter. A murmur went round among the men in the car. Mr. Smithers very coolly took out the watch that had lately been Senator Walford's, and, holding it up before the terrified Miss Thompson, remarked:

"I will give you just one minute to consider. For every minute that you refuse to comply with my very flattering request I shall give you another kiss. Two minutes have already passed."

"Wretch! Villain!" shrieked Miss Thompson, and much more to the same purpose, only stopping to catch her breath.

Mr. Smithers took this all with smiling coolness.

"If your object, madam," he said politely, "is to gain time——"

Here the Representative from the Eighth District spoke up.

"You should be satisfied, sir, with robbing these ladies instead of insulting them. Your proposition is——"

"Mister," interrupted Mr. Smithers, "I take it that you must be from the East. Out here in the West it isn't considered an insult to ask a kiss from a charming lady like Miss Thompson."

At which, without further ado, having noted that five minutes had elapsed since he made the first proposition, he kissed Miss Thompson, in the mouth, five times.

"This is infamous!" cried Senator Walford, rising to his feet. Miss Thompson was nearly fainting.

"Well, now," remarked Mr. Smithers to the Senator, "I think you are rather hard on this lady. She ain't so old and ugly, after all. However, it never has been my practice to force my attentions upon any lady, and I will not demand the toll I have a right to expect from these other two lady professors."

He walked over to where the Senator sat. The manuscript of the speech still lay on the table before him.

"Now, sir," said Mr. Smithers, "I would like, as it will not be in my power to attend the National Republican Convention at Philadelphia on June 19, I would like to have the advantage of hearing your address upon that occasion, and you will oblige me by delivering it with all the grace and elocutionary effect of which I know, sir, you are complete master."

"I will be shot if I do!" said the Senator hotly.

Mr. Smithers placed the muzzle of his pistol on the bald spot on the back of the Senator's head. The feeling of cold steel in the hands of an unscrupulous person and against the bare skin is peculiarly unpleasant. The Senator, without a word, picked up his manuscript.

"Now," said Mr. Smithers, "imagine that we are a lot of enthusiastic Republicans assembled to voice the sentiments of the great party you represent, and give it to us hot. You can't expect me, however, to indorse all of your sentiments, because I am a Democrat."

The Senator cleared his throat and began:

"Fellow-Citizens, Ladies and Gentlemen: On this great and auspicious day, when the representatives of the great party of progress and enlightenment, the Republican party, are assembled in this historic place, to name our standard-bearer and to announce our principles, I count myself fortunate in being able to address a few words of encouragement and confident hope to you. We have before us three great issues. First, the maintenance of our currency upon the basis we have established after four years of untiring effort—a basis which makes an American dollar good for one hundred cents the world over. The second is the protection of the American workingman from the products of foreign cheap labor; and the third is the upholding of the honor and dignity of our flag wherever it has been established."

"Hold on," said Mr. Smithers. "Haven't you got anything to say about trusts?"

"Further on," replied the Senator, calmly proceeding with his address.

He read on for about ten minutes, his ringing, clear-cut sentences followed with distinct admiration, if not approval, by Mr. Smithers, as well as the other persons in the car. He then made a severe arraignment of the Democratic party.

"And now, my fellow-citizens," he said, "have you any reasonable ground for doubting that the common-sense of the American people will not prefer that their affairs shall be conducted in the successful and admirable manner of the past four years, and of many preceding years when the Republican party was in power, rather than to trust them to a party whose principles no man can define, and whose——"

Digitized by Google

Just then a terrific explosion shook the car. All understood in a minute what it was. The gentlemen of the road in the next car had got tired of waiting for the slow process of the combination lock and had blown the safe open.

"There, now," said Mr. Smithers, with an air of great vexation, "they have gone and done the very thing I didn't want 'em to do. I don't believe in using dynamite on safes if you can possibly help it. It's as likely as not they will blow everything in the safe to pieces, and every red cent we will get will be just the little you ladies and gentlemen have been able to contribute personally to me. However, I will just go out and see about it."

He walked rapidly out of the car. In a few minutes he returned.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "I am happy to inform you that the safe has been most successfully busted. Some little damage was done to the contents, but nothing of any consequence. We are now about to leave you, and I bid you a cordial farewell, wishing you good luck, and ask you to excuse me for whatever trouble I have put you to. You have afforded me a great deal of diversion, and I am substantially better off for having made your acquaintance. I think you will be able to get help in about an hour. Meanwhile, I bid you good-evening, and regret that I have not a card about me to give to each one of you in person."

As soon as he was gone the ladies fell into strong hysterics. The gentlemen did everything possible to relieve them, but Senator Walford, as he was in the very act of ministering to the pretty prima donna, whispered to the Representative from the Eighth District:

"We will be on our guard what we tell the reporters about this story. We will just mention the hold-up. But, if you won't say anything about that speech, I'll promise to keep quiet about the purse and watch in your shoe."

"You may depend upon me," said the Representative from the Eighth District.

Two days afterward the special rolled into the Broad Street Station. Besides the party bound for the convention, the Senator had invited his fellow-travelers from the little way-station to Grand Junction to be his guests as far as Philadelphia. They had enjoyed themselves very much. After all, as Mr. Smithers said, he had only taken from them their superfluity. The ladies on their way to Europe, and the professor, still had their letters of credit and their steamship tickets; each of the poker players consoled himself with the thought that he would probably have lost the money anyhow; and all of them, with the Senator at their head, took the event philosophically.

At the station the two parties separated. Senator Walford was overwhelmed with thanks.

"You can do me but one favor, my friends," said he, holding Signora Bellini's little hand, "and that is to be very much on your guard when you are interviewed concerning that hold-up. Recollect, we were stopped by a gang of at least forty men, who did not remain in the car five minutes, and whom we would not recognize, if we should meet again, under any circumstances. We did not exchange a word with any of them, but simply gave up our valuables. One thing is certain—we were none of us at all alarmed. We were perfectly composed."

"Except me," said the little manager. "I never was so frightened in my life."

"Why, my dear sir," said the Senator, "I thought you were the coolest man in the party."

"So I may have appeared," quietly responded the manager; "but I know this much—I would have given all my old boots to be anywhere else, and when that cold pistol touched my ear I came near dropping dead on the spot from sheer terror."

"Strange," said the Senator musingly, "that you were the only man who was frightened."

"The only man who owns up to being frightened," replied the manager. "But I think we behaved very well, all of us, under the circumstances."

To which all present agreed.

Memories of Moody By His Son

William Revell Moody

II. His Early Work in Chicago

DWIGHT L. MOODY began his career in Chicago in the early autumn of 1854. He soon secured employment at Wiswall's boot and shoe house. When a jobbing department was added he found greater opportunities than ever. He led in the size and profit of his sales, outstripping all the other clerks. His methods were unique and his zeal was ceaseless. One of his plans was to watch the depots and hotel registers for possible customers from other places, and the success of this added greatly to his personal showing. Mr. Moody in his boyhood had been trained to hardship, the greatest of all schools for the teaching of economy, and thus he knew the value of money. His ambition in those early days in Chicago was to make $100,000, a fortune which at that time seemed greater than a million would to-day.

He kept on prospering in his new place and in one year, with special commissions added to his regular salary, made over $5000, a very remarkable income for one not yet turned twenty-four. "I have always been a man of impulse," Mr. Moody once said to the writer. "Almost everything I ever did in my life that was a success was done on the impulse, and I suppose when I get ready to die I will be up and off."

By this time, too, he was doing an even greater work than merely succeeding in his business career. After joining Plymouth Church he began to find means for increasing its power and usefulness. As a boy in Northfield he had achieved remarkable results in swelling the attendance at the Sunday-school, and so, arguing from that, he conceived the idea that he could be of much value to Plymouth Church as a recruiting agent. Having come to this decision he hired a pew with the understanding that he was to fill it each Sunday. Like everything else he undertook, he fulfilled his commission with intense earnestness and enthusiasm. He did not wait for the young men to come to church, but he went after them, stopping them on street corners, visiting them in their lonely rooms, and even calling them out of saloons. It was altogether new and strange and the novelty of the whole work had an irresistible effect, with the consequence that in a short time young Moody was renting six pews which he filled every Sunday with his strange and motley guests.

THE OUTWITTING OF THE UNPRINCIPLED COLLECTOR

As a clerk young Moody's success continued unceasingly and his work was appreciated by his employer, who, seeing his qualities of argument and persuasion, decided to send him out as a commercial traveler. In those days the commercial traveler was also the collector for the firm, and the modern assignments, in which all creditors share equally, were unknown. Then, if a firm was on the point of failure, it was the man who got his claim in first who saved the most money out of the disaster. One Saturday afternoon young Moody was dispatched to make a collection from an establishment whose credit was under suspicion. While on the train he discovered that the representative of another firm, to whom the same store was deeply indebted, was hastening to the same place on the same mission. A continuous ride to the town would break into Sunday, and it was one of Mr. Moody's principles not to travel on the Sabbath. It was necessary for him, therefore, to spend Sunday at some point and resume his journey early Monday morning. The other collector did not have such scruples, but planned to proceed, arrive on Sunday morning, and thus secure his claim the first thing on Monday morning, which would probably have shut out Mr. Moody's firm. However, where principle was involved Mr. Moody never hesitated, and yet his business pride was at stake and it was rather hard for him to see the other man win. Consequently he determined to do what he could, legitimately, to get even chances. It was in the early days of railway travel and changes were frequent; so at one of those changes Mr. Moody and his rival took a walk, and Mr. Moody engrossed him so thoroughly in conversation that he missed his train, and thus both men got to the town at the same time on Monday morning.

Though Mr. Moody would not work for gain, or travel on Sunday, it was by no means a day of rest to him. His marvelous energy did not seem to know such a thing. If he were ever tired, a good night's sleep was all he needed in the way of refreshment. To him rest was not inactivity, but a change of occupation. He once said: "How I do pity people who hang about resorts doing nothing all summer. My! It would send me crazy." Thus on Sundays, though his mornings were occupied in getting young men to attend Plymouth Church, he had nothing special to do in the afternoons and evenings, and these hours he decided to give to Sunday-school work. There was a little mission on North Wells Street and he applied for a class. He was told that the sixteen teachers were amply able to instruct the twelve scholars, but if he would provide his own class they would be very glad to have him. This was just what Mr. Moody wanted. Next Sunday there was a sensation. Young Moody opened the door and led in a procession of eighteen little "hoodlums" whom he had gathered from the streets. He let others teach them, feeling in his modesty that they were more gifted for that work, but he knew that he could persuade them to come, and thus he gave himself up entirely to recruiting, with the result that the Wells Street Sunday-school soon had more scholars than it could accommodate. This experience was of great value to him personally, for it not only brought him into contact with life, but educated him in organization and administration. The greatest blessing of all in his connection with this school was the acquaintance and friendship with Emma C. Revell, who at this time was a girl of fifteen and a teacher in the school, and who four years later became his wife.

"I suppose you would like to know what I am doing," he wrote home in a letter at this time. "Well, I am doing first-rate. Shall be on there in the summer, if not before. I came very near going last week. A man offered to pay my way on if I would go with him to buy some goods, but Mr. Wiswall was so driven for help that he could not spare me. I should like to come back to the Bay State once more. Things don't look out here much as they do in Boston. Many stores are kept open on Sabbath-day. It is a great holiday out here."

And on the same day in a letter to his mother he writes: "I have made thirty dollars a week ever since I came out here. Don't let Uncle Samuel get hold of it, but, as it has turned out, I have done the very best thing in coming out here. My expenses are a good deal, but I can make more money here than in Boston. I will send you a bill of fare of the house where I board, and then you can judge whether I shall starve or not."

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF ORDER AT MARKET HALL

From the first Mr. Moody usually went from one success to another, and when he saw the results of his work in the Wells Street school he looked upon it all as a call to a larger sphere, and so, in the autumn of 1858, he decided to begin another school on a still larger scale in a different part of the city. This was the North Market Hall—a big public auditorium over one of the three city markets with which Chicago was then supplied. Mr. Moody, with two friends, began here the work that eventually developed into the Chicago Avenue Church, in which he held membership during the last years of his life. In this enterprise his genius for organization was conspicuously seen. The hall was not attractive either in appearance or in cleanliness, but Mr. Moody crowded it with young people. Mr. John T. Dale has described it vividly. "It was a large, dingy, dilapidated-looking brick building on the outside, while the inside presented a large, grimy hall with blackened walls and ceiling, and as bare and uninviting in appearance as can be imagined," he writes. "But it was soon crowded to the Editor's Note—This is the second of a series of papers which began in The Saturday Evening Post of April 7, dealing with the more important events in Mr. Moody's life.

Digitized by Google

doors with classes of boys and girls of a type that was new to me, largely the gamins of the street, bold, restless, inquisitive youngsters, whose only wardrobe often consisted of trousers, shirt and suspenders, and even these were often in a very advanced stage of dilapidation.

"At the close of the school Mr. Moody took his place at the door, and seemed to know personally every boy and girl; he shook hands and had a smile and cheery word for each. They crowded about him in the most tumultuous manner and his arm must have ached many a time after those meetings. It was easy to see the grip he had on those young lives and why they were drawn to that place week after week. The institution was a veritable hive of activity, meetings almost every evening, with occasional picnics and sociables, and services on the Sabbath occupying most of the day."

In this North Market Hall school Mr. Moody filled every office from janitor to superintendent. "Sunday was a busy day for me then," he said. "During the week I would be out of town as commercial traveler, selling boots and shoes, but I would always manage to be back on Saturday night. Often it was late when I got to my room, but I would have to be up by six o'clock to get the hall ready for Sunday-school. Every Saturday night a German society held a dance in the hall, and I had to roll out beer kegs, sweep up sawdust and generally clean up and arrange the chairs on Sunday morning. When it was done I would have to drum up the scholars and new boys and girls. By the time two o'clock came we would have the hall full and then I had to keep order while the speaker for the day led the exercises. We had to keep things going to keep up the children's interest. When school was over I visited the absent scholars and found why they were not at Sunday-school, and called on the sick and invited the parents to attend the evening gospel services. By the time I had made my rounds the hour had come for the evening meeting where I presided, and, following that, we had an after-meeting."

Associated with Mr. Moody in this school were Mr. John V. Farwell, at that time the largest dry-goods merchant in Chicago; Isaac H. Burch, president of one of the banks, and others.

NEW IDEAS FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOLS

Mr. Moody was fond of quoting an old Scotch saying: "They say. What do they say? Let them say!" This gives a peculiarly valuable insight into his character. He disliked the traditional methods. He wanted something more effective, something more practical, and thus there were never prearranged programs. The order of exercises was born from the day and the hour. Mr. Moody, or some other helper, would read a passage of Scripture, sing a hymn, tell an anecdote. The time was not only filled up but was made alive by the best interest that could be put into it. If there were unsuccessful teachers they were easily gotten rid of by a plan of transfers from one class to another, ending very effectively in the survival of the fittest. The success of the school was enormous. It reached an attendance of 1500, and new teachers were added and order was brought out of chaos. There were no international Sunday-school lessons in those days, and the teachers and their scholars had only the usual text-books and the New Testament. Denominational lines were not recognized, and a new, vigorous policy prevailed in every department of the work.

THE FORCIBLE CONVERSION OF THE YOUNG BULLY

In his various offices Mr. Moody did not always have plain sailing. As sergeant-at-arms he kept order as well as he could. On one occasion he had trouble. A young bully, the ringleader among the worst element in the town, made persistent and malicious efforts to disturb the meetings. He was a source of great annoyance. After being repeatedly warned he only assumed a more belligerent attitude. It was against the rules ever to turn a scholar out. Grace had failed, and Mr. Moody saw that recourse to other means was inevitable. At last he whispered to Mr. Farwell:

"If that boy disturbs his class to-day and you see me go for him to take him to the anteroom, you ask the school to rise and sing a very loud hymn until I return."

The meeting proceeded. The boy began his interruptions and Mr. Moody made for him. He seized him with a strong grasp, hurried him into the anteroom and locked the door. Then he gave him a thrashing such as he himself had known in his boyhood days in New England, and when he returned there was a flush upon his face, but it had in it an expression of victory. This boy was soon afterward converted, and many years later told a friend that he was still enjoying the benefits of that gospel exercise.

GOD'S REVELATION TO HIS TROUBLED SERVANT

By 1860 Mr. Moody had got seven of his one hundred thousand dollars. The country was filled with great excitement. Abraham Lincoln had been elected President, and along with other young men Mr. Moody was deeply interested in politics. His business took up his time and enthusiasm to a very large extent, but he was keenly responsive to the big questions and activities of the time. It was in the midst of this that the great change in his life occurred. "The greatest struggle I ever had in my life was when I gave up business," he often said afterward. This struggle lasted for three months, but finally it ended in his devotion of all that was in him to religious work. How it came about is best told in his own words:

"I had never lost sight of Jesus Christ since the first time I met Him in the store at Boston, but for years I really believed that I could not work for God. No one had ever asked me to do anything.

"When I went to Chicago I never spoke to the young men about their souls; that was the work of the elders, I thought. After working for some time like that I started a mission Sunday-school. I thought numbers were everything, and so I worked for numbers. When the attendance ran below one thousand it troubled me; and when it ran to twelve or fifteen hundred I was elated. Still no one was converted. There was no harvest. Then God opened my eyes.

"There was a class of young ladies in the school, who were without exception the most frivolous set of girls I ever met. One Sunday the teacher was ill and I took that class. They laughed in my face, and I felt like opening the door and telling them all to go out and never come back.

"That week the teacher of the class came into the store where I worked. He was pale and looked very ill.

"'What is the trouble?' I asked.

"'I have had another hemorrhage of my lungs. The doctor says I cannot live on Lake Michigan, so I am going to New York State. I suppose I am going home to die.'

MR. MOODY'S BODY-GUARD. THE MEN IN THE PICTURE ARE MR. MOODY AND JOHN V. FARWELL

"He seemed greatly troubled, and when I asked the reason he replied:

"'Well, I have never led any of my class to Christ. I really believe I have done the girls more harm than good.'

"I had never heard any one talk like that before and it set me thinking.

"After a while I said: 'Suppose you go and tell them how you feel. I will go with you if you want to go.'

"He consented and we started out together. It was one of the best journeys I ever had on earth. We went to the house of one of the girls, called for her, and the teacher talked to her about her soul. There was no laughing then! Tears stood in her eyes before long. After he had explained the Way of Life, he suggested that we have a word of prayer. He asked me to pray. True, I had never done such a thing in my life as to pray to God to convert a young lady there and then. But we prayed, and God answered our prayer.

"We went to other houses. He would go up the steps all out of breath, and he would tell the girls what he had come for. It wasn't long before they sought salvation.

"When his strength gave out I took him back to his lodgings. The next day we went out again. At the end of ten days he came to the store with his face literally shining.

"'Mr. Moody,' he said, 'the last one of my class has yielded herself to Christ.' I tell you, we had a time of rejoicing.

A TURNING-POINT IN A GREAT CAREER

"He had to leave the next night, so I called the class together that night for a prayer-meeting, and there God kindled a fire in my soul that has never gone out. The height of my ambition had been to be a successful merchant, and if I had known that meeting was going to take that ambition out of m.. I might not have gone. But how many times I have thanked God for that meeting!

"The dying teacher sat in the midst of his class and talked with them and read the fourteenth chapter of John. We tried to sing 'Blest be the tie that binds,' after which we knelt to pray. I was just rising from my knees when one of the class began to pray for her dying teacher. Another prayed, and another, and before we rose the whole class had prayed. As I went out I said to myself:

"'O God, let me die rather than lose the blessing I have received to-night!'

"The next evening I went to the depot to say good-by to that teacher. Just before the train started one of the class came, and before long, without any prearrangement, they were all there. What a meeting that was! We tried to sing, but we broke down. The last we saw of that dying teacher, he was standing on the platform of the rear car, his finger pointing upward, telling us to meet him in Heaven."

With the $7000 he had saved Mr. Moody began his life as a missionary and evangelist. He practiced rigid economy. He left his boarding-house, slept in the prayer-meeting room of the Y. M. C. A., took his meals in cheap restaurants, and lived in a way that would have killed a man of a less vigorous constitution. "I was an older man before thirty than I have ever been since," he used to say. "A man's health is too precious to be carelessly neglected as I did mine." But his soul was in his work and he carried out his plans with a diligence that seemed to be inspired. His methods were his own. He would not wait for the children to come to his Sunday-school, but would go to them, often hailing them on the street and seeking an introduction to their parents in order that their consent might be obtained.

THE SWIFT PERSUASION OF AN UNWILLING CONVERT

One Sunday afternoon he met a little girl on the street and asked her where she attended Sunday-school. She replied that she was not a regular attendant anywhere, and then he requested to be introduced to her mother so that the family would agree to her attending his school. The child knew who he was and she did not want him to see her home. She asked him to wait on the corner until she got through her errand. For three hours Mr. Moody waited, but the little truant had gone with no intention of returning. Several days later, however, he saw her again and she recognized him also. Without a word of explanation she turned and ran. At this time the drainage system of Chicago had just been changed, resulting in the elevation of the streets several feet. Some of the property owners not only raised their houses but built new sidewalks, consequently the connections between the old sidewalk levels and the new ones had to be made by steps. Up and down these walks the girl fled, and close behind her was Mr. Moody. Finally she ran into a saloon, and he did not abandon the chase, but followed into a little sitting-room beyond, then up a staircase into a little bedroom where the Sunday-school recruiting officer found the child hiding under a bed. He persuaded her to come out, and, after a talk with the mother, he secured her for the North Market Hall.

During the first year all that Mr. Moody received was about three hundred dollars from friends who became interested in his work. By strict economy he hoped to make his savings last several years, but beyond that he had no plans, feeling sure that either the way would be made open for him to stay in Christian work, or, in case his support failed, he might follow the example of St. Paul, who made tents while doing evangelistic work. If it seemed God's will for him to do so he could go back to selling shoes. His dependence was on God.

From teaching children and getting them into Sunday-school he began to know their parents, and, unconsciously, he was in regular evangelistic work almost before he knew it. It is impossible to state exactly when he commenced the special services in which he became more widely known, for it was a development rather than a sudden departure.

Mr. Lincoln's Quick Study of Mining

MISS LOUISE H. STEVENS, the lecturer and traveler, of Brooklyn, New York, is busy upon the memoirs of her father, the late Professor Stevens, who, among other Government commissions, surveyed the mineral lands of Venezuela, which recently figured in the international diplomatic correspondence.

The scientist had met many distinguished characters in his travels but, he said, by far the most inspiring was Abraham Lincoln. The way he came to meet Mr. Lincoln was interesting. This heretofore unpublished incident Miss Stevens intends to use in her biography. Professor Stevens was working up a mining case for the Government in a Western State where Mr. Lincoln was practicing law. Mr. Lincoln at the time was comparatively unknown in law and politics. When the professor engaged his room in the crowded country hotel he found that a Mr. Lincoln was to occupy one bed in the room as there was no other place where he could be accommodated. After arranging his books, the professor settled down in an easy chair to prepare his brief.

Mr. Lincoln soon came in and made himself known. He said he also had to spend the evening making up an argument upon a mining case, and he knew less about mines than about anything else. In an hour the professor finished his work and retired, but before he did so he granted his roommate the privilege of using all his books, maps and papers upon mines and mining. Then he went to sleep, and when he awoke at seven the next morning he found Mr. Lincoln just where he had left him poring over his books and papers. The lamp was still burning although it was daylight.

As Professor Stevens' case did not come up the next day he attended the court to hear Mr. Lincoln present his arguments. He reached the scene in time for the opening speech by his roommate and he stayed all through the session.

Although Mr. Lincoln spoke for over an hour on the technicalities of mines and mining he did not make a single mistake. He cross-examined some half dozen surveyors and engineers, and in every case puzzled and embarrassed them with his knowledge of the subject. Of course he won the case. But Professor Stevens said that everybody in the court believed he had been graduated in mining engineering and had devoted years to the study of the science.

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

The May Elections in the Cuban Cities

In May elections will be held in the one hundred and thirty-seven municipalities of Cuba. The suffrage will be restricted to those who can read and write and who have $250.00 worth of property, or who fought in the Cuban Army. After the municipal elections a general convention will be held, and it will submit a scheme of government for the consideration of the United States. Under Spanish rule there was, theoretically, no restriction to the suffrage, and the fact that the Americans have placed qualifications upon the vote, while States in the Union, with few exceptions, do not permit such things, shows that circumstances alter cases.

Good Things the Americans are Doing

So far the best results attained are physical. The fact that the streets of Havana are being better cleaned and at less cost than those of any American city speaks volumes.

It is evident that the populations of our new possessions have the tropical qualities of their climate, and they are not to be handled as easily as some of our own people whose life in colder latitudes has made them more amenable to law and order. The real gain so far in the new government which we are giving the islands has been in the way of honest administration, in the abolition of fees, the dismissal of blackmailing politicians, the correction of corrupt judiciaries and the general cleaning out of the practices which naturally followed many years of Spanish rule. It is a gratification to know that in this revival the strong natives are participating, and are developing fine qualities of character. For instance, the president of the Filipino Supreme Court, recently established by the American Government, was formerly Aguinaldo's Secretary of State. In the Board which General Otis recently appointed to report a practicable plan for municipal government in the Philippines, two of the five members are Filipinos.

The commission which President McKinley sent to the Philippines, just after the war, reported that the most desirable scheme for the government of the islands would be to inaugurate a system of local government based on a suffrage restriction by educational or property qualifications, and supervised, at least in the first years, by a commission of eminent and well-paid American officials at the ratio of one for every 250,000 natives. This is the commission: Judge William H. Taft, of Ohio, President; Judge Henry C. Ide, of Vermont; General Luke E. Wright, of Tennessee; Professor Bernard Moses, of the University of California; Professor Worcester, Michigan University.

The Constitution and the Flag

By a vote of thirty-six to seventeen the United States Senate declared that the Constitution did not extend over the Island of Puerto Rico by its own force. Under this decision it was left for Congress to say just how free our new colonists shall be, or just how little self-government or how few benefits of republican institutions they shall have. The Puerto Rican tariff bill has been a diverting incident in politics. After the President of the United States had declared in his annual message that it was the proper duty to give our new dependencies free trade, the idea of imposing a tax upon an island that had been recently swept by a tornado, and tens of thousands of whose people were absolutely dependent on charity, not only drew an almost universal protest from the newspapers, but created radical difficulties in the Republican organization. There were so many changes in the plan, followed by a special message from the President, asking that all duties collected be appropriated for the benefit of the island, that the whole thing has turned out to be more or less of a farce. Of course we shall hear from it during the campaign, but the only really important and permanent fact that it has developed was the vote on whether or not the Constitution, like trade, followed the flag. Senator Foraker, in a brisk and breezy fight, mitigated the situation somewhat by practically securing civil government for the island. Puerto Ricans complained bitterly of the proposed tariff. Those in favor of the Bill held that it was the practical way to raise the revenue which Puerto Rico needed, and that every penny of the money would be given to the island. Independently Congress voted $2,000,000 to relieve distress in Puerto Rico.

A Trade Gain of Forty Millions

In 1897 our exports to Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii Islands, Philippine Islands and Samoan Islands were $16,922,305, and our imports were $37,919,519. Last year our exports were $41,581,084 and our imports were $60,175,605. This year the figures will be even larger. Senator Beveridge, in his speech on the Philippines, spoke eloquently of the wonderful resources of those islands and of their importance to the trade of the United States, and he made this very

J. B. FORAKER
Photo by Chickering, Washington

BERNARD MOSES
Photo by Pierce, San Francisco

WILLIAM H. TAFT
Photo by Somers, Cincinnati

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE
Photo by the Pach Studio, N. Y.

RICHARD OLNEY
Photo by B. F. Keeney, Boston

significant statement: "Manila, as a port of call and exchange, will, in the time of men now living, far surpass Liverpool." He spoke as a man who had carefully investigated the facts, and his prophecy will be remembered. Except Puerto Rico, which was devastated by the storm, all our new possessions are doing well. The bubonic plague is frightening Hawaii somewhat, but the conditions of trade and commerce there are all excellent. Governor Leary has gotten most of the natives of Guam properly married, has imposed a tariff of eight dollars a gallon on ardent spirits, and has started the lazy population on the road to a larger prosperity. And the crops of Cuba are said to be the best that have been known for years. The tobacco crop will alone yield $24,000,000.

Some of the Problems of Expansion

Everywhere the discussion about expansion proceeds. One of its strongest opponents is Mr. Olney, who was Secretary of State under Mr. Cleveland. His views have attracted widespread interest, and he has probably done much to draw the lines for the Presidential contest. And Mr. Bryan is busy denouncing "imperialism."

One interesting difficulty in all the islands is to keep the Government's generosity from spoiling the people. The easiest way in the world to ruin the average man is to give him free food, and the somewhat indiscriminate distribution of provisions by our agents in Cuba and in Puerto Rico has filled the native mind with the happy expectation of existence without work. All that, however, will be gradually reformed, and it must be said, if we are to accept the reports from our officers and representatives, that as a rule the natives are measuring up to their new responsibilities.

Of course, colonial work is entirely new business for us. Heretofore the nearest approach to it we had was far-off Alaska, whose most serious problem generally was the proclivity of the whaling fleet to get lost and demand rescue; but now we have all these islands on both sides of the earth, with alien peoples whose habits and customs are entirely different from our own and whom we must assimilate as benevolently as possible. One big problem was how to manage the church question. Such a thing as a state church is entirely foreign to our ideas and institutions, and it has been interesting to watch how the Catholics and the members of the Administration have been handling the difficulties in executive session, and with such little show of conflict in the secular press. The average American politician would no more think of openly discussing a religious question than he would of committing suicide; and thus it has happened—and it may happen—that the church problems in the colonies will be solved by those skillful processes of church and political diplomacy which take place under the surface. Neither religion nor love is comfortable on the hustings. In the meanwhile many of the churches are doing all they can to extend themselves with a new expansion. We lead the world in denominations and creeds, having between one and two hundred, with new ones constantly forming, and if all of the new colonists cannot find something to their liking they will be indeed hard to please.

American Methods Abroad

One result of the Americans going to the islands has been in each instance to raise prices. The tendency is still upward and General Otis recently, in telling the army officers that it would be better for them to send their families away from Manila, mentioned as one of the arguments that the expenses of living in the Philippines were increasing too rapidly. A new journalism has followed American conquest, and judging from the contents of the papers, both in Cuba and in the Philippines, the greatest interest in the United States is beer. The larger part of their advertising space is taken up by announcements of the various beverages and their flaring accounts of the cafés and restaurants. At the same time it is not fair to judge the new occupation by this evidence. In several of the islands there are absolute orders, signed by the American officers, prohibiting any saloon from selling to the soldiers.

It is against all reason to expect these strange people to adapt themselves at once to American methods, and it is certainly problematical if the Americans will try to become acclimated in their habits. Our people consider themselves the finest products of human civilization, and when we take charge of a new poulation it is not to learn its language or to adopt its habits, but to gradually make it recognize our own merits and to try as much as possible to become like our own selves. Of course, all this means an enormous increase in the spread of the English language, and if any one wants to measure the century there is no better way than to take the fact that, whereas one hundred years ago the Spanish language outnumbered the English by six millions, to-day the English surpasses the Spanish by nearly three to one.

Digitized by Google

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior

Not so many years ago a somewhat lank, big-boned Pennsylvania boy went to Missouri to try his luck. His name was Daniel Webster Davis. The boys at school used to poke fun at him. He ought to make an orator, they said. This was funny enough, for at that time young Davis was bashful and unpromising. After a while he thought less of his name, and when his intimates forgot the Daniel and cut the Webster down to Web he felt, for the first time, that life was worth living. All the time somewhere within his make-up there was a desire for an effort at oratory. It may be that the taunts suggested something that might otherwise have gone unthought of; but whatever the reason, he began to study "pieces" and recite them. One by one he went through the difficulties of memorizing and declaiming the stock poetic and prose selections, until he knew them all. It was with this training that he set out for himself. At first he talked to small crowds—debating societies and friendly groupings. Then came politics, in which he "took sides."

His lankness gave way to bulk, and when his twenty-fifth year was at hand he was a strong, well-knit, black-mustached fellow with a head full of facts, a stout heart and a weakness for public speaking on political questions.

Daniel Webster Davis is now the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and it was he who arrived in Pretoria in President Kruger's private car.

Down in the southern part of Missouri there are entire counties that yearn for the time when he will come back on a speech-making tour. This is not a party preference, for political friends and foes are alike in their desire to "hear what Web Davis has got to say." Women have pleasant remembrance of a dark-eyed, black-haired man with a big mustache, who knows how to make political speeches interesting. He tells stories that women like to hear, and he speaks of the babies so tenderly and at times so amusingly that his audiences wonder that he is a bachelor.

Mr. Davis is in the thirties, but he speaks and writes as a man having the experience that comes with ripened sixty. When he was almost a youth he was Mayor of the town of Kansas City.

As a speaker, Mr. Davis, in common with most men who talk publicly, has a few tricks, and one of these involves story-telling. In a community where he finds the honest, whiskered farmer whose literature is neither plentiful nor changeful, he is careful not to be too advanced as to anecdote. He uses the old, reliable, moss-grown story that is clear as to point and uncomplicated in construction.

The Only Authorized Version

Linsay Flavel Mines, the poet, started his career, like many other versifiers, as a reporter upon a newspaper which paid its writers according to the space their work made and not by regular salary. One day he was assigned to report the ceremony of the laying of the cornerstone of one of the new public buildings in downtown New York. Dreams of a long, column article, and possibly two columns, flashed through his mental vision as he went from the office to the function. When he arrived there he found to his consternation that the business methods of Wall Street had affected the affair and that it was to be exceedingly brief. Bishop Potter lent dignity to the occasion, and after a few remarks began reading from the Episcopal liturgy. When the audience was dismissed Mr. Mines approached the Bishop as he was getting into his carriage and asked him where his prayer was taken from.

"From our prayer-book," replied the Bishop.

"I wish you would lend it to me so that I can copy it, because I'm certain there is not one in our office."

Those who know the Bishop and his dealings with reporters, and the fact that he never gives an interview to any of them, can imagine the look of surprise that he concentrated upon the young man, but it was only for a moment, and he silently handed the book to him.

The reporter had taken it and was turning away when the Bishop called him back, and in his solemn way said: "You know the charge that is made against most book borrowers? You will return it to me, will you not?"

"Sure," said Mr. Mines.

And his paper the next day was the only one that had that prayer precisely as it was prayed.

A Note from Leedle Yawcob Strauss

Living happily in Roxbury, one of the suburbs of Boston, is Charles Follen Adams, whose Leedle Yawcob Strauss is one of the imperishable characters in the humorous literature of America. This month—that is to say, on April 21—he will celebrate his fifty-eighth birthday. He was in the Civil War, and was wounded and taken prisoner at Gettysburg. His pen has lost none of its facility. The other day a letter from this office was sent to Mr. Adams on a business matter, and it was by mistake addressed to Charles Follen Adams. Very promptly came the following:

"Dear Editor: Below you will please notice my protest regarding the manner in which you have spelled my middle name, both in letter and on envelope. YAWCOB.

ADAM'S FALL

'In Adam's fall
We sinnèd all,'
Not only Sirs but Madams:
Though this be true,
'Tis wrong for you
To call me Follen Adams.
CHAS. FOLLEN ADAMS."

J. A. TAWNEY
Photo by Sanderson, Winona, Minn.

SARAH COWELL LEMOYNE
Copyrighted by Aimé Dupont, N. Y.

CHARLES FOLLEN ADAMS
Photogravure by Hastings, Boston

G. P. WETMORE
Photo by Parker, Washington, D. C.

VIOLA ALLEN
Photo by Sarony, New York

Two Americans Who are Stars

One of the most successful players of the theatrical season which closes this spring is Miss Viola Allen, who by her acting has made the fortune of "The Christian," and also that of Mr. Hall Caine. The play is far more successful in this country than in England, mostly because of Miss Allen's fine work as Gloria Quayle. Miss Allen was born in the South. She began at Madison Square Theatre, New York, in "Esmeralda," in 1882, and the year following she became the leading lady in John McCullough's company. She played with Salvini, Barrett, Joseph Jefferson, William J. Florence, and she was leading lady at the Boston Museum.

Mrs. Sarah Cowell LeMoyne was known for many years as a public reader, but before that she was on the stage, and in her early days played in "The Banker's Daughter," in which she had ten entrances and five lines, and had her pride somewhat hurt by a reference to her "Lady Macbeth strut." Mr. LeMoyne, her husband, was the Captain of a Massachusetts company during the war, and he returned to the stage after the hostilities were over. It was largely due to his suggestion that Mrs. LeMoyne became a star. Mrs. LeMoyne recently said: "What ability I may have as an actress, since I had had so little actual experience on the stage, must be largely owing to my training as a monologue reader, but fundamentally to hard work. I dare say I was fitted temperamentally for acting."

James R. Keene's Loyalty

One of the strongest traits of character of James R. Keene, the Wall Street multi-millionaire operator, is his loyalty to his friends. He is said never to forget one when trouble comes. Among his early associates after he came to New York from the West is an elderly man, now broken in health and fortune. Years ago, side by side, they fought the strenuous fight. After one victory came a defeat. The other could not rally, and all that he had was lost—all except Mr. Keene's remembrance. It is said that he receives at regular intervals an income sufficient to relieve his necessities from a "forgotten investment" made with the California broker years ago. Another instance of his staunchness happened not long since. A well-known man "on the Street" who had been intimately connected with Mr. Keene and his associates, lost all of his accumulations in an outside venture. He was more than sixty years old, but self-reliant and hopeful. "I think I can endure the Klondike," he said bravely to Mr. Keene. "There's no use hanging around the old scenes."

"Come in and see me to-morrow," replied the millionaire.

That evening Mr. Keene mentioned the sturdy resolve to a group of old friends, and the next day he turned over to the man who was down a sum of money sufficient to defray expenses in the Klondike for two years. "If he strikes luck," said Mr. Keene to his friends, "we'll all be glad, and our money will come back. If he fails, we won't regret the money. That show of the right spirit is worth it twice over."

It is two years since then, and the latest news from Alaska is that the old prospector has located claims worth something like a quarter of a million dollars, and intends paying New York and his friends a visit.

Two Popular Men in Congress

Senator George Peabody Wetmore, of Newport, was born in London during the visit of his parents abroad. He was graduated from Yale, has been twice Governor of Rhode Island, and was elected to the United States Senate by unanimous vote.

Hon. James A. Tawney, who represents the First District of Minnesota in the House of Representatives, was born in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, in 1855; he learned the trade of a machinist. He left Pennsylvania in 1877 and went to Winona, where he was employed as a machinist for four years. Then he began the study of law and subsequently entered the law school of the Wisconsin University. He was elected to Congress, and he has been reelected three times.

Digitized by Google

Moving the Big Show

By W. C. Coup * * * * Edited by Forrest Crissey

IT REQUIRES several months of hard labor to prepare any show for the road, even those already organized, for, as a rule, all shows "lay off" during the winter. With few exceptions the horses are allowed to "run out," and all the wagons and paraphernalia are stored in convenient winter quarters provided for the purpose. The wild animals are taken from their traveling cages and placed in more commodious ones. The manager then decides on his route for the coming season. This, in itself, is an arduous labor, for the cost of transportation becomes, necessarily, a most important consideration in his calculations.

The manager of a large show, however, can do this with comparative ease, since he does not fear opposition so much as does the manager of the small show and, consequently, may choose his own territory, while his small opponent must skirmish around to get out of the way of the larger show.

Therefore, the route of the big show is completed on paper not later than the first of February, and the first agent, usually the railroad contractor, begins his duties. Such a show as I am describing is perfectly safe in laying out its route thus early and advertising its days and dates for months in advance. And, having done this, woe betide any smaller concern which elects to show in the same neighborhood, for the larger show will immediately send an advance brigade and literally flood the country with their bills. Brigades of this kind are called "skirmishers," and are kept in readiness to jump to any point where their services are needed to fight any kind of opposition. They thus uphold a sort of monarchical right in the territory and prevent, if possible, the success of the lesser attraction. This makes it really far more difficult to manage a small show than a large one, as the latter has the "right of might," while the lesser shows are continually forced in each other's way, to their own detriment and often to their complete financial disaster. A large concern in a prosperous season clears an immense amount of money, but, on the other hand, a disastrous season is bound to result in an enormous loss.

THE FIRST ATTEMPT TO MOVE A CIRCUS BY RAIL

A few weeks before the time for opening the circus season the horses are taken in, stabled, groomed and fed with grain to get them "hard" and in good condition for work. The wagons are overhauled, painted and gilded, and, if necessary, new ones are built. The various agents are by this time hard at work, each having his particular duties to perform.

Previous to 1872 the "railroad circus" was an unknown quantity. Like all other circuses of that day, the big show of which I was the manager traveled by wagon. During our first season our receipts amounted in round numbers to $400,000, exclusive of side shows, concerts and candy stands. Of course we showed in towns of all sizes and our daily receipts ranged from $1000 to $7000. Finding that the receipts in the larger towns were frequently twice and three times as much as in the smaller ones, I became convinced that we could at least double our receipts if we could ignore the small places and travel only from one big town to another, thereby drawing the cream of the trade from the adjacent small towns instead of trying to give a separate exhibition in each. This was my reason for determining to move the show by rail the following season.

To this end, therefore, I at once telegraphed to the superintendents of the different railroads asking if they could accommodate us and guarantee to get us to the various towns in time to give the exhibitions as advertised; and in order for us to do that it was necessary, I informed them, that we be landed in a town as early as six A. M. From some of the railroad superintendents came the reply, "Cannot furnish switch room," and from others, "Give further particulars." After a great deal of correspondence I went to Philadelphia and interviewed the officials of the Pennsylvania Company. I urged and argued and argued and urged, until they said I was the most persistent man they had ever seen, and even told me they would pay me if I would leave them in peace. This, however, did not suit my purpose, and I hung on until I finally made arrangements with them.

After much preparation we eventually fixed upon New Brunswick, New Jersey, as our first loading place. We were new at the work and so commenced loading at eight P. M. and finished the job at eight A. M. with no extraordinary incidents except the breaking of one camel's back—the creature having the misfortune to slip off the "runs." From New Brunswick we went to Trenton, where I had hired Pullman cars for our performers and band, and cheaper cars for our laborers and other attachés.

THE SPARTAN HABITS OF THE OLD-TIMERS

Our experience with the vast crowds of the season before had given us the idea of building two rings and giving a double performance. This, of course, doubled our company, but it kept the audience in their seats, since they were precisely as well off in one part of the canvas as in another, whereas in the old one-ring show we found it impossible to prevent the people who were farthest from the ring from standing up. They would rush to the front and thus interfere with many other people. This two-ring arrangement seemed to obviate this difficulty, and, as it at once hit the popular fancy, it proved a great drawing card for us and others, for within a few months smaller showmen all over the country began to give two-ring performances. Indeed, from that time it seemed to me that the old one-ring show was entirely forgotten.

It was quite laughable, during the earlier portion of the season, to watch the expression on the faces of our performers when they came on to join us and were shown the Pullman cars which were to be their homes for the next six months. "It is too good to last," remarked one. "The expense will break the show," said another. To their surprise, however, it lasted that season and has lasted ever since. Previous to that they had been in the habit of taking breakfast at any hour from midnight to four P. M. according to the number of miles they had to travel; but now all is changed, and an era of luxuriant comfort has become established for them. For many months, however, at the dawn of this epoch, the performers viewed their regular meals and sumptuous surroundings with a comical seriousness most ludicrous to behold.

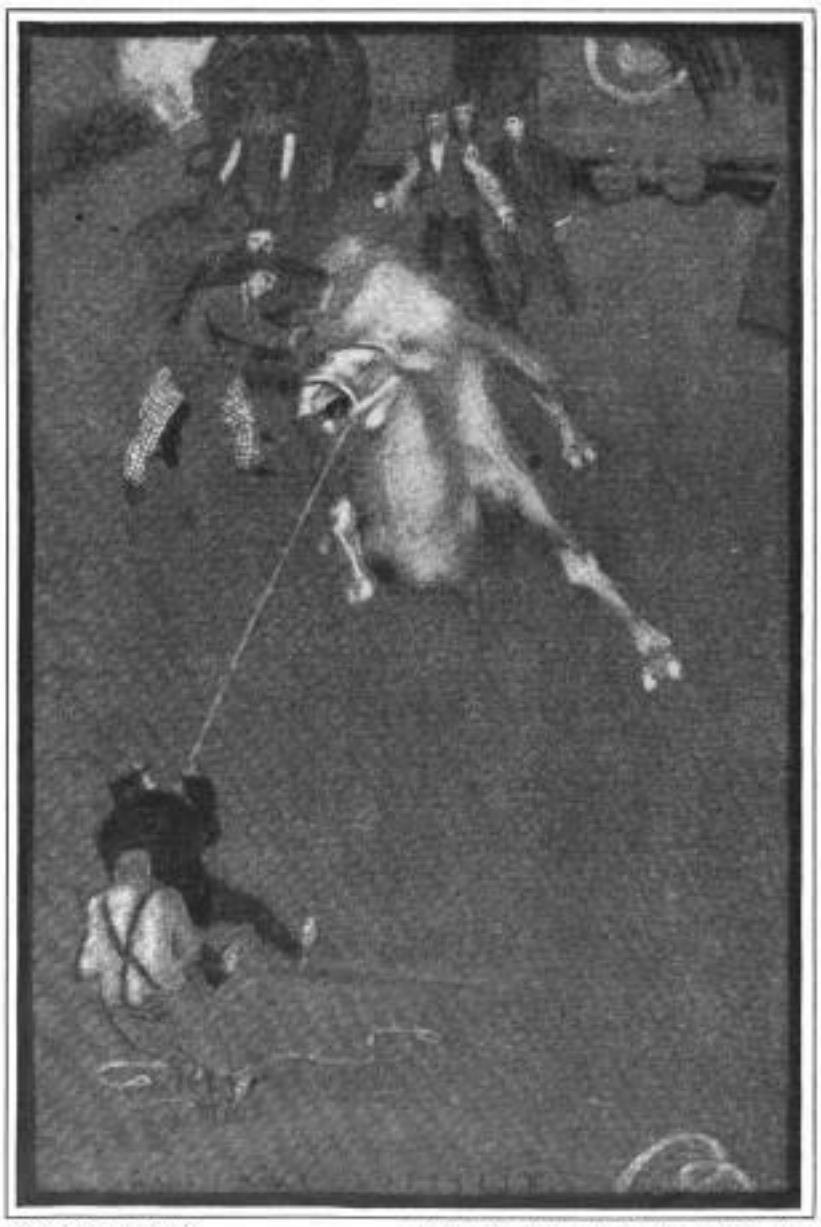
Small shows had, prior to this time, traveled to a limited extent by rail; but not with accommodations like ours. Such shows consisted of seven or eight cars, whereas ours numbered sixty-one. All of these, with the exception of the sleeping cars, we had hired from the railroad company.

SEVEN HEARTBREAKING DAYS ON THE LONG ROAD

It has always been a mystery to me why the railroads build themselves cars scarcely any two of which are of uniform height. Our heavy wagons would be pushed up on "runs," and, on being pushed from one car to another, would frequently crash through the rotten boards composing the bed of the car. This would cause vexatious delays.

The reader cannot possibly form any idea of the amount of labor involved in teaching our men to become proficient in loading and unloading. It is a positive fact that I never took the clothes off my back from the time of first loading until we reached Philadelphia, our seventh stop! During all that time I was constantly teaching the men the art of loading and unloading, giving attention to the moving of all the wagons, chariots, horses, camels, elephants, etc. We reached Philadelphia tired and exhausted with the seven days' hard work.

I was also mentally fatigued by my partner's opposition and his requests to abandon the scheme; but at this point I realized more than ever the benefits that would accrue from this great departure, and I determined to stick it out to the end. I went to the superintendent of one of the railroads on which we were to travel to Baltimore and Washington and told him I must have a lot of cars of uniform construction at any price. These he succeeded in getting after considerable trouble. I then made up my mind to try it as far as Washington, and if I could not by that time get everything to run smoothly I would abandon it. We reached Wilmington without mishap and gave our exhibitions—three each day. It must be remembered that we had advertised three shows daily and so far had given them; indeed, we did throughout the season, but that was the first and only year that such a feat was attempted.



I told the railroad superintendent that if we could manage to load in Wilmington by two A. M. and reach Baltimore at five A. M. it would be a success. He ordered the road cleared, and we arrived in Baltimore with the first section only a little late, and, with a little extra energy, we had the parade out on time and opened the doors to the morning performance at ten A. M. The trip from Baltimore was easily made, but from there we had to run over heavy grades up and down to Frederick, Maryland. In order to load we had to remove all the brakes, and this the yardmaster refused to do. I showed him my contract, wherein the company had agreed to remove all brakes, but he still refused, so I finally resorted to strategy.

I invited him to a restaurant, and while we were absent, by a prearranged movement, Baker, the boss canvas-man, wrenched the brakes off, and by the time the yardmaster and I returned the train was almost loaded. Of course I pretended to be very angry at such conduct, but our point was gained. As the brakes were easily replaced we made the next stop all right.

PERFORMING BY DAY AND TRAVELING BY NIGHT

I determined to have a train of cars built for our special purpose, and accordingly visited all the shops in the East; but I could find no one willing to undertake the job on such short notice. Finally, at Columbus, Ohio, I made the acquaintance of a thorough man of business. He was conducting the car shops there and was prepared to execute any order I might give him. In a short time I had made a contract with him, and in thirty days a train of cars was built. They were of uniform height, with iron extensions reaching from one car to another. These improvements made the loading and unloading mere play. I then heard of some palace horse cars at Cleveland. These I bought. I had them freshly painted and lettered, "P. T. Barnum's World's Fair."

When our men, as they came into Columbus to exhibit, saw that train awaiting them, they sent up such a shout as has seldom been heard. Now we had Pullman cars for the artists, sleeping cars for the laborers, box cars for the extra stuff, palace cars for the horses and other large animals, such as were required for teaming, parades, etc., and platform cars for wagons, chariots, cages and carriages. Thus the Herculean task of putting the first railroad show of any magnitude on its own cars was successfully accomplished.

DRAWN BY GASTAVE VERBECK

—THE CREATURE HAD THE MISFORTUNE TO SLIP OFF THE "RUNS."

Little, indeed, do the managers of the present day know of the untiring energy and indomitable perseverance necessary to accomplish that feat. The railroad people themselves were utterly ignorant of our wants, as we ourselves were in the beginning. Frequently, as at Washington, the yardmaster would order us to load one car at a time, then switch it away and commence on another. To load a train in this way would have taken us twenty-four hours! Finally, however, system and good order came out of chaos. Once properly launched on our season, we were able to give three performances daily, and quite often made jumps of one hundred miles in one night. The scheme, as I had predicted, completely revolutionized the show business, and has been adopted since, not only in this country, but by the French and English circus proprietors in their travels in Germany. It also greatly advertised us, vast crowds assembling at the depots to see us load and unload.

ON A RUNAWAY CIRCUS TRAIN

I once had a very thrilling experience while riding in the cab of the locomotive pulling our train from Indiana, Pennsylvania. This station is on one of the branches of the Editor's Note—The first of Mr. Coup's papers appeared in the Post of November 18, 1899. The series will be continued in subsequent issues. Each paper is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

Pennsylvania Railroad, high up on the mountain, the grade there being exceedingly heavy. It is, I believe, conceded to be one of the steepest grades on that system. There is also a horse-shoe bend, or curve, similar to the well-known one on the main line. While standing on the platform, about the time the last car was being loaded, I was accosted by the engineer, who inquired if I had ever traveled on a locomotive and if I would like to take such a trip. I replied that I would like to do so, and boarded the engine with him. A few moments later the signal bell was rung and we pulled out into the darkness. I placed myself so as not to be in the way of the engineer and fireman and was soon lost in meditation.

The sensation was indescribably weird and thrilling. The scene was shrouded in darkness, and, as we flew along the road, the only discernible objects were the trees, which seemed to me like giant sentinels saluting as we flew past. Now and then we caught glimpses of lights in the mountain valleys, but they passed by like a streak of lightning, so rapidly were we going.

"How far can your practiced eye discern objects on a night like this?" I asked the engineer.

"Only a rod or two," he answered.

"In that case," said I, "you could never stop the train to prevent a collision should an obstruction present itself?"

"No—not with these brakes," he replied.

As he said this his face blanched and he whistled hard for down brakes. Finally I heard him exclaim: "God help us! We're running away!"

On, on we sped down the decline at a speed that was something frightful. The engine rattled and shook, and several times appeared to be almost toppling over. It was impossible to stand, and I held on by the window ledge for dear life. Down the mountain we sped altogether helpless! We had no control over the train, loaded down, as it was, with toppling chariots, with horses, animals, elephants, camels and human freight.

PANIC AMONG THE ANIMALS

Evidently the animals instinctively knew the danger, for above the rattle and roar of the train could occasionally be heard some of those strange trumpetings which proceed from an animal only in moments of danger—often just before a storm or cyclone. Momentarily I expected the whole train to be thrown from the tracks and down the mountain side. By the occasional streaks of light that flew past us I could see the blanched faces of both the engineer and fireman, and knew that they fully realized our awful danger. Both of them, however, kept perfectly cool and I tried to imitate their example. How far I succeeded I do not know, but I do know that my nerves were strung to a higher pitch than they ever were before.

A blinding rainstorm added to the horror of the situation, and, with the speed at which we were traveling, each drop seemed to have the penetrating power of a shot. Quick as a flash the thought passed through my head: What if we meet a train? Just at that moment we sped past Blairsville at the junction of the branch road and the main line. The station lights seemed mere specks. As we struck the switch the engine jumped and almost left the track. Looking back we could see the rear lights of our train swaying in the path like a ship tempest-tossed at sea. Our speed seemed to increase as we flew along the main line.

We had gone twenty miles when a whistle was heard ahead.

"What is that?" I asked.

"Another train," replied the engineer; "it will pass us now," and as he was speaking the reflecting lights of its engine appeared, apparently not six rods from us. With lightning rapidity the trains passed each other and the "windage," to use a nautical term, nearly took my breath.

During all this time, which positively seemed hours, my thoughts were not of the pleasantest. On, on we dashed, the engine frequently jumping as it struck something on the track. It seemed to me a miracle that the train did not lurch sheer over some one of the terrible embankments. The fireman was not engaged in tending the fire. It was unnecessary. We were all mute spectators of the scene being enacted by this silent machine—the marvelous and lifelike invention of man. Gradually, at last, our speed began to slacken. We had reached a grade. The danger was past and our lives were saved!

A SINGLE TRACK AND A BROKEN RAIL

We were still moving ahead at the rate of thirty miles an hour when—crash! through the window came some object. Once more the whistle sounded "down brakes," and in less than a mile the train came to a stop. Shortly afterward we heard shouts in our rear, and the man who had flung the missile through the cab window came running breathlessly, and said that less than a mile ahead of us was a broken rail that would undoubtedly have wrecked our train. Knowing that the express train was due in about an hour he had been running back to the station to detain it, when he had met our "wild" train and, realizing the danger, had done all he could to prevent a catastrophe.

Back sped the man to the station to warn the express, leaving us between what were undoubtedly two horrors. The station was fully a mile away. Suppose he could not reach there in time! There we were on a single track, a broken rail ahead of us, an express train due at any moment behind us. Slowly we pulled up to the broken rail and at once replaced it with a new one, for we always carried extra rails on our train for cases of emergency. The track walker succeeded in getting to the station in time to stop the express, though luckily it was not quite due. We ran back to Blairsville and switched on to a side track.

There we found that the second section of our circus train was due at nearly the same time as the express train, and it was an anxious quarter of an hour that we spent in righting things. When, however, the second section did come in, I found that they had been more fortunate than the first section. They had taken the precaution to add to their train several cars belonging to the railroad company, which were fitted up with better brakes than ours, some of them being supplied with both new air and common brakes. Then as a consequence of these precautions the train had descended the mountain under perfect control. I learned a lesson from that experience and lost no time in fitting all our cars with air-brakes. I wish I could remember the name of the engineer. A braver man never handled an engine or went into a battle.

It may not be generally known that all well-regulated roads employ a certain number of men as track walkers, whose constant duty it is to patrol every inch of the road and report the slightest irregularity of rails, road-bed, etc. On this particular night the track-walker's lantern had gone out and the only expedient he could think of was to throw a stone through the cab window. I have often shuddered to think of what the consequences might have been had not his aim been a true one.

THE BRONCHOS' CHARMED LIFE

On another occasion, while going into Clinton, Iowa, with the biggest show I ever owned, we were running about twenty miles an hour, when the locomotive jumped the track and struck a tree. The shock threw all the cars of that section on their ends. The Mississippi River was on one side of us and a springy hill on the other. Here in this narrow place stood the cars, laden with animals of all kinds. It was truly an awful situation. We began to break up the cars in order to extricate the poor dumb brutes. We were compelled to hitch ropes about the horses' necks and pull them out, only to find perhaps that their legs were broken or that they were otherwise hopelessly injured. No fewer than thirty-five of my best horses were thus lost. The reader must remember that, as the cars had been thrown on their ends, in each horse car twenty horses were thrown into a struggling heap. Strange to say, the broncbos seemed to have charmed lives, for not one of them was hurt, and I was enabled to give a performance that day in spite of the accident.

The elephants were piled up in much the same way as the horses, and in order to extricate them it was necessary to strip the cars completely—a labor in which those huge animals assisted us. The camels were unhurt. The loss, in crippled animals and destruction of cars, amounted to several thousand dollars.

I cannot leave the subject of moving the big show without going back to some of my earliest pioneer experiences.

No other human being can realize like the showman the volume of dread hardship and disaster held by those two small words, "bad roads." At the time of my breaking-in we were passing through a section of country in the Southwest, over such wretchedly constructed highways that the slightest fall of rain was sufficient to convert them into rivers of mud. The heavy wagons would sink to their hubs in the mire and the whole train would be stopped.

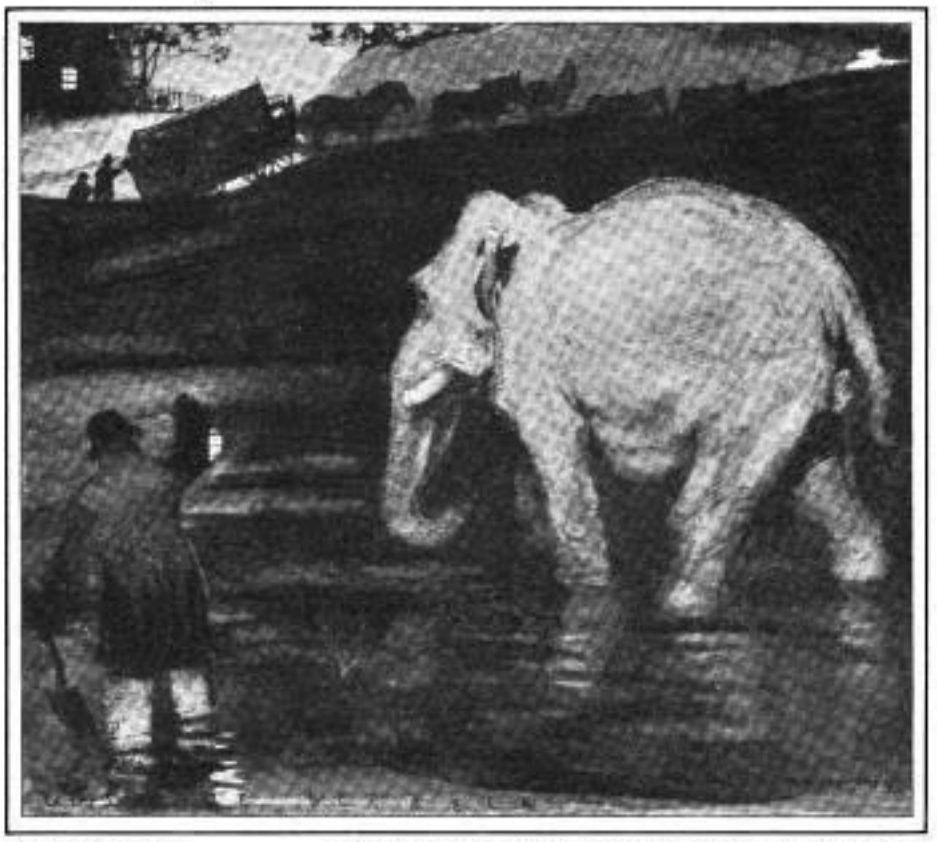
Then followed a scene too picturesque to escape the attention of even the poor fellows who were half dead from lack of sleep. By the light of flaring torches a dozen big draft horses would be hitched to the refractory wagon. Inspired by the shouts, curses and sometimes the blows of the teamsters, the animals would join in a concerted pull that made their muscles stand out like knotted ropes. But often a battalion of six teams would fail to start a wagon.

OLD ROMEO TO THE RESCUE

Then the shout would go down the line for Romeo. In a few minutes the wise old elephant would come splashing through the mud with an air that seemed to say, "I thought you'd have to call on me!" He knew his place and would instantly take his stand behind the mired wagon. After he had carefully adjusted his huge frontal against the rear end of the vehicle the driver would give the command, "Mile up!" Gently, but with a tremendous power, Romeo would push forward, the wagon would start, and lo! the pasty mud would close in behind the wheels like the Red Sea.

So vividly did this oft-repeated picture impress me that it is as clearly before me now as it was forty years ago. Sometimes, when an elephant was not available, the wagons would be literally pulled apart, and when the break came the horses would fall sprawling into the mire, only their heads visible above the surface of the mud.

But the poor horses were not the only sufferers from bad roads. The men came in for their share. Very distinctly do I remember the night when we were about to cross a slough. Some of us were dozing in our saddles, others sleeping soundly on the tops of the wagons which carried the tents. Suddenly the shout was heard from the man in the lead, "Help, there, boys! I'm going down in the quicksands! Throw out a line, lively!"



We knew the voice. It belonged to Hickey, the wagon boss, who was a favorite with the men. Instantly the fellows tumbled from the wagons and rushed forward. The torches showed Hickey sunk to his armpits. A man of ready wit and action threw a rope and the sinking man caught it and passed the noose over his head and under his arms, knotting it so that it could not slip and cut him in two. By that time a team of horses had been hitched to the other end of the rope.

"All right! Easy now!" came the order from Hickey, and the team was carefully started. Watching those horses strain on the rope made me hold my breath in expectation that the poor fellow would be actually drawn in two. But, finally, the grip of the mire loosened and he was hauled out to safety.

AN UNEXPECTED MIDNIGHT BATH

Perhaps the most disheartening of all bad-road experiences is that of losing the way—a thing which happened with perverse frequency. Just imagine yourself a member of such a caravan. You have slept four hours out of sixteen and are crawling along in the face of a drenching, blinding rainstorm—soaked, hungry and dazed. The caravan has halted a dozen times in the forepart of the night to pull out wagons and repair breakdowns. But it halts again and the word "lost" is passed back along the line of wagons. This means retracing the route back to the forks of the road miles in the rear. Many an old circus man has wished himself dead on hearing the word "lost" under these conditions.

After one of these disheartening experiences, when we were obliged to "right about face" and drive the poor, jaded horses back over the same road along which they had made their useless but painful pilgrimage, I clambered up to the top of the tent wagon, stretched out on the jolting, shaking heap of canvas, and was soon oblivious to fatigue and discouragement. My next conscious impression was that of a sudden crashing of timbers, the squealing of frightened horses and the sensation of falling. Then I felt myself plunging into the icy waters of a little stream into which the heavy show wagon and all its contents had been precipitated by the breaking of a bridge. It seems almost miraculous that I should have escaped falling under the mass of tents on which I had been sleeping, but in some way I was thrown to one side and contrived to reach the shore in safety.

DRAWN BY GUSTAVE VERBEEK

THEN THE SHOUT WOULD GO DOWN THE LINE FOR ROMEO

Judge Farrell's Wasted Eloquence

THE Honorable Robert Farrell, Judge of the City Criminal Court of San Francisco, who is familiarly called "Bob," prepares his public speeches with great care. The cause of this is an oration he made a number of years ago which was a noted piece of flambovant eloquence. It began, "From where Mt. Shasta lifts her snowy peaks in air to where San Diego sits by the waters of the ever-smiling sea."

The next day letters came in directed to "Mt. Shasta Snowy Peak Farrell," and "Ever-Smiling Sea Farrell."

It took months for him to escape the effects of his oratory, and he vowed never to commit the crime of eloquence again.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

421 TO 427 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

April 14, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription

5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

How to Make Good Aldermen

THERE are Committees of One Hundred that issue manifestoes signed by five-score distinguished names—and accomplish nothing. And there are smaller committees—of five or six, let us say—whose names are not often heard and might not be widely recognized if they were, yet whose collective owners accomplish miracles. The Municipal Voters' League, of Chicago, is a case in point.

And it is all a matter of organization—organization stripped of superfluities and directed very exactly and intently to a sole, definite and limited object.

The Municipal Voters' League handles nothing but aldermen and is in active business but six or eight weeks in the spring of the year. Yet this suffices; a handful of men have given Chicago its first decent Common Council in a quarter of a century. A Council made decent and kept decent—such is their single aim. When that body legislates for two million people—in numbers a nation—such a purpose is adequate and success in it is magnificent.

Half a dozen men—a stationer, an architect, a real-estate dealer, an ex-alderman and so on—say to the passive but well-disposed citizen: "Help us with a small subscription, and we will keep the town fit to live in. Ten thousand dollars will do it." Seven thousand did it in 1899. "We will give our time, taken from our business, and will begin where we ought to—at the beginning." Nay, before the beginning.

Before the primaries, that is to say. At the very first rustling of the campaign, when names of intending or intended candidates are but barely syllabled. The agents of the League—half a dozen salaried men, all told—penetrate every corner of every ward, and full particulars regarding the character and record of every candidate are got from those who know him best; each spring scores of suckling statesmen, more willing than deserving, are strangled in their cradles.

Every would-be alderman receives a summons to call at League headquarters. He comes? Always. He finds himself face to face with earnestness and experience. Bumptiousness and swagger ooze away. He is interrogated; he puts himself on record. "Can we depend upon you to favor one measure? To stand out against another? What are your views and ideas on this, that, the other?" Then the League, wholly non-partisan, pronounces for or against. Its verdict carries weight in the primaries. If there is a slip here, the League will enter a candidate of its own. It is detested and feared by the old-school politician. With reason. Three years ago a Common Council of sixty-eight members contained ten honest men. To-day almost two-thirds of them deserve that epithet—a state of things that has even made practicable the organization of the body on a non-partisan basis.

"You cry out against the machine," shouts the exasperated professional, "but you are a machine yourselves—one of the worst sort!" "One of the best sort," rejoins the League, "for we have no private axes to grind—our one object is to promote the general good." The children of darkness are angered to find themselves laid by the heels, their skulduggeries combated, their tricks forestalled.

To be an alderman in Chicago has ceased to be a reproach. Aldermen now openly appear advocating good causes among good people. The saloon-keeper retires; the young professional man begins to look in. The public servants now dine at a new club of their own and discuss municipal matters in an atmosphere of mutual esteem.

All this because a handful of earnest men have known how to do the right thing at the right time in the right way, and have done it—with all the private sacrifices, too, that such a service involves. As small a number would have saved Sodom. But they were not forthcoming. Will they be forthcoming in New York, in Philadelphia, in St. Louis? The mere method seems simple and efficacious—the men themselves once found. —HENRY B. FULLER.

Reform in politics would prosper better if the reformers had less appetite for the loaves and fishes.

The Democracy of the Schoolroom

EVER since the years in which emigration to the United States became the most significant movement of Europeans, there have been among us many patriotic yet timorous souls who have feared the effect of the influx of great masses of humanity unlike us in speech, social customs and political beliefs, and most of them far below the American standard of intelligence. Doubt could not be allayed by study of other nations that had received large bodies of aliens, whether by conquest or peaceable annexation, for mighty Rome was destroyed by races that she was supposed to have absorbed and made part of herself, and alien peoples have been the cause of almost endless trouble to the modern European nations: they have stood apart, remained clannish, complained, conspired, often rebelled.

Yet in the United States it is a fact—it is a mystery also to observers from the outer world—that our immigrants, of whom we have received about twelve millions, soon became loyal Americans, while their children and grandchildren cannot be distinguished except by name from the descendants of the first settlers of the colonies. The explanation is to be found in our common-school system. The schoolhouse is generally the first public building erected in a new settlement; it precedes the church, for while Americans differ theologically to a degree unknown anywhere else in the world, they are as one in the demand that their children shall receive elementary education.

Not only is the school free to all, but in States which are most intelligent and prosperous school attendance is compulsory. The schoolroom is the cradle of equality and freedom, for in it there is no distinction between foreign and native-born, rich and poor. Every attendant must learn the language of the country, and his standing from year to year depends not at all upon favor or privilege, but solely on his own intelligence and application.

To Americans all this may seem a matter of course, but to the immigrant it is an astounding revelation. No matter how dull and common the parent, he knows that ignorance was one of the bars that kept him from any contact that was not servile with the better classes in the land of his birth. Here, however, for several hours of the schoolday his children are side by side with those of the richest, wisest and best families of the vicinity. Children are as observing as the animals; they are adaptive and receptive, too, and therefore unconsciously, slowly, but nevertheless surely, they acquire some of the qualities of those whom they admire and with whom they associate. There is no democracy so genuine and assimilative as that of the American schoolroom and its playground, so at the end of the period of school attendance it would be a wise man indeed who could differentiate the children according to the races from which they sprang.

One evidence of this result of common-school training is that the system's most enthusiastic supporters are the men and women who know best. They have a missionary spirit like that of the church in its most proselyting days. When we occupied Cuba and Puerto Rico and began the conquest of the Philippines, teachers were as desirous as traders to go to the new lands. Through the influence of American individuals and societies twenty times as many children are at school in Cuba as there were a year ago, and scores of competent and energetic teachers are demanding as a right that they shall be permitted to establish our school system in the Philippines. Undoubtedly they will have their way, nor do our remaining half-million teachers doubt that at a not distant day the schools will transform the rising generation of Filipinos, Hawaiians and Puerto Ricans into enthusiastic Americans, or that the children will draw their parents after them. —JOHN HABBERTON.

The man who merely skims does not always get the cream.

New Issues for Old Parties

THE student of political science will see in the discussion of questions arising out of our war with Spain a possible reorganization of American politics along entirely new lines. So seeing he will be pleased, for he knows that frequent reorganization is necessary if political parties are to be made instruments of the greatest possible good.

Every great party is organized primarily with one chief end in view. It labors for that end until it succeeds or fails and the issue is settled. When this happens we see two parties which include practically all the voters of the nation. They have been divided on one great question. Some millions of people belong to party Number One for the reason that they were in favor of the issue involved. Some other millions are in party Number Two for the reason that they did not favor that issue. Party Number One has accomplished its purpose. Party Number Two has given up and admits defeat. Now it is that a reorganization is needed.

It is needed for the reason that after they have accomplished their object or failed to do so the two parties are useless so far as accomplishing any other great object is concerned. They are lined up for or against a dead issue and harp on the past without representing any active, living principles. If a new issue of great importance should come up there would be no hopes that all the men in party Number One would agree upon it as they did on the issue that brought them together. The leaders know this. As a result they hesitate to embrace such an issue. Instead they bring up as the principles of their party minor matters upon which no one feels so strongly that failure to agree will drive him away. They keep real issues obscured and make politics, instead of a great conflict where principles are involved, a mere game where each player strives to win for the sake of winning. The men of earnest purpose, the men whom the nation needs, have no time for such a game and drop out, while those without high principle or purpose get a chance and play the game for the sport and for the winnings. The latter are the spoils of office.

But when a great issue, an issue of sufficient importance to compel a new organization of political forces, comes before the nation it revitalizes politics. Men line up anew. Old parties are broken up. Men who were in party Number One are now in party Number Two, and vice versa. Now politics is no longer a game. It becomes work—work for earnest men with high principle. The spoils-seekers are crowded out by men who believe so earnestly in the issue involved that they will spend time and energy fighting for it. There is none of the old ill feeling, for now old enemies are working side by side. The strife we see now is fresh and sharp. It means something.

But when this issue has been decided the same evils will follow, until a new issue arises to reconstruct party organization and revivify politics. —LEONIDAS HUBBARD, JR.

Conservatism carried too far becomes dry rot.

Free Speech for Muzzled Officials

TRUTH is the greatest thing in the world. Possibly that is one reason why it is so hard to get at. In our modern methods and restrictions we have made access to it tortuous and difficult. Red tape leads through many labyrinthine paths. The men in administrative life and the officers of the Army and the Navy ought to be allowed to speak their sentiments with the greatest freedom, but they are all tied up by custom and convention. It is even worse abroad than it is in this country. A delightful instance of it was the case of Lord Charles Beresford. He was a member of Parliament for York, but in January gave up his political career and reentered the British Navy as second in command of the Mediterranean Squadron. Two days before he left politics, however, he made a speech.

"As I am not yet active in service, but still a member for York, I may express myself. Two days hence I will be on full pay, and must then drop politics," he said. That is, he could speak his convictions as a member of Parliament, but he must keep his mouth closed as an Admiral in the Navy. And he dealt his blows straight from the shoulder.

May it not be a good idea to detach some of our bureaucrats or officers and put them in Congress for a short time so that they might be as frank as Lord Charles was in his farewell speech? We abuse politics for a great many evils, of which they are undoubtedly guilty, but we should not forget that they offer our best means for getting at the truth. Even when the politicians talk too much it is better than if they did not talk at all. —LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Creeds endure, but every saint worships better in new clothes.

Parchments that Mean Something

AT LAST there is a possibility that the college degree in America will amount to something. In the United States there are nearly five hundred universities and colleges which issue these degrees, and as far as the general public is concerned there is little difference as to their relative values. The D. D. from a certain agricultural college, which made a business of degrees, looks just as big in the newspapers as if it had been conferred by the greatest theological institution of the land. Masters of Art have become as common as Colonels in Kentucky; Bachelors of Art are too numerous to mention; and a Professor may be anything from a bootblack to an astronomer. In Europe, where the degrees have their certain values, there has long been a disposition to regard all American distinctions of that kind in the light of suspicion or of jest.

Our educators very naturally appreciate the importance of reforming this evil, and the movement is rightly begun in the meeting in Washington of the representatives of the largest universities in the country. The Presidents of Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, the University of Chicago, and the University of California invited the Presidents of Clark, Columbia, Cornell, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Wisconsin, Yale, and Leland Stanford, Jr., to meet them in Washington, and to consider plans for making more uniform the graduate degree in America, and for improving its reputation abroad. By raising the standard in the best institutions necessarily the weaker colleges will be persuaded to increase their own value and usefulness. —WEBSTER WALLACE.

Digitized by Google

Americans in Paris

MRS. MARGARET SPICER-SIMSON, whose home is in Washington, whose studio is in Paris, and who paints mostly in London—art is a wretchedly cosmopolitan affair—will be represented at the Exposition by a number of her marvelously painted miniatures.

In connection with one of them there is a charming story. There was a very old lady in London—almost as old as the century—Mrs. Money-Coutts, a sister of Lady Burdett-Coutts, whose charities are known all over the world. Although Mrs. Money-Coutts was well over ninety, she had never had a picture of herself made. Her children tried to persuade her to have a photograph taken, but she would never consent. At last one of her granddaughters entered into a not unkind conspiracy with Mrs. Simson. Winter afternoons they visited the old lady and chatted with her, and Mrs. Simson made thumb-nail sketches. Christmas Day the little ivory miniature was finished. It was given to Mrs. Money-Coutts for a Christmas gift. She looked at it for a long time with her bright old eyes, and that night she gave it to her son—you must know Money-Coutts, the poet. The next day she died; and now all that is left is her memory and that sweet old face, immortal on ivory.

A very charming story I think—and yet I cannot tell why.

THE PET SUPERSTITION OF THE THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS

In my youth I was told it was bad manners to talk of a rope in the house of a man whose father was "hangit." There used, also, to be a point of etiquette to remember in visiting the Théâtre Français—so long the home of the French drama, founded by the first of the Bourbons, managed by Molière, reformed by Napoleon, and burnt under the Republic. Recently one of the sociétaires had taken me back to that wonderful green-room which was, perhaps, the last salon in France. On the walls pictures of Talma, Rachel and Mars; a wood fire chattering on the great marble hearth; a grand piano and age-old chairs; the famous players of the Comédie Française—some of them in the costumes of Le Marriage Forcé of Molière, others dressed in the fashion of fifty years ago—a few authors in evening clothes; and so for a little while we talked and bowed and walked to and fro as in a comedy.

"Would you like to see the stage?" my friend asked; and she was Mademoiselle Morêno.

We passed down a broad pair of steps to the stage. It was between acts, and the stage hands were dragging away——

"Beg pardon," I said, "I almost tripped over that rope!"

Mademoiselle Morêno wrung her hands with anguish; the stage manager turned away blackly; the actors in the wings eyed me with disfavor.

"It is forbidden," said my friend, "don't you know? For four hundred years it has been forbidden to mention—you know what—on the stage!"

And even as she spoke a stage hand came up bringing me a small bouquet of flowers, on top of which was a snip of the rope. I knew what that meant, and I paid my golden fine and put the flowers in my buttonhole—they were artificial, very artificial! When we had escaped into the corridor (which is a picture-gallery) I tried to learn why one must not speak of a rope in the house of Molière.

"I suppose it is only a superstition," my friend explained, "but you should go now before the house burns down or something awful happens."

I did not want Molière's play to fail, so I went away like the young man in the parable. With what success, for the four hundred years preceding, the management of the Théâtre had met in muzzling garrulous strangers I cannot say, but should any one ever quarrel again with well-seated custom, why here is history to give him the lie to his face.

THE SECRET OF BELASCO'S LUCK

Of course the theatrical people of America have quite as interesting a collection of superstitions. They know as well as you or I do that if the final line of a play is spoken during the rehearsals the play will fail. Only in America there are prophylactics against bad luck. The best of them is that practiced by Mr. David Belasco. He makes it a rule to pick up every piece of coal he sees on the street. They are better, he believes, than horseshoes. When he takes off his overcoat after coming in from a walk it rattles like a Noah's ark. In his library there is a whole corner filled with these offerings to luck. A few hours before one of his plays was to be produced I was walking up Fifth Avenue with Mr. Belasco. After we had gone a half dozen blocks I noticed he was troubled.

"What is it?" I asked.

"I think I saw a piece of coal—we were talking so intently I am not sure, but let us go back."

We went back five blocks and found a little three-cornered piece of coal. Mr. Belasco's face brightened.

"It will be all right now," he said; and it was.

Should you ask him now the reason of that play's extraordinary success he would tell you it was due to the fact that Mrs. Leslie Carter carried that piece of coal when she went on the stage. And to-day it is set in gold. I have never tried coal; I have no faith in black cats; but horseshoes——

THINGS NO GENTLEMAN SHOULD DO: WHISTLER'S CODE

After all, there is only one American in Paris, and that is Mr. Whistler. You might not think it should you see him, for his fluffy white hair, his eye-glass, his coal-black moustaches are very French; you might not think so should you hear him, for his speech is anything but American. It is a sort of singsong English.

(Ten years ago, when he was living up the Fulham Road, in London, he remarked in a moment of confidence: "I could never get to talk this blawsted English accent, but I can sing it!" And he does.)

He chants English in a way that makes other foreigners in London—George Moore, of Ireland, and W. E. Henley, of Scotland—mere banglers at the art.

But this paragraph is about Mr. Whistler's luncheon. It came off a few days ago. He asked eight people—the proper number for a luncheon—to come to his studio in the Rue du Bac at one o'clock. They were men of letters, artists, journalists—all of them Mr. Whistler's good friends and admirers. They put on their longest frock coats, they had their best hats ironed, they bought violets for their buttonholes, they took cabs—and arrived happy and hungry at the studio.

One o'clock. The sombre English servant took their hats and coats as they came in.

They filed into the studio—all except Monsieur Davray, who was ten minutes late. Mr. Whistler, in a very long frock coat, came up beaming.

"Good, y'know," he sang, "so good of you to come, oh Smith and Brown—feeling fit, Brown?—and Jones and Robinson?—wife better, Robinson?—and Jenkins. D'lyghted, D'lyghted!"

In his enthusiastic welcome Mr. Whistler dropped his eye-glass; it splintered on the arm of a chair; imperturbable, he took another from his waistcoat pocket and screwed it into his eye.

(Ten years ago when he was living up the Fulham Road, in London, he said: "No gentleman ever has a string on his eye-glass—if it falls he takes another one from his pocket and puts it in his eye." He said also: "No gentleman ever wears detachable cuffs or a shirt that opens behind.")

"Glad you're all here—where's Davray? Oh, he'll come nipping along after a bit," Mr. Whistler chanted. "Come over here to the table—I've got something—one of those queer American things, and, I say, it's jolly. Listen!"

It was one of those phonographic affairs, with a sort of long, broad-mouthed tube to exaggerate the voice that issued from it. I think it is called a gramophone. Mr. Whistler inserted a disk and turned the crank. There came out a grisly, queer voice, which sang Yankee Doodle. Mr. Whistler beat time and smiled; every one else smiled—it was half-past one and no sign of luncheon. Mr. Whistler put in another disk. The song that came out, in a queer, gruff voice, was:

"Honey, yu'z ma lady luv,
Yo' eyes are bright
As de stars above—
I'll sing dis song
Me whole life long—
Yo-se me-ah, la-ady luv."

Every one said, "Good, good! Bravo! How curious! Isn't it odd?"

And Mr. Whistler laughed.

"Don't you want to hear it again?" Mr. Whistler sang politely.

Every one said "Yes." It was two o'clock.

At three o'clock Mr. Whistler by request was still making that beastly machine sing Yankee Doodle and the nigger song—appetites were clamorous, and every one, save Mr. Whistler, was eating cigarettes or gnawing at paint-brushes.

"Isn't it extraordinary?" said Mr. Whistler—this was half-past three—"Sha'n't I turn it once more?"

Every one said, "Yes—yes—capital—again—again!"

Mr. Whistler turned the crank. Yankee Doodle came first; then came "Yo—az ma La—a—a—ady Luv"—and it was four o'clock.

Enter the sombre English servant: "Messieurs sont servis."

"Ah, luncheon is ready," said Mr. Whistler, and the eye behind his monocle was full of wicked humor; "I hope you gentlemen have an appetite."

The eight men filed in and sat down to a luncheon such as only an artist and epicure—like Whistler—could order; and as they speared the oysters they wondered who the joke was on.

—VANCE THOMPSON.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

In your issue of February 24, Colonel A. K. McClure, in his article, How We Make Presidents, says: "On the popular vote Tilden received 250,761 majority over Hayes, and in the electoral college, as the popular vote was cast in the States, Tilden received 203 votes to 196 for Hayes. On the morning after the election Senator Chandler, of New Hampshire, who was Secretary of the National Committee of which Senator Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, was Chairman, announced that Hayes was elected."

I have seen this statement before in the press, but never over the signature of Senator W. E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, or from any one who had authority to speak for him. I heard the inside of that campaign related to Assistant Postmaster-General Hazen, in his office in the Post Office Department, one afternoon by one who was close to Senator Zachariah Chandler. In that conversation I heard the Hayes Administration and its ingratitude to Senator Chandler portrayed in a masterful manner, and incidentally a famous dispatch that was sent all over the country by Zach Chandler, as Chairman, was referred to. The conversation so impressed me that when I returned to my home, Lynchburg, I wrote to Hon. Zachariah Chandler under date of April 6, 1877, inclosing an original telegram, and asked him whether or not he was its author. The telegram follows:

"To J. B. Work: Hayes has one hundred and eighty-five votes and is elected. (Signed) CHANDLER."

In reply I received the following autograph letter:

"J. Birney Work, Esq., Lynchburg, Virginia.

"Dear Sir: Your letter of the 6th ulto was duly received and should have received earlier attention. My dispatch of November 8, 1876, saying 'Hayes has one hundred and eighty-five votes and is elected,' was true, but had those words not been said and said at that time Hayes would never have occupied the Presidential chair.

"But for the most indefatigable exertions and unyielding determination that right should prevail, the Democrats would have stolen a vote or a State somewhere, and thus given Tilden the Presidency. Very truly yours,

"(Signed) Z. CHANDLER."

This being the first time I have ever seen over the signature of any responsible author the statement that Senator William E. Chandler wrote this famous dispatch, I submit Senator Zach Chandler's claim to authorship. J. B. WORK.

Chicago, Illinois.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Strictly speaking, there is but little difference between combination or corporation and trust, since combination, according to Webster, is a union or society, and corporation is a society acting as an individual. And what is a trust? Simply a corporation of greater magnitude, a more hideous evil covering a wider scope.

Within the past few months trusts have been organized involving capital to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. Notice the effect of one great trust last winter in the city of Chicago alone: 1950 men were thrown out of work.

A friend of mine built himself a new house last summer. A year ago this last fall he purchased a part of the nails necessary for the construction of the building and paid one dollar and eighty-five cents a keg. During the winter the nail trust went into effect, and in the spring, when he purchased the rest of his nails, he paid three dollars and fifty cents a keg.

I have another friend whom I met a short time ago on the street. He is a trust disciple. In the course of our conversation he said: "Look at the consolidated street railways; by means of their consolidations we are enabled to ride all over the city on one fare."

"Yes," I remarked, "that is true; and if it were not for consolidated street railways we, to-day, would be having three-cent fares. At least two-thirds of the street railway patrons have no use for transfers. Street railway lines are so numerous to-day that most of them can obtain car service in front of their homes and ride to their place of business on the same line, but it is five cents just the same."

Mr. Flint speaks of railroad combinations that have increased their reserves in times of prosperity that they might be able to pay dividends in times of financial depression. To whom do they pay these dividends? To the stockholders of the various companies? or their employees? Certainly not to the latter.

Grand Rapids, Michigan. H. O. SHARP.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I would like to ask through your columns, because it will come before many people, the reason why the endowment of schools and universities by rich men fails to accomplish the purpose intended—namely, to give the people the advantages of well-equipped schools and colleges and well-trained faculties.

I am deeply impressed with this because of an incident that happened some time ago.

A young man was desirous of taking a course in French. He wrote to the correspondence department of the University of —— for terms, etc. In reply he was informed that the tuition for one term by mail would be twenty-one dollars, that he must pay postage both ways, and furnish books, etc. Not being able to pay so much he communicated with a school of languages in New York and found that he could take the whole course, as many months or years as he liked, for five dollars, including books, postage free.

Now, the university has received many millions of dollars in the last few years, and the language school is a self-supporting institution of excellent and world-wide reputation.

Of what use is the endowment to the people—I mean the common people? Of course it is not necessary to the rich, because they are always able to secure the best and pay for it.

Fort Benton, Montana. H. E. ROBBINS.

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

REPRESENTATIVE BROSIUS' VOICE ECHOES AND ROLLS AROUND THE GALLERIES

WASHINGTON, April, 1900.

EVERY one at the bottom of his heart cherishes vanity; even the toad thinks himself good-looking, 'rather tawny perhaps, but look at his eye!'" Could anything be more delightful in the way of application than this saying to the recent exposition of this amiable weakness which our statesmen, politicians and public men, from the highest in position down to the humblest, have laid themselves open to here in Washington within the last few days? All the town is laughing, and Robert, who was one of the victims, is so sensitive on the subject that I scarcely dare to join in the laugh, and all because a clever woman had offered to mold the hands of statesmen to be used in the line of her so-called "manu-psychological" researches, engravings of which were to be used in a book called Hands that Have Built Empires.

When Robert received an engraved card correctly and elegantly setting forth that Mrs. Blank desired the honor of casting his hand in plaster, to be used in a historical manu-psychological book entitled Hands that Have Built Empires, I could have told him, had he shown it to me, that it was some clever scheme; but no, Robert did not show it to me. He was so inflated with the idea that his hands were molding an Empire that he swallowed the bait whole. He hunted up a manicure establishment and had his hands put into glistening, pink-tinted shape. He forwarded a check to the fair prophetess, gave the desired sitting for the cast, went about for several days with a pleased smirk and—held his tongue! along with other Representatives, Senators and big wigs from every station and calling here at the Capital. When the "murder was out" and the molder of hands had left behind her all manner of casts, purporting to be the hands of the high and mighty, the town burst into one huge laugh. I asked Robert what she had told him when she modeled his hand. He shamefacedly admitted that she had talked great nonsense.

"What did she say?" I persisted.

"Oh, well, there was a lot of stuff about there being 'rhythm' in my hand."

I looked at Robert's square, blunt fingers and said:

"Oh! she mistook you then for a poet? She told you, no doubt, that 'words become luminous when the poet's finger has passed over them its phosphorescence?'"

Robert laughed rather half-heartedly over this, and I said reflectively:

"Well, she knew how to play upon your vanity. She certainly understood well that 'Man's vanity is the only passion that gives him no respite.'"

"Oh, come now, Agatha! How about the time not long ago when so many of you women were taken in so cleverly by the débutante who advertised that she was 'An orphan, rich, well-born and attractive, would be glad to have a desirable chaperon for a season in Washington and would give handsome salary for same. References exchanged. All correspondence strictly confidential.'"

"That's not a case in point," I replied testily.

"Well, I don't see why not. Did not some of these would-be-smart matrons here enter into correspondence with the 'rich, well-born, attractive' débutante? Did not they have interviews, and in one or two instances enter into an agreement, for a handsome sum, to pilot the débutante through the shoals of a Washington winter? Answer me this?"

"Y-e-s," I admitted reluctantly.

"And did not these ambitious matrons find their interviews all exploited in a yellow journal very shortly thereafter? Was not the 'rich, well-born, attractive' débutante a clever reporter of that same journal out for copy?"

"True," I said meekly. Then, gathering up my spunk, I said:

"How about the button-mold tariff amendment that was offered in the House, for which so many members were willing to lobby without informing themselves whether there was such a thing as a button-mold interest, or without knowing that button-molds have not been in use for twenty-five years in this country, and that there's not a factory to-day that I know of that produces button-molds? How about the good-looking young woman who came here in the interest of this button-mold business, and who interested so many in the amendment which she wished to have tacked on to the tariff bill? How about the champagne supper that was given, and the money that was paid out for printing, typewriting and incidental expenses to get it put in shape to be introduced? And how about the dénouement? How about this famous button-mold amendment when, after it was actually introduced and was before the House, it was all exploited in a certain enterprising newspaper, with the names of members of the House given in full?"

"I hoist the white flag," exclaimed Robert; "that button-mold performance was enough to kill every tariff bill which may be introduced for the next fifty years, but, Agatha, that happened before my time, back in the Wilson Tariff Bill, and was the work of an unscrupulous lobby which took advantage of the hurry of the times to slip in that amendment. It was luckily not disastrous, and the country saw at once the state of the case."

SENATOR SPOONER

SENATOR BURROWS

"All very true, Robert, but such doings are enough to make free-traders out of every one who wants honest legislation, and it makes one question very seriously this Puerto Rican bill with its sop to the Northwest in the shape of its proposed amendment of free breadstuffs——"

"Oh, Agatha," interrupted Robert impatiently, "I do wish you would not get on to that everlasting old cry. Ever since James Madison introduced into the First Congress the first tariff bill there has always been a commotion which in those days was styled 'shrieks of locality,' and these 'shrieks of locality' have to be heeded and will never cease to be heeded so long as the National Congress lasts, justifying General Hancock's famous, though disastrous, characterization of the tariff as a 'local issue.'"

"I have seen a good deal since you have been in Congress, and why—if this measure has been so entirely for the good of Puerto Rico, and so munificent and wise on the part of the Government—should there be so much explaining and apologizing, none of which seems to hang together, and why should the great and wise Senator Davis have come to the front so hurriedly in the Senate with his free-trade clause?"

"Agatha, I tell you you know nothing about it. You can't understand politics nor anything of political expediency, nor of the ways and byways of parliamentary proceedings. I commend you to what Jo Bailey has just written about women in all parliamentary matters."

"Oh, yes," said I in my most nettled voice, "Mr. Bailey had probably been attending the meetings of the D. A. R., and he rushed into print in a periodical exclusively run by women and exclusively run for women, in which he said that women fail as parliamentarians because they 'lack the mental calibre,' and because 'the feminine temperament is constitutionally opposed to the perfect mental poise absolutely indispensable to success in governing a deliberative body.' He must have printed this just after his own parliamentary methods of filibustering failed so signally and were snubbed so decidedly in the House the other day when the Chair advised him to 'keep cool.'"

Robert laughed at my vehemence. He had steered me away from the tariff bill. He went on:

"I agree with Brosius. I am tired of this yell against our party measures and against the Republicans."

"That reminds me, Robert, that while Mr. Brosius was speaking in the House the other day some one made a funny comment about his voice. You know what a penetrating, reverberating voice he has, and how it echoes and rolls around the galleries, and some one said out loud:

"'Dear me, how he does go on, to be sure. He thinks he's making a speech, but it sounds more like boiler-making.'"

"I'm going to tell Brosius that," declared Robert in high glee.

"And I heard something else," said I; "you know, Robert, what a magnificent talent I have for hearing things. Well, I heard something anent our political outlook which I thought was very witty. Senator P—— said that he went to a dinner the other night, given exclusively to men, and Corporal Tanner was among the guests. Of course the talk was almost wholly of politics and of the big measures which are before Congress. Some one asked Corporal Tanner what he thought the effect of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the Puerto Rican Bill would be, if they became law, on the November elections, and what chances we had of a Republican House.

"'Oh, well,' said he gravely, 'in view of our treaty with the Sultan of Sulu I think

We have no agents or branch stores. All orders should be sent direct to us.

New Summer Suits, $5.

WE have just received from abroad some entirely new styles in Suits and Skirts for summer wear. We have had these illustrated on a Supplement Sheet, which will be sent free, together with our Spring Catalogue and a choice collection of samples of suitings, to the lady who wishes to dress well at moderate cost. We make every garment to order, thus insuring that perfection of fit and finish which is not to be found in ready-made goods. We pay all express charges. Our Catalogue illustrates:

New Designs in Summer Suits, $4 up.

In Foulé, Crashes, Cotton Covert Cloths, Duck, Linens, etc.

Tailor-Made Suits, $5 up.

In All-Wool Serges, Cheviots, Broadcloths, Covert Cloths, Venetians, etc.

Duck, Pique and Crash Skirts, $3 up.
Separate Skirts, $4 up.

Lined with Percaline, well stiffened and bound with Corduroy; made of All-Wool Cloths, Serges, Cheviots, etc., in the latest effects.

Bicycle Suits in the newest fabrics, $5 up.
Separate Bicycle Skirts, $3.50 up.
Rainy-Day Suits and Skirts made of double face materials.

Our line of samples includes the newest materials, many of them being exclusive novelties not to be found elsewhere. We also have a special line of black goods and fabrics for second mourning. All orders filled with the greatest promptness; a suit or skirt can be made in three days when necessary.

Write to-day for Catalogue, Supplement and Samples; you will get them free by return mail.

THE NATIONAL CLOAK COMPANY,
119 and 121 West 23d Street, NEW YORK.

WARNER'S RUST-PROOF

Pure! Delicious!!
Bonbons, Chocolates
Huyler's
863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK
Large Variety of Fancy Boxes and Baskets suitable for PRESENTS
Orders sent everywhere by Mail or Express.
Mail Orders receive most careful attention.
Huyler's Cocoa and Chocolates
Unequalled for Purity and Flavor.
Sold at our Stores and by Grocers Everywhere.

BRADLEY Platinum Paper
For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Send for sample picture free.
The Paper on which Photographic Masterpieces are printed.
JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 12th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

The very best proprietary articles in our market today are the formulas of expert professional men.

Sozodont was originated by Dr. R. Van Buskirk, a chemist whose standing in the community here he lived was always the ighest.

NEW SIZE
the Liquid, without the Powder, 25c.
arge Liquid and Powder together, 75c.
t the stores or by mail for the price.

Sozodont

P. O. Box 241, N. Y. City.

ew York HALL & RUCKEL London

KLEINERT'S

OLYMPIA

Dress Shields

The Olympia is the only perfect shield, and the shield that gives more satisfaction, wear and comfort than any other. It is the only shield that can be

WASHED and IRONED

It is Odorless

And will not rot or deteriorate with age. Our guarantee with every pair.

Send 25c

For sample pair and be convinced.

I. B. Kleinert Rubber Company

721 Broadway, New York

Live Agents Make Big Money.

The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.

THOUSANDS IN USE

Simple, effective, strong and compact.

Postpaid for 65c Stamps

QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Galien, Mich.

A New Idea in Trunks

The STALLMAN DRESSER TRUNK is constructed on new principles. Drawers instead of trays. A place for everything and everything in its place. The bottom as accessible as the top. Defies the baggage-smasher. Costs no more than a good box trunk. Sent C.O.D., with privilege of examination. Send 2-cent stamp for illustrated catalogue.

F. A. STALLMAN
60 West Spring Street, Columbus, O.

SHAVERS

Everywhere are tickled to death with my "Cream Foam." Comes in a convenient tube, containing enough for 50 shaves. No cup. No rub. Makes quick shaving easy. Nothing like it for why hearth. Pure, clean, refreshing, and WILL NOT DRY ON THE FACE. Send 10c. in stamps for full-size package, or 4c. for sample.

Just the thing to give your husband

H. L. RITHELSEN, 26 B'way, New York

that we ought to carry Utah at the November elections without doubt.'"

Robert laughed at this and said:

"Why, Agatha, no one need really feel any fear seriously about the main chances next fall for the Republicans. The party will stand together solidly, for it has hardly ever been the history of our party to have a serious split. Do you remember that wise old war horse who gave advice to a young politician how to treat a threatened bolter from the party? He said: 'My son, try with the party bolter what is known to practical politicians as the postponement treatment. By this skillful treatment I kept Podgers, in my district, from scratching or bolting for thirty-six years. When I first began to reason with his discontent with the party, it was a Presidential year and the canvass was on. 'Podgers,' said I, 'as you love your country, do not bolt this year. Never mind what our party has done. Consider the far-reaching and vital importance of the issues involved.' Podgers concluded to postpone. The following year I accomplished my end by reminding him that 'this is the first, and therefore the most critical, year of an Administration which you have indorsed, Podgers, and you must make some sacrifices to sustain it.' He concluded to postpone. The next year I said to him, 'My dear Podgers, you must vote the straight ticket this year. Do you realize what year it is? Of course you do. It is the prelude to the campaign year, and its significance is tremendous and far-reaching.' Podgers concluded to postpone, and the next year was again campaign year and I but repeated my argument first mentioned, and so on for thirty-six years; and that is the way I kept persuading Podgers to postpone. And this is the way it will be, Agatha; we will persuade the threatened bolters that, no matter how evil some things may seem to be in our party policy, they will be less than those of our adversaries, and you will see that, in spite of all this croaking, we shall pull the machine through; not only through, but up on to high, firm ground."

SENATOR WOLCOTT IN HIS AUTOMOBILE

"We'll see," I said in a voice that croaked like Cassandra's.

Meantime I am seeing, with both eyes wide open, the cross-currents in Congress. I am watching the struggle of United States Senators to come together upon some firm, common ground upon the great problems before them. Senator P——, who has been looking worried lately, tells me that it is not unlikely that the officials of the Government will defeat the treaty themselves if the amendment is adopted, and that the State Department is showing the cold shoulder to all politicians who approach the sacred edifice with questions as to how the British Government will act if the treaty goes through with the amendment. He says there is more feeling at the Department than there has been in years, and that it is almost impossible to learn anything, and that there is about the whole building a vague atmosphere of threat.

"I am reminded," said Senator P——, "of the complaints which Polo made of the State Department just before the Spanish War broke out. He would go there almost breathless every day, in the frantic hope of getting some word of promise, or of information even, and one terribly hot morning, after a fruitless expedition, he said to Sir Julian Pauncefote, 'The Honorable Secretary, Mr. Sherman, cannot understand me, so I go to Mr. Day, but Mr. Day he cannot talk at all; it must be that he cannot speak either English or Spanish; then I try Mr. Adee, but alas! Mr. Adee he cannot hear, and so I try Mr. Cridler—well!' And so," continued the Senator, "it is to-day. No one up there will either talk, listen or understand. But I believe the treaty will go through amended, and I also think that the British are quite as likely to ratify it as not."

"What about Mr. Quay?" I asked.

"I shall emphatically vote to seat him upon constitutional grounds. Not to seat him will make a dangerous precedent. Besides, we shall need Quay before the campaign is over. He can do things that no one else can or will do, and there will be plenty of work for him. Quay used to have the funniest way of attaining an end in the Senate. Whenever he used to get a hint that any of Pennsylvania's industries were in danger of losing protection during a former tariff struggle he would produce book after book from under his desk, and solemnly read hundreds of pages for hours at a time, all about steel and glass, until half the Senate would flee and the others would purchase his silence by granting him whatever concession he wanted. I believe that he kept those books as a sort of bogie to threaten the Senate, for they were always under his desk."

Meantime I have persuaded Senator P—— and Robert to join Page and me and the rest of the smart world in Lenten pilgrimages to Chevy Chase, there to indulge either in the chase of the poor, spiritless bagged fox, or the poorer substitute chase of the festive aniseseed. Robert did not wish to go, but I had previously made him become a member of the club and impressed upon him that, even if he did not feel "like a fairy, sportive and gay," he must affect to feel so, for all Washington is sporty in the spring season.

Page, who has been feeling very joyous lately, because of the love letters and cable messages she receives, decided to follow the hounds the other day, and Robert actually perked up and got himself up in correct riding garb and attended Page to the meet. Senator P—— drove with me in the cabriolet. Page has not been brought up in a hunting county of Virginia for nothing, and the way that girl took the stiff fences and wide ditches was wonderful.

I was as much entertained by the occupants of the carriages as by the hunters themselves, and enjoyed the items of gossip—yes, gossip—which Senator P—— indulged in for my express benefit. He pointed out to me the silver member of the House from Nevada, Mr. Newlands, who, as he expressed it, "is one of the boys." I could think of no one, as I looked at Mr. Newlands, but "Colonel Sellers" in The Gilded Age, for he is the counterpart of John T. Raymond as he was in his stage make-up. Mr. Newlands is a promoter of sports as well as a promoter of legislation, and can make as good a speech on either side of any subject as any man in the House, or he can take a fence, or send a ball spinning across the links with equal skill. Mr. Newlands was not following the hounds that day, but jogged along on a comfortable cob.

Next came Senator Wolcott whizzing by us in his automobile and nearly upsetting us in the muddy road. A moment after that General Corbin came dashing along, with a smart young woman perched high beside him on the box-seat of his vehicle. I remarked:

"What a sport and ladies' man General Corbin is getting to be."

"Yes," remarked the Senator dryly. "He's being badly treated, but he's working along on the plan of the consolation prize."

Just then almost the entire hunting field swept across our line of vision, then disappeared over the brow of a hill, and we pushed on to the little old-fashioned club house where the hunters were to meet when the run was over.

Editor's Note—The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 3. Each paper is complete in itself.

Another thing about PINGREE SHOES. The workmanship and the made-to-order-"feel" of them fully equal that of the best custom-made shoes. Shape-keeping, too, is included here.

PINGREE SHOES

are made for men, women and children—in all the latest shapes and fashionable leathers. The genuine always bear the makers' name.

First-Class Stores have them

Ask Your Dealer!!

The best shoes in the world for the prices: The Pingree Specials:

"Gloria" $3.50 for Women

"Composite" $3 for Women

"Governor" $4 for Men

PINGREE SHOE TALK

is just off the press—you'll enjoy reading it. We'll send it for the asking—and a clever souvenir, besides.

PINGREE & SMITH

Established 1866. DETROIT

Every One May Now Drink Tea!

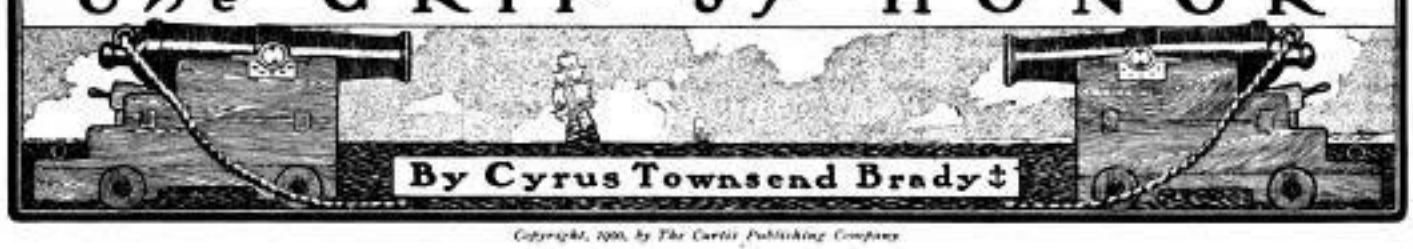
Tannin Conquered at Last in

Tea-Ette

Tea-Ette is pure Tea of the best grades, treated by a process which modifies the Tannin without destroying the good qualities of the Tea. TEA-ETTE is the result of careful scientific research. It aids Digestion, Beautifies the Complexion, Builds Up and Strengthens the Nervous System. It is rapidly finding its way into the best families, who recognize the evil effects of Tannin on the Lining Membrane of the Stomach. TEA-ETTE is the purest tea in the market. If your grocer has not yet included it in his stock, ask him to get it; or on receipt of 50c. we will mail one-half pound package. State kind of Tea you drink.

THE ROYAL TEA-ETTE CO.

43 Wallabout Market, Brooklyn, N. Y.



Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

W. V. WILLIS & CO., 124 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

The GRIP of HONOR

Copyright, 1910, by The Curtis Publishing Company

Eighteenth Chapter

THE ship is clear, sir," said Lieutenant Richard Dale, saluting smartly. He was a handsome, dashing young sailor, the picture of sea gallantry, as he ran lightly up the ladder from the main-deck and stopped before the little Captain of the Bon Homme Richard, who was standing on the weather side of the poop, keenly surveying the scene.

"Very good, sir," replied the little man, nodding but not turning toward his executive officer. "Look yonder," he added, pointing toward the shore. "What do you make of that, sir?"

"It cannot be the Alliance!" exclaimed Dale.

"'Tis indeed she," rejoined Jones sternly; "I have repeatedly signaled to Captain Landais to follow in our wake—to form line ahead. If we get out of this thing safely——" He stopped, compressing his lips passionately in a way which promised trouble for Captain Landais and the Alliance, a new and handsome frigate, the best of Jones' squadron. After a momentary pause the Commodore, a man of few words in time of action, turned toward the stern of his ship.

"Look aft there, too," he commanded.

"It should be the Pallas, of course," said Dale, as his eye fell upon a smaller ship which was following the Bon Homme Richard. "And the Vengeance, sir?"

"There! Hull down on the horizon, fleeing like a coward," exclaimed Jones bitterly.

"And those two white fellows forward there, reaching out from the harbor?" queried Dale.

"Are the Serapis and the Scarborough, if the information sent us by O'Neill be correct."

"Would he were here!" exclaimed Dale.

"Yes, he is himself a host," asserted Jones sadly. "We are fearfully short-handed. O'Neill gone, and Henry and Cutting Lent, our third and fourth officers, both absent. The Frenchmen are an unknown quantity. I have only you, Dale, and Stacey, and Mease—and the boys—but I can depend upon you."

"Upon me—upon all of us," replied Dale gallantly, "to the death itself."

"I know it," returned the Captain smiling and laying his hand affectionately upon the young man's shoulder. "They are very young, though," he continued gravely, "for such desperate work as this."

There was a little pause.

"Messieurs," said Jones, turning toward a little group of French officers who were standing on the lee side of the poop. At the Captain's word they stepped forward and saluted gracefully.

"Colonel de Weibert, you have served in the artillery, I believe?" queried the Captain of a fine-looking veteran. The Frenchman bowed. "Will you assist Lieutenant Dale in working the battery on the main-deck? It is an unusual place for a soldier, but we are very short of experienced officers. You understand the handling of great guns. It would be a great favor."

"Any place which enables him to fight the enemy is a good place for a soldier, my Captain. I am at Lieutenant Dale's service," answered the old soldier.

"You, Vicomte, and gentlemen," continued Jones, turning to De Chamillard, who was attended by several subalterns, "will take charge of the soldiers on the quarter-deck and forecastle. I desire a continuous small-arm fire to play upon the decks and tops of the English ships."

"Sir Captain," smilingly answered De Chamillard, a dapper, dainty little officer, "not a man shall escape my marine infantry, I answer for them and for my friends here as well," he added, indicating his gayly clad lieutenants.

"Remember, gentlemen," exclaimed Jones, his face lighting, "'tis for the honor of America—and of France. . . . Mr. Brooks," he said to an alert young midshipman who was acting as his signal officer and aide, "signal the Pallas to edge off to the east and engage the smaller ship of the enemy. . . . The big fellow is our game, messieurs. See! they are forming line ahead and are waiting for us. Brave fellows! Quartermaster!" he cried, stepping to the break of the poop and looking down at the old seaman and his mates stationed at the wheel, "d'ye see those two ships?"

"Ay, ay, sir," answered the veteran tar, peering eagerly ahead, "I see's 'em, Yer Honor."

"That's well. The one ahead, nearest the shore, is our mark. I intend to round to on her port bow. Mind your course!"

"Very good, sir," answered the steersman, giving a knowing squint at the lifting sails, and shifting the wheel a few spokes.

"Now, gentlemen," continued the Captain, "to your stations all. But stay. . . . Mr. Brooks, direct the sailing-master, purser and the junior officers to come up on the quarter-deck."

In a short time the two older officers and a little band of youths whose ages ranged from twelve to seventeen years stood before the Captain and saluted. His eyes fell tenderly upon the boys; so youthful and immature were they to be charged with the heavy responsibilities of the coming hour, which would have devolved upon older men but for their unfortunate absence.

"Young gentlemen," he said quietly, "accident has thrust you into positions of great responsibility which otherwise you might not have been called upon to fill for years. We are about to engage two powerful ships of the enemy. The Richard is heavily overmatched in everything except in the spirit and courage of her officers and men. I am determined—nay, we are all determined, are we not?—that the flag which floats above us shall never be struck. We may be sunk, but we will not surrender. I shall try to do my part; you will, I doubt not, do yours?"

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Count on us to the death, sir," broke forth from the impetuous youths who clustered about the Captain.

"I enjoin upon you the utmost vigilance and care. Give implicit obedience to the orders you receive from Mr. Dale, Mr. Stacey, or from me, and exact the same compliance with your orders from your men. They are a hard lot to handle; don't lose control of them." He paused a moment, scanning the intent faces of the lads close about him, and then continued: "Remember, too, we have more than one foe to fight—the prisoners below, the enemies yonder on the sea, and disobedience in our own squadron. Who keeps guard over the prisoners in the hold?"

"I, sir, with the master-at-arms," answered Payne, a resolute-looking youth of fifteen; "I wanted to be on deck in the batteries, sir, but——"

"You could have no more important station, my lad," replied the Captain. "Keep them under hatches. Do not hesitate to shoot the first man who makes a move to break out! They must not be allowed to gain the deck. At all hazards, keep them down! I repeat it, sir, keep them down!"

"Yes, sir," gravely answered the boy, awed by the emphasis of the Captain's manner.

"You, Mr. Mayrant, with Mr. Mease and Mr. Brooks, will remain on deck with Mr. Stacey and me," continued the Captain. "You, Mr. McCollin, will take charge of the old eighteen pounders on the berth-deck. You, too, have a post of danger. Be careful of them! I distrust them greatly, yet they must be tried."

"Ay, ay, sir. Thank you, sir," said the young midshipman, delighted at being thus distinguished.

"Mr. Casewell," added the Captain, turning to the largest and oldest, "you will take charge of the forecastle. Mr. Fanning, I confide the maintop to you. The rest of

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBBS

"REMEMBER, SIR, I REGARD YOUR STATION AS ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT"

Editor's Note—The Grip of Honor began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 24.

All the Badness Extracted

And nothing but goodness remains in Royal Dutch Coffee. This is recognized by thousands of persons who could not drink the ordinary brands because of the injurious effect on their health. No wonder, for more depends on how coffee is roasted than on the mere grade of bean. Ordinary roasting does not refine.

ROYAL DUTCH COFFEE

IS SIMPLY PURE COFFEE

It is the highest grade of bean grown and is roasted and refined by the BEACH PROCESS (controlled by us), which extracts the tannic acid and all the impurities which has made coffee drinking harmful to health. Royal Dutch is, therefore, a pure, wholesome and healthful coffee, which even the most delicate can drink with perfect safety. Unequaled for flavor, aroma and smoothness. Insist on it at your grocer's. Always one grade—that the best.

A one-pound package will be mailed to any address in the U. S., postage paid, on receipt of 45 cts. in Express or Post-Office Money Order or stamps.

Send for our free booklet.

WALTER McEWAN
Albany, N. Y.
Importer and Roaster of High-Grade Coffees.

KNOX'S GELATINE

It is the "finally" dessert—old and young like it.

Mothers are fully becoming conscious of the nutritiveness of Knox's Gelatine for Children, for it is the only one in America made of pure calves' foot stock.

I will mail FREE My Book of 32 Pages

"DAINTY DESSERTS FOR DAINTY PEOPLE"

It gives 70 delicious receipts and valuable information.

ANOTHER SUGGESTION

For 5 cents in stamps I will mail the book and a full pint sample. You can read a newspaper through Knox's, it is so transparent.

CHARLES B. KNOX
53 Knox Avenue, Johnstown, N.Y.

That Baby Again

See what

WHEATLET

For breakfast every morning is doing for him!

Several hundred thousand people—men, women and children—eat Wheatlet, the Ideal Breakfast Food, every morning. Do you?

Sold by Grocers. Write for Free Booklet

THE FRANKLIN MILLS CO., Lockport, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

HOOKON HOSE SUPPORTER

Holds the Stockings Up

Holds the Corset Down

Does away with Safety Pins

Being hooked on the lowest corset clasp it keeps the corset down and close to the body, preventing the pout of the corset from protruding, thereby greatly reducing the prominence of the abdomen.

The HOOKON cannot become unfastened; always comfortable, no matter what position the wearer may assume. Made of best materials, and will wear longer than other hose supporters. For sale at leading stores.

Send 50c for sample pair—silk
Send 25c for sample pair—cotton

I. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
721 Broadway, New York

WEBER PIANOS

In addition to the regular styles of Grands and Uprights in the choicest woods, we are displaying some special designs in LOUIS XIV, RENAISSANCE and COLONIAL cases, and will give estimates on other designs conforming to any architectural requirements.

Inspection Invited. Correspondence Solicited

OLD INSTRUMENTS TAKEN IN EXCHANGE

WAREROOMS:
Corner Fifth Avenue and 16th Street, New York
268 Wabash Avenue, Chicago

A Few Points of Merit in the Columbia Zither

Sweetness of Tone Best Workmanship
Instructiveness Best Materials
Inexpensiveness Durability.

EVEN A CHILD Can play it without a teacher.

No. 3 (here illustrated) $6.00
Others from $4.00 to $8.00

Inquire of your music dealer. If he hasn't the Columbia Zither send price to us, and we will ship, express prepaid.

Catalogue Free.

The Phonoharp Co.
182 Liverpool Street
E. Boston, Mass.

"SUPPOSE I LIVE"

That's the way to look at life insurance. If death comes the policy is in force. If life continues the policy bears fruit. In fact, life without a policy is worse than death without a policy. Ask us for "The How and The Why"—free booklet.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER
Is the Best

Does Perfect Work
Easy to Operate
No Jagged Edges

Sample 25c, Postpaid

Correspondence solicited by the trade. Money refunded if not satisfactory.

CHAS. G. HOPPER, Mfr.
Germantown, Pa.

The IDEAL Steam Cooker

Cooks a whole meal over 1 burner, as gasoline, oil, gas or common cook stove.

Reduces Fuel Bills One-Half

MAKES TOUGH MEATS TENDER. Prevents steam and odors. WHISTLE blows when cooker needs more water. DINNER SETS, BICYCLES, WATCHES AND OTHER VALUABLE PREMIUMS GIVEN WITH ORDER FOR COOKERS. Send for Illus. cat. We pay express. Agents wanted.

TOLEDO COOKER CO., Box 15, Toledo, Ohio

you will command the several divisions in the main batteries and the other tops. Now, young gentlemen, before you go to your stations I would take you by the hand, and so," lifting his cocked hat reverently, an example all present followed, "may God guard the right!"

The sun had just set and the gray twilight of late September was stealing over the sea. Battle-lanterns were lighted between decks on the Richard, the yellow flickering radiance from which glimmered on the sinewy, half-naked, sweat-covered bodies of the stalwart men at their quarters.

"Don't do it, sir; it'll blow up with ye, as the others ha' done"

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

It was a varied assemblage of about three hundred men that manned the guns and filled the tops. The crew had been made up in France out of such material as came to hand. There were about seventy-five tried and true American seamen, most of them veterans of many a hard fight and bold adventure. These commanded the different guns and filled the more important stations. There were, perhaps, one hundred and fifty veteran French soldiers—old artillerists—some of whom had volunteered at the guns. A few of the most expert marksmen among them were stationed in the tops, but the greater portion was divided into two large bodies drawn up on the quarter-deck and forecastle. The rest of the crew had been gathered from the riff-raff of all nations; perhaps a tougher, rougher, harder, more desperate body of men never fought a ship.

But in the presence of the enemy these men, whose passion it was to fight, forgot their personal grievances and, mindful of the finished skill and superb courage of their Captain, looked favorably upon him and eagerly anticipated the conflict. Rude jests and bits of sea pleasantry—usually permitted in moments like this—flew up and down the line between the Captain and the ruffians under his command, as he passed them in review.

He carefully examined every part of the ship. The young midshipmen, deeply impressed by their new opportunities and responsibilities, were pacing restlessly up and down, scrutinizing every detail of their several commands. On the berth-deck, standing before the hatch which led into the hold in which over two hundred English prisoners were confined, the Commodore found young Payne on guard, attended by the master-at-arms, two American seamen and three French soldiers.

"Ah! I am glad to see you at your station," said the Captain, raising his voice as the young midshipman, full of pride, saluted him. "You remember my orders, sir—to shoot the first man who shows his head above the hatch?"

There was a hoarse murmur from the prisoners beneath the gratings at this speech of the Captain's, which was, as he had intended, clearly audible to them.

"Ay, ay, sir. I'll do it, never fear," answered the lad in his boyish treble.

"Remember, sir, that I regard your station as one of the most important on the ship. Those men must not be allowed on deck!"

"They shall not be," answered Payne. "If the ship goes down, they go with it!"

There was another harsh roar from below. "Silence there!" shouted Jones. "Do what you can," he continued, turning to McCollin, "with the old eighteens."

"They shall be fought as long as they exist, sir," answered the young officer.

Nineteenth Chapter

THE Captain, not ill pleased at this and other manifestations of hearty spirit which had met him on every hand, mounted the ladders and resumed his station.

Anything less like a war-vessel than the Bon Homme Richard could hardly be imagined. She had been an old-fashioned, high-pooped East Indiaman with a towering forecastle. This antiquated makeshift had been pierced for thirty-six guns, twenty-eight twelve pounders on the main-deck and eight nine pounders on the quarter-deck and forecastle. In utter desperation at her entire inadequacy, Jones had recourse to the dangerous experiment, not often resorted to, of mounting six eighteen pounders in ports pierced for them on the berth-deck very near the water line. The guns were all of an obsolete pattern and much worn by use, the eighteen pounders being especially bad, as dangerous, in fact, to friends as foes. Bad as they were, they were all he could obtain, and, with characteristic determination, Jones resolved to make the best of them.

The Serapis, with which they were about to engage and to which they were rapidly drawing near, was a brand-new, double-banked frigate, mounting fifty guns on one uncovered and two covered decks, twenty eighteen pounders, twenty nines and ten sixes. She was manned by three hundred and fifty well-drilled able seamen and commanded by one of the best officers in the English navy, ably seconded by a full quota of capable and experienced subordinates.

Pearson had no more doubt of winning the victory than he had of the rising of the sun next morning. Leaving one factor out of a comparison of the opposing forces, his confidence was absolutely warranted. But Jones had no more doubt of winning the victory than Pearson had. Pearson knew his ship and his crew—Jones knew himself. He was the neglected factor that vitiated Pearson's conclusions.

All the busy notes of preparation had died away. There had come over the hearts of all, in that moment before the approaching crisis, a little silence which bespoke a recognition of the gravity of the fight to come. The mellow-toned bell forward was striking the time: two, four, six, seven bells in the second dog watch, half after seven o'clock.

The breeze freshened slightly, and as the Richard drew nearer the Serapis the latter swung her ponderous main-yard and slowly filled away. The two ships were sailing at right angles to each other, the Richard slightly ahead of the Serapis, which was moving to cross her bow.

"Shall I go to the batteries now, Captain?" asked the First Lieutenant.

To-day, to-morrow,
every day and every hour

Uneeda Biscuit

They're fresh, delicate, crisp, and get better day by day.

At grocers'.

For a sweet treat

Uneeda Jinjer Wafer

National Biscuit Company.

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup."

YERBA MATÉ

Is not a medicine, nor a concoction of herbs. It is the tea of South America, now being introduced into the United States through the International Commercial Congress.

"Many times," writes J. M. Carter, of Delhi, N. Y., "have I drank this cup, that inebriates not, with the kindly, warm-hearted natives. It is not only refreshing, but invigorating and restorative. A spoon will often work the whole day, taking nothing but maté."

Prepared and used the same as tea or coffee, and drank at breakfast, dinner or supper.

Ask your dealer, and if he hasn't it, we will send sample and booklet for 10 cents; or enough for 500 cups on receipt of $1.00. Agents wanted.

YERBA MATÉ TEA CO., Sole Importers
257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia

Can be enlarged 1 inch and strengthened 50 per cent. in one month by using the Hercules Graduated Gymnastic Club and Strength Tester Five Minutes each day. It will develop and strengthen the arms, chest, back and waist in less than one-half the time required by any other apparatus known. The busiest man may become strong and healthy by its use.

Write for descriptive pamphlet and price-list to HERCULES, Box 3559 Y, Boston, Mass.

STARK TREES PAY

Grown by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Fruit Book free. We Want Cash Weekly and want More Home and traveling salesmen.

STARK BROS., Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N. Y.

Digitized by Google

Old Hickory Comfort

Rustic furniture, beautiful and fashionable, for porch, lawn, summer house, clubhouse, etc. It is young white hickory, put together by hand: made into things that are strong, enduring and perfectly comfortable. The weather cannot hurt it, as the bark is left on. Chair like sample shown, $2.25; two for $4.00. Freight prepaid east of Rocky Mountains. Pretty rustic settee, $7.50. If your dealer does not keep them, write for illustrated catalogue, free, showing 50 patterns and unique Twentieth Century styles of Rockers, Settees, Tables, and all varieties of Rustic Furniture for Lawns, Verandas, etc., for Homes and Clubs.

The Old Hickory Chair Co., Martinsville, Ind.

BACK RESTERS

For Stenographers, Bookkeepers and Office Men

McCloud Adjustable Spring-Back Chair

Antique Oak, best leather cushion and pad.

Gives delicious comfort. You can work three times as long without fatigue, because the back can be adjusted forward or backward at any angle over the seat to give support where it is most needed, between the shoulders or at the small of the back.

It is superior to all other Chairs for use of Typewriter, desk or piano. Made in wood, cane, leather seat or back, including high chair for standing desk, in endless variety. All combining grace and elegance never before attained. Send for free catalogue and prices that will please you.

THE DAVIS CHAIR COMPANY

S. N. McCLOUD, Manager. Marysville, Ohio

LET US STRAIN

The Bugs, Flies and Mosquitoes

FROM THE SUMMER AIR FOR YOU

Our Good Fly Screens for Good Houses are delivered anywhere at moderate cost.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED DESCRIPTION AND SAMPLES OF MATERIALS.

THE A. J. PHILLIPS CO., Fenton, Mich.

We also have a good line of agency goods.

TO INTRODUCE OUR

Golden-Finish, Quarter-Sawed

Oak Mantels

We will sell 200 of this design at the remarkable price of $29.70 EACH, including best quality enameled tile facing, and 40x39 hearth, fretwork and brass-plated Club House grate and frame. These Mantels are well made and the richest grain effects are used in every part. Sample of wood, showing finish used, and illustrated catalogue free.

We Pay the Freight to all points east of the Mississippi River and north of South Carolina.

Alcott, Ross & Scully Co., 2010 S. Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Hot Waffles

Nothing Better. Or DELICIOUS WAFERS

With "Wagner" Ball-Bearing Waffle and Wafer Irons

These delicious articles may be had without any trouble.

For sale at leading housefurnishers at $1 each, or if your dealer does not handle them, we will deliver both to you upon receipt of $2. Book of recipes, with catalogue, mailed for 2-cent stamp.

Wagner Mfg. Co.

Sidney, Ohio

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples

WILL NOT COLLAPSE

And therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.

WALTER F. WARE, 512 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

"Yes, I think you would better," answered Jones. Then, to young Brooks: "Pass the word quicky for the men to deliver their fire promptly and together at the word. Not a gun is to be discharged until the order. After that, as rapidly as possible."

As the fleet-footed midshipman ran along the decks a murmur of excitement arose.

"Silence fore and aft the decks!" came the clear voice of the Captain.

The murmurs died away as young Brooks sprang up the ladder and reported that everything was ready. Down on the berth-deck in front of the hatchway little Payne looked to the priming of his pistols. There on the starboard side his young messmate and friend, McCollin, gave another careful inspection to his three old eighteen pounders.

They were nearer now. Suddenly came the sound of a hail from the English ship, the words of which were indistinguishable.

"I don't understand you," cried Jones. Then he turned to the quartermaster:

"Over with the helm! Hard-a-starboard!" As the wheel was put over the great ship swung slowly to port and rounded off the port bow of the English ship.

The Englishman hailed again.

"This is the United States Ship Bon Homme Richard," shouted Paul Jones in reply, at the top of his voice, springing up on the rail the while. "Stand by!" A quiver and shiver went through the ship from her tops to her very vitals. "Fire!"

Streams of light leaped out on the darkness, clouds of smoke arose at once from the sides of the Richard only to be brushed away by a broadside which had been delivered no less promptly from the English ship.

The desperate men ran the huge guns in and out and loaded them with frantic energy and kept up a continuous cannonade upon their foes. The roar of the great guns drowned every other sound as the two ships sailed side by side in bitter conflict, but the trained ear of the American Captain had detected another sound coincident with the first broadside which told a tale of disaster. When the loggerheads had been applied to the priming of two of the eighteens they had exploded, killing or wounding nearly every man of their crews.

McCollin, who commanded the battery, was struck by a piece of iron and received a dreadful wound. He remained at his post, however, clinging tenaciously to a broken stanchion until he recovered himself a little. As the frightened and appalled men shrank away from the remaining gun of the battery, not yet discharged, he seized the hot iron from the dead hand of the captain of number one gun and, setting his lips grimly, staggered over to the last cannon.

"Don't do it, sir," hoarsely cried the old boatswain's mate who served under him, "it'll blow up with ye, as the others ha' done." There was no reply. McCollin was beyond words. With set lips and grim face he wavered on before the awestruck men. With tottering steps he reached the gun and applied the iron. There was a blinding roar, and the gun whirled inboard in rapid recoil from the force of the discharge.

"Load it again," gasped the boy, striving to stop the blood with his hand against his side. Before the men, who had sprung eagerly forward, could reach the piece, an eighteen-pound shot from the Serapis' lower deck struck it fair on the trunnion and dismounted it. That battery was useless.

"All the men alive of this division," said McCollin thickly, "will find places at the divisions on the gun-deck."

A few moments later a powder-blackened, blood-stained little figure appeared out of the smoke before the Captain.

"I have to report, sir," said the boy, "that two of the berth-deck guns blew up, sir, and the other was dismounted."

At this moment a round shot struck the lad fair in the chest. With his hand still at salute he was whirled across the deck and thrown against the taffrail, a broken mass.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

PRACTICAL MUNICIPAL POLITICS for YOUNG MEN

By NATHANIEL C. SEARS

II. HOW CAMPAIGNS ARE CONDUCTED

THE young man who is willing to do his full civic duty will seek to make his influence felt in the election as well as at the primaries. After having performed his duty by taking part in the selection of delegates and in the choice of candidates, he naturally wishes to do what he can for the success of one of the tickets to be voted for; and naturally, too, the ticket for which he will work is the one in the selection of which he has taken a part.

The management of the campaign is usually vested in either a special campaign committee appointed for the occasion, or in the city central committee of the party. The city central committee of a party is made up of a representative from each ward of the city. The special campaign committee is chosen by the candidates from among men prominent and efficient in party work. Whether the work be done by the one or the other of these bodies, the method is the same. The general committee is divided into sub-committees, among which are the committee on halls and speakers, the committee on finance, and the committee on printing. Through these sub-committees the routine work of planning a series of public meetings, of distributing campaign literature, and of obtaining funds for the carrying out of these undertakings is accomplished.

THE WATCH ON FRAUDS AND REPEATERS

There is usually another sub-committee created for the purpose of detecting and preventing fraudulent action in connection with registration and voting. This committee undertakes the task of ferreting out such fraudulent schemes as the registration of persons not entitled thereto, and the colonization, in the saloons and boarding-houses of the worst districts, of tramps and vicious characters not entitled to vote, who are given a temporary residence to enable them to register fraudulently as residents and vote. The vigilance of each political party is directed to possible frauds by the other party; and the existence of these committees, organized to detect and prevent such action, operates as a great check upon these abuses. As a result of party vigilance, more stringent primary and election laws and a more thorough enforcement of them, the extent of such frauds has been greatly lessened.

THE WORK OF THE WARD COMMITTEE

The committee plan a series of public meetings, extending over the period of the campaign, which is usually of not less than five and not more than ten weeks' duration. Meetings are thus held in every ward of the city, and frequently several in different parts of the same ward. The purpose of the meetings is twofold—to keep up interest in the election and loyalty to the party by means of public speeches, and as well to give the candidates for the various city offices opportunity to meet the voters and address them. By means of music and the attraction of good speakers, it is sought by each district to make its particular meeting a successful one in comparison with those held elsewhere. The committee engage as many speakers of ability and reputation as the nature of the campaign will allow, who go from meeting to meeting each night and address as many as the time will permit. The same speakers thus appear before several meetings in different parts of the city upon each evening.

Aside from this plan of campaign carried out by the committee, the candidates must make a personal campaign.

In all our political system there is no campaign so difficult in point of labor on the part of the candidates as is the one incident to a general city election. In the case of elections to other executive offices, the work

Editor's Note—This is the second of a series of three papers by Judge Sears, begun in the Post of March 31. Each article is complete in itself.

Won't Need a Baby Carriage

IF YOU BUY OUR NEW

Automatic Go-cart

It answers as both. A slight foot pressure changes it into a comfortable baby carriage; and back again into a go-cart. Perfectly simple. Overcomes every objection to the old style. Write for particulars.

Most Comfortable Invalid Chairs

and safest, are made by us; the kind sick persons should have. Cost no more than the ordinary.

Bloch Reclining Chairs 50 changes of position.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for catalogue.

If your dealer won't supply our Automatic Go-Cart, we will ship direct from factory.

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory

713 and 715 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia

The Plain Ironing

For a large family can be done in one hour with a

Gem Ironing Machine

Saves Time, Work, Clothes, Money

Keeps your servants happy, because it is to ironing what a sewing machine is to hand sewing.

Simple in construction, indestructible. No home laundry is complete without it.

Don't use methods a century old when you can buy this great labor-saver for $40.00

Booklet, "Clean Linen," with good laundry free with catalogue of Ironing Machines, Mangle Washing Machines, Clothes Dryers, etc., for home clubs, hospitals, small hotels, boarding schools, etc.

STEEL ROLL MANGLE COMPANY

218 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

Thrice Armed

for business is he who uses the Remington Standard Typewriter.

Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict, 327 Broadway, New York

The market gardener, the truck raiser, the farmer, the flower grower, all need the help of Rawson's 1900 Seed Book. Tells all about the famous

Arlington Tested Seeds

Describes many novelties and specialties. It's free—write for it.

W. W. Rawson & Co.

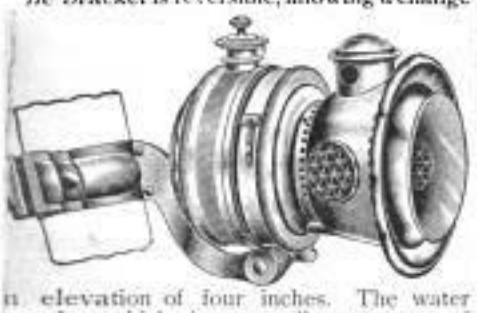
13-15 Faneuil Hall Sq.

Boston, Mass.

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES [illegible] buggies by automatic machinery from materials bought for cash. We sell direct at

Save Dealers' Profits



Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS STOCKS on every floor. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 56-68 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

Digitized by Google

O. K. 1900 Acetylene Lamp

s the latest and best. It is small, com- act, light and exceedingly handsome. The bracket is reversible, allowing a change n elevation of four inches. The water upply, which is generally a source of rouble in Acetylene Lamps, is under perfect ontrol. It has ground-glass lens, lava-tip urner, and all material and workmanship re of the highest grade. The carbide is oaded in a bag, quick and clean to handle. The light is clear, strong and steady. Retail rice, $2.50. If your dealer doesn't have it, ve will send it express prepaid to any point n the United States for this price.

Descriptive booklet sent free

EAL LOCK CO., 160 Washington St., Chicago

It Fits the Leg

Fits best because best shape; easiest to adjust. The most comfortable garter a man can wear—

BRIGHTON Silk Garter

Flat, nickel clasp and trimmings, pure silk elastic web. All colors, newest patterns. 25c pair at furnishers' or by mail.

PIONEER SUSPENDER CO.
716 Market Street
Philadelphia

THE PUTMAN BOOTS

for practical Sportsmen's Footwear. We have for 18 years supplied Western Hunters, Prospectors, Ranchmen and Engineers (who demand the best), and have learned through our personal contact with them to make a perfect boot. SEND FOR CATALOGUE OF OVER 20 DIFFERENT STYLES OF BOOTS. ALSO INDIAN TANNED MOOSE-HIDE MOCCASINS. This cut shows No. 678, 14-inch Boot. Uppers are Special Chrome Tanned Calf Skin. Tanned with the grain of the hide left on our special tannage, making the leather WATER-PROOF. Large eyelets, wide leather laces, laced at side to fit tight around top. Sole genuine hand sewed. (Making it soft and easy.)

Made to measure and delivered to any part of U. S. for $7.50

Send for blank showing how to measure your feet.

H. J. PUTMAN & COMPANY
10 Hennepin Avenue, Minneapolis, Minnesota

Always ready for use. Clean and Effective

Star Scraper

Cleans Pots, Pans, Kettles, Sinks and Plates quickly and thoroughly. Made of tempered flexible brass.

Sample, by mail, 10c

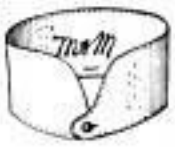
HOUSEHOLD SPECIALTY MFG. CO.
43 Leonard Street, New York City.

The Earth is Covered with Velvet to Those Who Wear

Gilbert's Heel Cushions

"INSIDE THEIR SHOES."

Remove Jar in Walking, Increase Height, Make Better Fitting Shoes, Arch the Instep. Indorsed by physicians. Simply placed in the heel, felt down. Don't require larger shoes. ½ in.—25c; ¾ in., 35c; 1 in., 50c; per pair. At shoe and dep't. stores. READ.—Send name, size of shoe, height desired, and two-cent stamp for pair on ten days' trial.



GILBERT MFG. CO., No. 16 Elm St., Rochester, N. Y.

9 for 10 Cents

We will send to any one 9 handsome Tidy Battenburg designs, all different, stamped on colored cambric. Also our new 100-page catalogue of Fancy Work Novelties and Handkerchiefs. All for 10 cents.

C. S. DAVISSON & CO.
391 Broadway, N. Y. Dept. 69

WHY not sell the celebrated M. & M. white and fancy rubber collars, cuffs, fronts and waterproof muckluks? All other goods in great demand, patented and guaranteed; 125 styles; catalogue free; liberal commission; exclusive territory; no better line to sell; few as good. 1900 agts. wanted at once. Write immediately.

M. & M. MANUFACTURING CO.
Springfield, Mass.

necessary to be done by the candidates, if great in the aggregate, is at least spread over a considerable period of time. The nominee for gubernatorial office proceeds in dignified and leisurely manner to canvass his State, and he rarely begins until months after the nomination. He makes public addresses only at the more important points in the State, and it is seldom that he is able to speak to more than one audience in one evening. The candidate for the Presidency preserves a still more dignified silence and permits others to speak for him. But the candidate for the chief executive office in the large city has work of the severest kind before him during every day of the brief campaign. Fortunately such campaigns are brief, for otherwise few men could endure them.

TRIALS OF THE TRIMMER AND TRICKSTER

The work of the candidate begins with the convention which nominates him. He must there announce the principles upon which his candidacy is to stand. The convention adopts a series of resolutions, which constitute the party platform. But in a mayoralty campaign the people look to the public utterances of the candidate rather than to the party platform for the basis of their judgment. If the candidate be a sincere and straightforward man, he can, without difficulty, declare the lines upon which he will act and the principles by which he will be guided if elected. If, however, he be a demagogue, intent only upon success at the polls, his task is more intricate. There are many diverse and conflicting interests embraced within any political party. A policy of administration which would please some would offend others. If the candidate is willing for the sake of office to become a trimmer and a trickster, he will avoid any public utterance of a well-defined nature upon such subjects, and will endeavor in private to persuade each faction or class that he favors that particular interest. Many committees representing different classes of business wait upon the candidate in a mayoralty campaign to obtain from him, if possible, assurance as to his policy in relation to such interests. He is also asked to address meetings called in special interests, and to announce his position in relation thereto. It requires some degree of firmness unflinchingly to state that which it is known will alienate the interests thus presented. But the embarrassment comes only to the insincere, and to him, if he be elected, it must come.

There is, also, much importuning of the candidate for promises of appointment. The minor appointments are usually made upon recommendation of the ward clubs, but there are also a few positions, somewhat akin to the cabinet offices of an executive, which are of great importance, and are usually made with great care of selection. The success of an administration depends largely upon the integrity and capacity of these appointees. It is pledges of such appointments that are for the most part solicited during a campaign, and as an implied condition of support. The only safety of the candidate lies in a refusal to make any promise. He cannot make intelligent and wise choice of such officials in the heat of a campaign. He should not allow the incidents of the campaign to determine so grave a matter. Aside from this ground of moral objection, it is unwise from the standpoint of policy. Unless the candidate be willing to falsify and promise all things to all men, he would soon exhaust his possible pledges and antagonize all seekers save those to whom promises were given. By firmly declining to promise any one, the candidate avoids immediate and future trouble.

THE CAPTURE OF THE RELUCTANT VOTER

The labor of the candidate includes attendance upon the various public meetings and the making of public addresses to them. Usually the candidate in a mayoralty campaign will address from 150 to 200 of such meetings. This involves, in a campaign of only five or six weeks, the necessity of speaking at several meetings in one evening. To do this, the candidate must begin the night's work by appearing as the first speaker at one public hall, leaving it as soon as his speech is concluded, and driving as speedily as possible to another hall, speak there, and so on until his last meeting for the night has been thus attended. In this manner as many as six or seven meetings are sometimes attended in one night and as many addresses made.

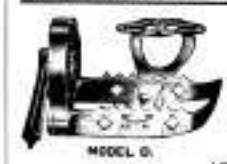
After the last public meeting of the campaign has closed there follows the work of the election day. With this work the candidates have but little to do, as it is cared for by the organized body of party workers. Aside from the judges and clerks of election and challengers, representing each political party, there are others of the party workers busy in the voting precinct. The work of the judges, clerks and challengers is to see that the voting is legally conducted. The attention of the other party workers is directed to the getting out and polling of the full party vote of the precinct. To that end they are provided with lists of all registered voters of the precinct, and as each one votes the name is checked off upon the list.

If in the latter part of the day it becomes apparent that many of the party are neglecting to vote, strenuous effort is made to reach them and bring them to the polls. Carriages are hired and driven to their homes, and in a thoroughly managed precinct every voter known to be of the party is reached if possible, reminded of his duty and urged to perform it. There has been in the past much of barter and purchase of votes in the municipal elections of large cities. There is at the present time comparatively little of such abuse of the franchise. The improvement is partly due to more stringent laws and largely due to the adoption of the Australian ballot. If one were dishonest enough to buy a vote, it must be from one also dishonest, and there would be no way, where a secret method of voting was in use, by which the one knave could know if the other had kept faith. Then, too, the abuse was largely practiced in the interest of some one candidate and was effected by a system of pasters, or by scratching one name from a ticket and substituting another. The voter sufficiently base to barter away his vote does not, as a rule, possess enough intelligence to enable him to make changes upon the Australian ballot without thereby making it entirely invalid and ineffective. The money used at the polls in the municipal election of to-day is largely expended in employing men and carriages for the purpose of bringing known adherents of the party to the polling place.

PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS IN POLITICS

How, then, can the young man, entering upon political work, do anything to make his influence of force and account in a municipal campaign thus conducted? If the nominees of his party are men of good character, and if the principles for which they stand are such as he can heartily support, he can make his individual effort of much avail. As a rule, he must be willing to enter the ranks as a private. Here, as elsewhere, it is difficult to enlist as an officer of the line. This fact deters many from entering into politics. But working in the ranks there are many things which he can do, and should be willing to do, if he feels that the success of his party will be for the public good. It is the detail work which is of value. To talk for party, or brag for party, or bet for party, does not take the place of work for the party.

From the methods of the campaign which have been outlined, it will be seen that there are many ways in which this detail work can be done. The young man can see that his friends and neighbors do not forget to register. Together with a few others, he can divide up the territory of his precinct and thus perform this task systematically and thoroughly. During the campaign he can see that meetings are arranged wherever most needed in his ward. The general committee are likely to overlook the needs of particular localities unless their attention is called to them. He can, with his friends, arrange the details of such meetings, obtain good speakers for them, through the general committee, and see that the meetings are thoroughly advertised throughout his district. He can aid in preventing fraudulent practices at his polling place. If he be of capacity as a public speaker, he can readily obtain opportunity to speak at such meetings in his own ward and elsewhere. But the detail work is more important than oratory. Just as soon as he has demonstrated by detail work that he is in earnest and willing to do other and less attractive things than mere public speaking, his worth and influence will be recognized by his party. As his labor becomes more apparent in results his influence within his party will grow and he will be able, with the cooperation of others of his kind, to keep out of the transactions of his party within his district anything which savors of dishonesty or demagogism. In other words, he can largely help to make the politics of his district so clean and repatable that no man could feel that he was likely to be contaminated or degraded by participating there in the rights and duties of his citizenship.



If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and load in daylight. $10.00 to $17.50.

Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

MODEL O.

Ramsey Swinging Pedals

ARE THE

PULLMAN CARS OF CYCLING

They give automatic ankle motion, absorb the vibration, reduce the knee action, and obviate the "dead centre." The increased application of power makes hill climbing 25 per cent easier. A great boon to riders, especially ladies.

Special Offer: On receipt of $5 we will ship, with express prepaid, a pair of RAMSEY SWINGING PEDALS, with the guarantee that if they do not fulfil every claim after ten days' trial, we will refund the money on return of the pedals. Send name and date of wheel with order. Fit any bicycle. Special Toe Clips, 50 cents. Raisers, 25 cents. Specify RAMSEY pedals on your new wheel.

RAMSEY SWINGING PEDAL COMPANY
Broad and Race Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Brake in use in all parts of the world. Is no experiment. A Cyclist using the Morrow for a few weeks would give up cycling rather than give up the Coaster-Brake. Ladies' skirts keep down when coasting. Feet always on Pedals. When ordering your new wheel be SURE to specify the Morrow Coaster-Brake.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

Our ACETYLENE BICYCLE LAMP is superior to any yet offered

Illustrated pamphlet, giving detailed information regarding Brake and Lamp, sent on application.

ECLIPSE BICYCLE CO., Box H, Elmira, N. Y.

Moving Picture Machine

$150.00 PER WEEK

And upwards is being made by many young men without previous experience, exhibiting with our

PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT OUTFITS

WE START YOU, furnishing everything at lowest prices.

WRITE FOR OUR SPECIAL OFFER

On our EXHIBITION OUTFIT and SPECIAL 20th-SIDE PRICES on Moving Picture Machines, Films, Stereopticons, Lights, Lenses, Posters, etc.; also SPECIAL POINTERS on How to Make Big Money This Season. Let. Dept. R.

CHICAGO PROJECTING CO., 225 Dearborn St., Chicago

Dunlop Pneumatic Tires

For Bicycles
For Carriages
For Automobiles

Send for Booklet.

THESE ARE THE ONES YOUR YOUTH RODE.

The American Dunlop Tire Co.
Belleville, N. J. Chicago, Ill.

MONITOR and MOGUL

Marine Gas Engines

MONITOR Vapor Engine and Power Company, Grand Rapids, Mich. Send for Catalogue

$5

BICYCLES CHEAPER THAN EVER

From the OLD RELIABLE CO. Great Special Sale. Nearly 8000 BICYCLES, every one A BARGAIN. MUST BE SOLD. All makes, 21 bands, $5 AND UP. Late Models, new, $11.50 AND UP. Shipped anywhere on approval. A few more good agents wanted. Big Money. Write to-day for 52d list and special offers never before approached.

BROWN-LEWIS COMPANY, Department A D, Chicago, U. S. A.

Digitized by Google

THE BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Love and Laughter Now and After*

ONLY the best of literary workmanship has raised above mediocrity the stories included in By the Marshes of Minas, the latest work of Professor Charles G. D. Roberts. The themes of the tales are of the highest character. There is no complexity of plot nor of character to attract either the mystery-loving reader or the student of human nature. Yet from beginning to end the book is readable: first, and I think mainly, because of Professor Roberts' beautiful diction; second, because of the picturesqueness of his background; third, because of a certain feeling of sincerity and belief-in-his-work-on-the-part-of-the-author that Professor Roberts has infused into this work; and fourth, because of several attractive young women.

The scenes of these stories, as of The Forge in the Forest and A Sister to Evangeline, Professor Roberts' novels, are laid in Acadie, during the early stages of what is known in American school histories as the French and Indian War. The events depend upon the struggles of the French to regain Acadie, or at least to hold the allegiance of the settlers to France. The constant figure in most of the stories is Father la Garne, the Black Abbé, a character taken doubtless from the celebrated Abbé le Loutre, whose notoriously well-trained Indians shot Captain Howe. He and his Micmac savages are the powers of evil in these short stories as in the longer narratives. Other characters from the novels have small parts to play in the short stories—indeed, By the Marshes of Minas is chiefly made up, as it were, from incidents in the careers of the author's greater characters which did not influence their life histories strongly enough to be worthy of mention in the longer works.

Both land—the "deep bosomed" country, as Professor Roberts has somewhere called it—and characters are particularly suitable as material for romantic stories. Acadie in those times of stress was a rather sparsely settled country where feats of valor or of wit might easily win from men or maidens love at first sight. The heroes are tall and stalwart men of action. The heroines—there is a certain similarity among them—are not only marvelously beautiful and brave, but also quick-witted and alive with coquetry. Their piquancy is one of the chief charms of the book.

But its lasting charm is the charm of workmanship. It is said that the author wrote these tales in a hurry. Neither in their style nor in their construction, however, does a trace of his haste appear. His plots are compactly set forth. His clauses are well ordered, his words have been aptly chosen—yet they are not so striking as to give the effect of artificiality. Moreover words, clauses and sentences follow each other in that indescribable beauty of cadence which is the finishing touch of elegant diction. It is to be found but too rarely in recently written prose. —Albert White Vorse.

Miss Wilkins' Short Stories†

MISS WILKINS has broken faith with realism, and entered the ranks of the romanticists. She has abandoned her sad-eyed spinsters, with their shabby gowns and patchwork quilts; she has turned away from the narrow, upright, melancholy life she portrayed with such pitiless exactitude; from trivial incidents, and minute detail, and simple emotions; she has wearied apparently of the "known truth," which is seldom gay, and, in all the fervor of conversion, has plunged deep into pretty but fantastic extravagance.

Of the five stories comprised in this last volume, one is a mere sketch, inserted probably to help fill up the book, and one is a Revolutionary tale, brimful of heroism and adventure. The remaining three are far more important, both in substance and in treatment. They deal with episodes as wildly improbable as those of the Arabian Nights, yet they narrate these episodes with such conscientious fidelity, and with such sober adherence to little facts, that we are well-nigh deceived into believing what we are told. In The Love of Parson Lord, a stern, half-ossified minister openly denies his motherless child the innocent pleasures of her age, even the possession of a rickety old doll given her by a sensible grandmother, while he secretly buys her a splendid new doll and muslin frocks and all the giddy paraphernalia of youth. On the same principle he connives at her meetings with her lover, while refusing his consent to their union, and is only extricated from his difficulties by a trick on the part of the Squire, who naturally fails to understand the situation.

This is improbable enough, but in The Tree of Knowledge we have a middle-aged woman writing anonymous love-letters to a young sister, whose emotions are fed for months on these amorous though dignified epistles. As a result of the deception, the girl takes a gentlemanly highwayman and burglar for her unknown correspondent; and, being singularly innocent, is not even aroused from her delusion by the suspicious circumstance of her supposed lover's making his way into the house at midnight through a parlor window, a method of paying a first call sufficiently unusual to have startled any less guileless young person.

The burglar, however, is, like so many burglars of fiction, well born and well bred. He is touched by the unexpected warmth of his welcome, falls instantly in love with his fair hostess, swears to mend his ways, keeps his word, and in two short years returns with a flourish of trumpets to marry and be happy ever after.

Further than this it would be hard for the spirit of romance to stray. The last story, One Good Time, is the best of the three. It is the Heir of Linne on a small New England scale. A country girl, reared in pinching poverty, inherits fifteen hundred dollars, and spends it all in gewgaws and frippery in six days. Of course we know that Narcissa never would have done anything of the kind; but it is delightful to be told she did, and to realize that Miss Wilkins is a veritist no longer. —Agnes Repplier.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

PROFESSOR EDWARD KIRK RAWSON, Superintendent of the Naval War Records, has chosen from the great sea fights of the world Twenty Famous Naval Battles—his title—as specially suited both to literary treatment and historical study. In the annals of our own navy, the duels of the Bon Homme Richard and Serapis, the Constitution and the Guerrière, and, sixty years later, of the Kearsarge and Alabama, Professor Rawson, with his sources of information, has been enabled to make peculiarly interesting. T. Y. Crowell & Co.

Mr. E. W. Kemble, more than any one else, perhaps, has the faculty of getting into his black and white drawings the warmth of the true darky laugh. Under the title of Coontown's 400 and with appropriate text, he has gathered thirty drawings of the darkest side of social aspiration. Mr. Kemble's humor is always true to itself and to its subject. There is nothing ill-natured about this latest satire—how could there be! Life Publishing Company.

The indecorous antics of the gods—in a quiet and withal a reverential way—have for very, very many years afforded tempered mirth to those who had the leisure for leisurely enjoyment. Most of us haven't, nowadays. So Mr. James S. Metcalfe, aided by some of our cleverest illustrators—Charles Dana Gibson, F. G. Atwood, Oliver Herford are among them—offers to come to our aid with his Mythology for Moderns, a brief compendious history of all that it's really wise to know about Olympus. Life Publishing Company.

* By the Marshes of Minas. By Charles G. D. Roberts. Silver, Burdett & Co.

† The Love of Parson Lord and Other Stories. By Mary E. Wilkins. Harper & Brothers.

THIS MANTEL

Is 5 feet wide, 5 feet high; opening 42x42; tile projection 3 inch, and 40x30 Genuine Imported French Beveled Mirror.

A high-art classic design, embracing the finest features of modern colonial Mantel architecture, and in keeping with its design—its high quality of workmanship and finish—makes it particularly suitable for the better class of houses. Made from home-dried lumber, and guaranteed in every particular against any defect.

We furnish tiles—the very latest shades and colors—$8. No. 1 King Grate, with summer front, $12.

Making the Total Outfit, as shown,

$89

Send 10 cents to pay postage for our new 1900 Catalogue, comprising large photographic illustrations of fifty entirely new designs from $10 up. Our little "How" booklet, telling how to select and arrange everything belonging to the fireplace,

FREE

KING MANTEL COMPANY, 433 Gay St., Knoxville, Tenn.

We sell direct to the consumer at manufacturers' prices, and WE PAY THE FREIGHT

Chicago Conservatory of Music and Dramatic Art

Auditorium, Chicago, Ill.

The Leading School of its kind in America

Offers unequaled advantages to beginners and advanced students. CATALOGUE SENT FREE.

BERNHARD ULRICH, Director

Ad Sense

"I read it every month, from cover to cover," say thousands of bright business men throughout the country. They pay for Ad Sense at the regular price, $1.00 a year; send 10 cents—coin or stamp—for sample copy to Ad Sense, 81 Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, etc.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL open up to Young Men and Women good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No interference with work—only spare time required. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed, national reputation, established 40 years. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Trial lesson, 10c. A fine Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 155 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

Will Make You A Journalist

There is nothing to prevent you from becoming a well-paid reporter, an editor of power, an author of fame. Spare time study with practical direction will make you a successful journalist. No matter where you live you can be taught by mail, and have for your instructors experienced and eminent writers. Practical work, actual experience. Graduated students are recommended to leading publications, thus assisting to prompt employment. Interesting book of full particulars free.

NATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTE (Inc.)
13-15 Second National Bank Building, Washington, D. C.

A Way to Change Your Work

Prepare for a better position without neglecting your present work. Our students advance in salary and position while studying. 150,000 students and graduates

TAUGHT BY MAIL.

Mechanical or Architectural Draughting; Electrical, Mechanical, Steam or Civil Engineering; Architecture; Surveying; Bookkeeping; Stenography, etc.

Established 1891. Capital, $1,500,000. Write for circulars.

The International Correspondence Schools
Box 1171, Scranton, Pa.

Shorthand

Intensely practical instruction by experts. We teach shorthand only, and we teach that thoroughly. No lightning system nor fabulous claims. Money refunded if dissatisfied. Send stamp for booklet or 25 cents for beginner's book.

Correspondence Shorthand School, Box 857, Philadelphia, Pa.

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it as a profitable and pleasurable profession paying $15 to $35 weekly? Start is always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Philadelphia

LEARN TELEGRAPHY

Digitized by Google

THE ANGLE-LAMP

While Recognized as an ideal light for all purposes, is considered by many to be the one satisfactory light for summer residences. Its comparatively little heat, together with its wonderful ease of operation, makes it a grandee comfort in warm weather. In addition to these advantages it never smokes, smells or gets out of order; is absolutely safe under all circumstances, and burns but about EIGHTEEN CENTS' Worth of oil a month. The unique feature, "NO-UNDER-SHADOW" Insures all the light falling directly downward and outward—just where needed. Thousands are in use in homes, stores, offices, churches, halls, factories, etc., and every user is an enthusiastic admirer. Our Catalogue K shows all styles from $1.80 up. It is interesting reading and will be sent on request.

THE ANGLE LAMP CO.
76 PARK PLACE.—— NEW YORK

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Electric Lighted Trains

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

THE North-Western Limited to St. Paul and Minneapolis, 6.30 P. M. daily from Chicago, cannot be excelled. Three other first-class trains from Chicago also—9.00 A. M. Daylight Train, 10.00 P. M. Fast Mail and 10.15 P. M. Night Express. All agents sell tickets via this popular route. W. B. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago.

BROWN'S
Famous Pictures

Authors and Their Homes, Famous Paintings, Easter Pictures, etc.

200 ON LIFE OF CHRIST
150 MADONNAS
One Cent Each, 120 for $1

Size, 8½ x 8, 1500 subjects.

Our pictures are very much superior to any others. Comparison will prove this. Send 4 cents in stamps for four sample pictures and 24-page catalogue, illustrated with thirty (30) pictures.

G. P. BROWN & CO., Beverly, Mass.

Ladies' Watches

OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.

The Blue Book sent free.

New England Watch Company

37 and 39 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Spreckels Building, San Francisco

BE AN ACTOR OR ACTRESS

Learn this noble profession at home, through the Desberger Method, also Elocution, Oratory and the Memory to retain volumes. "The Art of Acting," with fifty portraits of leading actors and actresses, sent free to all addressing

The Educational Institute of Drama
Dept. D, St. Louis, Mo.

Bind Your Music

In the PADEREWSKI MUSIC BINDER. It is so made that selections can be bound in as fast as acquired, and lie flat when in use. Size of cover, 14 x 11½. Sent by mail for 15 cents. In stiff covers, containing 100 pages, 50 cents. Agents wanted. Big money-maker. Write for terms.

REILLY & CO., 78 Nassau St., New York City

Dr. Andrew Lewis.

NO 10¢ STAMMER

Write at once for our new 180-page book, The Origin and Treatment of Stammering. The largest and most instructive book of its kind ever published. Sent free to any address for 6c. in stamps to cover postage. Ask also for a free sample copy of The Phono-Meter, a monthly paper exclusively for persons who stammer. Address

The Lewis School for Stammerers
110 Adelaide Street, Detroit, Mich.

The Coming Thaw in Siberia

MR. WILLIAM LE QUEUX is reported to be about to set out on a journey which is sure to result in several books. He is to travel in Siberia along the route of the great Trans-Siberian Railway and has been accorded official permission to visit all penal settlements, mines and prisons in Siberia. Books of fiction and fact are to be written, but it is hoped that Mr. Le Queux will not mix the two carelessly. As a writer of wildly exciting novels he has shown that he possesses an imagination heated enough to make one wonder whether the Russian Government is wise in opening Siberia to such an investigator.

Frankfort Moore's Seventeen Refusals

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE has no sympathy with the young novelist who is discouraged because his second or third book does not bring him fame and fortune. "I published thirty-one books," he says, "before the literary public knew anything about me."

Mr. Moore was a journalist in Belfast, and a hard-working one at that, but he managed to find leisure time to produce in twelve years thirty-one books for boys, rattling tales of adventure of all kinds by land and sea.

Mr. Moore was never discouraged, for he thought he should know quite well when his time came. He finished writing I Forbid the Banns, and, as he was leaving home for his office, one evening, said quietly to his wife that, now the story was completed, he should resign his position that night and they would move to London.

"Is it as good as all that?" asked Mrs. Moore.

"I think so," replied her husband; "you might read it." Shortly after they went to London.

In a few months the novel had been rejected by seventeen London publishing firms. Finally some one was found to try it, and in the first six months Mr. Moore's royalties amounted to £1000.

The Secret of a Successful Interview

MR. MOORE says that he has only seen two interviews with himself which were satisfactory. One was done by Mr. Clarence Rook, author of The Hooligan Nights; the other he wrote himself.

One day there came to him a sad-looking little woman who said that she was quite new to journalism, but that she had got an order for an interview with him. Mr. Moore expressed himself as being willing to submit to the process. But the lady was hesitating, and was apparently competent to interview a mouse, but scarcely any one more important. "Perhaps," Mr. Moore said, "it would be better if I sent you a few notes."

The reporter departed, intensely relieved.

Then Mr. Moore, scenting a joke, sat down and wrote the interview from "As I entered Mr. Frankfort Moore's cheerful study . . . " to the usual end, and sent it to the bashful reporter. She seemed to catch the humor of the thing. She copied it upon the typewriter and sent it back to Mr. Moore, saying that she inclosed the interview she had written and that she submitted it to him, hoping that he would find nothing in it to offend him. He made a few trifling alterations and sent it back. When it was printed he sent a note to the editor congratulating him upon the interview and saying that he liked it better than any which had ever been done. And the editor replied politely, saying that he had liked it himself, and had been encouraged and pleased to find the little woman could do such good work. But six months later, meeting Mr. Moore, he said: "It's curious, you know, that interview with you is the best thing that woman ever did; it's almost the only good thing. She can't reach it again. You must be a most unusually sympathetic chap to interview."

Introductory Offer Extended to THE SATURDAY EVENING POST Readers

THE NEW IMPERIAL EDITION OF

At Half Price
To THE SATURDAY EVENING POST Readers
For 30 Days

Ridpath's History of the United States

FOUR SUPERB ROYAL OCTAVO VOLUMES. REVISED TO DATE.

Only 500 Sets

Are offered to THE SATURDAY EVENING POST Readers at this price

NO American home, however obscure and humble, can afford to be without some readable, authentic and patriotic narrative of the struggles and triumphs of that land whose name has become, in all the world, the synonym of liberty. Such a work is Dr. Ridpath's Popular History of the United States. It is a compendium of the stirring facts of our history woven into a narrative so brilliant and dramatic as to leave an ineffaceable impression on the mind of the reader. The images rise from these pages like the creations of fiction. The great acts of our National drama are set on the historic stage like the scenes of the Histories of Shakespeare, and the imagination is borne onward without effort or weariness. Thousands of the readers of Dr. Ridpath's work have borne witness to its unfailing and absorbing interest.

Reads Like a Romance

Includes the Spanish-American War

Only 50 Cents Required

OUR OFFER: The work is superbly bound in half calf, gilt tops, the most elegant of bindings; the type is large and clear, and printed upon the highest quality of heavy vellum finished paper. Hundreds of illustrations, colored maps and charts richly embellish the work, and sells regularly at $20. To those who accept this offer within thirty days, the set will be sent, prepaid, on payment of 50 cents, and the balance will be payable in ten monthly payments of $1 each. Books can be returned within ten days and money refunded if not found satisfactory.

An Easy Way to Secure a Matchless Set of Books that Should be in Every American Home

MAIL THIS COUPON TO-DAY

HENRY G. ALLEN & CO., 150 Fifth Ave., New York.
I accept your Special Offer to POST readers of Ridpath's History of the United States, and inclose 50 cents as initial payment. Send full particulars, and if satisfactory, will order the set, otherwise the 50 cents is to be returned to me.

.....

.....

America's Greatest Historian

Dr. Ridpath needs no introduction to the American public; his name is a household word, and his history stands unrivaled among all works of a like kind, giving the real substance of many exhaustive histories within the compass of a single work. How completely this is done, with what consummate skill the historian has sifted the wheat from the chaff, how the vividness of his narrative grows in fascinating power to the close, is well attested by the fact of its phenomenal sale.

Henry G. Allen & Co., Publishers
150 Fifth Avenue, New York

Royal Engraved Wedding Invitations and Announcements
Samples Free

Royal Stationery

Two quires of finest Writing Paper, correctly engraved with your Initial or Monogram (choice of five designs), and 50 envelopes to match, for

	Initial	Monogram
Stamped in Plain Colors,	$ .25	$1.25
Stamped in Gold, Silver or Copper Bronze,	.85	1.35
Stamped, Illuminated in Two Colors,	1.00	1.50

Handsome sample book and sheet of souvenir engraved work mailed for 10 cents

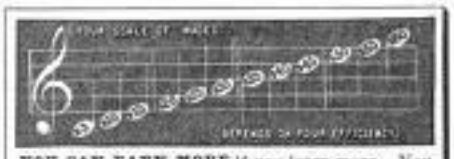
Royal Visiting Cards—Latest styles of engraving and sizes, including plate. Samples free. 50 cards, 75c.; 100 cards, $1.00.

ALL CHARGES PREPAID

ROYAL ENGRAVING COMPANY
18 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Books by Mail Cheap

To Lovers of Good New Books



WHY pay publishers' price for books when by joining the Empire Book Club you can secure any book you wish, delivered at your home, at wholesale price? Write at once for booklet "P," which tells of the advantages we offer you and the terms of membership.

THE EMPIRE BOOK CLUB, 71 Broadway, New York

Learn to Draw by Mail

Home lessons by well-known Illustrators, in newspaper, magazine, book illustrating and design. Adapted to men and women, beginners and advanced students. Catalogue free. Successful students.

N. Y. School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

YOU CAN EARN MORE if you learn more. You can learn more if you improve your spare time.

DON'T BE CONTENTED to hold a subordinate position all your life when a few hours' evening study will fit you for a really desirable position, and insure lifelong profit and pleasure.

Steam, Electrical or Mechanical

Study Engineering by Mail

If you are dissatisfied with your position, write to-day for free Handbook "I." We have helped hundreds to better positions—we can help you.

American School of Correspondence, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.
(Chartered by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts)

The Wonder Instrument of the Age

A Musical Novelty, the Multiphone Clarionet. Any one can become a virtuoso, and produce entrancing music on this instrument with 5 minutes' practice. Postpaid, 50 cents, with full instructions.

NATIONAL MULTIPHONE CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

The New Mother Goose
By Guy Wetmore Carryl

The Extreme Peevishness of Little Bo-Peep

THOUGH she was only a shepherdess,
Tending the meekest of sheep,
Never was African leopardess
Crosser than Little Bo-Peep.
Even apathetic, impassible
People described her as "That Wayward, contentious, irascible,
Testy, cantankerous brat!"

ROUSED from some dream of Arcadia,
Little Bo-Peep, with a start,
Answered him, "I ain't afraid o' yer!
P'r'aps you imagine you're smart!"
Then he received such a blow as he Never entirely forgot.
Weep for a page of sweet poesy
Stained with this horrible blot!

YET, as she dozed in a grotto-like
Sort of a kind of a nook,
She was so charmingly Watteau-like,
What with her sheep and her crook,
"This is a dryad or nymph," any Person would probably think.
Poets pronounced her a symphony
All in the palest of pink.

ALL of it's true, every word of it,
I was not present to peep,
But, if you ask how I heard of it,
Please to remember the sheep.
There is no need of excuse. You will See how such scandals occur.
If you recall Mother Goose, you will Know what tail-bearers they were.

THUS it was not enigmatical
That the young shepherd who first
Found her asleep, in ecstatical
Sighs of felicity burst.
Such was his sudden beatitude
That, as he peeped at her so,
Daphnis gave vent to this platitude:
"My! Ain't she elegant, though!"

MORAL: That Daphnis was blamable
Probably you will deny,
Calling Bo-Peep irreclaimable,
Crying reproachfully, "Fie!"
But make a careful inspection if
Thus to conclusions you'd leap:
He must have made some reflection, if
She saw a little bow-peep!

Alois P. Swoboda Teaches by mail, with perfect success, his original and scientific method of Physiological Exercise, without any apparatus whatever, and requiring but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring. By this condensed system more exercise can be obtained in ten minutes than by any other in two hours, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

It is the only natural, easy and speedy method for obtaining perfect health, physical development, and elasticity of mind and body.

Perfect Health means an absolute freedom from those ailments which a well-informed mind knows are directly or indirectly due to a lack of properly arranged exercise.

Pupils are of both sexes, ranging in age from fifteen to eighty-six, and all recommend the system. Since no two people are in the same physical condition individual instructions are given in each case.

Write at once for full information and Booklet, containing indorsements from many of America's leading citizens, to ALOIS P. SWOBODA, Chicago, Ills.

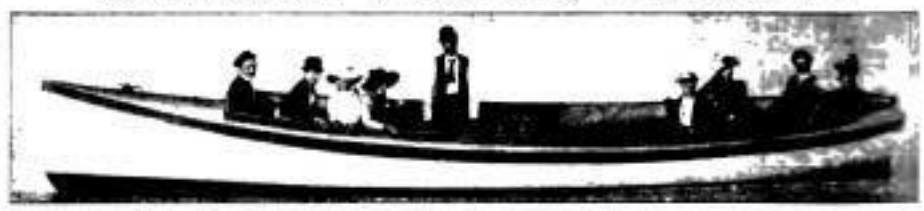
"LIGHT OF ASIA" LAMP A Small, Handsome, Portable Electric Light

Mounted in an Aluminum Shell; Covered with Fine Leather.

Batteries Do Not Deteriorate Unless Used. Will Last a Long Time. They are Easily Renewed.



Weight, 3½ ounces. ⅞ inch diameter. 8 inches long. Can be carried in a vest pocket.

TAKE ONE TO THE COUNTRY.
IT GIVES A GOOD LIGHT.
EVERY HOME SHOULD HAVE ONE. By mail, $3.00.

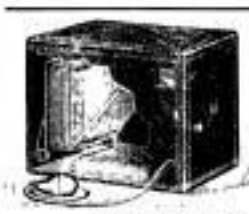
ELECTRIC CONTRACT COMPANY
61 ELM STREET, NEW YORK



DETROIT MOTOR LAUNCH

As shown, 20 ft. special A 1 grade — speed 7 miles — seats 12 grown persons. Designed, built installed and tested by experts — is an assured success. Built for hard and constant use. Delivered equipped and ready to run. Racing is controlled by a governor. Reversing lever can be placed anywhere in the boat. Man at wheel controls everything. Send for catalogue FREE, showing up-to-date launches, 18 ft. to 30 ft., from $300 to $900.

Special Designs submitted for Cabin Launches of larger size.

Detroit Boat Works, 1362 Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Mich. Pleasure and Hunting Boats. Electrical Launches and Yachts

PRODUCT OF 1900

SUNART VICI MAGAZINE CAMERAS

Size 4 x 5, $8.00

At One Loading 12 Plates or 24 Films

Improved Pneumatic Shutter
Achromatic Lens
Every Camera Guaranteed

Folding and Cycle Cameras from $5 to $30

SUNART PHOTO CO.
32 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

Ask your dealer to show the Latest Magazine Camera and Automatic Tripod. CATALOGUE FREE

Perfect

THE LOZIER GAS ENGINE

Reliable as a Steam Engine

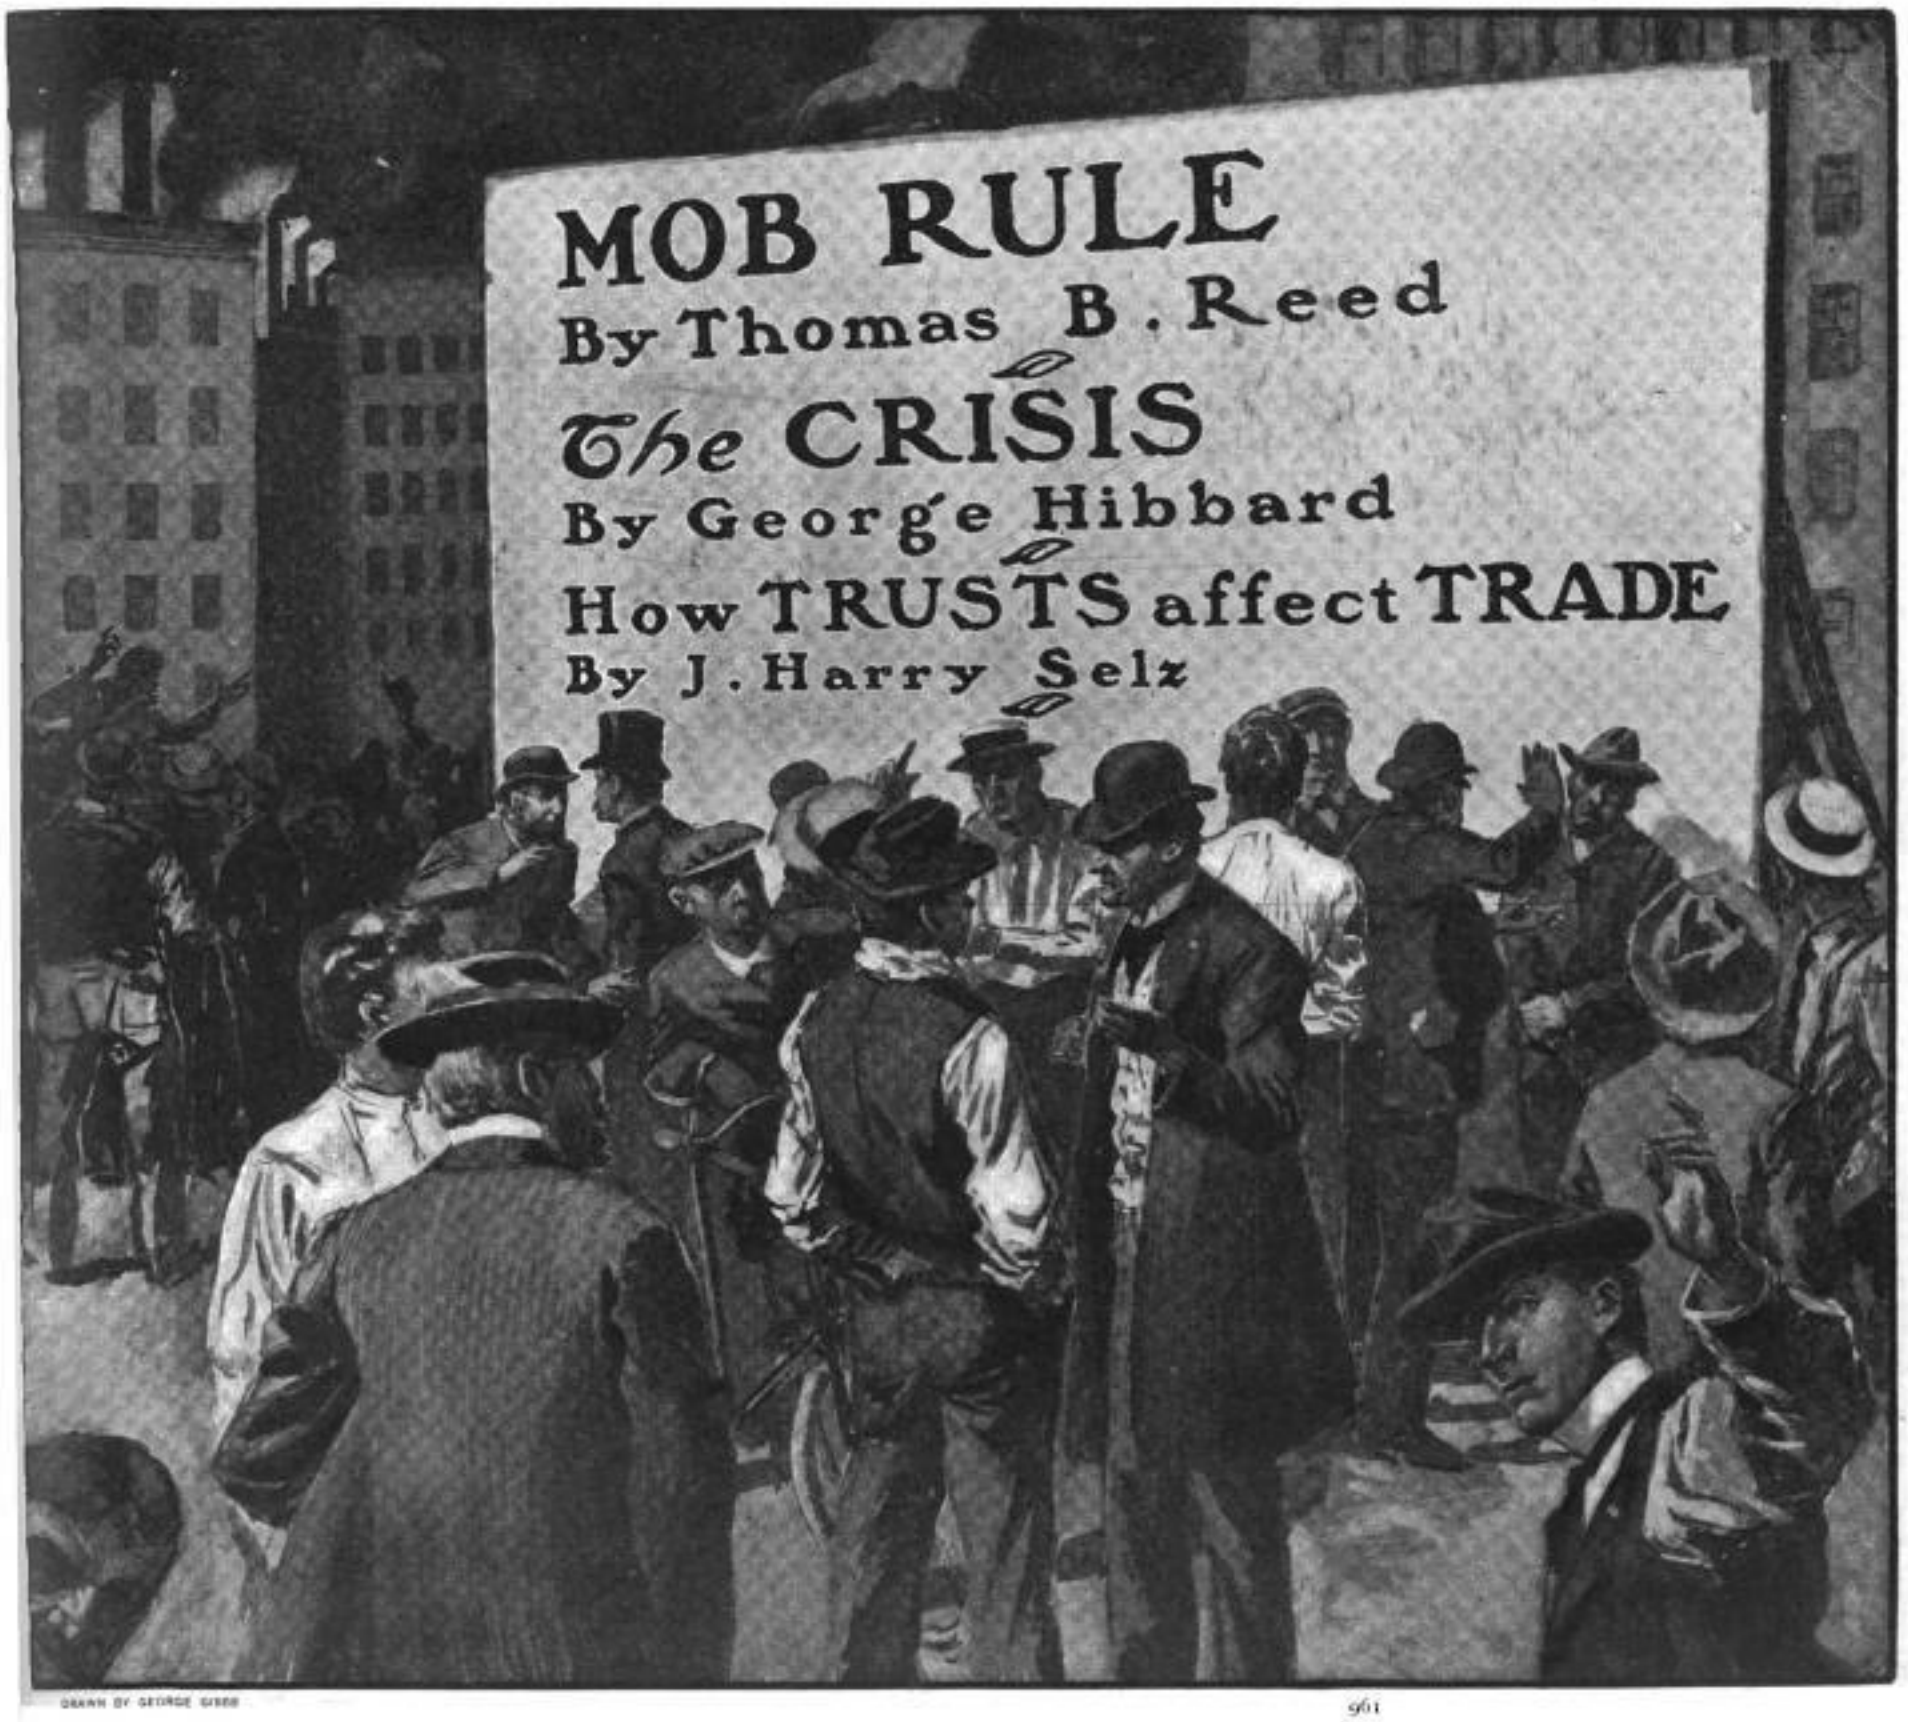
LUBRICATION—Automatic. Oiler sprays
IGNITION—The same rain or shine.
MIXER—Of another sort.
CONSTRUCTION—Finest ever produced.

"CLUB SPECIAL" is the name of our popular launch for fishing, hunting and general club use. Length 21 ft. Perfectly safe and seaworthy. Write us for free advice, [illegible] of sale engines and good boats. Marine Department.

LOZIER MOTOR CO.
20 Gardner Block, Toledo, Ohio

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST



An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A° D¹ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

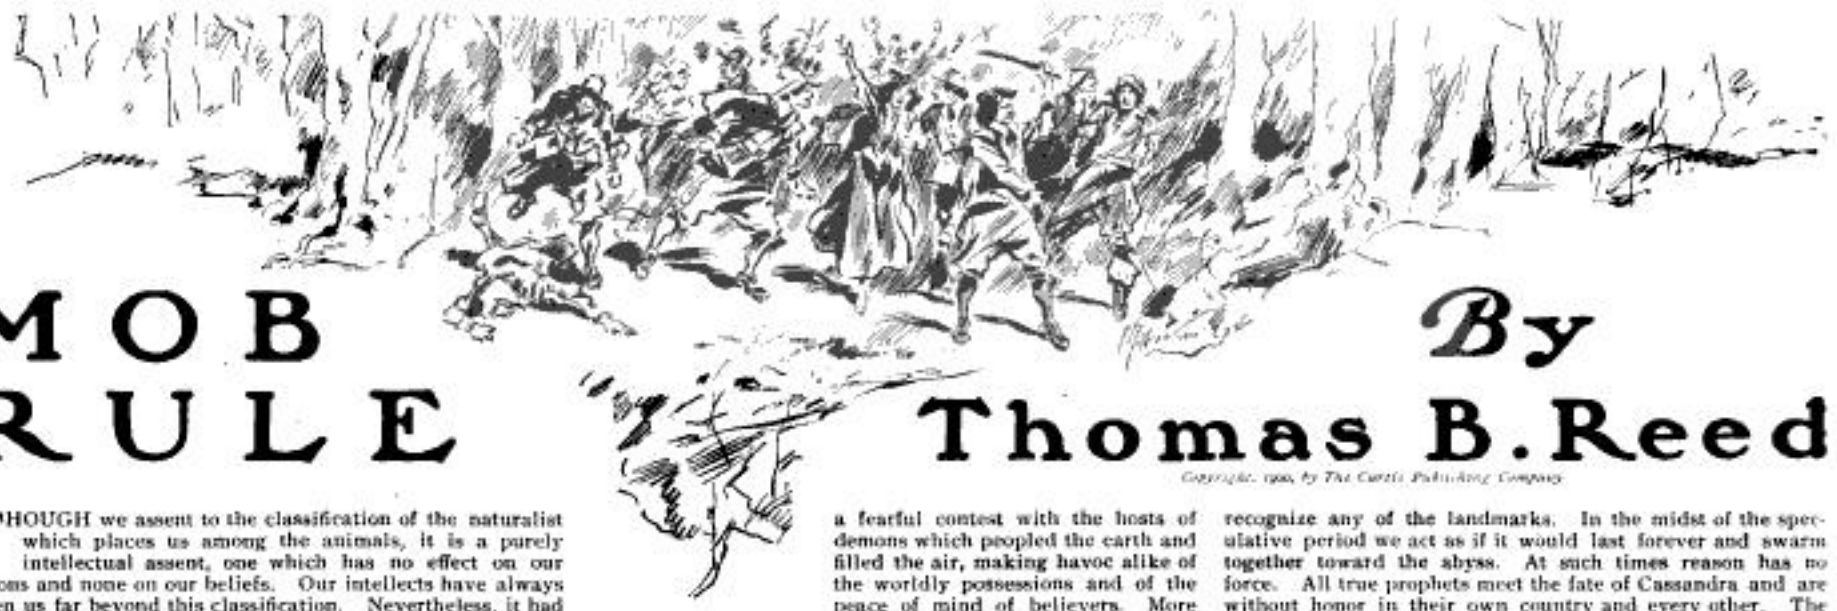
Volume 172, No. 43 — Philadelphia, April 21, 1900 — 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company



PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBBS

Digitized by Google

MOB RULE

By Thomas B. Reed

Copyright, 1906, by The Curtis Publishing Company

THOUGH we assent to the classification of the naturalist which places us among the animals, it is a purely intellectual assent, one which has no effect on our actions and none on our beliefs. Our intellects have always taken us far beyond this classification. Nevertheless, it had better not be forgotten. Even the unlearned persons know that there is but one type of skeleton and flesh throughout the animal kingdom, that man and beast and bird and fish, and perhaps even reptile and mollusk, are built on the same plan.

The learned and undevout have gone to the length of serious intellectual faith in our ascent through monkeys from ascidians, whatever those last may be. Notwithstanding all this, we never consider ourselves as animals when we are contemplating our own actions. We deem ourselves always creatures of reason, acting from the dictates of something which we call mind, a something distinct from our animal natures, above them and beyond, immortal as well as invisible. And yet it must be that we are not all reason. There are too many points of resemblance between us and the brutes that perish for us to claim superiority in nature, though we hope for it in degree. In the smallest things as well as the largest we show our origin and never quite realize it. When you disfigure an animal or put him in some unusual condition and send him among his fellows; when you singe a rat, for instance, cut off his tail and let him go, his kind treat him very much as we treated the woman who invented the bloomer costume, or as we treat men who discover new religions or part their hair in the middle.

Some of the Crazy Lurches of Mankind

However, it is not of these minor matters, of which any one may suggest many instances, that this discourse will treat. Our animal origin manifests itself in greater matters when we are doing our worst and, while we are doing it, pride ourselves that we are doing our best. The way in which men go in throngs and crowds always seems to have something essentially animal in it. That men should unitedly go in the right direction is not at all strange. Reason, it would seem, ought at all times and in all men to be the same. It ought to lead to right results, to right thinking and to right action, and it ought to do so in the whole mass of men. Nevertheless, every age and every century witness some crazy lurch of mankind, memorable enough in its consequences almost to absorb history by its details. When later generations, wholly free from its influences, come to study it, it seems to be a riot of unreason.

In the first Crusade three hundred thousand men, women and children left their homes and kindred and marched toward Jerusalem through hostile and desert lands, enduring the most grievous toils, privations and sufferings, and strewing their bones and unburied bodies all along the route. They had sold out their possessions, given up their lands, turned their backs on their country, and started by unknown and devious ways toward a city of whose geographical situation even they were entirely ignorant. This great company of human beings was set in motion not by their reason, but by the harangues of an ignorant monk, ill-looking, low of stature, half crazed, of whom history afterward took so little account as to forget how or where or when he died.

Of course it is not to be disputed that many causes contributed to this result, that, at another time, Peter the Hermit would have preached in vain; but the wonder is that the human race, endowed with reason, could ever have been in such condition of feeling as to make the first Crusade, exactly as it was, possible. There were not wanting men who resisted, but sometimes the very men who resisted one day were the craziest of the crazy the next. The ten men who were blind, by mere force of numbers led the one who saw into the very ditch of which his eyesight warned him. It is this influence of mere numbers that seems to be animal. The force of it we all acknowledge. The fact we all acknowledge. Our greatest men we excuse for their failings on the plea of the shortcomings of the age they lived in. We might in justice go a great way farther and excuse the actions of many great men by the unanimity of temporary public folly.

Witchcraft and its Long Reign of Terror

History is full of examples of the tumultuous swarming of men's minds as strange as the swarming of the hosts that marched to the deliverance of the Sacred City. The witch mania was in every way as remarkable. For four centuries that portion of the race of man that believed in Christ was engaged in a fearful contest with the hosts of demons which peopled the earth and filled the air, making havoc alike of the worldly possessions and of the peace of mind of believers. More than twelve generations of men lived and died under the conviction that at any time they might be assailed and overpowered by demon satellites of the Prince of the Power of the Air.

It is not, however, this steady belief which concerns us now so much as the occasional paroxysms and incidents of it. Sometimes people lived as if they had no such faith. At other times on a sudden they would lash themselves into bloodthirsty fury about practices which never existed and never could exist. Reason then became useless. Men refused to follow it. Wise men hid their thoughts and the foolish had their day. It is curious to think what must have been the state of the public mind when, in 1644, Matthew Hopkins, styling himself "Witch-finder General," traveled through four counties in England in great state, at public expense, finding witches and bringing them to the stake, killing as many as sixty in one year. His method was simple. He tied them and put them into a river. If innocent they sank and were drowned; if guilty they floated and were burned. At the end of three years the public mind changed and they tried his own medicine on him. Just what happened is obscure, but the probabilities are that he was innocent and did not float, and so came to an end.

That ebullition of popular frenzy which we call the Salem Witchcraft took place among a people who believed in demonology before the episode and after. For years the belief had caused no more disturbance than the belief in ghosts, but suddenly, at the beck of two or three hysterical girls, the whole colony was thrown into convulsions. Deacons and ministers, the President of Harvard College and Judges of the Supreme Court vied with each other in such persecutions of poor wretches that twenty were put to death and the jails filled with more than two hundred others. How great was the fury we may understand from the fact that the Judge who condemned the first victim was man enough to make public profession two years afterward of his sorrow and repentance, and to set aside for the rest of his life the anniversary of that unhappy day as a day of penitence and atonement. The jurymen, also, publicly acknowledged themselves carried away of the devil. They were right in part. They were carried out of their senses, but not at all by the devil. However, in those days it was omne ignotum pro diabolo. They still believed it was the devil, only they now thought they were his victims as well as the hysterical girls.

The Chronic Credulity of the Business World

But this swarming of mankind is not confined to historical examples. It seems to be a part of every-day life. It is a phenomenon of constant recurrence in financial matters. The business of a nation seems to tread one everlasting round. After a crash and after a spasmodic effort to relieve ourselves in some other way, we set to work, living within our incomes, and by safe investments begin to accumulate, grumbling all the while and longing for the flesh-pots of a speculative Egypt. By and by our accumulations outrun all tried and safe investments and we start out into new and unknown fields. And just here begins our craze, just here wisdom and self-restraint seem to desert us. We are sure to go in a body after something which will not only waste the surplus which we desire to invest, but a good deal of the safe earnings we never meant to disturb.

What the next speculative delusion may be nobody can tell. In 1873 it was railroads, last time it was industrials, the next time it may be balloons. Whatever it is, it will pull us along apparently happy and prosperous until we are landed by another crash upon another hard times. Then we shall spend a few years discussing whether it was the Currency or the Money Power, the Speculators or the Shylocks that did it, and end, if we are wise, in finding that it was human nature that did the most of it after all.

As a race we don't like to work. Unless the sweat of the brow was the necessary precursor of eaten bread there would be very little perspiration except on horses. We would all of us rather swap jackknives than dig potatoes. Hence, when there are accumulations beyond safe and tried means of investment, the tendency is to leave off production and go to swapping. Not that we all leave off, but a good many do; and that, with the waste of misdirected effort, the making of things we do not want and cannot use soon eats up our store and brings us back to work again. Now, although we go over the round twice or thrice every generation, we never recognize any of the landmarks. In the midst of the speculative period we act as if it would last forever and swarm together toward the abyss. At such times reason has no force. All true prophets meet the fate of Cassandra and are without honor in their own country and every other. The fever has to run its course. Nor is this feverish behavior confined to those great crises in monetary affairs which require about twenty years to complete the cycle. It shows itself in similar fashion through shorter intervals. The ups and downs of Wall Street do not bear relation to actual values alone. If they did, life would be calmer, but perhaps less interesting. Human swarming comes in there also. At one time everybody crowds to Wall Street to make purchases and at another time to make sales, while the values may be identical at both times. Nor is the swarming confined to business. Two years ago the bicycle made the streets dangerous, and everybody felt himself unhappy if he was not balancing himself in the midst of danger between two wheels swiftly rotating. Now, the golf links is the only field of honor.

A curious instance of this swarming of mankind was the year of slander known as the year of our Lord 1876. When Congress met in December, 1875, the Independent Press, which, from the nature of its existence, must be chronically critical, since criticism which excites suits all of us who are readers better than praise which cloys, had fully prepared the public mind for the wickedness of Grant's Administration. Committees were instantly set to work, and from that time until August 18, 1876, no scoundrel who had a lie, original or second-hand, no scamp with a grievance need lack transportation to Washington or fame after he got there. Although the investigations were ostensibly secret, somehow or other the blackness of it all dripped into the newspapers and smeared the minds of us all.

Nobody escaped. The public were greedy for news and prompt of belief. The newspapers teemed with accusation and testimony. And yet only one trial was the outcome of it. Hundreds of volumes lie mildewed in Washington, filled with stuff that stirred the indignation of the people, but containing not one proven case that anybody, however inflamed by party zeal, dared bring to the calm scrutiny of a court of justice. The passions and prejudices of that year have entirely subsided, and we should now wonder at the spectacle we then presented as we wonder at the abuse of George Washington, if we had not forgotten all about the whole transaction. This was only a quarter of a century ago, and yet nine out of ten of my readers will puzzle themselves in vain trying to remember anything about it.

Titus Oates and the English Riot of Unreason

Our history is full of just such unreasonable swarmings, and so is the history of every other land. Two hundred years ago England was convulsed by a wild and almost unbelievable fury. A man called Titus Oates, after a life of exposed profligacy, had for his followers the whole English nation. Such a devil's dance was never seen before nor since. At the mercy of this wretch and the associates whom his success created were the lives of hundreds of honest men whose standing and dignity would have been at any other time the sure safeguards of their innocence and acquittal. For nothing has the law of England been so remarkable as for its protection to a man accused of crime. In other countries he has been exposed, unprotected, to all the resources for conviction of skilled prosecutors. In England his rights have been the first care of the law. Yet only two hundred years ago in that land of liberty the most preposterous self-convicting perjury prevailed alike against high character and the clearest proofs of innocence.

To us who look at it from a distance, with all the facts revealed, as time can always reveal them to those who search, it would seem impossible that for two years charges without anything in the nature of support should have produced the same results as honest, straightforward, reliable testimony supported by facts and proofs and documents. During these years the utterers of the most transparent falsehoods were maintained sumptuously at the public expense and surrounded with honors and the outward respect of all. The chief rogue, though imprisoned and beaten with sticks which were meant to kill, survived, had his pension restored, and died at the good old age of eighty-six.

How could such a thing be possible? How could men be so bereft of their undoubted sense? It was simply another one of those periods of the riot of unreason where the animal took possession of the man and a whole nation went back again to the dens and caves of the earth. Was it Sydney Smith who said that a mob was a mob even if made up of

---

Editor's Note—This is the seventh paper in a series of articles by Thomas B. Reed. Other papers by Mr. Reed will appear in early issues of The Saturday Evening Post.

Digitized by Google

bishops? England was at that time a mob. The nation had been roused and frenzied by a combination of circumstances not common in its history. Cromwell's Commonwealth had been too much in advance of the world. His great and powerful mind had alone been strong enough to maintain the nation far above the level of its real thought. When he died England fell from her proud height and was for a time well content with the low level of Charles the Second.

A Trio that Shamed History

But the influence of Cromwell and those whose thoughts he represented was not dead. The divine right of kings had received a shock from which it was never really to recover. Unquestioning loyalty received James the First out of even the alien kingdom of Scotland, but doubt and distrust awaited the possibility of James the Second. Charles was becoming frail and had no children. England, just rescued from Presbyterians and Independents, was terrified at the prospect of Catholic domination. A dim idea was also beginning to dawn upon men of the horrible shame, afterward so clearly revealed, that the nation which, under Cromwell, had held a lofty head among the nations of the world, was but the puppet moved by France—a land hated by every true Islander for long centuries. When, therefore, the Duke of York, next heir to the throne, became a Catholic, the cup of terrible unreasoning terror and dull foreboding was filled to the brim. What might happen none could tell. That nothing could be done but wait was the last and most unendurable addition. The soldier actually fighting drinks delight of battle with his peers, but the soldier under fire and with no chance to return it is either in fear or frenzy, or both. Then, if ever, comes panic, terror and wild alarm.

Upon such a scene as this stepped the Reverend Titus Oates, already thrice or four times disgraced. To him were added Bedloe and Dangerfield, as interesting a trio as ever made history ashamed. Their theme was the great conspiracy of the Roman Catholics to compass the killing of all prominent Protestants and the conversion of the rest, and the renewal of the sway of the Pope. As declared by Daniel De Foe, himself a dissenter, all this fright and panic terror set in when there was not one Catholic in ten in the remotest regions, not one in a hundred in most counties, and not one in a thousand in the city. Judges were frightened into silence on the bench, and statesmen, fearing for their own lives, were vociferous in the Parliament. But at the end of two years the majority came to their senses and mourned over their cowardice and folly as did the Massachusetts judge and jury. Meantime worthy men among the best in England had been put to a shameful death, and more than two thousand had languished in prisons and jails.

The Significance of the French Revolution

It would not be at all just to class with the incidents already mentioned that tremendous phenomenon, the unconscious servant of which was that child of fortune, Napoleon Bonaparte. We call it the French Revolution, but in its origins, which are so fully depicted in the first volume of Louis Blanc's history, and in its results which have filled all histories ever since, it was so far-reaching in all directions that it ought to be called the World's Revolution. That Revolution, as a whole, was no temporary wildness and riot of unreason, but the great proclamation of the rights of man. There were special incidents which might be classed among the examples given, but the whole phenomenon answers no such description.

Of the tendency of mankind to swarm in a state of ungovernable rage, examples might be multiplied to an extent limited only by the patience of readers. Every capital in Europe, from Paris and The Hague to St. Petersburg and Constantinople and Jerusalem, shows its places of the skull, its Golgothas, where the savagery of mankind has burst all bounds, and demonstrate that any nation at certain times may be liable to go wrong suddenly, wildly, not from the result of reasoning, but from something lower, from the animal natures we think ourselves so much above.

The Only Way to Secure Toleration

When such events as have been described assume sufficient proportions they make their own places in history and excite the wonder of the very creatures whose ancestors did the deeds, the like of which they themselves will do under similar provocation. We all believe in tolerance without limit. This is theory. No harm can come of full discussion, we declare. The truth is mighty and can be trusted to prevail. In language this covers everything. In actual life it covers nothing. We are tolerant of all the things we care nothing about, never of anything we are interested in. If you want your opinions tolerated have enough people of your way of thinking to make it uncomfortable for those who desire to be intolerant. Never expect toleration from a crowd which has other views, and has them vividly. If any one shall say, what is the use of dwelling on these lower manifestations of mankind? I answer: much, every way.

Every man who, without cynicism, contemplates the probability of unreasoning outbursts of public opinion and action, helps his own level good sense and diminishes by more than one the very probability he contemplates. We make more progress by owning our faults than by always dwelling on our virtues. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Knowledge of ourselves is its onward march. Mortifying to our pride as a race as are these outbursts of popular fury, it is some consolation to know that, as out of the fire that sweeps the woodlands come the ashes which fertilize the earth for a richer growth, so out of these desolations come some of the elements of future progress. Out of the wrongs of man come the lessons which erect institutions which preserve the rights of man. The martyrs are the seed and the Church is the harvest.

The CRISIS
By George Hibbard

WITHIN a short period—it would not perhaps be defining the time too closely to say within a few years—there came upon this country several weeks of great and threatening financial disturbances. The times had long been "bad," but there was a critical fortnight of momentous importance. Confidence was destroyed. Capital was anxious and afraid. A panic was imminent. It was not only in Wall Street that men held their breath, wondering what the next day, the next hour, might bring; all over the country there was doubt, apprehension, dismay. Everywhere every preparation was made, every resource strained to meet the expected shock. Money was "tight" in a way that had hardly been known before. The banks would not lend, and well-known business men, who were undoubtedly good, were going under, because they were unable to obtain absurdly small sums—small in comparison with the magnitude of their interests—with which to tide over some momentary stress. One failure more and it seemed that the worst would come. One more serious break in the price of some great speculative stock and all must go. It needed but the toppling of the one brick and the whole row would come down.

It was but a short time before this financial reign of terror that Percival Scawen had become a part of the active force of Berners, Garrard and Company. It had been all arranged by old Mr. Tippits, Percy's uncle, and "Sam" Berners one afternoon in the club window. Mr. Tippits had observed, with that fine old gentlemanly pessimism that was peculiar to him, and which was always heightened by his first cocktail, and grew deeper and darker with every succeeding one, that he was condemned if he knew what to do with his nephew. Berners, on the contrary, who was fresh and florid, and amply filled the chair in which he sat, was invariably strengthened in his exuberant optimism by the like means. Therefore he had said in the carelessness of his expansion that Mr. Tippits had better give the young rascal to him. So the matter was settled, and "Percy" Scawen was sent, not unwillingly, into the office of Berners, Garrard and Company to acquire business habits and business instincts.

It must be confessed that he was painfully lacking in any of these, as Berners, Garrard and Company too soon discovered. His life had not been such as to encourage methodical ways and, so far, his only experience had been in spending money, not making it. He had a small income which Mr. Tippits had doled out to him sparingly while he was in college, and for a few years afterward, but for some time he had been at perfect liberty to do what he had pleased with his own.

What he had pleased had not pleased Mr. Tippits. There had not been anything very desperate in the young man's extravagances, but he was a yachtsman—not with longings for palatial steam yachts which were quite beyond his means, but with a distinct liking for fast sailing boats which he could manage very well himself. But even this had cost money, and when Percy had gone in with three others to build a "cup winner," and proposed to go on a "mug-hunting" cruise, Mr. Tippits was naturally alarmed, and did what he could to stop such proceedings. That Percy agreed so readily with his suggestion that he should take the position mentioned was something of a surprise to him, but then Mr. Tippits did not hear all the gossip of the clubs.

Juliana Berners was conceded to be a very charming young girl. That she was very pretty was undoubtedly something that logically should not be ascribed to her as a merit, for certainly she had nothing to do with it. But in looking at her the world was apt to forget this and quite unjustifiably to accord it to her as one of her chief virtues. That she was exemplary in her conduct would undoubtedly be a very just reason for granting her admiration, seeing that her own conduct was entirely under her own control. But then, as it happened, she was not exemplary to any very perceptible extent, for the way she flirted was almost beyond precedent. Still such is the inconsistency of the world, that after bestowing its approval when it was unearned it did not withdraw it when it was undeserved. Thus it will be clearly seen that there was no possible excuse for the very extravagant things that were always said and thought about Juliana.

This view of the matter, however, had not occurred to Percy Scawen, for to him she seemed absolutely perfect. He never stopped to consider whether she was responsible for her prettiness or not. She was very pretty indeed, and that was enough for him, or rather, to be strictly accurate, was altogether too much for him. As for her flirting—why, the most of it—not quite all of it, alas—was done with him, which made it quite different. But, in truth, everything had run along very smoothly. "Sam" Berners, the great and good-natured financier, had liked Scawen, and had fully made up his mind to give his consent to Percy's marriage with his daughter when it should be asked, and as Juliana had no living female relatives, this was all there was of it.

But one day Percy was seized with an idea of his own unworthiness, and an ambition had grown within him to deserve and "win" his Juliana. Young men who are very much in love are frequently attacked with such fancies, and Percy was certainly very much in love. He became disgusted with the idle life he was leading, longed to do something, and it was at this time of doubt and dismay that Mr. Tippits had insidiously approached him with the suggestion that he should "go into" Berners, Garrard and Company. Scawen jumped at it. He would prove to Juliana's father that there was something in him. He even had heroic fancies in which he secretly cherished a picture of himself as winning a distinction—not specified—on a battle-field—not localized—under the eyes of his commander, who was always represented as the famous and florid financier. But as he was here called upon to imagine that personage in the plumed hat of a field marshal, the image was broken, the illusion destroyed, and he said nothing to Juliana about such aspirations, which perhaps was just as well, as she would most assuredly have laughed at him. So Scawen went into Berners, Garrard and Company and did his best.

As has been said, Percy had been thus employed for only a short time, but already the results of his action had begun to be manifest. At first he could hardly believe what he saw, but gradually the facts became too unmistakable to be overlooked. Berners had always been kind to him and cordial, but now Percy noticed an alteration in his manner. For some time he did not mention his discovery to Juliana, but one afternoon he suddenly burst forth.

DRAWN BY C. CHASE EMERSON

"DON'T MAKE IT DOUBTFUL," HE BEGGED

"Why—why did I ever go into the office?" he wailed. "Your father used to think I was a decent enough sort of harmless fellow, and everything was all right, but now——"

"But now," said Juliana anxiously.

"I believe he thinks I'm a driveling idiot, with hardly brain enough to stick on postage stamps. You should see the way he looks at me——"

"Oh," exclaimed Juliana, "perhaps that is why——"

"Has he been abusing me?" broke in Percy. "No doubt. He thinks I'm good for nothing, now that he's seen me down there where I don't belong. I thought there might be some chance once—that he'd perhaps consent to let me marry you," Percy murmured, "but now I know I haven't the faintest ghost of a show in the world."

Digitized by Google

"He did ask me the other day if I didn't see you very often," Juliana admitted.

"That's it," Scawen exclaimed desperately. "The next thing will be that he will forbid my seeing you altogether."

"And," continued Juliana thoughtfully, "I remember now that he said something about not being able to realize how worthless the young men of the present day were until you tried them."

"There," continued Percy helplessly, "you see how it is. I have ruined myself with him. If I had been contented to go on as I was doing he would have thought that I was all right, but this accursed ambition of mine has played the mischief with me. He has found me out," he concluded helplessly, "and it's all up."

"Couldn't you do something," suggested Juliana anxiously, "to reinstate yourself—to bring him to believe in you—to make him think better of you than he did before?"

"You don't know what you're saying," replied Percy, shaking his head despondently, "just as I didn't know what I was doing when I went into this. I supposed that a common humanity made people able at least to understand any state of existence, but I tell you a business life's different. Perhaps there isn't anything in it common to humanity. I don't know. Anyway, it's worse for me than being dropped in a foreign country where I don't know the customs, can't speak the language, and seem to have a hereditary feud with all the inhabitants. Send me to Mars or Jupiter and tell me to distinguish myself. I might, but," and Percy again shook his head dolefully, "don't ask me to do anything in a business community."

"What is the matter?" asked Juliana solicitously.

"Every one seems to know all about me—to wonder what I am doing out of the club, and only curious as to why in the name of the evil one I don't go back there and stay there."

"You must show them that they are wrong."

"And just at this time, too," continued Percy, "I do not quite understand what it is, but something seems to be the matter. Every man is in a hurry, even when there is not the least reason for it, and jumps a foot if you speak to him suddenly."

"Papa told me the other day," said Juliana, "that the state of the country was very precarious."

"If it gets much worse," mused Percy, "their tempers won't stand it."

"But, Percy," said Juliana slowly, "you mustn't blame papa; he has a great deal to make him nervous."

"What?"

"I don't think it can make any difference if I tell you," she almost whispered, after looking carefully around. "But there is a huge scheme in which papa is interested and which he wants to carry through. I don't know what it is exactly, but there are millions and millions involved, and, of course, he is anxious."

"I wonder if that is what they mean," said Percy.

"What?" she asked.

"Their talk about a 'disturbing influence,' a 'hidden cause,' an 'unknown quantity' that is at work."

"I shouldn't wonder a bit," said Juliana. "Papa is certainly not at all himself."

It was with a very heavy heart that Percy, on the following morning, made his way down town. It had been his custom since he had been a business man to walk briskly down Fifth Avenue, cross Washington Square, and, mounting to the "Elevated" at Bleeker Street, betake himself to the offices of Berners, Garrard and Company. In the first days of his experience he had strode along sharply in the morning procession, distancing the veterans who were getting their exercise before settling down for the day's work and passing even those of his own age and experience. But gradually his steps had begun to lag—the most venerable millionaire kept ahead of him—and, finally, on this particular morning he dragged along at a very inactive pace.

He was oppressed with the idea that something unpleasant was going to happen. As he glanced at those whom he knew, he saw little in their countenances that helped cheer him up. A threatened panic in Wall Street soon makes itself known in the aspect of the town, and in many faces Scawen read doubt and dismay. Financially he was aware that he had little to fear, for what money he had came from real estate upon long lease, and his own prospects could be little affected. Still, the consternation that he felt was general, communicated itself to him, and heightened the feeling of apprehension that mastered him. Even the brightness of the early summer day in Washington Square did not raise his spirits, and dolefully enough he walked up the steps to the elevated station. In the car two old gentlemen were talking very mysteriously. Although their tones were low, Percy was so near that he could not help hearing the greater part of what they said.

"It has all centred about that particular stock," said one.

"Yes," said the other; "it's the test."

"That's the critical point. If Z. and N. should break, then everything would go."

"But will it?" said the other anxiously. "It seems to have unlimited support."

"It's too much for any one person or any combination to carry through in these times," answered the first, frowning grimly.

"I don't know," said the other; "whoever has been doing it so far seems to have plenty of pluck and I hope he can hold his own."

"So do I," said the first devoutly. "I tell you the financial prosperity of the country depends on it."

Scawen left the train, his ill-defined fears rather increased than diminished. Nor was the aspect of the offices one to quiet his distressed spirit. What the difference was it would be hard to say, but there was a difference. In every face there was an evident restless expectation of something that was most disturbing. Percy sat down at the desk that had been given to him, and, as he had nothing to do, did it. But he was not allowed to remain long in suspense. Almost immediately a messenger informed him that Mr. Garrard would like to speak to him. Percy at once obeyed the summons and entered Mr. Garrard's private office.

The position held by Mr. Garrard in the firm was apparently at times one of singular prominence. Then it seemed that his was the preponderating influence—that his will ruled, that his word was law—but this was not always the case, and it was noticed by the observant that this only happened when it was necessary that something unpleasant should be done. On such occasions "Sam" Berners affirmed that no matter how much he might wish it, that he could do nothing with his associate; at such times Mr. Garrard boldly stated that he felt obliged to disregard Mr. Berners' best-known wishes, and act according to his own judgment.

"Mr. Scawen," he now said, "I very much regret that it is necessary for me to speak as I must. Indeed, I have hesitated some time, but"—he coughed slightly—"I cannot see that it will be advantageous for either of us to have this go on. We derive no good from such an arrangement, nor do I believe that you do. I must beg that you will consider your connection with us closed."

"I'm turned out," said Percy briefly.

"The arrangement does not seem to be all that it promised," said Mr. Garrard coldly. "Mr. Berners has said much, but he cannot make me see it in a different light, and in this instance I fear that I must go against his particular desire. You are no use here, and, indeed, your ignorance of business methods is most demoralizing—has a most harmful effect upon the others in our employ."

"Very well," said Percy, "I'll go."

"At Mr. Berners' request," continued the other, "I long refrained from taking this step, but I really can delay no longer," and as Percy left the office, Mr. Garrard followed him. "I hope that you will derive some advantage, Mr. Scawen, from your very brief experience of business life."

But Scawen had gone out and shut the door.

"The old beggar," Percy said that afternoon when he recounted the interview to Juliana; "he talked just as if he thought I didn't know that he was doing exactly what he was told to do, and as if I believed he really had some voice in the matter."

"You think it was papa sent you away?" asked Juliana apprehensively.

"Sure of it," asserted Scawen. "Every one knows that old Garrard's nothing but a stalking-horse."

"Papa," said Juliana, "is fearfully disturbed. He walked up and down the library all last evening, and I don't believe he went to bed all night. I have found out what it is. There is a stock——"

"Z. and N.," said Scawen quickly.

"Yes," she answered, "whatever that means," and she added admiringly, "but how did you know?"

"Never mind," he replied quickly; "the security of the country depends on it."

"Oh!" she exclaimed, much impressed.

"If it breaks, everything will go," he said.

"And papa thinks that you don't know anything about business," she said with reproachful wonder. "Well, it seems that he has got the whole weight of it on him. He had to talk to some one last night, and so he talked to me," she hurried on. "I know I ought not to tell, but you don't count. One of the family"—a sudden heavy blush spread across her face—"that is, almost one, perhaps."

"Don't make it doubtful," he begged.

"You know what I mean," she said swiftly, "of course. You interrupt me so foolishly. Papa has been carried along—gone in deeper and deeper—and now is in altogether. Percy," she said, "we may be poor."

"I've got something," he replied.

"That may be all then, dear, if this doesn't come out right. And—and there's more danger. There is another man—a bear."

"You don't like him?" said Scawen.

"I don't mean it that way," she retorted contemptuously. "I mean, in a business way."

"Oh," he said humbly, "you remember that you have such a way of calling people animals——"

"But I'm serious now," she responded, "and you do make it so difficult for me to tell you. Papa is in an awful position. He has to keep up the price of Z. and N. or he is ruined. And he could if it were not for Mr. Scrice."

"David Scrice!" cried Percy in amazement.

"That may be his first name," said Juliana.

"David Scrice," repeated Percy slowly; "that is serious."

He had been long enough in the "Street" to have that name mean a great deal. Had he not heard men, great in the financial world, almost whisper it in their awe? And did not all live in terror of its owner? Great as "Sam" Berners was, David Scrice was much greater, richer, more experienced, and plenteously endowed with that wizard-like reputation that a great and successful operator gradually acquires. A superstitious assurance of his certain success in all he undertook had gradually mastered his associates, and any one who opposed him seemed to them foredoomed. And Percy felt the full force of this presentiment.

"You don't know what that means," he went on. "He can do anything."

"Then everything is lost," said Juliana helplessly, "and we—no," she continued, "I won't believe it. I won't believe it. It must come out right. Papa told me that what Mr. Scrice was doing was horrible—trying to bring ruin on all the country—just so that he could make money out of it—though how he could do that I don't see."

"He knows," said Percy ominously. "But tell me all you can about it—everything he said."

"He was with papa in this until just now, but papa seems suspicious and doesn't know what he'll do."

"Things are in a bad way everywhere, and every one is anxious," said Percy, remembering the pale, set faces he had seen in the afternoon. "There isn't anything to do except to wait and grin. I don't know enough to do anything, and I shan't be in the office after to-morrow."

"Papa says that to-morrow is the crisis," Juliana went on. "If Mr. Scrice turns traitor there will be a panic, papa will lose his fortune, and the consequence to the country will be fearful. Thousands will be ruined, and it will need years to bring back prosperity again."

"The little beggar ought to be hung!" exclaimed Percy energetically.

Even before he had reached the office the next morning Scawen noticed that the excitement had increased. Another day had only given another twist to affairs, and the tension was tighter. The crowds in the street were larger and more shifting—coming together and breaking up with more rapidity. The noise was greater—a broken tumult, the result of the feverish activity. The careless morning greetings were shortened, and no man paused with another for an idle chat. Such words as were spoken came sharply, nervously, and were generally short questions and merely monosyllabic answers. Several whom Scawen knew very well passed him without recognizing him, and one or two almost ran him down in their haste.

There was a strange feeling of unrest. The very air seemed charged with some new quality at the same time exciting and depressing. A fear of coming disaster had attacked all men, and the common terror seizing the masses made any rout and panic possible and only too probable.

Although Percy knew so little of the detail of the situation, a sympathetic fear seized him, and, excited and bewildered, he entered the offices and approached his desk. There, too, all was different. Discipline was relaxed, and nobody except one old, gray-headed, withered clerk, who had lived through many flurries and furies, was doing anything. In fact, very few of the clerks were there, many in the sudden emergency having been dispatched by Garrard on unexpected messages.

A certain middle-aged employee with whom Percy had struck up something of a friendship spoke to him as he passed swiftly out.

"I tell you," said he, "I've been here since I was a boy and I've never seen a day open like this. Old Garrard's beside himself, and Mr. Berners hasn't come yet."

"I should think he'd be on hand early at such a time," said Percy.

"So should I," replied the man as he hurried away. "He's needed badly enough, but he's not here, and it's near the time of opening."

Percy had hardly sat down when Garrard looked from his room, and called to the only person left in the place—the venerable bookkeeper.

"I wish you would go at once to Mr. Packard, in Nassau Street, and tell him I should like to see him immediately."

The man arose as quickly as his old bones would permit him to do, and Percy was left entirely alone. From outside came a dull murmur of voices, and the hurried, unending, increasing sound of tramping feet. Scawen felt himself drawn more and more into the fierce agitation of the moment. The madness was contagious, and he could not sit still. He arose and paced up and down the empty office. Again Garrard's head appeared at the door.

"Oh, it's you," he said slowly; then he added quickly, "Have you seen anything of Mr. Berners?"

"Not to-day," said Percy.

"Well," replied Garrard snappishly, "did you think I meant last week? Why doesn't he come?"

As Percy was wholly unable to furnish any information, he remained silent.

"I can't act without him, and something must be done."

On an ordinary occasion Percy was the last person in the world to whom Garrard would have confided any difficulty, but at such a time no rules held. It was like a shipwreck, a fire—positions were altered, dignities were forgotten.

"He's got to come," continued Garrard impatiently.

"Perhaps he's been detained," suggested Percy idiotically—as he felt at once.

"A man whose whole fortune's at stake," said Garrard, "and who's carrying market, too, doesn't have anything that's more important."

In the stillness of the offices the exceptional turmoil in the street was strangely noticeable.

"You hear what's going on?" said Garrard feverishly.

The windows, which were in the first story, were open, and, as Percy listened, the monotonous noise of the street was suddenly broken by a new sound—one rather unusual in that place—the rapid rumble of wheels over the stones. The clatter grew louder, and it was clear that a carriage had suddenly drawn up before the building.

"That must be he," said Percy.

The big door swung open and with a rush some one entered. But it was not Berners—but Juliana, flushed and breathless, who came in. She sped across the floor and stood with her hand on her heart before the two men.

"Mr. Garrard," she gasped, "papa had an accident getting into the brougham this morning. The horses started, and his leg is broken. He can't stir, and he told me to come and tell you and give you this."

Garrard seized the note, tore it open and seemed to read the lines at one glance.

"I must do what I can," he cried. "We've got to keep this thing going and I must get money. Berners has found out from one of Scrice's fellows that he's thrown us over and we must be ready to meet him." Garrard paused, his hat on his head. "You stay here."

He had spoken the last words at the door and was already gone.

Digitized by Google

"Percy," cried Juliana excitedly, "isn't it awful?"

"Pretty bad," he answered ruefully.

"What can we do?" she said.

"Nothing," he replied; "but it's a queer fate that leaves us in command at such a time. See," he said, pointing through the door of the private office to the dark depths of the huge vaults, the massive door of which stood widely open, "even the safe isn't shut."

"Now would be the time," she said in a low voice, "for you to show papa that he was mistaken."

"Yes," replied Percy, "there's no doubt about the time; it's the doing it. The hour comes oftener than the man in history, and I'm afraid even if the moment has come the man hasn't."

"I won't believe that," she said adoringly. "I believe that you could do anything."

"As far as I can see, the important thing," mused Percy, "is to gain time."

"Yes, yes," said Juliana, "that's what papa told me. He said that if he could only get safely over to-day he would be all right. That Mr. Scrice's betrayal has weakened him, but that in twenty-four hours he could fix everything."

"The question is how to gain twenty-four hours."

"Yes," she said.

Percy glanced up at the big clock. The hands, racing on, had reached a position indicating five minutes to one. Going to the stand where the "ticker" slowly wound out its snaky coil, he glanced at the changing figures.

"Z. and N. has lost nine points," he said.

"Is that bad?" she asked.

He nodded gloomily.

"Another point off," he said, after a pause of intense absorption.

"Can't they stop it?" asked Juliana.

"There isn't any way unless we buy, or Scrice stops selling."

"Why don't we buy?"

"Mr. Garrard hasn't the means, probably."

"And won't he stop selling?"

"I'm afraid there's no way of making him," said Percy, picking up the thin slip. "Another drop."

Slowly the minutes passed as Scawen watched the stock in its downward course—point by point—until the figure which all must remember was almost reached. Other stocks, too, were affected, and Z. and N. was dragging all down with it into dire destruction.

"If it goes a point or two more," groaned Percy, "it can never recover—I know enough to know that—and all will be up."

He had hardly finished speaking when the main door was quickly opened.

"Who is it?" asked Juliana.

"Scrice," whispered Percy in an amazed tone. "Scrice himself."

A small, wiry, active man hustled into the room where the two had betaken themselves.

"Mr. Berners?" snapped the straight, thin mouth.

"Not down this morning," answered Percy affably.

"Not down!" ejaculated Scrice in evident astonishment, but then, as if time were too precious to be lost in idle surprise, he jerked out: "Mr. Garrard?"

"Just stepped out."

"Well, who is here?" asked Scrice.

"I am," said Percy modestly.

Scrice glanced at him and then at Juliana uncertainly.

"Most remarkable!" he said half to himself; "I really can't understand." He hesitated. "Of course you are not in a position to know about anything," he went on. "Mr. Berners and I are connected in some transactions, and it is important I should have certain papers at once. They are in the safe."

Scrice took a step toward the open vault. Instantly Percy had thrown himself before the open door.

"You want them, Mr. Scrice?" he said.

"Yes," replied the little man; "I must have them at once."

"I don't know about that," said Percy boldly.

Juliana, who was watching the scene with parted lips, wide-open eyes and quickly coming breath, stood motionless.

"Don't know," stuttered the small man, "don't know! I tell you my connection with Mr. Berners gives me a right to them."

"Perhaps it did," said Percy, and Juliana gazed upon him in fascinated wonder, "but I don't know that it does."

"What do you mean?" cried Scrice.

"If I am not mistaken, Mr. Berners has learned some things that make a difference," Scawen continued.

"I don't know what you mean," Scrice said, "and I haven't time to discuss it. I must have the papers at once."

He advanced a step farther, but Percy did not stir.

"You can't," he replied firmly.

"Get out of my way," sputtered Scrice furiously. "Young man, I haven't any time to lose."

"I know," said Percy. "I can read it all there," continued Percy, pointing to the tickers; "Z. and N. is falling, and every stock with it."

Scrice jumped to the instrument, and was drawing the ribbon through his fingers.

"It isn't!" he cried with a short oath; "it's rising; it's risen three points while I've been gone."

He turned to go.

"Mr. Scrice," said Percy firmly, as he laid his hand on the other's arm, "do I understand that you are going back on the floor?"

"I'm going about my business," said the enraged man, "and if you have any you'd better go about yours."

"My business," said Percy quietly, "just now is right here. You say the market is rising; if you go your action will cause it to fall—how far I do not know, but far enough financially to destroy very many—to give a serious blow to the prosperity of the country."

"Let go my arm!"

"Not until you promise that you will not bring on this disaster."

"Let me go!" screamed the little man, jumping up and down in his passion.

"Not just yet."

"What are you going to do?" demanded Scrice angrily.

DRAWN BY C. CHASE EMERSON

"I'LL SHOW YOU," SAID SCAWEN QUICKLY

"Keep you here," Percy responded with steady decision.

Juliana, looking on, clasped her hands and uttered a quick exclamation.

"Keep me here?" stammered the infuriated man. "Don't you know that we are only a few feet from the street—that the windows are open—that I have only to call?"

Percy stood embarrassed and silent. What Scrice said was only too true, and he felt helpless, baffled, desperate.

"What are you going to do now?" sneered the little man triumphantly.

"I'll show you," said Scawen quickly, as he picked up the struggling millionaire in his arms.

Percy's education had certainly not been such as to fit him for Wall Street upon any ordinary occasion, but much hauling at ropes and steering on stormy seas had given him firm muscles, and Scrice was absolutely helpless. Swiftly Percy bore him across the room to where the safe stood open, gently put him down within the vault, and, before the astonished man could make the slightest movement, had shut the massive door upon him. Turning, he locked it and stood leaning with his back against it, gazing at the frightened girl before him.

"Percy," cried Juliana, "what have you done?"

"I don't quite know," he answered desperately, "but it seemed the only thing to do, and I hope it's all right."

At that moment one of the clerks entered the office.

"I say, Hawkins," called Percy hurriedly, "go as quick as you can and find Mr. Garrard. Say to him that it is all right. He may act just as if nothing had happened and Mr. Berners were here."

"I don't understand," said the man.

"It isn't necessary," replied Percy. "Go and do what I say. There isn't a moment to lose."

"All right, sir," said the man, moved to obedience by the short, sharp words of decisive command, words spoken with a force that had brought quick action for Scawen in many a critical moment when the big sails were bellying above and the waves rushing by below, and something had to be done instantly upon which the winning of a race depended.

"How will it end?" Juliana asked almost in a whisper, as the man hurried out.

"I don't know," Scawen answered doggedly. "Something had to be done."

"But won't it hurt him?" gasped the girl; "won't he suffocate?"

"No danger of that," Percy replied. "The place is as big as a room, and there's air enough to keep him for any decent time."

"I can't hear anything," she continued in increasing terror.

"You couldn't hear a pistol shot through those doors, much less a man's voice. He's safe for the present. And if time's all that's needed, we've got it."

The next were anxious moments for the two as they stood hardly daring to move. The noises of the active street appeared terrifyingly near, and it seemed that something must happen. But all was quiet within the deserted offices. The sunlight fell brightly on polished wood and gleaming brass; still its calm radiance was without quieting effect upon the two conspirators. Scawen walked the floor, his hands cold and his brow feverish, while Juliana sat with her heart beating as it had never beat before in her short life.

"Hadn't you better let him out?" she said as time passed.

"Not yet," replied Percy. "See, the market is only holding its own. There would be a chance to set all back before closing."

As he spoke two excited men opened the office door and rushed madly into the private room.

"Mr. Berners, or Mr. Garrard?" they exclaimed together.

"Not here just now," said Percy promptly.

"Do you know where they are?"

"Mr. Berners is at his house, but about Mr. Garrard I know nothing."

"Can he be with either of them?" said one of the men to the other.

"Impossible," he replied, and then he turned to Percy. "Mr. Scrice left us a short time ago to come here to see Mr. Berners and Mr. Garrard. Have you seen him?"

"Yes," said Percy.

"He came here?"

"Yes."

"Do you know where he is now?"

"I cannot tell you," replied Percy.

"But you must. We are associated with him," said both. "It is most important."

"I cannot tell you," repeated Percy decidedly, "and if you are connected with him I tell you that you might as well hold on in what you are doing."

"That's all bluff," said one impatiently, and the two hurried out of the office as rapidly as they had come in.

"It won't be much longer," said Percy, glancing at the clock as he resumed his walk.

Again the outer door swung hurriedly open, and this time Garrard entered breathless.

"What is it?" he cried. "What has happened? They've failed in their raid altogether. It all seemed to weaken and go to pieces in a moment."

"Yes," said Percy; "Scrice wasn't able to be there to help."

"Wasn't able to be there?" exclaimed Garrard. "What was the matter? Where was he?"

"Shut up in there," said Percy, pointing to the door of the safe, "where he is now."

Garrard sat down abruptly in the nearest chair.

"Now," cried Juliana, coming forward, "don't you think that Percy is good for something? Hasn't he proved you were wrong?"

"He has saved the country," answered Garrard slowly.

It has always been a financial mystery why there was not a panic on that particular day, and the commercial world has never known what saved it from impending destruction. It has also always been a matter of surprise at the club that "Sam" Berners, after abusing Scawen as he had fallen into the habit of doing, should so soon have accepted him as his son-in-law, and should ever afterward have spoken of him with such extravagant and unqualified praise.

Grant Allen's Sense of Justice

MRS. GRANT ALLEN, wife of the late author, Grant Allen, will open a book store in Hanover Square, London, in the interest of bookmaking. Mrs. Allen was devoted to her husband, and her writings upon his life and work, upon which she is laboring, will be a valuable addition to the data already in print of this many-sided man.

A peculiar incident concerning one of Mr. Allen's scientific articles illustrated his nearness to his animal friends. He had written a paper upon insects and bugs and sent it to his publisher. In it he minutely described both the bad and good sides of his subjects. Several days after he had dispatched the manuscript he wrote to the publisher:

"Return at once proofs of chapter on bugs. I have found out that I have done one of them an injustice. I dreamt about him all one night after I mailed the matter to you, and he looked at me with reproachful eyes and said I had made him out worse than he was. In looking up his history from a later source I have found out that he was right."

Digitized by Google

How Trusts Affect Trade

By J. Harry Selz

IN A RECENT number of The Saturday Evening Post there appeared a plausible and skillful argument on behalf of the trust; an article most interesting in every detail and one that must have set every reader thinking on this most important subject. In attempting to present something of the other side of this question I shall not hope to command the theoretical forces of the problem with the masterful ability of the writer of the previous article. Instead, I will willingly concede at the outset that if "trusts," "business combinations," "corporate consolidations," or whatever we prefer to call these aggregations of industrial and capitalistic enterprise, were half so beneficent in practice as they appear in the eyes of the clever writer above referred to, this modern phase of business would deserve to be received as one of the best fruits of nineteenth century civilization. More than this, I will concede that it is the intention of that class of "captains of industry" represented by the eminent gentleman who wrote the previous article, to operate their vast interests in a manner to benefit the shareholder, the jobber, the wholesaler, the consumer and the employee.

How the Trust Works Out in Practice

This brings us to the main issue: Does the trust work out in actual practice the legitimate and beneficial results implied in the plans upon which it was originally shaped? My experience and observation are to the contrary. It seems to me that this gentleman speaks of the trust as it should be, not as it is. We must come back to the logic of existing conditions, so often enforced by the old rector of Sevenoaks, in that "We must take things as they air."

It is my profound conviction that no trust ever organized has actually been operated upon as fair and as unoppressive lines as its founders intended. It is not in the nature of things that it should be otherwise. The defect is inherent in the very constitution of the trust. In attempting to point out some of the dangers and defects of the trust system, I wish to be clearly understood as considering the subject from the standpoint of the merchant.

Not the greatest, but still a very important menace to the public good is the power of the trust, if so disposed, corruptly to influence legislation. The "sugar scandal" at the National Capital is too fresh in the minds of the people to require a further array of cases in point. So universal is the recognition of the fact that an extensive "lobby" of high-priced men is maintained at Washington by the trusts that I do not feel it necessary to offer definite instances in proof of that statement. That much, I am sure, will be taken for granted. These "attorneys" are the ablest in the country. Most of them have held high political positions and all are familiar with the currents, rocks and shoals of "business legislation" and "practical politics."

The Ediers of the Third House

It is not easy for the outsider to realize the extent of this "Third House," much less to grasp an understanding of its power. But the trusts have a keen realization of this influence and pick the men who represent them to do their work so quietly, so secretly, that their names are never on the lips of local gossipers, nor their figures pointed out to visitors by resident office-holders as "big lobby men." There is nothing spectacular in their appearance. They know their business and perform it with a skill and power which makes resistance almost impossible.

This might result in a general debauching of the legislators, to the despoiling of the people's rights and interests. The honest testimony of any man who has had an opportunity to see the inside of business legislation in Washington will sustain the possibility of this ever-increasing danger. The opportunity presented for the debauching of the public conscience is so flagrant that it simply appalls any man of good, sound business morals. How is this growing power of the trust to be curtailed? The remedy most frequently suggested is that the protective duty be removed from all articles made by any trust or combination. This measure seems very unlikely of adoption, for the reason that the trusts are heavy contributors to the campaign funds of both the political parties. The managers of the great combinations are too shrewd to put all their eggs in one basket.

The Fraud of Water Ballast

A prevailing evil of the trust is the fraud practiced on the investor by means of over-capitalization. Personally I am not a believer in the principles of paternalism and am slow to favor the interference on the part of the Government in a matter of this kind. However, as trusts appear to be the order of the day, and as National and State Governments have passed wise legislation for the protection of depositors in chartered banks, the same action seems to be equally in order for the protection of investors.

In laws compelling the fullest and most exact publicity of the affairs of trusts and combinations is the greatest safety to be found. The vital facts which a prospective investor should know concerning a corporation or a trust are: the extent of its capitalization and to what the capital is applied; its actual earnings or losses and its distribution in dividends and to accumulated funds. A Federal law compelling the periodical publication of a sworn statement giving all these facts in full detail would be very effective. It should make a false statement or a failure to comply with its provisions punishable with imprisonment as well as a heavy fine. Moreover, it should be required that these statements be sworn to by all the members of the board of directors. This seems to me an important detail. No board of responsible directors is sufficiently unscrupulous to perjure itself.

Provision should also be made for an official examination of books and accounts, this work to be done after the manner of the supervision now exercised by bank examiners over State and National banks. The law recognizes the weakness of human nature and tries to protect it against the gambling den, the pool-room and the lottery. Now, if the stock exchanges do not arise to equal enlightenment, why should not the law step in and protect the investor against fraud?

The Loss of Individual Initiative

Whenever a manufacturing plant becomes the property of a trust or combination, a change takes place in the spirit of the men, particularly of the young men, in its employ. The hope of securing a proprietary interest is gone and with it the ambition it inspires. From the manager to the cheapest laborer, all who are actively identified with the work of the trust are employees. To be sure, some of them command imposing salaries, but there is no escaping the uninspiring consideration that they are servants and must remain servants, doing the bidding of a "board," of an impersonal master. There is little in this prospect to fire the ambition of the typical American, who loves personal liberty and independence, and who would prefer to be his own master and the proprietor of a humble enterprise expressing his own individuality than to hold a position of large responsibility and limited authority in the service of a combination.

The loss of individuality is very frequently apparent to the merchant who deals with a trust. Formerly, when there were individual companies, he dealt with a principal: now he deals with a board of directors, or with some individual who is controlled by this board, and to whom all questions of importance must again be referred before action can be taken on them. Trusts are impersonal; no one person is given full power to act. They prove the truth of the late Lord Beaconsfield's famous remark when he spoke of a "soulless corporation which had neither a body to be kicked nor a soul to be damned." This also results in red-tape rules, sometimes autocratically enforced, causing vexatious delays, both obnoxious and galling to the energetic merchant.

The Inevitable Squeeze of Labor Interests

The advocates and makers of trusts have said much on the effects of combination upon labor, but I cannot agree with their statements and arguments. All their utterances have been from the standpoint of their own companies. Generally the iron and steel business is the one to which they point by way of illustration and proof of the statement that a combination has increased instead of reduced the price of labor. Let this be granted, for sake of argument. How about scores of other industries? Apply the inquiry to the shoe business.

Material, machinery and labor are the three things which enter into the cost of a shoe. The conditions governing the first two elements largely dominate the third. If materials and machinery are high, the chances are that the cost of the labor will be the first to be depressed in order to give the shoe manufacturer any profit. What is the actual situation? The materials used in the manufacture of shoes are practically controlled by a trust. The competition of the independent companies in this line amounts to very little, and the result, is that all manufacturers who have good credit must pay the same price for materials, irrespective of the amount purchased.

Most machines for the making of shoes are in the control of a trust and are rented, not sold. The initial payment on a machine is usually more than its total cost, and a royalty must also be paid for every pair of shoes produced. These two elements entering into the cost of a shoe are obtainable only on a closed market and are not subject to competition, to the ordinary laws of supply and demand. This leaves labor only to be had on the open market, subject to competition. What is the result? Labor, having a flexible price, must bear the burden of the two elements having an arbitrary price. There must be flexibility somewhere, and therefore the compression which would naturally be distributed over the three elements must be borne by the third alone. Inevitably labor is the sufferer from these conditions, which are the direct result of combination in materials and machinery.

Paring the Corners Off the Wage List

Here is the course which the shoe manufacturer runs in buying on a closed market and selling on an open market: competition at first compels each manufacturer to sell at the lowest margin of profit; then he strives to increase the value of the shoe without increasing its price. This may be by way of improving the style and appearance of the product or actually putting better material into it. One maker, however, does not get far in advance of another on these points. Each advantage scored is quickly taken up and met by competitors. This brings matters into very close quarters, and the shrewd shoe manufacturer finds that the inflexibility of the price of materials and machinery force him to the question: "Can I take a shaving off the labor end of this dilemma and thus score a point over my competitors?"

Quickly he comes to the conclusion that this can be done. At first there is no reduction in the price of labor or increase in hours, but a sharper crowding in the demands under existing hours and wages. High pressure in every department at length actually results in a reduction of the cost of a shoe. This enables the manufacturer to undersell his competitor by just so much and the latter becomes bewildered. Knowing that the cost of materials and machinery is the same to all, the unscrupulous competitor recognizes that the advantage scored by the first manufacturer must be in reducing the cost of labor. Then follows a more drastic effort in this field. What the first manufacturer accomplished by "good management" the latter achieves by a direct cut in wages. This precipitates a general reduction of wages, directly due to the rule of combination prices.

Why this movement has not become general is due to the fact that this country has had a season of remarkable prosperity ever since trusts became the order of the day. When the next period of financial contraction begins to appear there will be altogether too clear a proof of this summary of the effects of the trusts upon labor. Not always will the Kansas farmer take down his shotgun in order to compel his creditors to accept payment of a note previous to its maturity for the purpose of saving interest. When the awakening comes, the trusts will make their weight felt upon the whole body of labor.

Jobbers Between Two Fires

The shoe manufacturer and jobber today has to deal with ten different trusts and combinations. In other words, as I have already indicated, he is obliged to buy on a closed market where there is no competition, and sell on an open market where competition is keen and severe. There can be but one result from conditions of this character: the weaker house goes to the wall.

Some trusts are engaged in selling a manufactured article which in turn is sold by the jobber, the jobber being asked to sign a contract that he will not sell the goods below a stipulated price. In other words, he is forced to pay an arbitrary price for his goods, but he is not allowed to make his own price in selling. This combination of limitations, growing out of trust methods, places the jobber at a greater disadvantage than he would be as a mere distributing agent. In the latter capacity he would be at liberty to return all unsold goods, but as a jobber, dealing with a trust, he must make his return on the goods whether he sells them or not, he cannot sell them below a stipulated price, and he cannot get them unless he agrees to that price; either this or he is placed where he must choose between the two evils of having no control over the selling price of his goods, or he must sell them without profit, owing to the unrestricted competition which is sure to follow the carrying of the same goods on the part of his competitors in all other jobbing centres. Both these expedients have been and are still being constantly tested, and neither is found satisfactory. When the jobber has arisen in rebellion against this arbitrary control of his business he has found a "branch store" opened in his territory, and this speedily brought him to terms.

Before the days of trusts and combinations, the individual companies for which the jobber acted as agent had their own particular brand of goods. Each manufacturer took a personal pride in maintaining the standard of his own brands, and this certainly had a direct and strong influence in stimulating the maintenance of high quality in almost every line of goods. The jobber worked hard to push a certain brand and the manufacturer reciprocated by keeping up the quality and making close prices. Under the combination system all this is changed, the brand loses its individuality, the spur of competition is gone, and prices are arbitrary.

The Outcome of Combination

This takes all the zest of individuality out of the business and forces the jobber to consider various expedients, all of which are distasteful. The one which seems to commend itself quite as much as any other is the proposal that the jobbers shall get together and demand of the trusts with which they deal certain concessions in the matter of profit and in the manner of handling the products. This has, in fact, been tried in one instance and has worked fairly well, competitors naturally antagonistic to each other working together with one common impulse brought about by the very desperateness of their own situation. Were this carried one step further and jobbers and manufacturers brought into consolidation, a new condition would thus arise, and we should have two sets of trusts instead of one with which to deal. The retailer would then find himself buying on an absolutely closed market and selling on an open one. He would therefore be forced to follow the examples set by manufacturers and jobbers, combining all his fellow-retailers into as close an organization as any from which he is compelled to buy. Unless this happens and the trust form is carried out from start to finish, the manufacturer, the jobber and the retailer buying from the trust may eventually go and the trust become its own distributer direct to the consumer.

Another point which cannot well be overlooked is the fact that under present conditions the inventor whose device enters the field dominated by the trust is completely at the mercy of the combination and compelled to take whatever the trust manager may choose to offer, or nothing. In many cases, if he rebels, it is the latter, and the inventor finds that his device has been practically stolen by some small company organized for this purpose and the capital stock of which has a par value of much less than the real value of the invention. What he does not always learn is the fact that the small company manufacturing the machine—supposing the invention to be a mechanical device—is owned by the trust controlling the product the manufacture of which the machine is designed to assist.

In conclusion, allow me to reiterate what I have said at the commencement of this article, that I have tried to present the facts simply as they appear to the merchant, and in the light in which many of us think they should be viewed.

Editor's Note—This article is in the nature of a reply to The Benefits of Business Combination, a paper by Mr. Charles R. Flint, which appeared in the Post of January 6. Mr. Selz is a member of a large manufacturing and jobbing firm in Chicago.

Digitized by Google

To the Third and Fourth Generation

By Clinton Ross

I

THE Admiral was at his afternoon nap. The sun through the low window fell over his grizzled face—the strong face of a man who had sailed the seas over, and in his day had made history. The room was filled with souvenirs of many seas, and places, and battles. It was a record of the Admiral himself: a frame for his face. From outside came the midsummer-day hum, the lullaby of the Great Mother, who takes us in the end to her bosom, and holds us close in endless blessing, after strife, turmoil, effort.

A bulldog came lazily in and licked the Admiral's hand, and then lay down to rest by his master's side. How long the two might have slept one can only guess, for there came a shuffling of boots in the hall that aroused the two sleepers, and there entered a stout, small boy, much roughed and tumbled, with a face all bloodied. The dog arose to meet him, while the Admiral opened his wise old eyes on the situation.

"Hum," said the Admiral. "God bless me! Been fighting again?"

"Yes, sir. Come to report. Got licked. But he couldn't make me say surrender."

"That's good," said the Admiral. "Are you ready for punishment?"

"Yes, sir; of course."

The Admiral arose slowly and took from the mantel a dog whip. The boy stood still while the Admiral swished him about the legs, not lightly, but the boy did not flinch. At last the Admiral stopped, placed the switch on the table, sat down in the great chair by the window, took a cigar from the case and lit it, and then, with a twinkle in his shrewd gray eyes, turned to the boy.

"You have conducted yourself creditably, sir, in this affair. What was it about?"

"About Bill, sir. Jim Prindle——"

"Eh, the grocer's boy? He's twice as big as you."

"I didn't care. He said his dog could whip Bill."

The bulldog, as if understanding, gave a low growl.

"I said he couldn't. He cuffed me. I hit back. He didn't have an easy time, either. He's a bully. I caught him kicking a small boy once, and I have had it in for him since. It wasn't so much about Bill, you see."

"Oh, I see. But you'd better have Sarah wash you up a bit. You show the effects of the action."

"Very well, sir."

When the boy had gone the Admiral chuckled and then laughed loudly, uproariously.

"Eh, Bill?" he said to the bulldog, "Oliver shows the stock." As Bill wagged his tail understandingly, the Admiral sobered. "Yes, he is his father over again."

At this moment the Admiral's sister, a spinster of fifty, was washing the boy's wounds, and scolding him, and almost crying over him. The men of her family were always fighting. Her two brothers had been killed in the Civil War, doing leal service, as became a Kent. And Sarah Kent had not the heart to reprove the boy too strongly.

He was a remarkable boy, with a face that could be strong, and again violent, and again soft and pleasant. To Sarah Kent he was the dearest boy in the world. But the Admiral was the master; the house his ship, and his sister and the boy his crew. And in his later life Oliver owed a deal to that training. For he had in him passion, impulse that had wrecked more than one man of his line. He was filled with weakness and with strength; he had in him the elements of utter, dismal failure or of far-reaching success.

As the years went by he grew to be a simple, honest-hearted youth, who might have been quite different. He was the apple of the Admiral's eye. The Admiral, in his well-known corner of the club, was never tired of telling of the boy. Ah, how many other yarns the old sailor spun!

The years passed. Oliver, of course, went to the Naval Academy. That school, in the Admiral's idea, was the only fitting one for a gentleman such as he intended Oliver to become. When he graduated a strange thing happened:

"No, sir; you are not to serve in the American Navy."

"Not to serve? But I want to," Oliver cried.

"But you are not; d'ye understand?" the Admiral said decisively. "Eh, but it's a pity," he muttered low.

"And why?"

The Admiral turned, with a quaver in his voice:

"I have my reasons, and good ones, though I'll acknowledge you would make a pretty officer."

"Can't I have them?" said Oliver.

"No," thundered the Admiral. "No." And then his voice fell low. "Not until after my death."

"What am I to do? Law? Business?"

"No."

"But I am your son," Oliver insisted.

The Admiral turned away. He was fighting a hard battle.

"Wherefore you are to obey me," he said at last.

Habit had left disobedience out of the question: he was the one man Oliver never disobeyed in all his life.

"What am I to do?"

"Go in for horses and yachts, and that sort of thing, if you want to—only, don't trust too much to the fair craft."

Now Oliver was not susceptible, but himself was dearly liked by the entertaining sex. Then he was eligible, for the Admiral's wife, a Van Orand, had brought him a fortune—so it was said. As for horses and boats, he cared for these, but preferred a sturdier career than they offered. But he settled down to horses, and some travel, and big-game hunting, and incidentally became a rather well known man-about-town.

But there came a day when the unsusceptible one met Mary Manners; and to him she was the one woman, and for her he became the one man. This was the spring of the Spanish War. The call attracted Oliver so strongly that this time the Admiral yielded and obtained him a commission. Everybody knows how he distinguished himself at Cienfuegos, and there is no need of repeating it here. How eagerly the Admiral waited for news in those days! How he told over what the boy had done, and how he wanted to see him! When Jim Prindle was brought back wounded he was taken to the Admiral's house, and Miss Sarah treated him like a hero—because he had been Oliver's shipmate. This was the same Prindle who had whipped the small Oliver, and whom Oliver, two years later, had himself subdued.

When Oliver at last returned it was Prindle who first met him and broke the news to him. Two afternoons before the Admiral had fallen asleep in his chair at the club, and had gone on the voyage to the far Land of Peace.

That night Miss Sarah, sad-eyed and quiet, came to Oliver as he sat in speechless grief. Handing him a sealed document she said:

"He wished me to hand you this when—when——" She sobbed, and Oliver took her into his arms and kissed her.

After a time he slowly broke the seals.

"He couldn't bear you should know while he was alive that you were not his son," she said slowly.

"Not his son!" Oliver cried, aghast.

And he pointed to the picture of the Admiral's wife.

"Nor was she your mother, nor am I your aunt," said Miss Sarah with a sob.

"And that was why I should not serve?"

"Read," said Miss Sarah, and leaned over and kissed him, and then, looking back again and again, went out.

Dazed, Oliver spread before him the sheets from the dead hand and read:

"My Dear Lad: You will not love me less if you know I am not your real father. He left you to me, to be brought up away from that career which has crushed strong men of your race. He loved you so that he could not bear the thought of that thing for you. He was a sailor and a good one, and we met in Hongkong first, and then in some trouble on the Corean Coast where once I was so fortunate as to save his life. I have tried to carry out his wish for you. Your mother was dead at your birth, and he took you from your surroundings. But it was his will. He gave you to me to bring you up as an American gentleman. Only in one respect, I believe, have I violated his wish. You were to know when you came of age; but I could not bear you should know until I should be dead. My lad, it was as well, perhaps. When you read this I shall be speaking to you for the last time. Aye, good-by, dear laddie. I have loved you."

For a long time Oliver sat over that letter, and before he broke the seals of that other letter from his own father he went into the room where the Admiral lay, bound on his last voyage, and bending over, he kissed him on the brow.

"Good-by, dear father," he said.

II

THEN he read what the dead English sailor wrote to him out of the past:

"Your own name was honorably won, but there were vices in the blood that again and again dishonored it. In any career, hearing your own name you will meet with that which men may not forget—that which brought trouble to your grandfather, to your mother, to me—something that, bearing the name, you cannot escape.

"I was stubborn; I chose to fight it; but luck is against me—if there be luck, if it be not instead something predestined through inheritance. You need have none of this to men's knowledge, yet, knowing that accident may bring it to your knowledge, I have chosen that you should know."

Some lines in the Admiral's hand followed:

"He, however, wished that you never should serve against England, because you are of a line of men that have fought England's battles—who won the highest distinction, and yet who in two cases sank to the most utter disgrace. It is very curious, but six months after writing this your father met his death under circumstances that presupposed the greatest gallantry, or the greatest ignominy. And the world, because of the old odium attached to the name, said it was ignominy.

"It is fair that you should know this, and that the name you would bear in England because of one man's fault, and through a singular course of mischances to his descendants, is not now an honorable one."

Here the reader paused and thought over it all. But why had his father wished that he should know? Had he thought that perhaps he might go back to try to take the stain from those dead men's names?

An old memory came back.

Again it was a midsummer afternoon in a Westchester house; again the boy went unflinchingly, as he had been taught, to take the punishment that awaited him; again the Admiral's face and words were before him.

And Oliver said: "He wished to keep me from this because he loved me, and yet he taught me to take my punishment—their punishment, for I came from them."

Late that morning Miss Sarah found him.

"My dear, you have not been to bed."

"No, for I have had much to think of, and I am trying to think rightly."

And then on a table he saw in a pile of letters one of Mary Manners'—a tender little note of sympathy.

And that afternoon he saw her, and thanked her for her note, and told her that something was known by him that made him wish to release her. But Mary Manners, who understood him, made him tell her of what the letters had told him.

"Is that all?" she said at last, with a sigh of relief.

"Is it not enough?"

"I am not sure. And—what are you going to do?"

"What the Admiral would have me do."

"Yes, I think he would have you release me. He would have you do as he taught you to do. As for me, you can't release me unless I accept the release."

"Ah, but you must!"

"There are women who don't admit 'must'!"

And she went on: "Oh, don't you see?—he wanted to keep you from that burden because he loved you, and yet he taught you to bear your burdens."

"Even the burden of those dead men?"

"Why did your father wish you to know at all? Was it alone because he thought accident might tell you the truth in such a way as to hurt you the more?"

"Do you think that he thought I might go back and bear the name?"

"And perhaps lift the burden those dead men have put on it," the girl said. And then in a low voice she went on:

"Yes, I would have you take the punishment God has put on you as the Admiral taught you to take punishment."

"And you say this?"

There lay a light in her eyes that shone into his soul.

"Yes, because I love you even more than they, and you must be strong."

DRAWN BY HAYDEN FISHER

"YES, BECAUSE I LOVE YOU EVEN MORE THAN THEY"

Digitized by Google

Memories of Moody By His Son
William Revell Moody
III. First Years as an Evangelist

DWIGHT L. MOODY once said: "I believe in the Young Men's Christian Association with all my heart. Under God it has done more in developing me for Christian work than any other agency." From 1861 to 1870 Mr. Moody was the most active and persistent leader of Chicago in the work of the Y. M. C. A. During a part of this time he was the Librarian, a position which afterward became the General Secretaryship. From 1865 to 1869 he was the active President. The first years which he devoted wholly to Christian work he gave to this organization.

> "It is impossible to estimate the value of his services," says the Memorial Tribute to Mr. Moody, adopted by the Chicago Association. "This Association long claimed him as its greatest single champion. For years he was its leading delegate to Association conventions. During the dark days of the Civil War he was the leading spirit in making the Association a power for good in the armies of the Union as well as at home. He was active in securing its first, second and third buildings. The first Farwell Hall, which was also the first Association building in the world, was opened in 1867 while Mr. Moody was President of the Association. Four months later it was burned to the ground. 'When the flames were fiercest the call for prayer was sounded, and the daily prayer-meeting gathered in the lecture-room of the Methodist Church at the usual hour for prayer.'"

It was in connection with this Association that he became interested in the work of relief during the war. After Fort Sumter was fired upon, Camp Douglas was established near Chicago, and among the recruits were many of the "Moody boys" of the North Market Hall. A company was also formed among Mr. Moody's friends and former associates in business. He believed strongly in the Union himself, but he would not become a soldier. "There has never been a time in my life," he said, "when I felt I could take a gun and shoot down a fellow-being. In this respect I am a Quaker." But in other ways he did notable work. With J. V. Farwell and B. F. Jacobs he formed an Army and Navy Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, and they began their work, holding services among the soldiers. At one time there were 12,000 men in the camp, and the Young Men's Christian Association had its own chapel. There was an Army Hymn Book with the American flag on the front page, and the workers visited the men in tents and barracks. They would offer to exchange hymn books for their playing cards.

War Experiences: The Soldier's Last Message Mr. Moody went to the front nine times, either as a member of the Christian Commission, or at the request of the Sanitary Commission, or the Chicago Citizens' Committee, to take supplies to the wounded. After the battles of Fort Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, Shiloh and Murfreesboro he was on the ground. He was also with the army at Cleveland and Chattanooga, and was among the first to enter Richmond. Mr. Moody's methods were direct and enthusiastic. "Now or never" was his famous argument with the stricken soldier. General O. O. Howard, in whose command Moody carried on part of his work, said that he was a fresh and hearty worker, full of enthusiasm, and popular with the men. In a letter to his mother at this time Moody wrote:

> "I am now at work among the soldiers a good deal. I had a good time in Kentucky. The boys wanted to have me become their Chaplain, but my friends will not let me, so I will remain in the city. I would like to see you all and talk about my Saviour, who seems so near to me. Oh, what would life be without Christ! I sometimes get to looking down in this dark world of sin, but when I look to Jesus it makes me look up."

After the battle at Pittsburg Landing the following incident occurred, the narrative being in Mr. Moody's words: "We must not let a man die on the boat this night without telling him of Christ and Heaven. You know the cry of wounded men is 'water! water!' As we passed along from one to another, giving them water, we tried to tell them of the water of life, of which, if they would drink, they would never die. I came to one man who had about as fine a face as I ever saw. I spoke to him, but he did not answer. I went to the doctor and said:

"'Doctor, do you think that man will recover?'

"'No; he lost so much blood before we got to him on the field that he fainted while we were amputating his leg. He will never recover.'

"I said: 'I can't find out his name and it seems a pity to let him die without knowing who he is. Don't you think we can bring him to?'

"'You may give him a little brandy and water,' said the doctor; 'that will revive him if anything will.'

"I sat down beside him and gave him brandy and water every now and then. While I was waiting, I said to a man near by:

"'Do you know this man?'

"'Oh, yes; that is my chum.'

"'Has he a father and mother living?'

"'He has a widowed mother.'

"'Has he any brothers or sisters?'

"'Two sisters; but he is the only son.'

"'What is his name?'

"'William Clark.'

"I said to myself that I could not let him die without getting a message for that mother. Presently he opened his eyes, and I said:

"'William, do you know where you are?'

"He looked around, a little dazed, and then said: 'Oh, yes; I am on my way home to mother.'

"'Yes, you are on your way home,' I said; 'but the doctor says you won't reach your earthly home. I thought I'd like to ask you if you had any message for your mother.'

"His face lighted up with an unearthly glow, as he said: 'Oh, yes; tell my mother that I died trusting in Jesus!'

"It was one of the sweetest things I ever heard in my life!

"Presently I said: 'Anything else, William?'

"With a beautiful smile he said: 'Tell my mother and sisters to be sure to meet me in Heaven,' and he closed his eyes. He was soon unconscious again, and in a few hours his soul took its flight to join his Lord and Master."

On returning to Chicago, Mr. Moody at once looked up the widowed mother and two sisters and delivered the message from this dying son and brother. As he was leaving the house one of the sisters, only a child at the time, came to him and placed in his hand the small savings of her sister and herself with the request that he purchase a Bible to give to some soldier. On returning to the front Mr. Moody related this incident, asking who wanted the Bible that the child had sent, and there were a number of petitions.

THE NORTH SIDE TABERNACLE IN CHICAGO AS REBUILT IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE GREAT FIRE

When the Court Adjourned for Prayer-Meeting These war experiences brought Mr. Moody prominently before the whole country and people from all sections of the land sent in requests to his meetings for prayers on behalf of husbands, brothers and sons. When the war was over Mr. Moody returned to Sunday-school work in Chicago. It was planned to hold a Sunday-school Convention at Springfield, Illinois, and Mr. Moody and two friends attended. After breakfast at the hotel they set out in search of a quiet place where they might have a prayer-meeting to themselves. The Baptist Church suited them and they entered by way of a basement window. While they were kneeling in prayer the pastor entered saying, "You are welcome, brethren, whoever you may be." From that grew a great revival which reached every part of the community. Mr. Moody made a tour of the State and had crowded houses wherever he went. Sometimes he filled two churches, speaking in both the same evening. A revival started at Pontiac, Illinois, in a very peculiar way. Mr. Moody went through the town on a muddy day, and talked to every man, woman and child he met. The result was a remarkable religious movement, in which several lawyers joined the churches, and the court had to adjourn at ten minutes before twelve to attend the noon prayer-meeting. In his Sunday-school work Mr. Moody did much to introduce the lesson system, and out of this agitation grew the International Series of Bible Lessons. All this time his interest was still maintained in the work which he had begun in the North Market Hall, which continued to grow in size and activity. The little mission grew into a church and became the Illinois Street Church, with a seating capacity of 1500. It was the centre of a large variety of Christian enterprises, one of which was the holding of open-air services during the summer.

"Some of the happiest nights I ever had were in the children's prayer-meetings," Mr. Moody used to say. "Some people don't believe in early conversion. 'If they have a father or mother, let them take care of them,' they say. Then they complain, 'If you do get them and they are converted, they won't hold out.'

"Well, that is not my experience. Some of the most active men that I had to help me in Chicago were little barefooted boys, picked up in the lanes and byways. Some of the most active men in the church there to-day were boys that went to church then. I was once sent for by a mother who was on her deathbed. She had been married twice and her husband abused her son.

"'Now I am dying of consumption,' she said. 'I have been sick a long time and since I have been lying here I have neglected my boy. He has got into bad company and he is very, very unkind, and he is given to swearing. Mr. Moody, I want you to promise me that when I am gone and he has no one to take care of him, you will look after him.' I promised that I would. And soon after that mother died. No sooner was she buried than that boy ran away and they didn't know where he was. The next Sunday I spoke to the children in my Sabbath-school and I asked them to look for him and if they found him to let me know. For some time I did not hear from him; but one day one of my scholars told me that he was a bell-boy in a certain hotel. I went to the hotel and found him and talked with him. How well I remember that night! He had no father or mother, and his step-father abused him. There was no place where we could be alone in the hotel, so I asked him where we could have some seclusion. He said the only place he knew of was on the hotel roof. There on the top of that hotel I spoke to him about Christ, and what He had done for him, and how He loved him. The tears trickled down his cheeks. I prayed with him there and he became a Christian. Below was the tumult of the city. It was the night before the Fourth of July and they were firing off cannon and sky-rockets. But there upon that roof at midnight this boy was praying and calling upon God for light and aid and comfort. Many years after I met him again and he is now an active Christian man."

Days of Rough-Water Sailing During these times Mr. Moody did not always have fair sailing. One man tried his best to break up his meeting. On a certain evening Mr. Moody was standing at the door of the inquiry-room. The entrance was on a landing on the stairs to the large hall, and below, to the vestibule, were several steps. While thus engaged a man approached Mr. Moody and deliberately and grossly insulted him. He never would say just exactly what this insult was, but it must have been of unusual indignity, for he thrust the man from him, sending him precipitously down the steps to the sidewalk. Happily the man was not injured, but Mr. Moody felt keenly his guilt in giving way to his passion. One who was present tells the rest of the story:

"When I saw Mr. Moody give such evident expression to his temper, although I could not but believe the provocation was extraordinary, I said to myself: 'This meeting is killed. The large number who witnessed the scene will hardly be in a condition to be influenced by anything more Mr. Moody may say to-night.' But before Mr. Moody began the second meeting that night he arose, and with a trembling voice made a most humble apology.

"'Friends,' he said, 'before beginning to-night I want to confess that I yielded just now to my temper, out in the hall, and have done very wrongly. I want to confess my wrong before you all, and if the man is present here whom I thrust away from me in anger I want to ask his forgiveness, and before you all I want to ask God's forgiveness. Let us pray!' There was not a word of excuse or vindication for resenting the insult. The impression made by his words was wonderful, and, instead of the meeting being killed by the scene, it was wonderfully blessed by the consistent and straightforward confession of Mr. Moody."

Editor's Note — This is the third of a series of papers, begun in the Post of April 7, dealing with the important periods of Mr. Moody's life.

Digitized by Google

On one occasion he was invited to the opening of a great billiard hall and saloon, and he went to the men and prayed with them, and prayed that their business might go to pieces. They did fail, and later one of the men became converted. In the early sixties he worked among all classes and conditions. Sometimes he would take a well-trained choir to the low drinking saloons and they would sing songs and distribute tracts while Mr. Moody would preach and pray. In preaching on How to Reach the Poor he once said:

"We don't make our services interesting enough to get unconverted people to come. We don't expect them to come—would be mortified if they did. To make them interesting and profitable, ask the question, 'How shall we make them more interesting?' and then ask some man that never takes a part to tell how he would do it. You will wake him up. If you can't talk, read a verse of Scripture, and let God speak. Bring up the question, 'What more can we do in our district?' Get those who never do anything to say what they think ought to be done, then ask them if they are doing it. Don't get in a rut. I abominate ruts. Perhaps I dread them too much, but there is nothing I fear more."

The Lightning Christian of the Country

All the children on the street seemed to know him, and very often in his walks he had in his pockets candy which he freely gave to his little friends.

In this period of his life he was very successful in securing appropriations for buildings. The Young Men's Christian Association wanted a building of their own. While the election which resulted in the choice of John V. Farwell as president and Dwight L. Moody as vice-president was going on, Mr. Moody was out getting pledges, and before night there were assurances of a hall with a seating capacity for 3000 people and with rooms for the committee meetings and offices. The first cash subscription was $10,000 from Cyrus McCormick. Some of the larger subscribers, appreciating Mr. Moody's effort in raising the money for the building, declared that it should be named after him. Mr. Moody learned of this plan and at the proper moment made a short but thrilling appeal, demanding that the audience name it Farwell Hall in honor of the chairman of the building committee and of one who had given so liberally to the cause. The proposal was carried with a shout, although Mr. Farwell claimed afterward "that the audience acceded to the only mistake that Mr. Moody ever made in connection with this enterprise." Four months afterward Farwell Hall was burned down. It was said that Mr. Moody, by his quick decision and well-directed efforts, secured subscriptions for the new building before the old one ceased burning. Rev. David Macrae, of Scotland, who was visiting Chicago at that time, called Mr. Moody "the lightning Christian of the city." The second Farwell Hall was larger and better, but it also was destroyed in the great fire of Chicago in 1871. The third Farwell Hall was erected while Mr. Moody was in Europe, but it was he who afterward raised the money necessary to clear the building from debt. This third building gave way to the present Farwell Hall, which exceeds in value any Young Men's Christian Association building in the world.

Mr. Moody's methods all this time were those of swift appreciation and incessant effort. He was quick to use those men with whom he came in contact. He was always ready in his replies. At one convention he always began by reading a verse from his Bible. A man exclaimed: "I am glad you keep to your chart."

"There is nothing else to keep to," replied Moody. "If that goes, everything goes."

Very often he would station himself at the entrance of the Association Rooms and distribute invitations to the noonday prayer-meeting, and many conversions came of this work. He was a great student of the Bible. "We need more Bible in our meetings," he often said. He did all he could for the prisoners and often visited the jails.

Common-Sense Treatment of the Charity Problem

At the International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association in Baltimore, in 1879, Mr. Moody was elected president with great enthusiasm. In this convention he said some of the things that are quoted to this day. When asked if it was advisable to appoint unconverted men on committees, he replied: "Well, if you want to carry a corpse, put them on. A man that is dead has to be carried. I think one man with Christ in his soul is worth a thousand of those without Christ."

Again, he said: "When any one came to me and bored me, when I was secretary in Chicago, with some hobby to be worked in the Association, I would say—if it was good in itself—'Yes, that is a good thing to do. I will appoint you chairman of a special committee to work that out. You fill up the committee with several others and go to work.'"

The question of the unemployed he solved in this way: "First of all, to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness, believing His promise, which I never knew to fail, that all things will be added unto them. Second, to pray to God for work. Third, to be as patient as possible during these times of hardship. Fourth, to look earnestly for work. Fifth, to take any honest employment that offers itself. Sixth, to study economy. The laboring-men should own their own homes.

"We used to have men coming in all the time and asking for work when I was secretary in Chicago. They would tell about their sufferings and how they had no work and wanted help. At last I got two or three hundred cords of wood and put it in a vacant lot, and got some saws and sawbucks and kept them out of sight. A man would come and ask for help. 'Why don't you work?' I would ask. 'I can't get any.' 'Would you do it if you could get any?' 'Oh, yes, anything.' 'Would you really work in the street?' 'Yes.' 'Would you saw wood?' 'Yes.' 'All right;' and then we would bring out a saw and sawbuck and send him out, but we would have a boy watch and see that he did not steal the saw. Then the fellow would say: 'I will go home and tell my wife I have got some work:' and that would be the last we would see of him. During the whole winter I never got more than three or four cords of wood sawed."

Copyright, 1876, by R. Sewell & Son, Philadelphia

THE OLD FREIGHT STATION IN PHILADELPHIA WHERE MOODY HELD MEETINGS

An Enthusiastic Welcome from England

Mr. Moody's first visit to England was brought about largely by the fact that Mrs. Moody was a sufferer from asthma and her physician had suggested a sea voyage with an entire change of air.

As soon as Mr. Moody reached England he was invited to speak at an anniversary meeting of the London Sunday-school Union in Exeter Hall. Mr. Moody was assigned to move a vote of thanks to the chairman of the evening, who was the well-known Earl of Shaftesbury. Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull gives this account of what happened:

"Toward the close of the meeting the chairman yielded his place to the vice-chairman, in order that such a resolution might be offered. The vice-chairman announced that they were glad to welcome their 'American cousin, the Rev. Mr. Moody, of Chicago,' who would now 'move a vote of thanks to the noble Earl' who had presided on this occasion. With refreshing frankness and an utter disregard of conventionalities and mere compliments, Mr. Moody burst upon the audience with the bold announcement:

"'The chairman has made two mistakes. To begin with, I'm not the "Reverend" Mr. Moody at all. I'm plain Dwight L. Moody, a Sabbath-school worker. And then I'm not your "American cousin!" By the grace of God I'm your brother, who is interested, with you, in our Father's work for His children.

"'And now about this vote of thanks to "the noble Earl" for being our chairman this evening. I don't see why we should thank him any more than he should thank us. When at one time they offered to thank our Mr. Lincoln for presiding over a meeting in Illinois, he stopped it. He said he'd tried to do his duty, and they had tried to do theirs. He thought it was an even thing all round.'"

Shortly after his return Mr. Moody met Mr. Sankey, who was a delegate to the International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association, held at Indianapolis in 1870. In one of the meetings there was some difficulty with the singing and Mr. Sankey led with the familiar "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood." Afterward followed the interview in which Mr. Moody told Mr. Sankey that he must give up his business and join him in evangelistic work.

Mr. Sankey tells this story about one of their experiences, before he had decided to join Mr. Moody in his work. Mr. Moody had asked him to meet him on a certain street corner. He did so and this is what followed:

"Without stopping, Mr. Moody walked into a store on the corner and asked permission to use a large empty box which he saw outside the door. This he rolled to the side of the street and, taking his stand upon it, at once asked me to sing the hymn, 'Am I a Soldier of the Cross?'

"After one or two hymns, Mr. Moody began his address. Many workingmen were just then on their way home from the mills and factories, and in a short time a large crowd had gathered. The address that evening was one of the most powerful I had ever heard. The crowd stood spellbound by the burning words which flowed from the speaker's lips and many a tear was brushed away from the eyes of the men as they looked up into the honest face of the speaker. After talking about fifteen or twenty minutes, he closed with a short prayer and announced that he was going to hold another meeting at the Academy of Music and invited the crowd to follow him there. We sang the well-known hymn, 'Shall We Gather at the River,' as we marched down the street.

"It took but a few minutes to pack the Academy, Mr. Moody seeing that the men were all seated before he ascended the platform to speak."

There are many interesting facts about the large sums of money raised by Mr. Moody for religious work, but of them all there is no story more remarkable than the success of the Hymn Book which appears under the name of Moody and Sankey. This volume was in some respects an evolution from Philip Phillips' book called Hallowed Songs. Mr. Sankey used Mr. Phillips' book and at the same time sang from his private selections. Finally a new selection resulted called Sacred Songs and Solos, which sold in large quantities at sixpence a piece, for Moody and Sankey were then in England. Some months later a small book of Words Only was published, and sold for a penny. The first advertisement of Sacred Songs and Solos appeared September 18, 1873, and soon the book was known all around the world. The royalties were placed in the hands of a committee and were devoted to religious work. At the close of the Moody and Sankey campaign these royalties amounted to $35,000, and, on the suggestion of English friends, the money was devoted to the rebuilding of the Y. M. C. A. building in Chicago.

When Mr. Moody returned to America in August, 1875, a new collection of hymns was arranged for by Mr. P. P. Bliss and Mr. Sankey, and the name was changed to Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs. The royalties from this book were first paid over to a committee of prominent business men in Philadelphia, New York and Chicago. Mr. William E. Dodge, of Chicago, was chairman. The money was devoted to religious, philanthropic and educational purposes in many parts of the United States. Out of this fund were erected many buildings, including three fine structures at Northfield and one at Mt. Hermon. These royalties are now paid to the trustees of the schools at Northfield and Mt. Hermon. Mr. Dodge made this statement:

Hymn Books as Money Makers

"The sale of the various editions of the books so prepared greatly exceeded expectations, and, although the royalty was small on a single copy of the book, as trustees we received up to September, 1885, the large sum of $357,388.64. All of this was carefully distributed among various religious and educational institutions. It was finally determined that the entire royalties of these books should be turned over to the trustees of the schools at Northfield, and this was accordingly done.

"During all these years neither Mr. Moody nor Mr. Sankey had any fixed income. Mr. Sankey, especially, had given up copyrights which would have brought him in a large yearly sum, and opportunities to hold musical institutes and conventions which would have substantially added to his income. Neither of them, during the whole continuance of the trust, received one dollar of personal advantage.

"In closing the trust I consulted a lawyer of very high national reputation—the leader of the bar in New York. He was greatly interested in the form of the trust and had but little sympathy in the religious work. He gave a large amount of time and thought, and, after receiving his opinion, I asked him to be kind enough to send me a memorandum, so that I could personally send him a check, which I supposed would necessarily be a large one. He told me under no possible circumstance would he accept a cent: that the unselfishness and splendid quality of men who could make such a sacrifice was a new revelation of human nature to him, and made him feel better disposed toward mankind."

Copyright, 1900, by Fleming H. Revell Co.

NORTHFIELD IN WINTER

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

The Nation's Servants Abroad

Of all the departments of Government employment, the consular service seems to be about the worst. A consul at one of the important cities of Europe has recently made a statement that only about two out of every twenty-five consuls which each Administration sends to that particular country bring back any money with them when they are superseded, and these two do it only by wretched parsimony. It is a fact that many of our consuls turn up afterward as agents of foreign interests or representatives of other countries, and sometimes as workers of rather questionable schemes. The consular work in the far East during the war with Spain is still a matter of comment and criticism, while at the point of all points where during the past months a good level-headed American was needed—that is, at Pretoria—the American Consul packed up and came home.

There has been a vast improvement in our Ambassadors and Ministers in the diplomatic part of the Government, because the positions have attracted men of wealth to whom the small salaries were no special consideration; and so we have a number of excellent gentlemen serving the richest nation on earth and spending many times their salary each year in order to maintain their proper pride and to uphold the dignity of their Government.

But in the consular service it is different. This branch is commercial. It is kept up for trade and money and the men enter it for salary. The absolute necessity of having trained representatives in this age of world commerce is apparent, but the ridiculous part is that district politicians make the selections. Fancy, if you can—you a manufacturer—needing experts in every branch of your establishment, discharging your superintendents and welcoming a new lot of nondescripts who had been sent to you on recommendations of politicians. How long would your business last? And yet in the broader and greater business of the whole nation that is the plan followed—the plan that has been followed for over a hundred years.

It seems absurd, but it is true.

What Harry Garfield Has Done

Sometimes it seems that there could be no reform, especially in politics, if it were not for young men. The first consul to represent this country was commissioned in 1789, and in the 111 years since then only one bill has been passed by Congress to improve the consular service, and it accomplished practically nothing. There are many young men who would like to serve their country in foreign places, and there are other young men who want to open the way for them. For some years the agitation has been going on, but it was not until the young men took hold of the movement that it reached important proportions—men like William Rockhill, Gaillard Hunt, Representative Adams, all formerly in the foreign service, and others, who are doing good work for the Government. The one to whom the most credit is given is Harry A. Garfield. He was President of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce and he saw the need of reform.

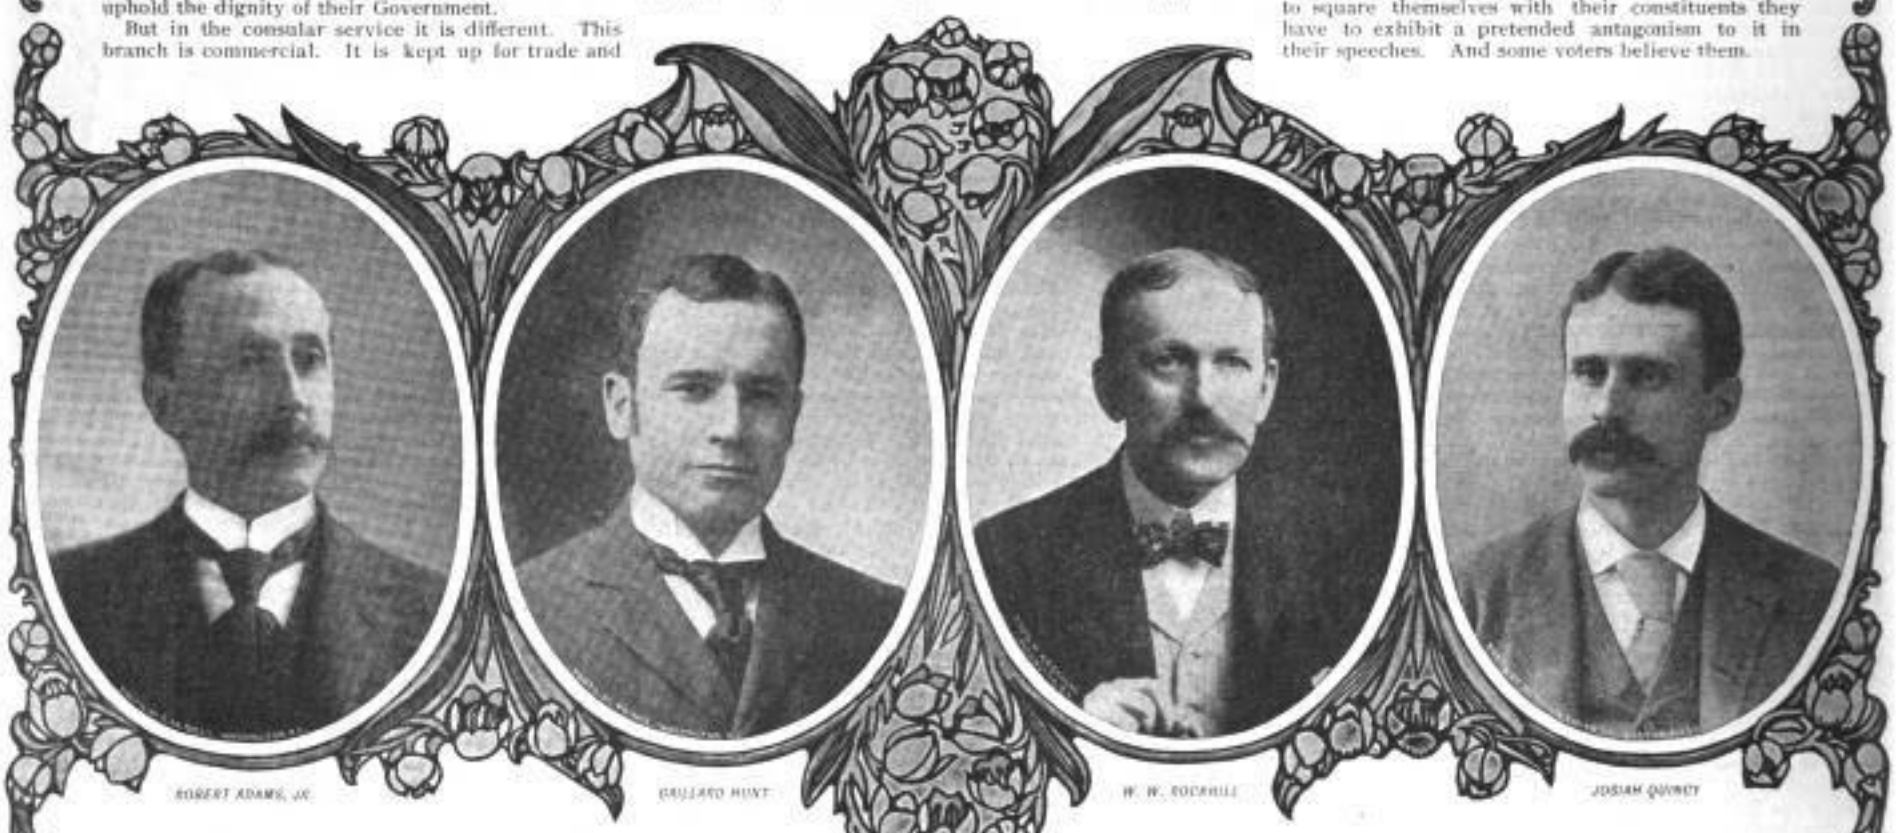
The Bill to Make Better Consuls

In the past several years eight or nine different bills for the improvement of the service have been introduced into Congress—all failures. The movement never had much real life until Mr. Garfield threw his energy into it. Thus we have the new bill, 9661 in the Senate list, which was introduced into the Senate on January 23 of this year by Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts, and which is entitled, "A Bill to Remodel the Consular Service of the United States." It is the matured product of the Cleveland business body. It provides for the appointment of four consuls-general at $8000 per annum; thirteen at $6000, nineteen at $5000; thirty-seven consuls of the first class at $5000, thirty-five at $4000, sixty at $3000, forty at $2000, thirty at $1800, fifty at $1500. It abolishes the fee system and commercial agents. Consuls shall be subject to examination and they must stand the test of competency. The consul-general or a consul may be transferred from one post to another; he is the Government's agent. Appointments shall be made by promotion, and the merit system will prevail. "No one shall be examined who is under twenty-five or over forty-five years of age, or who is not a citizen of the United States, or who is mentally, morally or physically disqualified to fulfill properly the duties of consul. The scope and method of the examination shall be determined by the board, but among the subjects shall be included either the French, German or Spanish language, and questions designed to ascertain each applicant's knowledge of the commercial resources of the United States." After a service of twelve months in a consulate no consul shall be dismissed from the service except for due cause.

Three Benefits that Would Follow

If the movement which is now being actively pushed, and which is interesting the business interests of the entire country, should be successful it will do three great things. It will remove a scandal from our politics. To appreciate how great this is we have only to examine the figures of recent Administrations. Mr. Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, when Assistant Secretary of State, did much to hasten the movement by his complete turning over of the consular equipment. He dismissed Republicans and put in Democrats wherever he could. But though the record under the Cleveland Administration was pretty bad, it has been even worse under McKinley. With 272 consulships of $1000 salary and over there have been 238 changes made by this Administration, and of the grade below $1000 twenty-one out of forty-eight were changed. These figures tell their own story.

In the second place, it will open new possibilities for the really deserving young men of the country. Of course, we do not expect appointments to office to be entirely free from personal influence any more than we expect the millennium next week; but by inaugurating the merit system and giving the young man practical assurance that so long as he does the work well he will keep his office, the consular service will be made attractive to the right sort of applicants. It will, in the nature of things, become the kind of school from which may be graduated our future diplomatists. In the third place, it will be a capital thing for the commerce of the country. Much can be done by having trained and efficient consuls at every point in the world.



The Fight for the Loaves and Fishes

It would seem that when all the business interests of the country, when all the unselfish efforts of good citizens, and when the best sentiment of the press and pulpit are in favor of a reform there ought not to be any difficulty in its accomplishment. But in politics the evident right is often the slowest to find recognition.

The little politicians in both branches of Congress and the little bosses behind them will not give up a single loaf or a single fish willingly. The merit system interferes with their style of statesmanship. Naturally they do not like it.

It is popular to deride Civil Service Reform as a movement against the plain people, whereas it is the only plan that offers perfectly honest assurances that a poor man may get into public service without compromising his reputation by irregular campaign practices or bending the knee to a boss. There is no farce more pitiable than that annual and sometimes semi-annual acting in Congress when a few of the Representatives make their sham fight against Civil Service Reform.

The funny part about it is that they are the very ones who are protected by the law. They use it as a constant and never-failing excuse for not carrying out their campaign promises; but then, of course, to square themselves with their constituents they have to exhibit a pretended antagonism to it in their speeches. And some voters believe them.

ROBERT ADAMS, JR. GAILLARD HUNT W. W. ROCKHILL JOSIAH QUINCY

A Simple Story of a Wise Young Man

A man who represents the United States at one of the important capitals of Europe offered the position of secretary to his son who had just graduated from a leading university. The young man asked time for consideration and then replied:

"It is mighty kind of you, and I know that I should have a good time for four and possibly for six or eight years, and should meet many people whom I would like to know; but after it is all over what should I be good for?" It was the question of a young man who thought.

The father pointed out that the salary of $2000 was a consideration, but the young man wisely shook his head and said:

"I would spend every cent of it, and at the end of the time I should be worse fitted for the responsibilities of life than I am now. I should like to go with you, but I do not see how I can."

It is unnecessary to say that the father was proud of the decision. This son is now struggling along on much less salary, but the drilling and the experience which he is getting will be paying large dividends when the diplomatic salary with a change of Administration would suddenly cease. It takes nerve to turn the back on the attractions of one of the capitals of the world, but it shows the kind of common-sense which distinguishes the really level-headed and successful American. And yet why should this be the case? Why should not this young man be able to enter the service of the Government with the same feeling of confidence as in ordinary business employment? There is no explanation except the evils of spoils politics. That is what the new consular bill seeks to reform.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

Made Cleveland Change His Mind

Joseph J. Little, President of the New York Board of Education, has been filling an unusually large place in the public eye for more than a year past. For a strictly peaceable man he has been engaged in more controversies than fall to the lot of most fighters. First, Mr. Holt, the publisher, engaged in a contention with him, and later Comptroller Coler has been questioning the accounts of his department in a remarkably unpleasant manner. But in spite of these diversions, Mr. Little manages to preserve the equable and smiling demeanor that makes him one of the most popular men in New York public life. It was this quality that enabled him to make Mr. Cleveland change his mind.

The President had been invited to attend a Democratic harmony dinner to be given in New York and had accepted the invitation. Later, other guests were invited without consultation with Mr. Cleveland, and when he heard of it he declined to be present. Now the sending out of these invitations had been intrusted to Mr. Little and he felt a personal responsibility in the matter. He had announced that Mr. Cleveland would be present and he felt that his reputation was at stake. A day or so before the dinner he called on Mr. Cleveland.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Little?" inquired President Cleveland pleasantly.

"Mr. President, you've known me for a good many years as a printer and as a Congressman. You never knew me to break my word in my life. What I say I do. What I promise I fulfill. I invited you to be present at this dinner and you accepted my invitation, and I have announced it to every other gentleman who is to be present, and I expect you to keep your word to me just as I would keep my word to you."

"But," began the President, "you have invited some people there that I don't want to meet."

"That makes no difference, Mr. President. Nothing was said about that when you accepted the invitation, and besides that, what is the use of a harmony dinner among friends?"

Half an hour later Mr. Little left the house with a new acceptance from the President in his pocket and the dinner took place as was originally planned.

Interviewing the Princess of Wales

The only newspaper woman who ever interviewed the Princess of Wales is an American girl, Miss Mary Penfield. It came about in a curious way. A new drama was being presented at a leading London theatre, and Miss Penfield, her editor and the playwright were occupying a box. Suddenly there was a round of applause and into the royal box came the Princess of Wales and a lady.

The playwright looked at his friends and exclaimed, "I wonder how the Princess likes my piece!"

Miss Penfield more in joke than in earnest replied, "I'll go and find out."

She was promptly challenged to do it, and rather than be accused of fear, rose and left the box. As required by London etiquette she was in evening toilette, better dressed, in fact, than most of the audience. At the royal box the official looked at her inquiringly, and when she nodded he opened the door and bowed her in. She advanced two steps and bowed to the Princess, who motioned her to a chair. She seated herself promptly and listened to the Princess' comments upon the play. Undoubtedly she had been mistaken for some one else, because at the end of fifteen minutes the box door opened to admit a lady who resembled her in face and figure. Miss Penfield thereupon rose, bowed humbly and returned to her friends, to whom she repeated the criticisms.

How Suzanne Adams Saved the Day

Suzanne Adams rescued a performance of Les Huguenots by the Metropolitan Opera Company on the briefest notice.

At twelve o'clock noon she received a telephone message in New York asking her to sing the part of the Queen in a matinée performance to be given that day at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. By a quarter to one she had completed preparations and boarded the train. She arrived during the performance, just in time to take her place on the stage. Madame Nordica, originally cast for the rôle of Valentine in the presentation, had been suddenly taken ill. For a time it was feared that no one could be found to sing in her place until the discovery was made that Madame De Vere would undertake the part. But she had been cast to sing the Queen and a new difficulty confronted the management.

Les Huguenots was the only opera for which music and costumes had been brought to Philadelphia. It was Les Huguenots or no performance at all, and to have found a Valentine only to lose a Queen failed to help the situation.

The stage-manager caught Mr. Grau in New York by the long-distance telephone. Five minutes later he was asking Miss Adams to save the performance by singing the Queen.

Miss Adams had not sung the part in several seasons and she was consequently uncertain of both words and music. To meet the first difficulty it was telephoned to Philadelphia to begin the performance three-quarters of an hour late; to master the second Miss Adams studied her rôle on the train. Not a moment was left to consider the difficulties to be faced.

On her arrival she literally stepped from her carriage to the stage. The first act of the opera was ending as she reached the Academy of Music a little after three o'clock.

When the curtain rung up on the second act she was in her place on the stage, self-collected and cool. She sang brilliantly, and the audience, having learned that she had saved the performance, gave her an enthusiastic welcome.

The Father of the Senate

Last month Senator William B. Allison, of Iowa, completed his twenty-sixth year as a member of the United States Senate. Since the death of Senator Morrill, of Vermont, he has been called Father of the Senate. For over thirty-four years he has been in the public service, for before he was elected to the Senate he was for eight years a member of the House of Representatives. Senator Allison has passed his seventieth year, but so well has he lived that he is one of the sturdiest and most faithful members of Congress. Recently some old Washingtonians at a dinner voted upon the various qualities of the leaders in both branches of Congress, and at the end of the verdict it was unanimously conceded that Senator Allison wielded more authority than any of his colleagues.

Rosebery's Treacherous Stockings

At one time when Lord Rosebery was visiting relatives in Dumferline he was one of a house party who gave a number of amateur performances. Whyte-Melville, author of The Gladiators, was another member of the party, and also something of an actor. Indeed Lord Rosebery used never to lose an opportunity to take part in private theatricals. For many years Mr. Melville has entertained his friends with stories of the plays they put on during his stay with the Premier.

Here is one of them:

In Rob Roy Melville took the part of the famous brigand and Rosebery was a chieftain of the triumphant clan. At the last minute it was found that Rosebery had no plaided socks to go with his kilt, and a stage hand painted the nether extremities of the now famous statesman in the required plaided colorings and all which marked his clan. Toward the middle of the second act Rosebery warmed up considerably to the part, and he could feel the paint trickling down to the floor from his limbs in great drops. But he was not prepared for the remark which greeted him from the front row at the opening of the next act, when an old Scotchman said:

"Say, Dougal, hoot there, man! Your plaid is getting mighty traitorous. If you don't put some ice on yourself your colors will be running into each other, and you'll be worse than a Campbell in the last act." It almost broke up the performance.

W. B. ALLISON

SUZANNE ADAMS

MRS. DANIEL MANNING

HAYDEN CARRUTH

The Making of a Humorist

Hayden Carruth was a country school teacher in Wabash County, Minnesota, twenty years ago. Then he went out West. In Sioux Falls, South Dakota, he started a weekly paper.

In 1887 he wrote some humorous editorials for the Chicago Tribune and sent some others to the New York Tribune. Both were accepted and he went to Chicago. Here he was offered fifty dollars a week to join the Tribune's staff. But the price did not suit him and he went to New York. There he hunted up a newspaper friend.

"I'm going over to see the Tribune people," he said. "Now, what ought I charge?"

Knowing the rates of compensation in the newspaper business, his friend suggested forty dollars.

"How did you make out?"

"Oh! all right, but I wish I had asked more."

"Do you think you could have got fifty dollars?"

"Fifty? I asked them seventy-five, and they took it so quickly I'm sorry I didn't make it a hundred."

The President-General of the D. A. R.

There are eight patriotic women societies in this country and all of them have large memberships. One of the most important is the Daughters of the American Revolution which has 27,000 members, and chapters in all the States, and even in Hawaii. The headquarters are in Washington and the President-General is Mrs. Daniel Manning. Mrs. Manning takes a prominent part in the official life of Washington, where as the wife of the Secretary of the Treasury under the first Cleveland régime she won wide popularity.

Digitized by Google

Pratt's Cats

By W. L. Alden

THERE'S some folks," remarked Captain Baker reflectively, as he laid aside the Nantucket Gazette and wiped his spectacles, "that has ideas, and some that hasn't; and it's them that hasn't that are lucky. Now, I never had any ideas, beyond doing my duty as a sailorman in whatever situation I might happen to be. The consequence was that I got on peaceably with everybody, and never made more than a middling-sized ass of myself at any one time. Then there was Captain Hank Pratt, of the Natchez. Some people used to say that he didn't know anything whatever except seamanship and the Bible; and so, in a way, he didn't. But he was chock-full with ideas, most of which went to show that he ought to have confined himself to seamanship and religion. He was, take him by and large, the best able-bodied, A 1 Christian I ever heard of, but when he tried to bend his ideas on to his innocence, it was like bending a three-inch cable to the signal halyards, and trying to anchor with the lot.

"I often think of the time we had in the Natchez with Captain Pratt's cats. I was first mate of the ship at the time, and we were lying in Boston harbor, filling up with New England rum and cotton goods for Singapore and Canton. We had taken in about all she would hold, when Captain Pratt says to me, 'Mr. Baker, you've been ashore several times at Singapore?'

"'It wasn't my fault, sir,' I says—for, next to Port Said, Singapore is the measliest place in the whole East.

"'I wasn't asking why you went ashore,' says the Captain; 'if so be that you got into difficulties, I'm afraid that it came from your not being a pious man'—which I wasn't at that time, I'm sorry to say. 'What I want to know,' continues the Captain, 'is just this: Did you ever see a cat in Singapore?'

"'Well, sir,' says I, 'I don't remember any particular cat, but then I haven't much opinion of cats, and I might pass half a dozen without noticing them. You'd better ask the carpenter; he was ashore at Singapore last voyage, for, if you remember, we were delayed twenty-four hours hunting him up.'

"'I did ask him,' says the old man, 'and he said that while he was at Singapore he'd seen the finest collection of variegated monkeys, mostly blue, that any sailorman ever saw, even after a month ashore in London, but he couldn't swear to any cats.'

"'Might I ask,' said I, 'what your particular interest in Singapore cats is pointing to?'

"'It's this way,' says he. 'I know from what I've read that there ain't a single solitary individual cat in all Singapore. I've got it in print in a book down in my cabin, and you can't deny what's in a book. Now, Singapore is just overrun with rats and mice, and the dogs and some other small animal, whose name I can't lay my hand to at this particular minute, don't begin to do their duty toward the vermin. What Singapore needs the worst way is cats that have been brought up to know their duty in regard to rats and mice, and will do it. Why, if the Singapore people could lay in a good supply of cats, their property would improve in value at least ten per cent. Now, I've been studying over this cat question for some time, and I've come to the conclusion that the man who carries a cargo of cats out to Singapore will make a lot of money.'

"'How so?' says I.

"'Look at it from a business point of view,' says the old man. 'What's the market value of a cat here in Boston? Just nothing at all, says you, and right you are. Now, what ought to be the market value of a cat in Singapore, where there ain't a cat of any kind, and where the mice and rats couldn't be reckoned up with any table of logarithms that was ever yet printed? My idea is that a good article of cat, laid down at Singapore, would fetch an average price of fifty cents in our money. Very good. I calculate to take in about a thousand cats between now and the day we sail. The boys on the wharf will catch them for me, and be glad to do it, for five cents a cat. I shall sell those cats at Singapore for fifty cents apiece, which will be a clean profit of forty-five cents per cat, their keep while on board ship not being worth mentioning, considering that we've got a fair supply of rats with us, and if the rats run short the cats will eat what the cook generally throws away. That's my little scheme for turning an honest penny in a new way, and I'd like to hear your opinion of it.'

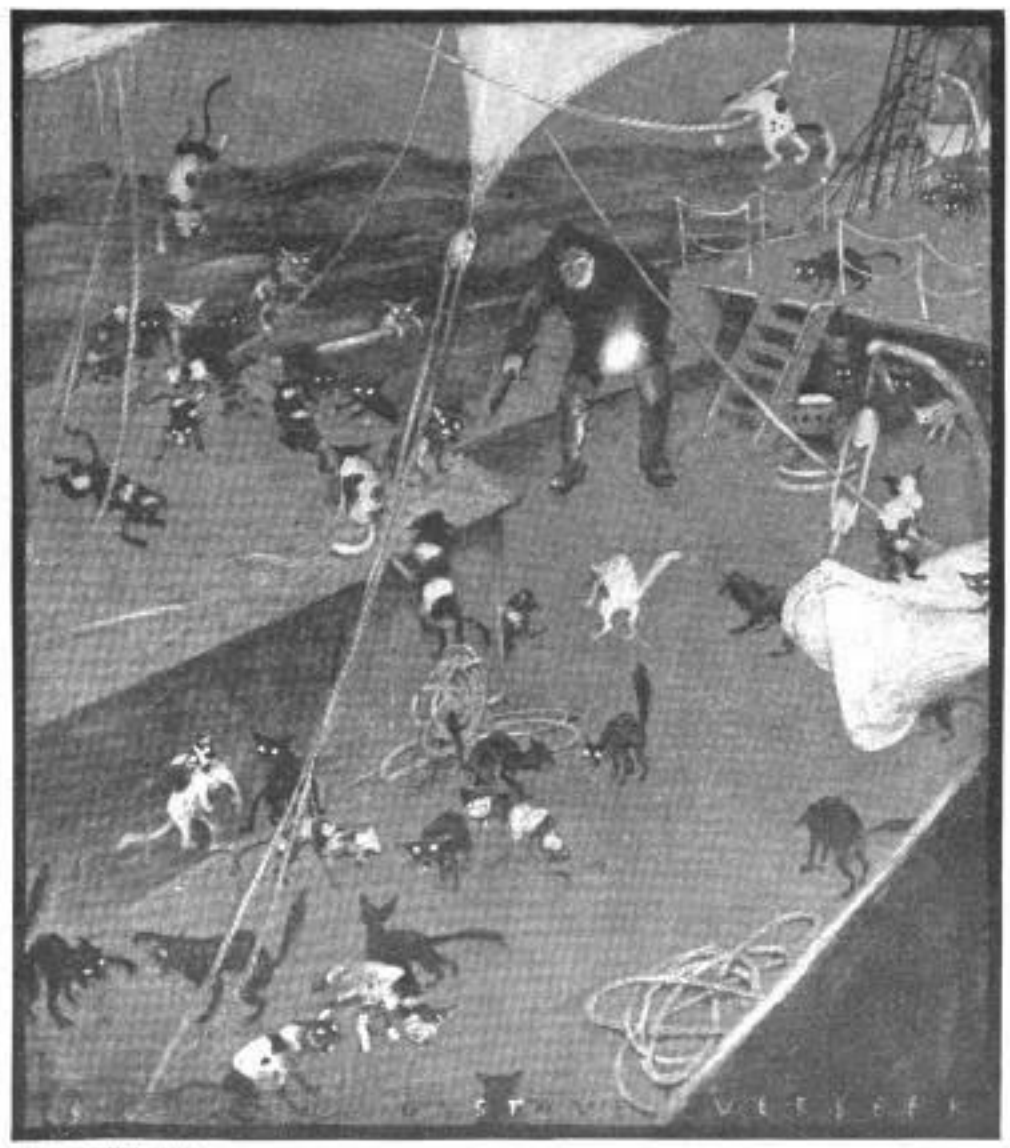
"'Begging your pardon, Captain,' says I, 'I haven't any opinion of it whatsoever. Likewise the same is my opinion of cats, which are an animal that no man can trust. You'll find long before you're off the Cape that you've made the biggest mistake of your life in meddling with cats. I've heard my mother say that there ain't a cat mentioned in the whole Bible, from beginning to end. You just lay that to heart, and have nothing to do with cats.'

"This was speaking a good deal plainer to my superior officer than I generally spoke, but I knew his cat idea was the worst sort of foolishness, and I wanted to have him give it up. But, of course, he wouldn't do anything of the sort. He was determined to take a cargo of cats to Singapore, and, accordingly, the more I might say against it the more he'd stick to his idea.

"Well, that very day Captain Pratt went to work to collect cats. He agreed with a warehouseman on the wharf to keep his cats for him till the day we sailed, and he offered a reward of five cents to every boy who would get a cat for him. Cats were thick in Boston in those days, and boys were mighty smart. They turned to with a will, and cats fairly poured in, as you might say. I told the Captain that there wasn't the least doubt that nine-tenths of the cats were private cats that the boys stole from their owners, and I put it to him, as a pious man, that he hadn't any right to encourage boys to steal. But he wouldn't listen to me. He said that the boys looked to him to be good, honest boys, and he wouldn't insult them by suspecting them of stealing.

"About an hour before we sailed the cats were all brought on board and dropped down the main hatchway to the 'tween decks, where the old man calculated that the beasts would be comfortable. We took away the ladder from the hatchway so that the cats couldn't come on deck, and there were two or three pannikins of fresh water waiting for them below. The crew seemed considerably amused when they saw the cats coming aboard—that is, all except the carpenter. He was a good man, the carpenter, so long as he was at sea, though a bit grumpy in temper, but he always stopped ashore when we were in port, and I'm afraid that he wallowed a good deal in the intoxicating bowl.

"He came aboard just after we had taken in all the cats, and he happened to look down the hatchway and saw the cats. He sort of staggered back and took hold of the fiferail to support himself. I asked him what was the matter, and he said he felt a little faint. 'By-the-by, Mr. Baker,' said he, 'is there such a thing as a cat aboard this ship, for it would be mighty unlucky to go to sea without one?'



"'Cat!' said I. 'Why, man, there's a thousand of them in the 'tween decks, that the Captain is taking to Singapore on speculation.'

"You never saw a man look so relieved. 'Oh,' says he, 'If they're real cats, that's all right. I don't mind real cats.'

"Well, we got on very well with the cats for the first twenty-four hours, though the cabin boy, whose bunk was close to the bulkhead that divided him from the cats, said he never slept a wink owing to the awful fighting that went on among them. But the next day the second mate, who wanted something got up from below, had the ladder put down the hatchway, and the cats, supposing that it was meant for their accommodation, went on deck in such a hurry that before anything could be done to stop them the whole gang took possession of the main deck, and the quarter deck, and the fo'c's'le, and the spars and rigging generally. The second mate ordered the men to catch the cats, but beyond catching two or three that were either sick or particularly tame, not a cat was caught. Then our troubles began.

"You'll say that a cat isn't dangerous, but just you try going aloft, especially at night, and meeting cats in the tops, and the crosstrees, and on every blessed yard-arm—particularly if the cats have got the notion that the top-hamper of the ship belongs to them, and that every man who goes aloft is trying to catch them. The moment a man's head came over the edge of the top he'd get two or three pairs of claws right in his face, and the wonder was that every man Jack didn't lose his eyes. If you laid out on a yard for any purpose, there would be a cat waiting for you, and she'd swear and claw at you till you was glad to give it up and slide down by a backstay, singing out that you were half killed. Why, there was three of the heaviest and best fighters of the lot—wild toms that had been champion fighters along the wharves—that took possession of the main topgallant-yard, and for three days we couldn't furl that sail, though it was blowing altogether too hard for any prudent man to carry it. When the halyards were let go, and the sail brailed up, the cats sat in the slings of the yard and waited for the men to come up and furl the sail. There was no knocking them off the yard, for they'd hang on with their claws and teeth like grim death. Whenever a man tried to get on the foot-rope they were ready for him, and let him have it right in the eyes. The end of it was that the men refused to go on the yard, and we had to hoist the yard up, and sheet the sail home to prevent it from being lashed into ribbons.

"The old man was the only one who wasn't in a rage with the cats. He said that the poor animals were only having a little innocent play, and that as soon as they got used to the ship they would be as gentle and polite as so many women. Perhaps they would have been, had they been fed properly, but as it turned out there wasn't any proper food for them. The only fresh meat we had on board was three or four pigs and about a dozen chickens, and the old man wouldn't have any of them killed for the first fortnight, because, as he said,

IT WASN'T SAFE TO BE ON DECK AT NIGHT WITHOUT A LANTERN IN ONE HAND AND A BELAYING-PIN IN THE OTHER

Digitized by Google

he had so much fresh meat ashore that he was tired of it and wanted nothing better than salt horse. Now, a cat will eat most anything that isn't salt, but hates salt worse than poison. But salt pork one day, and salt beef the other day, were all the provisions the Captain would serve out to the cats. He said that what was good enough for him and his officers and men was good enough for cats, and if the cats didn't like it, they could turn to and catch rats. That sounded fair enough, but the truth was that there wasn't a rat on board. They had all bolted in Boston as soon as they realized that we were filling up with cats.

"What with being half-starved, besides feeling themselves insulted by being offered salt meat, those cats got more and more savage every day. It wasn't safe to be on deck at night without a lantern in one hand and a belaying pin in the other, for you were liable to have a cat jump out at you any minute, and carry off a piece of your leg or your hand. They stole into the fo'c's'le, and tried to bite the watch below, so that the men didn't dare to go to sleep without setting one man to guard the hatchway. After we had been about three weeks out, and had just passed the line, owing to having had fresh breezes on the port or starboard quarter ever since leaving port, the men came aft, all hands of them, in the first dog watch, and told the old man that they'd had all the cat they could stand, and that it was the wish of all hands that he'd heave the cats overboard. The old man was as sweet as new milk. He told the men that the conduct of the cats had been regular outrageous, and he gave them permission to heave every cat overboard then and there. You see, he knew what he was about. There was no catching any of those cats, as I said a little while ago, and giving the crew permission to heave them overboard, while it sounded reasonable, didn't amount to anything.

"After we passed the line we stood over toward the South American coast, so as to get the trade wind. The cats kept making their usual disturbance, and never seemed to sleep while there was the least chance for any mischief. Luckily the wind had been pretty steady after the first three or four days, and we didn't have much to do except to brace the yards up now and then. The men were terribly discontented, but they couldn't help themselves. You'll naturally ask why the Captain didn't shoot the cats. Perhaps he would have tried it if it hadn't been that he had nothing to shoot with. You see, he was principled against carrying a revolver, and used to say that when he couldn't control his men by fair means he'd give up going to sea.

"We all came to the conclusion that there was nothing to be done but just to endure the cats until we got to Singapore; but the lookout wasn't a pleasant one. Those cats, as you might say, regularly besieged us, and we who lived aft never could leave the door of the companionway, or any side light that was near the mizzen chains, open for a minute, for fear that the cats would get down below. The old man had a bright idea one day. Says he to me: 'Mr. Baker, those cats are actually more than a Christian man is required to bear. I've made up my mind to poison them.'

"'All right,' says I. 'I'm glad to hear it. But where are you going to get your poison from?'

"'Ain't there a medicine chest in the cabin?' says he. 'And ain't medicines mostly poison? I'll give them all a dose of horse salts to-night, and we'll see what that will do for them.'

"Now, it's one thing to give a sailor medicine, and another thing to serve it out to a cat. A sailor has a natural taste for medicine, and will take anything you give him, from salts up to castor oil—but a cat has more sense. The old man left pannikins of salts in all three of the tops that night, and calculated that the majority of the cats would be dead before morning, but they never turned a hair. Not one of them would touch the salts. So we had to give up the idea of poisoning them.

"We'd been out of Boston just about five weeks when the cats began to go mad. There wasn't any doubt that either the salt food or something else had given them the hydrocephalus, as those scientific doctors call it. Any way, mad they were, and behaved accordingly. They fought among themselves; they tried to bite every man who came within reach, and they rushed up and down the deck and up and down the rigging, yelling and cursing and spitting as if they didn't believe there was any hereafter, and didn't care whether there was or not.

"Pretty soon the men understood what was the matter with the cats—which they found out through the second mate being foolish enough to tell them; I don't want to say anything against the second mate, but it can't be denied that he was young, and when a man is young he is naturally foolish. I was foolish myself when I was a young man, and I don't doubt that you were, too—begging your pardon, and not meaning any offense. Well, when the men knew that the cats had gone mad they were dead sure that they would all go mad, too, most of them having been chewed up considerable since the cats first came aboard, and it being well known that the bite of a mad animal is certain death. The Captain did his best to quiet them by telling them that if they were bound to go mad there was no help for it, there being no medicine that could do them any good, and, consequently, the best thing they could do was to say their prayers regular and do their duty to him and the owners.

"I judged that he made a mistake in this. He ought to have told them that he had a medicine which was a certain cure for hydrocephalus, and then he ought to have ladled salts into them, with, say, a little tar mixed in with it to give it a flavor, and then the men would probably have been satisfied. But there's the inconvenience of not being able to tell a lie! I can't really blame the Captain for it, but it would have been a sight handier if the Natchez had happened to have a Captain who was a first-class liar, and could have quieted the men down, and avoided any serious trouble with them.

"I don't say that I wasn't nightily afraid of those cats myself, for I never liked the idea of going mad; and to go mad in consequence of a cat was more aggravating than it would have been if the cats had been dogs. I never went on deck without a heavy bit of wood in my hand, and when I saw a cat coming my way I generally went the other way in double-quick time. Two of the men were caught by the mad cats, and the way they were bit up was a sight. Finally the men broke into open mutiny, and swore they would stop below in the fo'c's'le till the Captain would promise to put into the nearest Brazilian port, which was then only about 300 miles to leeward. The old man gave in and promised, for there was nothing else for him to do, and we braced up on the starboard tack and headed for Pernambuco. The men seemed to be more or less satisfied; but that night, soon after the second mate came on deck in the middle watch, I having gone below and the old man taking all night in, three or four of them jumped on him from behind as he was leaning over the rail, and gagged him and made him fast to the wheel. Then they tossed some provisions and a breaker of water into one of the quarter boats, and having backed the maintopsail, the breeze being light at the time, they got into the boat, all hands of them, and lowered away, and that was the last that any man ever saw or heard of them.

"The men had worked so quietly that neither the Captain nor I woke up, but after a while the old man, happening to awake and look at the compass over his berth, saw the ship was heading about north, and knew that something was wrong. So he rushed on deck and loosed the second mate, and told him to call all hands. There was nobody to call except the carpenter and me and the nigger cook and the cabin-boy, but when we were all mustered on deck we braced the yards up again, and put her on her course. The second mate was wild with anger and fright, for several times while he was bound hand and foot and couldn't help himself, or even sing out, cats had come up and investigated him, but curious as it may seem, nobody bit him. I calculate that this was on account of the tobacco that he used to use, which was the worst that I ever smelt. Anyway, it showed the advantages of using tobacco, and I've often thought of it when my wife talked to me about the evils of smoking.

"In three days' time we ran into Pernambuco, and the minute the ship was fast to the quay the cats bolted. They went along that quay like a streak of black and tabby lightning, and the natives ran and yelled that a whole regiment of devils had been let loose on them. We never saw any more of those cats, though I did read in the Boston papers after we got back to Boston that an epidemic of hydrocephalus had broken out at Pernambuco, and that the people were that scared they were leaving the town.

"We shipped a new crew—and a scaly lot of Dagos they were—and pursued our voyage to Singapore and Canton. I never mentioned cats once to the old man, for I could see that he was a good deal cut up about the failure of his speculation; but one day, while we were lying at Singapore, he said: 'Mr. Baker, you warned me not to put my trust in cats, and I laughed you to scorn. You were right, and I beg your pardon. Cats are an irreligious and an unscrupulous animal, and no Christian man, let alone a Christian sailor, ought to have any dealings with them.'"

The New Mother Goose

By Guy Wetmore Carryl

The Wandering Propensities of the Garrulous Gander

A GANDER dwelt upon a farm
And no one could resist him,
And had he died, such was his charm,
His master would have missed him.
His cheerful hissing day by day,
His scorn for any loud display,
Would win your heart in such a way
You almost could have kissed him.

This bird was always nosing 'round;
It may as well be stated,
Wherever open doors he found
They were investigated.
He loved to poke, he loved to peek;
In every knot-hole, so to speak,
He quickly thrust his prying beak,
For what was hid he hated.

The farm exhausted, "Now," said he,
"My policy's expansion.
When one's convinced how things should be,
The proper course one can't shun."
His mind made up he followed it,
Relying on his native wit,
And soon had wandered, bit by bit,
Through all his master's mansion.

"At least," said he, "it's not my fault
If everything's not seen to.
I've been from garret down to vault,
And also in the lean-to,
And everywhere I've chanced to stop,
A supervising glance to drop,
I've looked below, I've looked on top,
Behind, and in between, too!"

One thing alone he found to blame,
And thus his time he squandered.
For, seeing not the farmer's dame,
Into her room he wandered.
And mounting lightly on the bed,
"Why, bless my careful soul!" he said,
"These pillows are as hard as lead.
Now, how comes that?" he pondered.

The farmer's dame, for half an hour
Had watched the fowl meander,
And, finding him within her power,
She leaped upon the gander.
"Why, how-de-do, my gander coy?"
She shouted. "What will be my joy
To dream to-night on you, my boy!"
(This was no baseless slander.)

For with a stoutish piece of string
Securely was this fool tied,
And by a leg and by a wing
Unto an oaken stool tied:
And, pinning towels around her gown,
She plucked him with relentless frown,
And stuffed the pillows with his down,
And served him up for Yuletide.

The moral is: When you explore,
Don't try to be superior.
Be cautious, and retire before
Your safety grows inferior.
'Tis best to stay upon the coast,
Or some day you will be like most
Of all that brave exploring host
Who've gone to the interior.

An Idyllic Breakfast

RICHARD WHITEING, who is still rather the London celebrity of the moment, does not exactly write immortal verse, but people are still talking of his novel, No. 5 John Street, and wondering what his next book will be like. His is a personality that would not lose a particle of its charm even if one did know what his favorite recreations are, which he has never been weak enough to disclose. At the present moment recreation has a delicious significance for him, for, having at last severed a connection of many years with the Daily News, he is realizing what it means to be a bondsman no longer.

"I go to bed at twelve and rise with the lark," he was heard to say to a friend the other day with a twinkle.

"The London lark?" inquired the friend rather unkindly.

"I don't know," answered the great man, chuckling, "but it is the lark that gets down to a ten-o'clock breakfast."

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA
421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
Five Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Absent-Minded Beggar

JOHN BULL and his absent-minded beggars are becoming just a bit of a bore. No one seriously objects to the gentle looting of the "smart set" for any mildly charitable object that may appeal to its snobbishness as promising a fair return in notoriety at home or dinner invitations in England. Nor, though it is a matter to be weighed more seriously, can one carp loudly at the Americans who are contributing their coppers that wells may be driven and corn-laden ships sent out to relieve thirsty and starving India—a British dependency and trust. For despite the qualifying millions of Teutons, Slavs and Latins that Europe has disgorged on these shores since England sent its first lean handful of Puritans, there is more than a dash of British blood in our veins. And because of this we have half forgotten our earlier fights and later quarrels, and entered into a pact of friendship.

A sweet and beautiful thing is friendship, but it implies reciprocity. And so it would seem to be eminently proper at this time for Mr. Markham to descend from Parnassus and write a little rag-time lyric, dedicated to the absent-minded friend and brother and—beggar—across the seas, reminding him that it would be a graceful thing to inaugurate a series of pink teas and parti-colored concerts for the American fighter in the far East. With it could go a consignment of actresses and "society leaders" to try their blandishments on the Lion. And then, through British press and pulpit an appeal might be made for starving Cuba and tornado-swept and tariff-harried Puerto Rico. For while friendship is a very sweet and beautiful thing, its essence is reciprocity, and a final test is the pocketbook. And Great Britain should at least have the chance of proving herself, even though those of us who have had experience of international charity—as exemplified in the old ocean steamer concert, where Americans gave the money and British orphans got it—have small hope of collecting anything in England for American charities and colonies, except with a shotgun.

We look for universal peace, but will common-sense ever win its war against fashion?

Our Immediate Responsibilities

IT IS the custom of some people to escape for a while from a sense of their own responsibilities by concerning themselves with the affairs of their neighbors, and a number of Europeans are consuming much ink and paper by expressing doubt as to the ability of the United States to manage the lands and peoples that have come under the American flag in the last two years. The doubters remind the world that we have no colonial office, no system of colonial government, nor any class of men trained and qualified to rule races that are not of our own blood, so what is to become of the Philippines, Hawaii, Guam, Puerto Rico and their peoples, and, incidentally, what is to become of us while we are experimenting?

We might retort by saying that pots shouldn't call kettles black, for no nation in Europe has any dependencies of which it has great reason to be proud, nor has any of them acquired firm hold of any conquered territory except by much slaughter and other abuse of the natives, nor of any territory of which the remaining natives do not dislike the ruling country.

The most successful of the colonial powers is Great Britain, who is intensely hated by all India and has disgraced herself unremittingly in Ireland for more than two centuries. The only dependencies creditable to British rule are those in which the home government allows the people entire freedom in the management of their own affairs, but the plan did not originate in England; it was adapted from the States Rights system which was elaborated by the aggregation of colonies that declared themselves free and independent on July 4, 1776.

Holland's labor exactions have made her disliked by the people of Java.

Spain has slaughtered, robbed and failed contemptibly wherever she set foot, and the other South European nations have been uniformly incompetent as managers of "annexed" countries.

As for Germany, the newest aspirant to colonization, she seems to have learned little or nothing from the blunders of her predecessors.

But let all that pass. Regarding our new dependencies, we shall do as we have done in the many new and unexpected experiences of our short, but eventful, national career—that is, we shall meet our responsibilities bravely, promptly and honestly. Thus far we have lived up to the principle that what should be done shall be done, and we have never failed to find the men and the means with which to do it. Fortunately we have purged our blood of the insular, and also exasperating, affectation of superiority to all peoples acquired by conquest or otherwise, we are destitute of the insolence and arrogance which have been the most visible features of German attempts at colonization, and we have no trace of the rage for murder, theft and oppression that has blackened the colonial records of all South European peoples.

Congress may be slow, uncertain and stupid at times, but our military and civil representatives in the new countries are not.

The first great duty of conquerors and colonizers is to disarm suspicion, and the second is to win the respect and esteem of the conquered. We began both in Cuba, even before the war ended, by establishing free hospitals for the sick and feeding the hungry, making no distinction between Spaniards and Cubans. We did it by hurrying thousands of tons of food to Puerto Rico when a hurricane made the people destitute. In scores of cities and towns of the Philippines the smoke of our skirmishers' rifles was still in the air when Lawton, MacArthur and other commanders called the non-combatant natives together, requested them to form local governments and assured them of sympathy and protection. Not a penny of the revenues of any of the islands has been sent to the United States, or expended upon our army or navy, or used for the benefit of any American. There have been no executions, no confiscations, no forced loans or forced labor, no increase of taxes, no personal abuse nor any meddling with personal affairs.

To govern peoples who are uniformly well treated has never been a difficult task, so we may yet astonish our critics by showing that we need no special increase of skill to fit us for managing our new dependencies to their benefit and our own credit.

—JOHN HARBERTON.

A man may lose time by going slowly, but if he keeps on he will get there.

A National Park at Lake Itasca

AFTER all, unselfishness abounds; the rarity is the man who believes this, accepts it as a working basis, and organizes the scattered forces of altruism that exist unconscious, for the most part, of their own abundance and strength. The number of sunrays is infinite; they merely await the burning glass that shall bring them to focus.

All this shows forth clearly enough in the movement lately set on foot for a national park at Lake Itasca—a matter that is presently to engage the attention of Congress itself.

A private gentleman in Chicago, professional man and sportsman, conceived, as the result of several fishing trips to the head waters of the Mississippi, the idea of rescuing the Minnesota forests from the unscrupulous devastations of rapacious lumbermen, and of securing the last remaining great tract of primeval Nature in the Mississippi Valley for the perpetual use and pleasure of the whole American people. And with a single-minded enthusiasm that the simile of the burning-glass but faintly typifies he set to work.

Only at the very beginning were doubters and cynics met, and these but few. "What is there in it for you, for me?" asked the puzzled self-seeker, his eyes still fixed from long habit on the main chance—asked, only to be ashamed of his own question: there was nothing in it for anybody—except everybody. And everybody arose gratefully to the occasion. Here was a chance for generosity, for disinterestedness, even for unabashed sentiment.

A pause came in the drear grinding of the wheels of profit. A copious dew of altruism suddenly descended upon the arid and stubbly fields of mere dollar-getting, and everybody seemed gratified and refreshed.

A working organization was rapidly effected—Congress should view the field in person. North, South, East, West and Northwest were all represented in the roster of officers—college presidents, jurists, foresters, representatives in the State and National Legislatures, men high in commercial and professional life.

Congress came—at least a notable part of it—and spent a week in the woods. There were charges to meet, bills to foot. The railways, whose heads were frankly approached in the spirit of sentiment, did all gratuitously and almost unurged. Publicity was essential. The proprietors of the newspapers in Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis, addressed as men not yet lost to grace, promoted the plan with unlimited allowances of space, and the manager of the Associated Press lent his great engine to celebrate the excursion to the widest. Hospitality was desired. The Boards of Trade and the Women's Clubs of the Twin Cities came forward with open hands—and with open minds and hearts as well. Even the great lumbermen acknowledged the merits of the cause and cordially cooperated, and the more rustic and reluctant of Northwestern statesmen were brought to the line by the gentle push of public sentiment.

The plan is up to Congress. There is nothing to say against it; everything for it. If naught else were to result the disclosure of so widespread and disinterested a generosity as has accompanied these endeavors should be a satisfaction to all associated in them, and a sufficient reward to the originator of the enterprise. He has helped to make it plainer that we stand on the threshold of a better day and are beginning, as a people, to breathe a higher and purer

—HENRY B. FULLER.

Every park added to city or nation is a new breathing place for crowded humanity.

The Heroism of Woman

IT IS easy to believe, in the noble yet wretched tragedy which is being enacted in South Africa, the statement that the Boer women in the last struggles of the fight for home and freedom will take their places in the trenches. Without in any way slighting history under other forms of government, it is nevertheless true that there is something in Republican institutions that brings the flower of womanhood into its finest bloom. There have been heroines and great ones upon thrones and in the shadows of monarchies, but all of them put together, with all the frills and trumpery of regal romance, do not and can not equal the female figures that stand forth in the pages of liberty.

We have had it in this country, and in every war woman has done her part. From Molly Pitcher of the Revolution down there has been an unbroken list of heroines. If it had not been for the great patience and enthusiasm of the women that most wonderful of conflicts in the world's history, the Civil War in America, would not have lasted nearly as long as it did.

And it is not only in great things that woman shows her nerve. The other day in Naples two Boston ladies were leaving a shop. A man seized the purse of one of them whereupon she took him by the throat, gave him a good shaking, slammed him upon the ground, recovered her property, and then in her cool New England way told him to move on. We can scarcely pick up any newspaper without finding a story of a woman capturing a burglar, stopping a runaway, or doing something of the instant sort that is the very essence of nerve; and we should not forget in this the perfect category the Connecticut widow who, although dreadfully afraid of mice, upon finding a lion from Mr. Barnum's show in one of the stalls of her stable, deliberately whipped the beast away and sent him cowering down the road.

But this is really not the best test after all. When Kimberley and Ladysmith were relieved it was rumored that although the women had undergone great privation, great suffering and great anxiety, not one of them had uttered a word of complaint. The same story was told from the firing-lines. The men might have their faultfinding, but from the women on either side not a single syllable of dissatisfaction was heard. Doctor Robinson used to say, "There are times when God asks nothing of His children except silence, patience and tears." These are indeed the supreme moments and in those crises woman is high over all. Heroism of the battle is aided by the delirium of the conflict, but in the long, dreary hours of waiting, when there is no excitement to help, no active replying to stimulate, the quality of character that can endure quietly and resignedly represents the very highest bravery that human nature is capable of, and in this greater heroism woman has almost a monopoly. It was a Frenchman who said, "Women are even in extremes; they are either better or worse than men." In their heroism they are always better.

It is very difficult to get away from the familiar ultimatum of George Eliot that "the happiest women, like the happiest nations, have no history." But there are times when we might doubt this, for with all her suffering and all her tenderness the true woman finds joy in the greater things of life as she knows more every year how much she is the inspiration of every great movement in civilization. Individually the men wear the laurels. The generals weighed down with medals march at the head of their hosts, but behind it all is the sweet womanly patience that makes a man a hero whether he wants to be one or not, and that looks at death with a clear eye and a smile on the face.

George William Curtis said that the test of civilization is the estimate of woman, and, knowing that this is true we may feel that in spite of all other defects of the wars that are trampling upon human rights and offending the will of God; in spite of our own shortcomings and weak purposes, the constant progress and upward movement of womanhood in all parts of the world is the true measure, the real life of mankind.

By this criterion we are getting a better opinion of the world than by wars and commercial reports. There was something noble in the way Lord Roberts received the surrender of General Cronjé, just as there was in the meeting at Appomattox between Grant and Lee a quarter of a century before. But somehow the thing that touched even more deeply was the message of sympathy which the Queen of England sent to the widow of General Joubert. It was another proof of the fact that women are better in the higher things of life, for it touched the tender chords which seem to be beyond man's reach.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Digitized by Google

At the English Capital

THOSE Americans who are in the habit of coming across the Atlantic to join in the gayeties of the London season will perhaps do well to stay away this year. There will be no season, as season is understood. Already a large number of our society people are in mourning, and those who have been so fortunate as to escape quite realize the heavy task that lies before the British Army. A sadness is over the United Kingdom, a great sadness and a heavy anxiety.

In these circumstances it is not to be supposed that London should be gay. At every turn the mighty change is to be noticed. The theatres are doing no business, the pantomime season has been a flat failure, on every hand those who have money to spend are sending it to the innumerable war funds that have been opened, there is little dining out, there are no lances. There is no lack of prosperity in the country—workshops are as busy as ever—but those businesses which depend on frivolity or vanity for their support, such as the great shops of Regent Street, are doing no trade.

The shadow of Continental complications has combined with the shadow of the South African difficulty to darken the land, to make men more serious and women more sad. The Queen, it is well known, has been deeply distressed. She has reached an old age, and for long years has prayed for peace to reign until her closing day. Even at this late hour it is not definitely known whether or no Her Majesty will allow the customary Drawing-Rooms to be held, although it is said that, solely in the interest of those West End tradesmen who are passing through so harsh a time, she will sanction two Drawing-Rooms, at neither of which will she personally appear. She will receive the Diplomatic Corps later in the year. No, London is not likely to be a cheerful city this spring and early summer.

The Scorching Wit of Tommy A.

IF ONLY the swarm of letters from the front that reach England could be collected, what interesting human documents they would be! The newspapers get possession of many, but they are chiefly from private soldiers, and Tommy Atkins' idea of humor is not of the highest. Officers do not care to see their letters in print at all, and have serious objections to allowing their names to be connected with such communications as do see the light. Thus, most of the amusing incidents of a campaign—grim enough for the greater part—do not come to the notice of the public.

Two letters that I have seen contained some good things. One was from an officer in Ladysmith who managed to get it through the iron circle that ringed that unfortunate Natal town. He wrote that, passing along a street, he beheld a private with a huge stone in his uplifted hand, ready to smash it at a rat that was trying for some food. Just as the stone was about to leave the hand a cockney Sergeant-Major bawled out: "'Old 'ard, there! Let the bloomin' rat grow fat; we'll want 'im later on."

The other letter was from an officer who survived the blistering day at Magersfontein. It will be remembered that a portion of the troops lay out there on the parched, sun-baked plain for many hours, unable to get forward or back, and without a drop of water to wet their lips. The officer, who is a very rich man, was lying with his men, his tongue swollen for want of water, when a Tommy, genial ever, wearily turned his grinning face to the officer, slid his hand up, touched his cap and said: "Beg pardon, sir; but 'ave you the price o' a drink about ye?" "When I heard that London cadger expression out there," wrote the officer, "I thought of my estate, securities and every penny in the world that I possess; I said to myself I'd be jolly glad to lump them all together for one cool quart of water, but I realized that, in fact, I had not 'the price o' a drink.'"

The Exit of the Old Aristocracy

THE world has lost an eccentric character in the death of the Marquis of Queensberry. He was one of the old sort of aristocrats—the sort that predominated in the eighteenth century, but which has all but disappeared in England. He cared no fig for popular opinion; good reputation was nothing to him; he said what he thought, did what he liked, associated with whom he pleased, and generally managed to shock the good people of these isles with a great big shock. He was a free-thinker, and did not care who knew it; he loved prize-fighting, and, indeed, there lived no finer judge of the noble art of self-defense, nor any one who personally knew more amateur and professional fighters than Queensberry. The rules which he drew up for the governing of fights are in operation wherever fists fly.

Eight years ago, when Tennyson's rather flabby drama, The Promise of May, was put on at the Globe Theatre, Lord Queensberry added a scene of his own to the play by suddenly arising in the stalls and denouncing the character Tennyson had drawn of a free-thinker. The noble Lord could use language when he tried, and on this occasion he did not spare his brother Lord, the Poet Laureate. He roundly declared the whole affair an abominable caricature.

He was twice married, and each wife again freed him by way of the divorce court. One of his sons, Lord Sholto Douglas, will be well remembered in America owing to what was here considered his strange marriage.

Treating of Mr. Astor and the Prince

THERE has lately appeared in the London newspapers a cablegram from New York stating that the Prince of Wales coerced Mr. William Waldorf Astor into heading one of the war funds with a five-thousand-pound donation. Don't you believe it. The thing is absurd on the face of it.

The Prince has other things to do than to coerce any one to contribute anything. His Royal Highness is a rare good beggar when money is wanted for any charity, but he does not use his social position to force unwilling contributions; if he did his life would soon become unbearable. As matters stand he has a hard enough row to hoe in opening buildings and bazars, and listening day after day to absurd addresses from all sorts of civic nonentities, and so is right glad to have a circle of friends to retire to, among whom he can cast social rank aside and breathe easily. I believe Mr. Astor is counted one of those friends.

Besides all this, Mr. Astor is no fool. He is living the unostentatious life of a country gentleman over here; he makes no attempts to flash his millions in the eyes of the British public, and is in every way proving himself a good citizen.

Possibly few Americans who visit London know Mr. Astor's estate office, although the building is quite one of the most beautiful, architecturally considered, in London. Mr. Astor secured a choice niche of ground fronting upon the Embankment, and immediately beside the Inner Temple, so rich in associations and so honeycombed with quaint passages and turnings. On this plot he had a dainty building erected, which harmonizes admirably with its historic and architectural surroundings. Around this is one of the most beautiful wrought-iron fences to be seen anywhere, and altogether the building and accessories are well worth a visit by any one with an artistic eye. In that building, too, Mr. Astor has of late become accustomed to give choice little tea parties to his intimate friends. Many a good citizen has England given to America, so surely the great United States can afford to let us have one of her most renowned citizens for a change.

British Scholarship Under Boer Tuition

WHEN General Buller was chosen to lead in South Africa, and before he had sailed, I wrote to The Saturday Evening Post that he was a man who believed in hard knocks and that there would be little finesse about his generalship—that he would lead his men against the front of the foe and trust to their courage and relish for slogging to pull him through. This was done, but we find out that against modern arms courage does not count for so much as it formerly did.

In olden days when Tommy could get within two hundred yards of his enemy without coming under fire, his officers could trust him to do the sprint, and, as Tommy hath it, to "get among 'em"; but no man can sprint a mile and a half. So we'll simply have to cultivate "slimness." The Ladysmith garrison had plenty of time to think matters over, and as a result there were played some few tricks almost worthy of the Boers themselves. One night a party of soldiers obtained permission, and, under cover of darkness, slipped to a neighboring kopje, and built a rough fort. Then they retired. When morning dawned the Boers espied the fort, and at a considerable waste of good shells shattered the fort. When the guns ceased to fire an ambulance party scudded to the "fort" and returned with some of the party's own men in the stretchers as "killed and wounded."

Next night the fort was rebuilt, and again the Boers demolished it. But by the third morning the Boers had discovered the "slim" dodge, and simply heliographed congratulations to Sir George White's men, telling them that they were getting on, and, if they could hold out long enough, under Boer tuition would undoubtedly develop into pretty fair soldiers.

Mr. Winans' First Suit of Clothes

I DO NOT know just how many years ago Mr. Winans shook the dust of America from his feet and betook himself over here to corner our deer forests, raise Cain with our Scottish crofters, ruin all our revolver-shooting championships, import and popularize trotting horses, and otherwise spend his money in his own way. His flitting from America must have taken place about twenty years ago, I should think.

Mr. Winans is a serious, eccentric man, and is not given to grinning, but the other day he grinned. He received a most politely written letter from a West End tailor, the opening sentence of it running as follows: "We note your arrival in this country, and doubtless during your stay you will require a tailor." Even the Government, which does not note things any too soon, noted Mr. Winans' arrival two decades ago, when his deer-forest escapade almost upset the country, and as Mr. Winans intends to reside permanently in England he quite agrees with the tailor that the chances are that during his stay he will require clothes.—E. W. Sandt.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Here is an individual reason for the dislike of drudgery shown by those who have been educated and have learned to think.

All drudgery and common work are generally done by ignorant people, and for that reason a kind of stigma attaches to all who do it. But it is not that alone. It is the mental isolation and the loneliness that it brings.

When through books you have learned to see anew every flower and insect, every pebble in your way, and you have learned from great minds to think and reason about the minds around you and the universe, and your lot in life is cast with those to whom all this is as though it did not exist, you feel so much alone that you will try every means to escape it.

Speaking from individual experience: I could not name one of my acquaintances who could or would appreciate an essay of Emerson's or a poem by Tennyson; as for Spinoza, Kant, Mill, etc., they do not even know that these ever existed. I never could persuade any one of them to read even Dickens, Scott or George Eliot. Some read The Duchess, Bertha Clay, etc.—that is, the girls; the young men don't read anything.

One can do all the drudgery and take pride in doing it well, and then take down a favorite author and lose one's self in thought with Spinoza or Tennyson, or follow the psychological analysis of one of George Eliot's characters.

Books are very good friends, but you long intensely for living, thinking friends also, and in an environment of drudgery and common work they are rarely found.

Unfortunately, the very fact that you do common work closes you out from contact with refined, educated people, because, socially as well as financially, you cannot be of their class, and nothing is left but to remain alone and adapt yourself to your environment, or strain every energy to get out of your environment and do the work that will give you a chance to come in contact with educated people. And this cannot always be done, as you may have parents and relations in consideration for whom you must remain where you are.

I know quite a number of people who believe the sky is a solid roof and that Heaven is immediately above it, and who believe in witches. They are Democrats or Republicans, Roman Catholics or Protestants, just as their parents before them. They have never learned to think, and do not feel any necessity to strive toward the realization of any ideals, because they have none.

Any one of these who ever learns to reason and think, and yet is compelled to go on with the drudgery, would not object to the work if there were intelligent minds with whom to discuss matters and exchange ideas. It is then that one longs intensely for the realization of Bellamy's theories, where all would work and all would be educated. It is these common minds who learn to think and yet are compelled to keep on with the drudgery and ignorance around them that are at the beginnings of revolutions and reforms.

If all were educated the drudgery would still have to be done, only it would be done by educated people, and consequently better methods of doing it would be evolved; and if educated people could be found to do it the stigma would pass off from it.

M. M. Reenan.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

One reason why the young man fails is a lack of appreciation and encouragement from his employer in the way of a just reward for his efforts, and his own realization of his poor pay and his employer's or his employer's manager's selfishness and neglect of him.

Here are a few examples: A young man works day and night, every day in the year, and often without vacation or any hours of recreation, using every personal effort and contributing by his ability and gains largely to his employer's interest and success, never failing to do work after customary hours or favors of any kind if asked by his employer or required by his manager—all the year trying to assist and forward the interest of his employer. When the end of the year comes and the year's business is figured up, and the employer finds he has shown an increase of twenty-five to fifty per cent., he will swell up and tell his friends of his success, and in his office will express his selfish pleasure at such a happy state of affairs and expect his employees gleefully to congratulate him. It never seems to occur to him they could enter into his pleasure a little more heartily if he would voluntarily go to them and say: "My success has been fine this year. All of us have worked hard, and I wish to show my appreciation of your efforts by an increase in salary—in other words, I wish to divide the success and rewards with the man or men who have helped me make it."

But instead of this, too often the manager is called and is told that by rearrangement and putting more work on those retained two or three employees may be cut out and the expense lessened. If in some special or isolated case a salary is raised some pitiful amount it is done so begrudgingly. All incentive to continued good exertion is killed.

Again: A young man may work all day and one-half the night and keep it up all through the busy season, and some morning on account of lack of sleep he five minutes late. His employer tells him if he wants to keep his position he will have to get there on time. Or if he should ask for twenty minutes to go and attend to some urgent personal matter he is told that such matter must be attended to outside of work or office hours, and office hours or work hours are from 7:30 or 8 o'clock A. M. to as late as you can stand up or keep your eyes open. In the very next breath the same employer will ask this same employee to do something outside of hours, and dismiss him if, for any reason, he refuses.

One could write page after page of this unfairness and the majority of employers would have to recognize the truth. And yet the young man is asked to watch closely and conscientiously his employer's interest to become competent and valuable in it. He may do so for a while until, year by year, he sees it is of no use, and grows cognizant of the fact that the employer has but little disposition to be fair or appreciative, and that he is expected to work as hard and as long as possible for as little return as possible. Can you expect the majority to adopt any tactics other than those suggested by the employers—to take every advantage possible?

Never while the sun shines will the employee stop watching the clock and become truly interested, and quit the hypocrisy of pretending to be interested that he may hold his livelihood, until he gets a reasonable and just return for the interest and efforts he puts forth. This lack of fairness breeds incompetency, and while it is, in a way, a great loss to the employed, the employer also greatly feels it, for the more competent and coöperative his organization the greater his possibilities.

James L. Curtin.

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, April, 1900.

GOETHE tells us that "fools are never uneasy"; furthermore, that "uneasiness is a species of sagacity." This is certainly of great moment to me, for I have been uneasy almost to the point of panic, and my consolation is that if his saying be true my uneasiness not only smacks of sagacity but of downright prescience, and it is all because of this miserable Puerto Rican business and Robert's recent vote in the House thereon. This precious bill, which has twisted and turned so many times that the beholder rubs his eyes and asks, as did the bewildered Congressman, "Where am I at?" bids fair to become a regular Old Man of the Sea, not only around the neck of the public, but around the neck of the individual as well. In looking back over the past few weeks a good deal of light has dawned upon me, and I can see that Robert has been troubled and anxious ever since he voted, and I now recall that when the bill was first sprung upon the House he was emphatically against it, but, nevertheless, he voted for it. I also recall that immediately he began to receive letters from his district and from his State protesting against his vote, and that in our principal home newspaper, the Spruce City Flapjack, Robert was being roasted, almost burned in effigy. The Flapjack, of course, is not to be respected nor taken seriously, for it has ever been noted for being on any side of any question that would be to its own advantage, or even on both sides, for like the genuine flapjack for which it is named, it can be browned on one side nicely, then turned dexterously over and browned on the other, so that both sides look equally fair. But when it accuses Robert of having been influenced from high quarters by the promise of unlimited patronage if he would vote to tax the Puerto Ricans, this is too much, and Robert has packed his bag and gone to Spruce City to reckon with the Flapjack. Just what he expects to accomplish I know not. I said to him as he was leaving:

"What do you mean to do out there?"

"I mean to see State Senator Z——, and Mr. A——, of the lower House."

I was startled by this and exclaimed:

"Why, Robert, it cannot be necessary to explain yourself to the Legislature—unless——"

"That is just it, Agatha, unless——"

We were both silent. We both understood that unless Robert's vote could be explained satisfactorily to the Legislature and the rumpus in the State quieted, when the Senatorial vacancy should occur, in 1901, Robert John Slocum would not be the choice of that Legislature to come to the United States Senate. I said uneasily:

"Robert, tell me, it is not true that you were dragooned into voting as you did? And it is not true that you were promised unlimited patronage if you would vote for the bill, is it?"

"Agatha, my vote was not coerced by anything beyond argument that was convincing to me. I voted as I thought was right at the time. The Flapjack has ever been against me. You must not pay attention to its lies."

"Oh, I'm not uneasy because of what the Flapjack says, Robert, but I have been uneasy, in the light of all this clamor, when I remember how many times you were closeted with Mr. Blank and with Senator X——, and when I remember the mysterious way you were sent for to attend a secret conclave which lasted more than twenty-four hours, from which you emerged troubled and anxious. All this comes back to me with force and makes me remind you that 'a straight line is the shortest in morals as well as in geometry.'"

MR. PROCTOR IS ONE OF THE LONG-HEADED, WISE MEN IN THE SENATE

"I'm perfectly willing to stand upon my vote before my constituents. I did what I thought right for the party and I've made up my mind to face the music."

"A Spanish proverb sayeth, 'When a fool has made up his mind the market has gone by.'"

Robert laughed out at this and went speeding away to Spruce City, and I am left with uneasiness and doubt tugging at me, which not all the Lenten dinners, nor the Friday morning sewing class, nor the gossip about the new engagements, nor the ball in contemplation at the White House, nor Page's radiant, overflowing happiness can assuage. Page says that I take politics ridiculously to heart, but it is not politics in general, but Robert's in particular that I am taking to heart. I was trying the other day, in looking around upon the House and Senate, to find comfort in the reflection that among the older members of both branches of Congress there were various ones whom I could count who have not found their way there, nor kept their places there, by either trading or dickering, but their number was not so very large. In conversation with Senator P—— I confided to him the result of my observations, accompanied by some trenchant comments thereon. Senator P—— answered in a way which gave me a new view:

"You are still trying to get to the heart of the great American mystery, I see, Mrs. Slocum? But in order to do this you must brush aside the Utopian idea that a representative government is any better than the society it represents. You must see things as they are, not as you think they ought to be. You cannot expect legislators to be either better or worse than the society for whom they legislate, for it would not be really worth while to be any better, and they could not possibly be any worse." He laughed cynically, and then added:

"Washington said that 'it ought to be the end of all government to promote the aggregate happiness of society, and that is best done by the practice of a virtuous policy.' This might almost be so, perhaps, if this virtuous policy were the demand of a virtuous society, but——"

"Your belief would be, 'purify society and you purify government,' then? I don't believe it; why not go at it the other way and begin with government first?" I asked.

"That would be an artificial means and would invite defeat," he said emphatically.

But I could not see it the way Senator P—— did, and I said as much.

"I cannot see that society or the social structure is directly to blame for the buying up of Legislatures which induce the scandals of these contested cases. I cannot see that it is responsible for the dickering and trading in our national honor. I cannot see that it necessitates——"

"Well," he interrupted, "I cannot see for my part any great line between the lavish use of money to unlock legislative doors and secure political preferment, and the lavish use of money to open smart doors and secure social preferment."

And this audacious and wily man, looking the picture of middle-aged innocence, smiled blandly into my face. What could I do? Get angry? Oh, no! He had carried the war into Africa and I was tickled by it. I laughed, but I got off the subject of political morals at once. I asked him why the compromise committee on the Puerto Rican bill had been made up with only one advocate of free trade on it in the person of Mr. Davis.

"Why did they not put Mr. Proctor on the committee? He is one of the long-headed, wise men in the Senate. Or why did they not put you on it?" I asked.

"Well, I suspect they were afraid of what they might get, as the negro minstrel was who was describing, with great show of bluster, an insult he had received. He was talking to the interlocutor thus: 'Why, sir, he up an' hit me on the baid with a tomatus.' 'And you courageously demanded instant satisfaction?' suggested the interlocutor. 'No, no, sir, I mought ha' got it, sir.' And if Proctor and I had been put on the committee, together with Davis, why you see what they might have got. So it was better to put Kean, Spooner, Hale, McMillan and Warren on."

"Especially as I understand that Mr. Kean offers to convert anybody to his way of thinking in five minutes, as he has an unanswerable argument in favor of a tariff, and another of the committee boasts of holding one and the same opinion with the President on the subject: if so, could anything be shrouded in a more impenetrable mystery?"

"Oh, well, they all talk that way; that's what they were selected for, and Hale, the Chesterfield of the Senate, is the most pronounced of the bunch. Though as to Hale, he is a mighty good fellow even if he has gone a bit wrong on these questions. I remember some years ago, when Hale's mother-in-law was building their handsome house, that he was awfully uneasy lest that same pretentious mansion should be the means of cutting off his Senatorial toga above the knees, and he's never got over the surprise of his escape; for even to this day there is a feeling among constituents that it is bad policy for a Senator to own a handsome house. Why, do you know, Mrs. Slocum, that when William E. Chandler was Secretary of the Navy, by way of injuring him his enemies had the whole of the War, State and Navy building photographed and distributed as pictures of Mr. Chandler's private residence? And poor Senator Van Wyck at one time had the misfortune to live in a corner house with similar houses radiating from it, and the whole corner as far as the camera could reach was sent out as a picture of his mansion."

"How abominable! but how, then, have ex-Senator Sherman and Senator Foraker escaped? They have two of the magnificent houses in Washington."

"They haven't escaped," said the Senator grimly. "Nobody

Taken Especially for The Saturday Evening Post

SENATOR HALE'S RESIDENCE

We have no agents or branch stores. All orders should be sent direct to us.

New Summer Suits, $5.

WE have just received from abroad some entirely new styles in Suits and Skirts for summer wear. We have had these illustrated on a Supplement Sheet, which will be sent free, together with our Spring Catalogue and a choice collection of samples of suitings, to the lady who wishes to dress well at moderate cost. We make every garment to order, thus insuring that perfection of fit and finish which is not to be found in ready-made goods. We pay all express charges. Our Catalogue illustrates:

New Designs in Summer Suits, $4 up.
In Piqué, Crashes, Cotton Covert Cloths, Duck, Linens, etc.

Tailor-Made Suits, $5 up.
In All-Wool Serges, Cheviots, Broadcloths, Covert Cloths, Venetians, etc.

Duck, Piqué and Crash Skirts, $3 up.
Separate Skirts, $4 up.
Lined with Percaline, well stiffened and bound with Corduroy; made of All-Wool Cloths, Serges, Cheviots, etc., in the latest effects.

Bicycle Suits in the newest fabrics, $5 up.
Separate Bicycle Skirts, $3.50 up.
Rainy-Day Suits and Skirts made of double-face materials.

Our line of samples includes the newest novelties, many of them being exclusive novelties not to be had elsewhere. We also have a special line of Tailoring goods and fabrics for second mourning. All orders are filled with the greatest promptness; a suit or skirt can be made in three days when necessary.

Write to-day for Catalogue, Supplement and Samples; you will get them free by return mail.

THE NATIONAL CLOAK COMPANY
123 West 23d Street, NEW YORK

Aluminum House Numbers

No other metal so well adapted for numbers because it does not rust nor corrode.
A child can put them up.
Agents are making big profits selling them.
If you want the best pure Aluminum Numbers see that you get our make. If your hardware dealer does not handle them write to us.
Samples mailed upon receipt of 10c. Agent's outfit of ten numbers, mounted on polished oak board, delivered anywhere upon receipt of $1.00.
WAGNER MANUFACTURING CO., Sidney, O.

Ladies' Watches

OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fads in Watch Designs, Rates for Toilette Effects and Economy with Dress Color.

The Blue Book sent for

New England Watch Company
37 and 39 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Spreckels Building, San Francisco

"SUPPOSE I DIE"

That's the old-fashioned way of solving the life insurance question. Get our up-to-date, free booklet, called "The If and The Why." It will make life worth living. It is not necessary to die to get benefit from insurance.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn LABEL AND THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

Digitized by Google

escapes. When Windom was Senator and built his home here, it cost him his reelection and ultimately was one of the causes of his early death. Perhaps you will begin to admit the justice of my standpoint of purifying society before you can hope to purify the Government, Mrs. Slocum."

"Perhaps so," I said doubtfully. But I had no idea of letting the Senator hark back to the morals of politics, so by way of diversion I spoke of being in the House the other day when the rubicund and rosy Mr. Wise, of Virginia, was excluded from the floor.

"I was looking on from the gallery and the order had scarcely been given to the doorkeeper when Mr. Wise promptly retreated to the cloakroom; thither he was pursued by the relentless doorkeeper, and the eager spectators expected to see him forced to emerge into the chamber again on his way to the floor. Not so, however, for with the agility of an acrobat he sprang to the little window of the barbers' corner, pushed up the hasp, poised himself on the sill, then squeezed his portly proportions through the aperture. Fancy the amazement of those who were promenading out in the long public corridor when they saw this object being projected into their midst, not knowing where he came from or what ailed him. Once on his feet outside Mr. Wise coolly resumed his cigar and awaited the verdict of his brother's contested case. I wish I could have seen him get through that window! It was disgraceful, but very funny. There ought to be some way of putting an end to these perpetually contested cases."

"There is a way to end them already in sight. The House has a resolution before it to abolish the $2000 which the Government allows for these contested cases. Very few contestants would care to come all the way here to make the fight if the expense came out of their own pockets. Wise is himself an ex-member, as you know, and a very witty man. I heard him make a stump speech once when he was interrupted at almost every word by the most trivial questions from some hayseed, and at last, when he was all out of patience, he exclaimed, 'Now see here, my friend, do you suppose I came here for no other purpose than to chase ants up mullein stalks?' He was allowed after that to finish his speech, and a rattling one it was, too."

"It seems to me that between the scandals of these contests and the doings and sayings in the caucuses the gentleman with the hoofs and horns is kept rather busy, and the old adage is being pretty thoroughly worked out, 'He who sets all knaves at work must pay them.'"

The Senator laughed and said, "Oh, as to caucuses, they are as old as our Government itself. We used to nominate our Presidents in caucus until there were so many scandals that the convention plan was adopted; and in 1788 some one, in consequence of a particularly turbulent and tricky caucus, got off this parody on Gray's Elegy:

That mob of mobs, a caucus to command,
Hurl wild discussion round the maddening land."

"How finely that applies to the caucuses of the Senate lately. They certainly have hurled wild discussion round the maddening land.' Luckily there is a delightfully naïve and innocent side to you politicians, Senator P——, when you are off guard."

"How so?" asked he.

"Well, it is a liberal education to see a voted statesman gyrate down the centre aisle, and just when you expect him to pause and fling defiance at an opponent see him pull out a big red apple from his pocket, pluck off the stem, look it all over carefully, then set to upon it. The other day Mr. Cameron, apple in hand, met Mr. Linney, orange in hand. The place of meeting was the centre aisle of the House; a speech on the Wise-Young case was in progress. The galleries were looking on. Well, the orange and the apple, amidst facial contortions and prodigious bites and squeezes, had a fine time of it and only parted when a core and a few seeds were left. And the confiding way in which Senator Gear hangs his hat up on the floor of the Senate in the middle aisle, and the way in which everybody kicks it down the aisle and then goes back and apologizes, is too amusing. I should suggest that the Senator put a brick in his hat; this would at least stay it in its mad career toward the Vice-President's chair, and might cause discomfiture to those who so often start it on its travels."

"Good Heaven! Mrs. Slocum, how thankful I am that I do not eat apples. I shall never dare to stir hereafter, and I never mean again to venture either up or down the middle aisle, but shall steal silently around the outer edge of desks, and if I have occasion to address the Senate I will do so in The Record."

We both laughed, then the Senator asked, apropos of nothing:

"What has become of that pretty 'Bobby Shafto' fellow who went to sea?"

"You mean Mr. de Courcelles, of the French Embassy?"

"Yes; I always called him 'Bobby Shafto.' He seemed that sort."

"Well, your 'Bobby Shafto,' as you call him, is coming back to marry—not me, as the pretty song goes, but Page. He expects to be here soon and then we are to have a wedding."

"Wasn't there any American good enough for her that she should have to take up with this diplomatic chap?" asked the Senator almost querulously.

"Oh, come now, Senator P——, what is the matter with all you Senators? You seem to have a sort of jealousy planted in your breasts toward every diplomat, no matter what his country or his standing. I have noticed it in every Senator I have ever talked with. It seems to be an intolerance that is often strongly marked, and it seems to be particularly active against everything British. The present Ambassador is altogether delightful and is seemingly more in accord with us than any of the former ones have been. You all dine and wine him, but the feeling is there. Explain it!"

"I don't admit that we have any such feeling as you describe, Mrs. Slocum. If it is there, as you say, it springs unconsciously from the inborn democracy in the breast of every one of us, for democracy is the government of the people, by the people, for the benefit of—United States Senators, and there is a danger always that the British may not understand this political principle of ours, hence——"

There was a twinkle in Senator P——'s eyes as he went on.

"And these foreign diplomatic chaps regard us as a type of the utmost pragmatical, pig-headed self-assurance, combined with the narrowest education and experience that could possibly exist in any considerable government, and accordingly they despise us, Mrs. Slocum; but as to this young 'Bobby Shafto,' why, bless me! I've no feeling against him. I only think that almost any American is worth two Frenchmen. But come, tell me what your smart world is doing. What is going on?"

"Oh, my smart world is in that utterly beatific state of mind when 'first daughter to the love of God is charity to man.' And our mornings are made up of meetings of the society for the Circulation of Patent Ear Warmers and in attending to the subscription list for the Home for Sick and Decrepit Dogs. Then there is also the Friday morning sewing class, where the Lenten penance is the shaping of garments that are fearful and wonderful to behold. We are taught that 'dress is the table of our contents.' If this be true, alas for those who shall fall heir to the Friday morning productions! The anatomists would shudder at their outlines, for they bulge and hump in miraculous fashion, until I am forced to believe that the human frame differs according to condition. Besides these charity sewings there are all the dinners, for we are still eating. We have been eating steadily since December and I have six weeks of dinners ahead of me yet. I am almost converted to the new theory of sustaining life by means of the concentrated food capsule. Just think of the convenience of consommé in a capsule, and of terrapin and pâté de foies gras served in a pill the size of a pea! Could anything appeal more to the jaded palate?"

"But what would become of your beautiful accompaniments of orchids and orchestras, to say nothing of the faithful Jules?" laughed the Senator.

"Oh, we should need our chefs just the same, for the texture and tint of the capsules and the importance of their contents would require artists, and would require the orchids and the orchestras, too, for that matter, to help them down."

"Well, what else is on hand by way of diversion?" asked he.

"There are these readings, with incidental music, one of which was held at Corcoran House, where, for the sum of two and a half dollars, I listened with half an ear to Little Boy Blue, keeping the other half strained attentively upon the gossip around me, while my eyes feasted upon Senator Depew's household gods, taking stock of them and appraising them at their true and untold value. Then there was the ball at the German Embassy. Besides this ball there are all the promised festivities at the White House, which will be but preliminary to the wedding festival of the favorite niece, and then there are all the weddings, those that have been and that are to be, including those of statesmen and authoresses."

"By statesmen you mean one of my Senatorial colleagues, do you not? I doubt if he assumes the yoke again. And by authoresses I judge you are thinking of Mrs. Burnett. I remember Mrs. Burnett when she was a fresh-voiced, fresh-cheeked young matron, scarcely recognizing or believing in her own ability. At that time, when I used to visit her home continually, I should have predicted that Doctor Burnett would be the one to bring fame and fortune knocking at their door, for Doctor Burnett has always been intellectual and brilliant; but it seems that I have been all out in my calculations. Mrs. Burnett has made the name, the fame and the fortune. She became restless with this same restlessness that seems to come to all our women nowadays sooner or later. Then she began this nomad way of living partly in England, partly here, with the inevitable result.

I met her the other day just before she sailed and I thought her very much changed. My fresh-voiced, fresh-faced matron was gone. In her place was the elaborately dressed woman of the world, fully conscious of what she had achieved with her Lady of Quality and her De Willoughby Claim. I was not surprised when I read in the papers the other day of her marriage to Mr. Stephen Townsend, of London. As you remember, he had been her private secretary.

SENATOR HALE'S LIBRARY

Editor's Note—The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife began in the Post of February 3, and will be continued through succeeding issues. Each paper is complete in itself, and may be read without reference to those preceding it.

WARNER'S RUST-PROOF

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup."

YERBA MATÉ

Is not a medicine, nor a concoction of herbs. It is the tea of South America, now being introduced into the United States through the International Commercial Congress.

"Many times," writes J. M. Carter, of Delhi, N. Y., "have I drank this cup, that inebriates not, with the kindly, warm-hearted natives. It is not only refreshing, but invigorating and restorative. A pecs will often work the whole day, taking nothing but maté."

Prepared and used the same as tea or coffee, and drank at breakfast, dinner or supper.

Ask your dealer, and if he hasn't it, we will send sample and booklet for 10 cents; or enough for 500 cups on receipt of $1.00. Agents wanted.

YERBA MATÉ TEA CO., Sole Importers
257 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia

WHITE STAR COFFEES
THE BEST MONEY CAN BUY
AT LEADING GROCERS

Live Agents Make Big Money.
There is no equal to
The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.
THOUSANDS IN USE
Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.

Postpaid for 65c Stamps
With first order for one dozen (before the 6th), as we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE. QUICKLY send for free illustrated circular.
QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. F, Galien, Mich.

Alabastine

This is the rock-base cement wall coating which you have seen so extensively advertised. It is pure, cleanly and durable. In 16 tints and white. Mix it with cold water and a child can brush it on. The most healthful and economical coating for walls and ceilings. Paint dealers sell it. Instructive and interesting booklet mailed free for the asking.

ALABASTINE COMPANY, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Are You Deaf?
We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing.
Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.
WM. V. WILLIS & CO., 134 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

The GRIP of HONOR

By Cyrus Townsend Brady

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

CHAPTER XX

THE battle had been maintained with the utmost fury for nearly three-quarters of an hour, and both ships had sustained severe injuries, the Richard being in much the worse condition. The heavy shot from the long eighteens of the Serapis had played havoc with her. Pearson naturally thought that it was about time for Jones to surrender, though the hour when Jones thought it time to surrender would never strike. The sudden silence which had fallen upon the conflict was broken by a voice from the British ship. In high interrogation it rang over the waters in the moonlight: "Have you struck?"

From the Richard came Jones' immortal answer: "I have not yet begun to fight!"

A roar of wild exultation, an Homeric laugh broke from the throats of the crew of the Richard as the reply of the Captain was passed from deck to deck, until the whole ship from truck to keelson quivered with responsive joy. It was a joke the character of which those blood-stained ruffians could well appreciate; but their Captain was in no mood for joking. He was serious, and in the simplicity of the reply lay its greatness. Surprising answer! On a ship shattered beyond repair, her best guns exploded and useless, her crew cut to pieces, ringed about with dead and dying, the Captain has not yet begun to fight! But there was no delay after the answer, no philosophizing, no heroics. The man of action was there. He meant business! Every moment when the guns were silent was a wasted one.

"Back!" shouted the midshipman fiercely, pointing his musket at him

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

The helm was shifted to starboard and the headsails shivered. The Richard slowly swung off to port and gathered headway again. The Serapis had lost an opportunity of tacking and raking. In order to bring the guns to bear more quickly, and perhaps to prevent a raking by the enemy, Captain Pearson threw all aback, and the two ships, one backing, and the other reaching ahead, slowly drew abreast each other, the batteries speaking again as the guns bore. The wind was very light and the motions of both ships were sluggish in the extreme, so that they practically lay side by side, steerage way almost gone, slowly drifting until there came a sudden, temporary breath of wind.

The position was most advantageous for the Serapis, as with her heavier and more numerous guns she could deliberately knock the Richard into a cocked hat. She was much the speedier and handier ship and might reasonably hope to choose her own distance and, having selected a point of vantage, maintain it to the end. Pearson's game was to fight at long range until he had sunk his enemy; no difficult task that last—she was half sinking now!

Editor's Note—The Grip of Honor began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 24.

What the Richard lacked in mobility and direction she made up in her Captain. Jones did things instinctively; Pearson had to think about them.

Jones' only hope was in getting to close quarters and making use of the disciplined French soldiery upon his decks. They had done good service already in clearing the spar-deck of the English.

Therefore, as the Richard, gathering way, gradually forged ahead, her helm was shifted to port and the vessel slowly swung across the bow of the Serapis which had just begun to fill away again, as Pearson saw that he had nearly backed out of action. The bow of the Serapis struck the starboard quarter of the Richard, the jibboom thrusting itself violently through the mizzen-rigging. There was a terrific crash at the moment of impact. A second later and the English, cheering frantically, jumped upon the heel of the bowsprit and clambered upon the rail of their ship.

They were led by a tall, distinguished-looking officer who attracted double attention as he wore the red uniform of the English Army. As their heads appeared over the rail, the powerful voice of Jones could be heard shouting. "Boarders away!" Not waiting for the men who came springing up on the quarter-deck in obedience to his summons, the dauntless Captain seized a pike from the rack and hurled it through the air at the leader of the Englishmen. Good fortune guided his hand and the steel head of the lance struck fair in the bosom of the soldier. The British wavered a moment as their officer fell and Jones discharged his pistols full among them.

Then De Chamillard and those of his marines left alive upon the deck, by a well-directed pointblank volley, drove back the boarding party of the English.

The two ships were grinding against each other, and the wind on the after sail of the Serapis slowly forced her around until she swung parallel to the Richard. The jibboom snapped off short under the strain and her starboard anchor caught in the tangled rigging of the American frigate. Stacey, the sailing-master, sprang to lash the ships together. The officer snatched a heavy rope from the raffle on the deck and strove to overhaul it. It was tangled and he found great difficulty in clearing it. An impatient man at best, and now greatly excited, he swore roundly as he tugged at the vexatious rope.

"Don't swear, Mr. Stacey," said Jones calmly, coming to his assistance. "In another moment we may all be in eternity, but let us do our duty."

With his own hands Jones passed the lashing.

On the gun-deck below the batteries were being fought fiercely. The two ships were lying side by side, one heading in, the other out, the bow of one by the stern of the other, the starboard side of the Serapis closely touching the same side of the Richard. In the hope that the Richard would drift clear, Captain Pearson now dropped his port anchor.

In vain; no bulldogs ever clung to foes with more tenacity of grip than did those two ships in deadly grapple joined together. The Richard and the Serapis were fast locked for good, and the two ships swung to the tidal current, the wind being again almost entirely killed. In that position they lay for the next two hours, or until the battle was over.

As the Englishman had not hitherto engaged on the starboard side, the port-shutters had not been opened and the close contact of the two ships rendered it impossible to open them then. The Serapis' men were therefore compelled to fire through them, blowing off the port-lids. It was necessary for the men on both ships to extend the long handles of the rammers and the sponges of the guns through the ports into the other ship in order to load properly their own cannon. Badinage, of a character easily imagined, passed back and forth between the two ships, though nothing interrupted the steady and persistent discharge of the batteries.

The battle below was literally a hand-to-hand conflict with great guns, all the advantage in number and size being with the English.

At this juncture a new note was added to the conflict.

Jones, whose eyes were everywhere in the battle, observed a black shadow come darting athwart the two fighting ships, shutting off the moonlight.

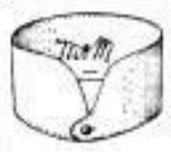
It was the Alliance.

"Ah!" he said to himself, "Landais has seen the folly of his disobedience and has come to our assistance."

As the American ship, with her French Captain and half English crew, loomed up between him and the moonlight, he thought of course that she would range down upon the unengaged side of the Serapis and with a few broadsides compel her to strike at once. But no, the Alliance under full sail stood on. Her men were at quarters, ports triced up, lanterns lighted. She was passing

INCOMPARABLE FOR THEIR CREAMY LUXURIOUS LATHER
WILLIAMS'

SHAVING SOAPS
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cts.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cts.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cts.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cts.
Jersey Cream (Toilet) Soap, 15 cts.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers') 8 Round Cakes, 1 lb., 48c. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 4c. stamp.
THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
GLASTONBURY, CONN.



An easy way.
Pearline

Magni-Photo
PROCESS
Enlarges the smallest negative or photograph to any size, with detail-depth and naturalness never before obtained, so that it excels in beauty the finest engraving. Send pictures you have taken on your vacation or around home to us and we will make them as large as you wish, making loved scenes a thing of beauty forever, and at very little cost. SAMPLE OFFER.—Send negative and 50 cents, or photograph and 75 cents, which we will remail promptly with finished enlargement 8 x 10. Money refunded if not satisfied. FREE circular price-list for sizes up to 40 x 72.
Amet Magni-Photo Company, Waukegan, Ill.

With Pen And Ink
Short Story Writing and Magazine Literature lead to fame as well as profit. The demand for stories and articles is so great that it will pay every one with even slight talent to have it developed. The Regular Course for beginners, the Special Course for semi-successful authors, and the Select Course for professional men and women.
Short Story Writing
TAUGHT BY MAIL. In charge of a successful author and short story and magazine writer, specially qualified to teach the art. Write for Illus. catalogue, etc.
National Correspondence Inst., 19-69 Nat. Bk. Bldg., Washington, D. C.

BOYS' PAPER FREE. If you will send names of 5 boy friends over 12 years of age we will send you "The Star" for 3 months free. Greatest boys' paper published. Address, with stamp, THE STAR, Dept. 23, Oak Park, Ill.

LEARN TO WRITE "ADS"
THE AD WRITER
THE AD READER
TAUGHT PRACTICALLY BY MAIL by the first and only school of its kind in the world. Individual instructions by successful "ad." writers. Send for prospectus.
Page-Davis Adv. School, 116 Reibsak Temple, Chicago

WHY not sell the celebrated M. & M. white and fancy rubber collars, cuffs, fronts and waterproof neckties? All colors, goods in great demand; patented and guaranteed; 125 styles; catalogue free; liberal commission; exclusive territory; no better line to sell; few as good. 1500 agts. wanted at once. Write immediately.
M. & M. MANUFACTURING CO.
Springfield, Mass.

Digitized by Google

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and load in daylight. $10.00 to $17.50.

Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

SICHEL MADONNA

(DETAIL)

A platinum print of the above beautiful Madonna, 7¾ x 9¾ inches on 11 x 14 mount, sent to any address on receipt of Fifty Cents.

Celebrity Photo and Art Company
256 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

IDEAL FOSTER'S

The spring that gives rest to your slumbers, because it lets you lie in a natural position—feet level with your body.

Order one from any local dealer. Sleep on it. If you don't like it better than the other kind

YOUR MONEY BACK

That's proof. If one dealer will not supply you, write us—we'll tell you of another who will.

BOOKLET FREE

FOSTER BROS. MANUFACTURING CO.
4 Broad Street, Utica, N. Y.

A Revival of the Dainty Portraiture of the 17th Century

Exquisitely Hand-Colored Miniatures, fitted in Handsome, Genuine Rolled-Gold Brooch, 1 or 1½ inch in diameter. These Miniatures retail regularly at $1.00. To introduce, we will copy from any picture sent us one of these at cost and mail free on receipt of $1.00, currency or P. O. Order. Copies returned. Address

ANGLO-AMERICAN ART CO., York, Pa.

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it at a genteel and successful profession paying $15 to $35 weekly? Situations always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Philadelphia

LEARN TELEGRAPHY

MENTAL NUTS

CAN YOU CRACK 'EM? A book of 100 catch or trick problems, with answers. Real brain tickers. Mailed for 10 cents.

HOME SUPPLY COMPANY,
A B, 132 Nassau Street, NEW YORK

the bow of the Serapis now. Why did she not fire? The insane and treacherous Landais held steadily on until he was standing squarely across the stern of the Richard. Now she was drawing past them as well. A command rang out. What was that?

Jones was petrified with astonishment when, at short range, the Alliance poured in a raking broadside of which the Richard received the brunt, though it was apparently discharged impartially at the two ships. As Landais drew past the stern the helm of the Alliance was shifted. She swung in parallel to the Richard, poured in another broadside, circled the Richard forward and raked her again! The last discharge was a frightful one. The shot at close range swept the crowded decks of the American ship which seemed actually to quiver and flinch from this treacherous blow. This broadside did much damage, killing and wounding many on the forecastle, among them Midshipman Caswell, mortally. Shrieks, groans and cries of startled surprise and dismay arose with increasing volume.

"The Alliance, the Alliance——"

"Treachery! We are betrayed!"

"The English have got the ship!" came from every side in wild confusion.

"This is the Richard," shouted Jones at the top of his voice at the first fire. "Hold your fire! Show the private signals there!" he cried hastily to the faithful Brooks; but the Alliance paid no attention to these and other warning cries. As the three broadsides were delivered by the American frigate, the men, in their perfectly excusable terror at this blow in the back, actually began to break from their quarters and leave the guns. That was never to be thought of under any circumstances.

"Back!" shouted Jones promptly, "back to your quarters, every mother's son of you! Shoot the first man that flinches from the guns!"

Dale and De Weibert and the midshipmen gallantly seconded his orders, and the Alliance sailing away toward the Pallas and delivering no more shots upon them, the conflict was resumed. That the men could be got to the guns again after this frightfully unsettling attack was supreme testimony to the quality of their officers.

Upon the part of the Serapis the battle had never been interrupted. The long eighteens of her main battery had simply silenced and dismounted nearly all the twelves on the main-deck of the Richard. The starboard side of the American had been beaten in and the port side beaten out by the heavy fire at close range, until the British were literally firing through a hole, the shot hurtling through the air and falling harmlessly into the water far on the farther side. The underpinning of the upper decks of the ship was, of course, nearly knocked to pieces. Why the decks did not fall in and the whole thing collapse was a mystery.

There had been no fighting at all on the berth-deck since the bursting of the three guns; but poor little Payne had hung grimly to his post. One by one the men of the guarding squad had been picked off by stray shot until there was none left but him and the master-at-arms. Several shot from the British had entered below the water line of the Richard and she was making water fast. There was nearly four feet of water in the hold then, and it was rising. The prisoners were in a wild state of terror. Imprecations, curses, appeals to which the young lad had turned a deaf ear had come up through the gratings over the hatchway.

To the other dangers of the battle, fire now added its devastating touch. In fact both ships were aflame in several places. The burning gun-wads had lodged in the chains and other inflammable positions, and writhing, tossing, serpent-like torches threw their hot light over the scene of horror. As the smoke drifted down the hatchway the prisoners in the hold could stand it no longer. There was a sudden rush below toward the opening, the gratings were splintered and broken by the thrust of a piece of timber, a head or two appeared in the clear, hands clutched at the combings.

"Back!" shouted Payne, trying to steady his boyish voice.

"No! D—— your baby face!" shouted the first prisoner furiously, clutching desperately at the combing while he was being lifted up in the arms of the men below. "D'ye think we'll stay here and be drowned like bloody rats in a hole!"

With white lips and a sinking heart the boy thrust his pistol full into the man's face and with a trembling finger pulled the trigger. He did the like to the next man with a second pistol. To seize the musket of a dead marine and point it at the third was the work of a second. Awed by this resolution and the promptitude of his action, the other prisoners fell back for the time. The sweat stood out on the forehead of the young midshipman. He had shot a man—two men—in cold blood! It seemed like murder. But he had done his duty. The words of the Captain rang in his ear, "Keep them down!"

It was hot—hot as a furnace—on the berth-deck. The smoke poured in thick, suffocating clouds between decks. The wavering reflections from the flames on every side accentuated the horror. He longed to throw down his weapon and fly, anywhere, to get a respite from the infernal demand upon him. But he was a sailor, the son of a race of fighters. He held on. The deep roar of the guns above told him that the battle was still going on. Suddenly out of the smoke appeared the burly form of the carpenter, wounded, blotched with red and gray, leaping forward, crying in terror-stricken accents:

"We're sinking, we're sinking! Four feet of water in the hold!"

The gunner and his mates, apparently equally terrified, came running from the magazines as they caught the contagion of the moment. They sprang to the gun-deck and thence to the spar-deck, repeating the carpenter's cry, "We're sinking, we're sinking! Quarter! Quarter!"

"We must release the prisoners," cried the master-at-arms, turning toward the little officer.

"Not while I live," answered Payne resolutely, all his courage coming back to him.

"The ship is sinking—make way!" returned the burly master-at-arms springing toward the hatchway.

"Back!" shouted the midshipman fiercely, pointing his musket at him—the boy's blood was up now. "Here they stay and here we stay. The orders of the Captain——"

He never finished his words; a grape shot struck him fair in the forehead.

The master-at-arms tore open the hatch cover. "On deck!" he cried.

In panic terror, crowding and trampling upon each other like a herd of wild beasts, the maddened prisoners scrambled up the hatchway, and, yelling frantically, ran pell-mell for the gun-deck. The body of the brave midshipman was spurned, crushed and broken beneath their feet as they ran.

CHAPTER XXI

ON THE spar-deck things had gone better. Though De Chamillard and his marines had been driven from the poop by the fire of the English, the men in the tops had more than evened that reverse. As the two ships lay side by side, the interlocking yards made a convenient bridge from one to the other, over which a bold man might pass. It happened that some of the choicest spirits on the Richard were stationed in the maintop. Fanning, who had been busily engaged with small arms, saw his opportunity. As the little parties in the tops exchanged volleys the midshipman threw his men on the yard, and when the smoke cleared away the astonished British saw the Americans rushing toward them.

The first and second men were shot down and fell to the deck of the Serapis; the third, a gigantic man, by a desperate leap gained a foothold in the top. Before he was cut down Fanning and another had joined him over the futtock shrouds; two men took the defenders in the rear by way of the lubber's hole, the rest came swarming. The force of their rush carried everything before them. The English, unable to stand the irresistible onset, were shot down or thrown out of the top. No quarter was asked or given. The Americans, having effected this lodgment in the maintop of the Serapis, now turned their fire upon the fore and mizzen tops, and enabled boarding parties from their own ship to gain possession of all the upper-works of the enemy.

It was at this moment that the gunner and the carpenter reached the deck, crying that the ship was sinking and proffering surrender. The gunner ran aft shrieking, "Quarter! Quarter!" intending to lower the flag. Jones, who had been superintending the working of the quarter-deck guns which were without an officer since Mease, who had been fighting heroically, had been severely wounded, heard the noise and turning about saw the gunner running for the flag. Fortunately the flag had been shot away, and as the gunner was seeking it, fumbling over the halyards in the darkness, Pearson, hearing the cries, called out again: "Do you ask for quarter?"

Jones had taken two long leaps across the deck to the side of the gunner. Raising his

Dining-Room Chair

Select quarter-sawed golden oak, old English or Flemish. Box seat and French front post effect. All joints perfect, well finished and strongly mortised, making a chair of exceptional beauty and strength. Finished with best grade of polishing varnish; hand rubbed and polished. Full size seat, 17x18 inches. Back of top with roll effect, the newest thing in dining chair construction. Seat stuffed and upholstered with high-grade genuine leather, any color, over finest-grade open cane. This is the proper thing; the best and latest upholstering. (Springs break quickly and leather alone only lasts a short time.) Generally sold from $4.25 up.

We make a Special Introductory Offer at

$3.25

CANE SEAT

$2.65

No. 89

Goods guaranteed as represented or money refunded. Freight prepaid east of the Rocky Mountains. Burlap packing insures delivery in perfect condition. 80-page catalogue FREE, with choice selections of dining-room chairs and tables.

MANUFACTURER'S WHOLESALE AGENCY
321 S. Canal Street, Chicago, Ill.
Specialties in dining-room, also supply any kind of furniture.

Admiral Dewey's Piano

The National Committee Selected for His House, a

HALLET & DAVIS PIANO

in preference to any other make, their selection meeting with the delighted approval and indorsement of Admiral and Mrs. Dewey. We will send full particulars about these magnificent instruments, a large picture of the Dewey Piano suitable for framing, and a catalogue of different styles of our instruments to any one interested in the purchase of a piano. A liberal allowance for your old piano, and accommodating terms of credit. Pianos delivered to your home. Address

HALLET & DAVIS COMPANY
Boston Chicago Cleveland Denver

A Way to Change Your Work

Prepare for a better position without neglecting your present work. Our students advance in salary and position while studying. 150,000 students and graduates

TAUGHT BY MAIL.

Mechanical or Architectural Draughting; Electrical, Mechanical, Steam or Civil Engineering; Architecture; Surveying; Bookkeeping; Stenography, etc.

Established 1891. Capital, $1,500,000. Write for free booklet.

The International Correspondence Schools
Box 1171, Scranton, Pa.

Edwin S. Johnston

"DO NOT STAMMER"

Indorsed by Hon. John Wanamaker, ex-Postmaster-Gen. U. S., and Rev. Russell H. Conwell, Philadelphia, Pa. Summer session at Atlantic City, N.J., from May to September. Send for new illustrated book to the PHILADELPHIA INSTITUTE, 1030 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Established 1884. Edwin S. Johnston, Founder and President, who cured himself after stammering 40 years. Please mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST when writing.

LEARN TO DRAW

BY MAIL OR IN OUR PERSONAL CLASSES

Practical instruction in magazine, book and newspaper illustrating by successful illustrators; also in wall-paper design and photography.

Call or write for catalogue.

N.Y. School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

Parquet and Hardwood

Floors

Wax Floor Polish, etc.

J. DUNFEE & CO.
Cor. Franklin and Washington Sts.
CHICAGO

Send for Book of Designs

Digitized by Google

discharged pistol he brought the butt of it heavily down upon the forehead of the man, cracking his skull and silencing him forever.

"Never!" he shouted in reply to the Englishman.

"Then I will give none," cried Pearson—an entirely superfluous remark, by the way.

It was at this juncture that the Alliance was seen coming down again, as before. Jones had time for but one glance of apprehension when he heard the noise of the leaping prisoners below. He sprang to the main hatch.

"The prisoners have been released," cried De Weibert, meeting him; the Frenchman had been toiling like a hero on the gun-deck. "The battery is silenced, we have not a single gun to work, the ship is afire. We must yield," he exclaimed.

As the frightened men came crowding up the hatchways, Dale, who had just fired the only gun on the deck fit for action, took in the situation at once. He stayed the rush in the nick of time by voice and action. He sprang into the midst of the panic-stricken prisoners, threatening them, striking them, beating them down, driving them back with his sword. It was a magnificent display of hardihood and courage, presence of mind and resource.

"To the pumps," he cried with prompt decision, "for your lives, men! The English ship is sinking and we will go down with her unless you can keep us afloat," he shouted in thunder tones with superb audacity. The battle lost was won again in that minute.

"Well done, Richard," shouted Jones, leaping through the hatchway and seconding the daring ruse of his noble Lieutenant by his own mighty voice and Herculean efforts, crying masterfully: "Get to the pumps, men! Lively! The ship is sinking under your feet. The English ship is going!"

It was unparalleled assurance, but it won. The two officers actually succeeded in forcing the English prisoners to man the pumps, where they worked with a frantic energy born of their persistent daze of terror. This left the regular crew of the ship free to fight the fires and to do what they could with the remaining guns. As Jones sprang back to the quarter-deck, the Doctor, covered with blood, came running toward him, crying:

"The ship is sinking, sir. The cock-pit is under water. I've no place to stow the wounded. We must surrender."

"Strike! Strike!" cried De Chamillard, who was wounded. "We can do no more."

"What! Gentlemen!" cried Jones, "would you have me strike to a drop of water and a bit of fire? Up, De Chamillard. Here, Doctor, help me get this gun over."

The surgeon hesitated, looked around again and, not liking the appearance of things about him, turned and ran below, but not to his station—for that was under water. His mates had been killed. He wandered up and down the decks doing what he could—which was but little—for the wounded where they lay. Assisted by two or three of the seamen, with his own hands Jones dragged one of the nine pounders from the disengaged side of the deck across to the starboard side to take the place of a dismounted one; and, while the heavy battery of the Serapis continued its unavailing fire below, these three small guns under his personal direction concentrated their fire upon the mainmast of the Serapis.

The fortuitous position of the Americans in the enemy's tops enabled them to pour a perfect rain of small-arm fire upon the spar-deck of the Serapis with little possibility of effective return. Man after man was shot down by the side of the intrepid Pearson—who, whatever his lack of other qualifications, showed that he possessed magnificent personal courage—until he remained practically alone upon the deck—alone, but undaunted.

It is not within the power of words to portray the situation, after over two hours of the most frightful and determined combat. No two ships were ever in such condition, no battle that was ever fought was like it. The decks were covered with dead and dying, bands of men in different directions were fighting the flames; the smoke in lowering clouds hung heavily over the ships, for the wind had died and there was scarcely enough to blow it away. The pale moonlight mingled with the red glare from the flames and threw an added touch of lurid ghastliness trembling over the smoke-wrapt sea. From below came the steady roar of the Serapis' guns, from above the continuous crackling of the Richard's small arms. The noises blended in a terrible diapason of destruction. The prisoners, still under the influence of their terror, toiled at the clanking pumps. The water gushed red from the scuppers. Order, tactics, discipline had been forgotten. Men glared with blood-shot eyes, set their teeth beneath foam-flecked lips and fought where they stood—fought in frenzy against whatever came to hand, whether it was the English ship, or the roaring flames, or the rushing waters. They recked nothing of consequences. In their frantic battle-lust they beat upon the sides of the other ships with their bare hands and bloody knuckles and knew not what they did. Their breath came quick and short, the red of battle was before their eyes, they had but one thought. Slay! Kill! One would have said that the brute instinct was uppermost in every heart. But in scenes of this kind, it is not the greatest brute that wins, but the greatest soul, and the one man who still preserved his calmness in this orgy of war was the man to win the battle—Jones.

The Alliance had repeated her previous performance, but the men had been worked up to such a pitch that they never heeded it; many of them did not know of it. Both ships were thoroughly beaten. It was only a question as to which would realize it first, who would first surrender. Nay, there was no question whatever of Jones' surrender under any circumstances whatsoever. Pearson would give up under some conditions, and those had at last arrived. That was the essential difference between the two men.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

Uncle Remus, Poet

IN THE early seventies occasional poems appeared in the Savannah News over the modest initials, "J. C. H." They were good poems, and it was known that their author was a young man" who had come from the country" to edit the State news department of the Savannah paper. He was a very young man with a bright, keen intellect, auburn-haired, and with a perfect poetic pallor. He was known to his associates as Joel Chandler Harris. His office work was the writing of editorial paragraphs and running comment on odd items of State news.

The future "Uncle Remus" had not then branched out in the line of fiction. His ambition was to be—a poet. He is that to-day, though he no longer sings in musical numbers. The following is one of his earliest poetical efforts:

JULIETTE

[Laurel Grove Cemetery, Savannah, Georgia]

Lo, here the sunshine flickers bright
Among the restless shadows,
And undulating waves of light,
Slip through the tranquil meadows.

The hoary trees stand ranged about,
Their damp gray mosses trailing
Like ghostly signals hung hung out
For succor unavailing.

And marble shafts rise here and there
In immemorial places,
Embalmed in Nature's bosom fair
And chiseled with Art's graces.

'Twas here, Juliette, you watched the skies
Born into evening's splendor,
And saw the sunset's woudrous dyes
Fade into twilight tender.

And saw the gray go out in gloom
Upon the brow of Even,
And watched to see the young stars bloom
In the far fields of heaven.

So comes the winter's breath; and so
The spring renews her grasses—
I lift my dazzled eyes, and lo!
The mirage swiftly passes.

Dear child! for many a weary year
The rose has shed her blossom
Upon the tablet resting here
Above thy tranquil bosom.

And many a season here hath brought
Processions of new comers,
And many a wonder death hath wrought
Through all these fervid summers.

And naught remains of thee, Juliette—
Thy face, thy form Elysian—
Save what the whole world will forget—
A dreamer's dubious vision.

"I'm glad I had the good sense to stop then," Mr. Harris said recently, "for if they had given me a little more encouragement I might have published a whole book of it!"

Misleading Titles of Books

By William Mathews

ONE of the puzzling problems connected with the publication of a book is the choice of a fit and attractive title. Upon the tact and judgment shown in this depends much of the success of the work. An incident that occurred about half a century ago strikingly illustrates this. In 1850 Dr. O. M. Mitchell, Director of the Astronomical Observatory in Cincinnati, gave to the press a volume entitled The Planetary and Stellar Worlds. The book fell dead from the press. The publisher complained bitterly of this to a friend, saying, "I have not sold a single copy." "Well," was the reply, "you have killed the book by its title. Why not call it The Orbs of Heaven?" The hint was accepted and acted upon, and 6000 copies were sold in a month.

An account of the blunders to which the modern system of naming books has led would be curious and amusing. Who that is unfamiliar with Horne Tooke's famous philological treatise would expect to find The Diversions of Purley—which at the time of its publication was ordered by a village book club under the impression that it was a book of amusing games—to be one of the driest and toughest books in the language; or who would suspect Urban Bees, by Leo Allatius, to be a volume made up of biographies of great men who flourished during the pontificate of Urban VIII, whose family carried bees on their coat-armorial.

Some years ago at a public sale of books in London, Drew's Essay on Souls was knocked down to a shoemaker, who, to the great amusement of the other bidders, asked the auctioneer if he had "any more books on shoemaking to sell." Not long ago the corporation of a North-of-England town decided to erect a new cattle market. The Mayor of the town, who was on the lookout for suitable plans, ordered a copy of a work then recently published, entitled, On the Construction of Sheepfolds. Fancy his astonishment when he received from London by return post a treatise on religious denominations by Mr. Ruskin.

The same gentleman once saw MacEwen on the Types—a theological work treating of the types of Christianity in the old law—vehemently contended for at an auction by a compositor and a burly farmer, the latter thinking that it was "a buik upo' the tups" (rams). Mrs. Edgeworth states that a gentleman who was much interested in improving the breed of Irish cattle, on seeing an advertisement of a work on Irish bulls, sent for a copy. "He was rather confounded by the appearance of the classical bull at the top of the first page, which I had designed from a gem; and when he began to read the book he threw it away in disgust." He had purchased it as Secretary to the Irish Agricultural Society. Not less keen was the disappointment of an inexperienced young English farmer who, wishing to be well grounded in agricultural knowledge, bought a book called Ploughing and Sowing, and found it to contain a minute account of a lady's benevolent operations among the laborers of a country district in Yorkshire.

It is said The Ancient Mariner, when first published, was sold largely to seafaring men, who concluded from the name that it had relation to nautical matters. Of Wordsworth's Excursion expensive copies were sold to tourists and to keepers of country inns and boarding-houses, as likely to be of especial interest to excursionists and sightseers.

That a Frenchman should be misled by the title of an English book is not surprising. An amusing blunder was made some years ago by the Paris Constitutionnel, in a biographical sketch of Mr. Broderip, the English naturalist. In naming his books, the writer said that he contributed to the Quarterly Review an article on Le Traité de la Construction des Ponts du Dr. Buckland (Dr. Buckland's Treatise on the Construction of Bridges). This treatise owes its existence to the French writer's mode of translating the title of the celebrated Bridgewater treatise by William Buckland, D. D., F. R. S.

To conclude, the name of a book should be unambiguous, and should avoid extremes—neither promising too much nor too little. When Bentley, the London publisher, was about to issue his projected magazine, he consulted one of the wits of the day about a title. "How say you about calling it the Magazine of Wit?" asked the publisher. "That promises too much," said his friend. "Well, then, suppose I call it Bentley's Magazine?" "Ah," replied the wit, "that promises too little."

Monarch
Bevel Gear
Chainless
Bicycles

Tests have proven that the method of transmitting power by bevel gears as used in the Monarch Bicycle is superior to all others.

Monarch Bevel Gear Chainless, $60
Chain, $30, $40, $50

Catalogue free.

THE MONARCH HEADQUARTERS
Lake, Halsted and Fifty-first Chicago, Ill.

Ideal
Bicycles

Are popular and durable models. The 1900 models represent the highest type of bicycle construction, highest quality of material and finish. Nothing better built. Send for free catalogue.

Prices $20.00 to $35.00

THE RAMBLER OFFICE
North Franklin Street and Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

Not How Much You Pay But What It Costs!

G & J TIRES may cost most in the beginning but cost nothing for repairs.

OTHER TIRES may cost less in the beginning and prove most expensive in the end.

OUR CATALOGUE EXPLAINS IT ALL

THE G & J TIRE CO., Indianapolis

BRADLEY Platinum Paper
For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Send for a sample book free.
The Paper on which the graphic Narrative is printed
JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 13th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

PRACTICAL MUNICIPAL POLITICS for YOUNG MEN

By NATHANIEL C. SEARS

III. INDEPENDENT CANDIDATES AS A FACTOR

ANY one guided by experience, in directing a young man to political usefulness, would advise him to attach himself to one of the established parties. But no thoughtful man, earnest in his love of country, could advise a young man to give himself up to such slavish adherence to any political party as would involve the support of bad men or bad measures. When moral duty and partisanship conflict, the loyal citizen must throw partisanship to the winds and let patriotism stand in lieu of it. The announcement of Mr. Seward commanded the respect of all sincere men when he said: "So long as my party shall be firm and faithful to the Constitution, the Union and the rights of man, I shall serve it, with the reservation of that personal independence which is my birthright, but at the same time with the zeal and devotion that patriotism allows and enjoins."

There is much of allurement in the word "independent." It has a good sturdy sound. It must be easier and more self-satisfying to the average man, when compelled to leave his party, to enlist under such colors, than to support the political party which he has been accustomed to oppose. But the only logical ground of choice is one based, not upon sentiment or pride, but upon the end to be attained. Presumably one will not leave his own party except it be clear that the defeat of that party is necessary for the good of the community. If that defeat is necessary, his duty lies in the course which will accomplish the result with most certainty. He should no more permit pride of partisanship to deter him from aiding his former adversaries than to let it hold him in the service of a bad cause. In deciding the question he must, therefore, look into the character of independent movements in municipal politics, the motives of them, and the scope of their usefulness.

The Motives of Independent Movements The national parties will not, and can not, abdicate the field of municipal elections. It is true that the principles of policy involved in city elections have little or no bearing upon national questions of policy, and, conversely, national issues have no relevancy to municipal questions. Yet it is absolutely impossible for either of the national parties to permit its forces to disorganize and separate even for the brief period of a municipal campaign. In a skirmish between two opposing armies, the particular bit of ground contended for may be of no strategic importance to either, yet success in the conflict for it may be of vital importance to each.

The present relation of the vote of our large cities to the vote of the State, and the rapid growth of such cities, make it a matter of earnest consideration as to how long it will be before the political action of the Republic will be dominated by the political action of the cities. Under these conditions it would be as wise for a commanding officer to order a retreat and submit to a defeat at a Shiloh, merely because its possession had no particular geographical relevancy to the city of Washington, as for either of the great political parties to abandon a municipal election in a city like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia or Boston, simply because no questions of national policy were involved in such election. They have heretofore declined to do so; it is safe to predict that the same policy will prevail in the future.

Objectively the motive of independent movements is always the effecting of the defeat of one and the success of the other of the regular parties, and by the same reasoning it is never the election of the independent ticket. To elect an independent ticket in a general municipal election in any one of our largest cities is practically impossible. It is so in reason. It has been amply demonstrated by experience.

The favorite watchword of the independent movement is, "Down with all machines," and it is a watchword which gains much support, because there has been much to merit popular disfavor in the methods of party organization. The independent movement must start without any organization. If it becomes organized and continues organized from one campaign to another, it loses the distinguishing feature of all independent movements; it is no longer a political spasm and it has become a machine. Hence the conflict between the independent movement and the regular political party is always a struggle between forces organized and forces comparatively disorganized.

The Logical Weakness of the Independents The logical result is obvious. Logical rules are just as forceful in politics as elsewhere in the world. Here, as everywhere, the success of a large body of men, striving for a common end, requires organization. The leaders of the independent movements do not altogether ignore this fact, and the first step in their undertaking is an attempt at some sort of hurried organization, by which of necessity leaderships are created and conferred. The hostility to political organization is limited to systematic and continuous organization; it does not extend to spasmodic organization.

Each of the established political parties has its large following throughout the city, its body of men associated in each precinct, among whom the campaign duties are divided. This following, attached to the party by family tradition, or long personal service, or influence of office, or devotion to party principles, cannot easily be drawn away. There is a large party following in each party which can always be counted upon to vote the party ticket. If one party is torn and disrupted for the time by factional strife, so that this strength is broken, the fact simply adds for the time to the strength of the other regular party.

Temporary conditions may be safely depended upon at times to aid in the defeat of one of the parties; such conditions do not arise at the same time in each of the parties. They cannot, from the very fact that the one gains by the loss of the other. The weaker members of that one of the regular parties which seems to be losing ground through the opposition of the independent movement leave their party to go over, not to the independent faction, but to the other regular party. This class of quick deserters in the face of defeat is made up of men who always wish to be found upon the winning side. When convinced that their own party is defeated they seek the probable winner.

The Triumph of Party Organization The independent movement has, therefore, in any election, to meet and oppose at least one thoroughly organized force, which presents the strength of long, continuous and systematic training. It is not reasonable to expect that this strength can be overcome by an organization of a few days' or weeks' creation. That it is not in fact to be so overcome has been repeatedly demonstrated.

One instance will suffice for illustration. No independent movement was ever conducted under more favorable conditions than those incident to the last mayoralty campaign in New York City. The people were convinced of municipal corruption and thoroughly aroused to the need of reform. The independent candidate for Mayor was a man of attractive personality, a citizen of high character and reputation, a ripe scholar, a profound thinker upon public questions, and, withal, somewhat of a practical politician. No more popular candidate could possibly have been chosen. It seemed that he would receive the hearty support of the masses. But the two regular political parties proceeded in the routine method of party action. One of them was torn by factional strife, and lacked even the hearty support of the national party organization. It seemed to be, and proved to be, an easy victim. The vote which it polled was considerably less than that of the independent faction.

Yet, under all these conditions, what was the result? Precisely what every thoughtful and sincere man knew that it must be. The independent movement defeated one of the regular party candidates and elected the other; and—significant of the irrational motive of the movement—the one defeated was the one whom the majority of the independents would probably have preferred to the one elected.

The voter, forced to leave his own party for the time, and obliged to choose between giving his support to the opposite political party or to an independent movement, must, after candid thought, conclude that the choice is merely of the direct or the indirect method of working for the same result.

The candidates of the political parties are at least as high in character as is demanded by the reason and conscience of that part of the community which takes part in political action. If these candidates present no fair choice to the voter, the cause of the default is apparent, and it is one for which there is no possible excuse.

Business Methods in Municipal Politics A few years ago we had an object lesson in the application of the business men of a community to public works. To the management of the World's Columbian Exposition business men of fine ability gave freely of their time and energy. Great results were worked out in the best and speediest manner. Funds were neither squandered nor pilfered. The public reaped the benefit of an application of the reason and conscience of the community to its affairs. The same sort of service, applied systematically and continuously to the politics of our great cities, would make of each of them a "white city."

The independent movement does not open the way to such systematic and continuous service. On the contrary, it is the gateway through which many a young man passes to a life of political sloth. With independent movements he runs his one or two quixotic tilts, realizes their inefficiency and uselessness, and then, renouncing his right as a freeman and his duty as a citizen, abandons politics forever. It is very safe to assert that if a young man wishes to make his influence felt and his service of use in the political action of his community, he can do it best by working continuously for the purifying of the political parties which he finds existing, rather than in occasional attempts to build up new ones. To thus give a little of his energy all the time will work out greater and better results than to give all his energy for a little time to any independent movement.

Editor's Note—This is the third and last paper in the series, Practical Municipal Politics for Young Men. The first appeared in The Saturday Evening Post of March 31.

Reed Call for April

Madison Cawein

WHEN April comes and heaps with buds,
With buds and blooms, each orchard's space,
And takes the dogwood-whitened woods
With rain and sunshine of her moods,
Like your fair face, like your fair face:
It's honey for the bloom and dew,
And honey for the heart!
And, oh, to be away with you
Beyond the town and mart.

When April comes, and tints the hills
With happy colors that rejoice,
And from her airy apron spills
Sweet laughter of the winds and rills,
Like your young voice, like your young voice:
It's gladness for God's bending blue,
And gladness for the heart!
And, oh, to be away with you
Beyond the town and mart.

When April comes, and birds and girds
The world with warmth that breathes above,
And to the breeze flings all her birds,
Whose songs are welcome as the words
Of you I love, of you I love:
It's music for all things that woo,
And music for the heart!
And, oh, to be away with you
Beyond the town and mart.

CRESCENT BICYCLES

The Bevel-Gear Chainless Crescent Bicycle for 1900 is a wheel for both manufacturer and rider to be proud of. There is no standing still in the matter of Crescent excellence. We are always doing something to give Crescent buyers better value for their money.

BEVEL-GEAR CHAINLESS MODELS, $60.00

ADULTS' CHAIN MODELS, $25.00, $26.00 and $35.00

BOYS' AND GIRLS' MODELS, $25.00

Send for Crescent Catalogue

THE CRESCENT BICYCLE
301 Wells Street, Chicago
30 Warren Street, New York

SAVE YOUR STRENGTH
You can cover the same ground with less energy by using the CLIPPER
BEVEL GEARED BUSINESS BICYCLES
The secret is in the Bevel-Gear.
Prices $60, $75
Chain Wheels, $50 and $40
Send for Catalogue.
THE RAMBLER OFFICE
North Franklin St. and Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

MAKES THE LAWN BEAUTIFUL

HARTMAN STEEL ROD LAWN FENCE
Adds to the attractiveness and value of the home. STRONG AND DURABLE; keeps out everything but the sunshine. Unequaled for School Lawns, Church Inclosures, Parks, Cemeteries, Private Lots, etc. Catalogue free.
HARTMAN MFG. CO., Box 125, Ellwood City, Pa., or 101 Broadway, New York City

STARK TREES PAY
BEST by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Fruit Book free. We Want Cash Weekly and want More HOME and traveling salesmen.
STARK BROS, Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

IF A YOUNG man starts in life with a good physique and with a sound morality he starts with the best chances of success. In these days of activity and opportunity his mental equipment will be well cared for. In fact the danger both in school and college is that it will be too well cared for—driven to excess. Culture carried too far polishes all the force out of a man; all his vitality is spent in the development of one organ of the body—the brain. Most educators fail to recognize the fact that the best brain is not entirely developed by conscious cerebration in the tasks of the class-room, but in large measure by an unconscious cerebration—by the natural use of the brain in supervising the work of the body. Before the brain is ready for conscious work it is fatal to its integrity to neglect this unconscious work; the brain is stunted both in growth and vigor. Body brain-work, or the use of the brain in every will-directed effort of the body, is the most important element in the education of the brain. The movements of the muscular system are as necessary to the development of the brain as the guidance and government of the brain are to the growth and health of the body. Brain and muscular system are developed by reciprocal action. "All our study hitherto has led us to emphasize greatly the influence upon mental development of the constitution and functions of the muscular system. The condition and action of the muscles stand in reciprocal relation to the senses and feelings which form the necessary effective accompaniment of the senses. Furthermore, the striated (or so-called voluntary) muscles are organs of the will. In the complicated sensory motor apparatus all the most primary foundations of the intellectual life are laid." (Professor George T. Ladd in his work on Psychology.)

Scholar and Athlete in After Life

Just at the time when young men come to college, when all their bodily organs are approaching maturity, this body brain-work is put in full force by athletic sports. By this means the reciprocal action between body and brain is steadily maintained, so that both are strengthened to endure the strain put upon them by the competitions of the college world and by the still harder competitions which they meet in the larger world of life. The young man who has been trained in athletic sport has a stronger probability of life than the man who slights its opportunities. Forty years ago the training of athletes was very crude. The diet prescribed was, to say the least, not suitable to the demands of the work done. Yet of all the members of the Yale University crew of 1860, every one appears on the list of living graduates, while of the five highest scholars of the class graduating that year, only one is living, and he rowed in that same University boat.

At certain seasons of the year one often meets squads of college men running bareheaded about the streets dressed not in the highest fashion of the day. They are getting up lung power by short runs in the open air preparatory to the training in the gymnasium for the athletic events of the year. To their minds the immediate object of all this work and discipline is an honorable place in the University or class organizations of some particular athletic sport. If it were an exercise made compulsory by faculty authority, their hearts would not be in it. Yet they submit to it under the authority of their fellows—an authority of their own choosing. In other words, moved by the hope of a reward which only a few of them can ultimately gain, they are induced to submit to a training which, without this hope, all the rules of hygiene, however convincingly presented, would not persuade them to adopt. In addition to the exercise they are required to bathe, to give plenty of time to sleep, and to avoid all irregularities and indulgences which would be detrimental to their highest vigor. They are really training themselves in the very best way to reap the final reward of a healthy physical life, a result which will stay by them even if they never attain the reward which is the immediate object of their striving. But this is not all. They are cultivating brain and will power. The regularity of their training of itself involves a moral effort. And there is the added moral effect of self-denial. When the preparatory training is over and the men go into the boat or on the field there is a still further extension of the mental and moral effort—greater or less according to the sport which they enter.

An Aid to Academic Order

In all the sports, obedience to recognized authority is cultivated. Thus the system of athletics, by furnishing occupation to the physically active young man who must have some outlet for his superfluous life and energy, is conducive to the good order of a college or university. Before the days when athletics were followed as assiduously as they are now, this superabundant life found its outlet in frequent conflicts between classes, or in rows between town and gown. Now it is worked off in training or in athletic contests. It is brought under the control of law and order. Again, it furnishes a healthy topic of interest outside of the class-room. It is too much to expect of the student, who is often tired of study, that he should not seek some other topic in his times of recreation than the one which he hears in the lecture or class room. The inhabitants of the college world are like the people of the outside world in this respect, that when off duty they find interest in other subjects than those of their regular occupation. They naturally seek some excitement with which to vary the monotony of attendance on recitations and lectures. The athletic contests supply this want, and prevent many a man from looking to dissipation or mischief for relief from the daily drudgery of college life.

To sum up the results thus far claimed, the tendency of athletic sport is, first, to give the best kind of physical training under the best circumstances—that is, to give symmetry of development and to prolong life. In the second place, it tends to cultivate the mind in certain ways not cultivated in the college curriculum, and to develop the brain so as to give its possessor the best physical basis for an intellectual life. It tends, in the third place, to cultivate character by its development of moral qualities. In the fourth place, it tends to good order in the University, and is also an antidote to excessive culture.

A Stimulus to Freer Fellowship

There are two other directions in which its tendency is good. It tends to keep up the esprit de corps by binding together in a common sympathy both graduates and undergraduates, increasing the loyalty of both. This is all the more important in the larger universities where the wide range of choice, by means of which men of different classes are distributed under different instructors, helps to dissipate the chances of those bonds of fellowship which were possible when each and all came under the same instructor at some period of their college career.

The enthusiasm which the college contests awake in the partisans of the contending athletes tends to good, not only on account of its influence in binding together graduates and undergraduates, but also on account of its influence on the interior life of the University itself. It counteracts the tendency to a dry intellectualism, which in some scholars seems to be almost bloodless. This enthusiasm enables those instructors who share it to come closer to their students and to do a better work with them.

The tendency of athletic sport is to make a healthier race. An influence has gone forth from the college athletic associations which has penetrated to every school in the land, and has been instrumental in the organization of the athletic clubs which, with all their shortcomings and excesses, are yet better than none at all. It has increased the attendance at the gymnasiums, and in fact largely created the demand for gymnasiums.

The influence of the sports for good came at a time when it was necessary to have

Ex-President Grover Cleveland

Mr. Cleveland has written especially for the College Man's Double Number of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST an able article for young men who are leaving college and getting actively in touch with the wider world of business and politics.

This is the first magazine article that Mr. Cleveland has written in a great many years, and it will appear in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST exclusively.

In Next Week's Double Number

(On All News-Stands April 26)

Richard Henry Stoddard writes of his personal acquaintance with Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Ex-Senator Ingalls writes wittily of the humorous side of politics.

Van Tassel Sutphen tells an amusing story of an automobile love affair.

Lady Jeune, in the same number, explains how London society has become Americanized; and Ellen Mackubin contributes an exceptionally good story, entitled The Man from Montana.

These are but a few of the many attractive features of next week's POST.

No Increase in Price—5 Cents the Copy

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A° D° 1728 by Benjamin Franklin

For One Dollar it will be sent every week for five months.

Newsdealers all have it. Try a copy.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA

Digitized by Google

something with strong motives to counteract the influence on the young of the demoralizing forces of city life. Just as athletics began to develop, population in the cities began a rapid increase—more rapid than the increase of the population of the country. Is it not a fortunate circumstance that at a time when the disintegrating forces of city life with its luxuries were introduced in increasing measure, an antidote to their poison entered our schools and colleges to counteract them? The present system of athletics helps to keep boys and young men from late hours, from excesses against self and against society, and is therefore to be welcomed as an ally of the best education. It not only saves men, but forms them. It aids our schools of learning to send out not mere scholars, but men of force, men of a character which only comes from the rare union of strength of body, energetic will and cultivated mind.

The Source of National Power In all races which have shown power in any direction the main sources of that power have been physical. At least their force has had a physical basis. For instance, consider the Greeks. For a long period they were a conquering race, masters of the world. But the influence of the Greek has extended far beyond the day of his power and the limits of his state.

"It is no disgrace to a nineteenth century American to go to school to the Greeks. They are still, in their own lines, the leaders of mankind. They are the masters. Attica was about as large as Rhode Island. Rhode Island is a noble little commonwealth. Yet it has enjoyed liberty longer than the democracy of Athens lasted, and in the blazing light of this much-lauded century. What now is or will be the influence of Rhode Island on the world's history compared with the immeasured and imperishable influence of Athens? Whence the difference?" (Professor George P. Fisher, Princeton Review, March, 1884.)

The causes of the difference were manifold. One cause was their complete system of physical culture. Hand in hand with their mental discipline, which was simple but thorough, went physical training. "Until the time of Alexander the main subjects of education among the Greeks were music and gymnastics, bodily training and mental culture. . . . The first duty of a Greek boy was to learn his letters, a feat which was also coincident with learning to swim. . . . By the fourteenth year the Greek boy would have begun to devote himself seriously to athletics." (Educational Theories, by Oscar Browning.) Could such a careful and continuous training of the body fail to have its effect upon the mind? While it gave the body strength, it gave vigor to the brain. When in the course of their conquests wealth and luxury came to them, the Greeks met the usual fate of nations weak in the moral sense, and they went down before the stronger race.

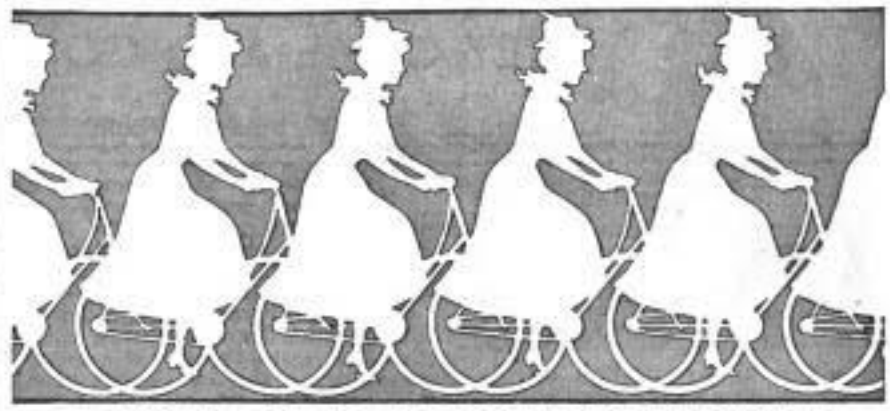
The training of the Romans was largely physical. It was a training for war. But when they relaxed their discipline and gave themselves up to lives of luxury, they gave up also their martial games and athletic exercises, and hired gladiators for their sport and mercenaries for their battles. They, too, were overcome by the stronger races.

An Ancestry of Physical Force The English have in their veins the blood of those old sea-rovers who were the terror of the coasts of Europe in the early centuries of the Christian era, mixed with the blood of that vigorous native stock, to subdue which, though it was furnished with only barbarian arms, was no easy task to the Roman legions. Their physical force is still maintained by vigorous athletic sports. Wherever the race goes it carries with it the love of exercise and the practice of it. The vigor of the stock never decays. Out of its island home it goes to conquer and colonize the globe.

The muscle of one generation is the source and support of the brain-power of the succeeding generation. "What else accounts for the prodigal activity of the early settlers of this country but the fact that, obliged, when cast on a land like ours, to battle with the elements and conquer the forests by their own bodily strength, they lived an outdoor life, in the main, and stored up an immense capital of vitality" (S. Weir Mitchell in Wear and Tear) which they handed down to their posterity?

As to individuals, if you find a really successful man who builds and keeps either a reputation or a fortune by honest hard work, he is generally a man of originally vigorous body. "All professional biography teaches that to win lasting distinction in sedentary indoor occupations, which task the brain and nervous system, extraordinary toughness of body must accompany extraordinary mental power." (S. Weir Mitchell in Wear and Tear.) Again: "To attain success and length of service in any of the learned professions, including teaching, a vigorous body is wellnigh essential." (President Eliot in his Annual Report, 1877-78.)

Possible Abuses of Athletics So far we have considered only the tendency of college sport toward good. It is only fair to take up some of its tendencies toward evil.



It is affirmed by the opponents of the present system of athletic sport that it requires an excessive amount of time from its devotees and draws them too much away from study. Undoubtedly the assertion is true with respect to some athletes. Some students also give too much time to study, ruining their health, and thus defeating the purpose of their college course, which is to prepare them for life, not to unfit them for it. Of the two excesses—excess of study and excess of exercise—the dangerous pressure at present is toward excess of study, because it does not admit of any rules to restrain it. Excessive devotion to athletic sport is restrained in all institutions of recognized standing by requiring a scholarship standard for the athlete high enough to make certain that he gives a fair amount of time to his proper college work. If he does not come up to the requirements he is not allowed to compete in athletics. Not only this, but every athlete must be regular in his attendance on college exercises. To this end the public events are cut down within limits narrow enough to insure his presence at lectures and recitations.

Then there is the evil of betting. This is not an evil peculiar to athletics. Games and races do not create betting. They simply divert it from other channels. If athletics were prohibited gambling would increase.

It is said that athletics set before the college a false standard of excellence—namely, one entirely physical. But that assertion will not stand the test of truth. The standard of good scholarship remains. It is often maintained by the athletes. The lately elected captain of the Yale football team is one of the best scholars of his class. The standard of good conduct remains. The college world still respects any of its number who approach these standards, but it thinks the better of a man if he has a vigorous body as well as a scholarly mind and upright character.

The Movement to Check Extravagance The tendency to extravagance in expenditure, though not existing to the extent often asserted, does nevertheless exist. The importance of college sport in a financial light will be revealed to many persons who fail to comprehend it in any other way. At Yale the total expenses of all the sports were, for the season of 1896-7, $43,625.25; for 1897-8, $64,685.33; for 1898-9, $55,384.24. Since for the seasons of 1897-8 and 1898-9 there were unusual outlays on the athletic field, particularly so in 1897-8, the expenses for 1896-7 would be nearer the average yearly cost of the sports: $43,625.25 represents the interest at four per cent. of an invested capital of $1,090,631.25. That amount is greater than one-fifth of the total permanent funds of the University, viz., $4,554,829.45, as given in the report of the treasurer for the year ending July 31, 1899. In 1881-2 the total expenses for the athletic sports were $17,476.04. There was, therefore, an increase of one hundred and forty-nine per cent. in the expenses during the period between the two seasons. During the same period there was an increase in membership at the University of one hundred and thirty-nine per cent. The difference between the two percentages does not show a greatly increased tendency to extravagance. But, nevertheless, it is idle to deny that there is extravagance which ought to be checked. There is a very general feeling, even in the student body, that this evil should be remedied. It is largely owing to the prevalence of this feeling that a movement is on foot to make the officer here known as the Graduate Treasurer of the Financial Union (a body which handles all the income of the college sports) also an appointee of the Faculty, authorized to supervise the accounts and to check unnecessary expense. When this movement is completed it will put an end to the only evil which threatens the integrity of college sport.

CLEVELAND

BEVEL GEAR CHAINLESS BICYCLE

Has a standard of value that satisfies the most critical. It will be selected by every person who has an appreciative eye for a fast, easy-running, trim, compact and clean bicycle. The Cleveland Bevel Gear Chainless contains the best gears and fittings that can be obtained. They are assembled under our own supervision, with the nicest care. Send for Cleveland Bicycle Catalogue.

Chainless, $75.00. Chain Models, $50.00, $60.00

Main Office: CLEVELAND, OHIO

IT'S WORTH YOUR WHILE

To investigate the difference between our prices and those of agents and dealers for the same grade of work.

WE DO NOT SELL

No. 48.—Single Strap Collar and Hame Harness. Price with nickel trimmings, $11. Good as sells for $16.

Through agents or dealers, therefore we do not have them to protect, and in making our prices are enabled to figure them as low as the grade of work we manufacture can be sold. We save you the profits that are added between the manufacturer and the consumer, by selling direct to you from our factory. This has been our method of selling for the past twenty-seven years, and we are to-day the largest manufacturers of vehicles and harness in the world. 178 styles of vehicles and 60 styles of harness and ship anywhere for examination, guaranteeing safe arrival. Send for FREE catalogue, showing all of our different styles.

No. 788.—Stanhope. Price, complete with shafts, $50. We guarantee it as good as others sell for $50 to $60 more than our price.

ELKHART CARRIAGE AND HARNESS MANUFACTURING CO., Elkhart, Indiana

Won't Need a Baby Carriage

IF YOU BUY OUR NEW

Automatic Go-cart

It answers as both. A slight foot pressure changes it into a comfortable baby carriage; and back again into a go-cart. Perfectly simple. Overcomes every objection to the old style. Write for particulars.

Most Comfortable Invalid Chairs

and safest, are made by us; the kind sick persons should have. Cost no more than the ordinary.

Bloch Reclining Chairs 50 changes of position.

We are builders of Baby Carriages, Invalid and Reclining Chairs. Write for catalogue.

If your dealer won't supply our Automatic Go-Cart, we will ship direct from factory.

Philadelphia Baby Carriage Factory

713 and 715 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia

Floors!!

LITTLE FOLKS, by their careless play, soon ruin floors not properly finished.

Johnson's Prepared Wax

Does not show heel marks or scratches, is not slippery, is durable, easily applied, and very convenient.

FREE. A sample half-pound can (sufficient to polish 150 sq. ft.) and our book, "The Proper Treatment for Floors," to any one having a floor.

Our beautiful Hardwood Floors can be laid over your present floors at about the cost of a good carpet.

Ask for catalogue showing styles.

S. C. Johnson

Racine, Wis., U.S.A.

Buy at First Hand

Deal with the makers direct and secure handsome, staunchly built, latest-style carriages and high-grade harness, with only one moderate profit added to the cost of making—Dealers' Profits Cut Off.

Our Catalogue will help you to choose from the biggest and fullest assortment of carriages, buggies, harness, robes, blankets and horse equipments. It accurately pictures and describes all the many styles, and fully explains our method of selling direct. Mailed free.

No. 1060 Phaeton Price, $82.95

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO. Columbus, Ohio

COLFAX PONY "RIGS"

Catalogue Free. 50 Useful Styles and Sizes. Address COLFAX, South Bend, Ind.

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES producing buggies by automatic machinery, from materials bought for cash. We sell direct and

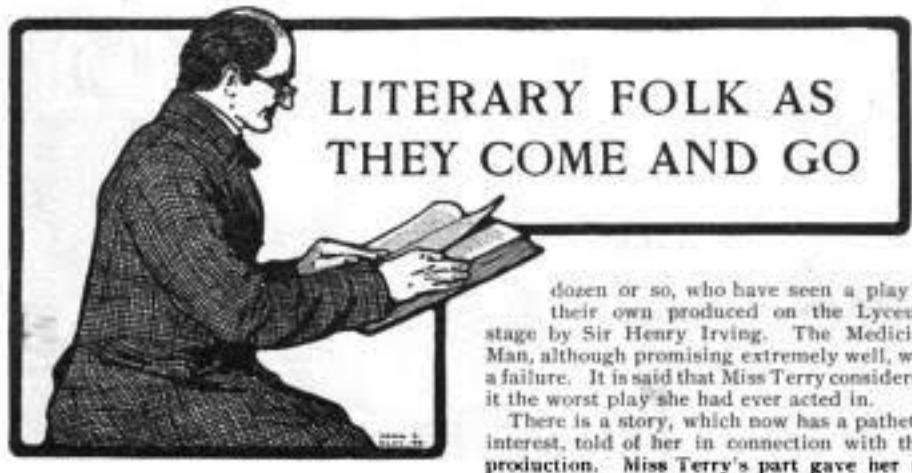
Save Dealers' Profits

Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS SACRIFICES on overstocked lines. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 36-48 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

DON'T SET HENS THE SAME OLD WAY.

THE NAT'L HEN INCUBATOR beats old plan 100 to 1. Little in price but big money maker. Agts. wanted. Send for cat. telling how to get one free. National Hen Incubator Co., B 26, Columbus, Neb. A. Edwards writes: "Would not take $100 for N. H. I. Plan."



BIRD manna The secret of the Harz Mountains. It restores the song of Cage Birds, prevents their ailments, and makes them sing even. Mailed for 15c. Sold by all bird stores. Bird Book free. 400 North Third Street.

Send also for a free sample of PROSPERFIELD'S Mocha and Cattle Powder, the best in the world, with free book.

makes Canaries SING.

Digitized by Google

LITERARY FOLK AS THEY COME AND GO

JOHN STRANGE WINTER'S new book, The Money Sense, is likely to be popular, for it is almost as vulgar, though by no means so witty, as Dodo. In this novel Mrs. Arthur Stannard deals with the rise and fall of a most disagreeable type of young lady, who may possess the money sense—whatever that may be—but has no grain of any other sort. Mrs. Stannard has lived now for some years in France, at Dieppe, where she is the centre of an English coterie of friends of pseudo-literary tastes. Living so much abroad she has lost touch with English manners, and her last novel is thought, in England, to be more the work of imagination than of observation and knowledge.

Some incidental characters, however, are of the nature of caricature, and there seemed a chance of amusement, if only of a personal nature, in the introduction of a lady novelist and a husband who objects to being called "the novelist's husband." But these drift and fade, even in the author's mind, for on one page they are called the Geoffrey Hilliards, and ten pages later they are spoken of as the Galbraiths. It was permitted Thackeray to kill his Helen Pendennis in one number of his novel and bring her to life in the next. But Mrs. Stannard is not yet quite Thackeray—although Bootles' Baby, it is said, was warmly admired by Ruskin in his declining years—and when she forgets the names of her characters it rather seems to give the show away to the reader.

Richard Whiteing's Long Shot

RICHARD WHITEING is a great man in every sense of the word. Tall and ponderous, with a massive head and strong features that are in nowise out of proportion to his magnificent physique, he is some one not easily to be overlooked, however crowded the drawing-room in which he appears. Kind with the kindness that belongs to Nature's giants, he is forever giving the struggling author a hint or a helping hand.

"Do not waste yourself over small efforts," he is fond of pointing out to the beginner: "a book is a long shot, but it kills more in the end than a volley of musketry!" It is easy to trace the hidden emphasis in his words to a retrospective glance over the years when the "volley of musketry" kept his own "long shot" from being fired.

A Playmate of Longfellow's Children

MRS. HENRIETTA DANA SKINNER, the author, is a daughter of the late Richard H. Dana, Jr. She says the most interesting period of her life was her schooldays, which were passed with the children of Longfellow and other New England celebrities. She obtained glimpses of the eminent poet and his friends which showed them in the pleasantest of all lights, that of the home circle. Longfellow had a great love for children and took a particular delight in reciting to them little poems, nonsensical improvisations and quaint little stories. Her friends have often suggested that she should make a memoir of these matters. At present Mrs. Skinner is deeply interested in patriotic movements in Detroit, where she resides.

The Death of H. D. Traill

THE English papers have had long accounts of the career of Mr. H. D. Traill, whose sudden death at fifty-seven years of age has robbed literature in general of a most valuable supporter, and literature in particular of its distinguished and gifted editor. Mr. Traill, apart from his literary work—and in connection with it, too—was a most delightful man. A strong sense of humor salted his outlook upon life.

Mr. Traill only once attempted a stage play, and that with the collaboration of Mr. Hichens. He was one of the few men, a half dozen or so, who have seen a play of their own produced on the Lyceum stage by Sir Henry Irving. The Medicine Man, although promising extremely well, was a failure. It is said that Miss Terry considered it the worst play she had ever acted in.

There is a story, which now has a pathetic interest, told of her in connection with this production. Miss Terry's part gave her no chance; there was no possible coup de théâtre. At one rehearsal, when she was overwrought, nervous and disappointed, she turned upon her admirers, Mr. Traill and Mr. Hichens, and poured out her disapproval in a half humorous, half severe tirade. "For such a play," she said, pointing to Hichens, "may you be cut off in the bud of your youth, and you," pointing to Traill, "in the flower of your prime."

Alas! for once the word in jest has come true. All who knew his work and all who knew the man, young at heart though nearing sixty years, will mourn for H. D. Traill these many days.

It is curious that Mr. Traill's most characteristic work, The New Lucian, should have appeared in London in a new and enlarged edition almost on the day of his death.

Paul Dunbar's Gifted Wife

LITERARY marriages are by no means the rule, and that the foremost writer of his race should be rivaled in the telling of short stories by his wife makes the appearance of Mrs. Paul Laurence Dunbar in the field of literature a matter worthy of note. Mrs. Dunbar has written a volume of short stories, The Goodness of St. Rocque, which is meeting with a favorable reception from the book-buying world. The scenes are laid in the New Orleans of George W. Cable, and much of the charm of description which belongs to the novelist of the Creoles has been caught by the writer. Until recently Mr. and Mrs. Dunbar lived in Washington, where the poet held a clerical position in the Congressional Library. They are now living in Colorado.

An Involuntary Horse Thief

THERE is no fun in being a criminal, even though it be by accident. George H. Jessup, the novelist and playwright, who has now a big place in Cabinteely, Ireland, once lived in San Francisco. There was an epidemic of horse-stealing at that time which was followed by a sympathetic attack of lynching. Vigilance committees were everywhere, and strangers on strange horses were viewed with suspicion.

Jessup and a friend were out driving one day and took part in a picnic where they knew nobody. They passed several pleasant hours at San Mateo, where the festival took place, and then remembered an important engagement. They left the crowd and went to the neighboring grove where the horses were tethered, and unfastening their own rig, as they supposed, jumped in and drove off. The horse had trotted two or three miles when the friend said:

"George, this isn't our horse. It's a larger and better animal."

Jessup looked at the steed carefully and replied, "Upon my word, you are right. This isn't our carriage robe either."

It was a handsome affair and they looked at it with some curiosity. On the inside of it was sewed a piece of cloth bearing the name and address of the owner. The friend gasped:

"George, do you know the owner of this rig is the head of the vigilance committee?"

Mr. Jessup broke into a cold perspiration as he replied: "Let's drive to the nearest telegraph station and wire him."

They drove like mad, and when they reached the station made arrangements at the hotel to have the horse and wagon cleaned. Then they sent a dispatch, and waited their fate.

In due time the irate owner arrived, and to their inexpressible joy he came in their own vehicle. There were explanations and apologies, and, according to California custom, the luckless Jessup was compelled to "treat the house," an act which kept him poor for the remainder of the month.

HER CARDS ARE OUT

MADE AND SOLD ONLY BY

The Singer Manufacturing Company

Salesrooms in Every City in the World

The "Odorless" Refrigerator

SOLID OAK, GOLDEN OAK FINISH

Freight Prepaid to any point east of the Mississippi where we have no agent. $24.38

The "Odorless" is the only refrigerator that will keep food free from contamination. Fresh Food will not taint nor spoil by absorbing the smell of odorous fruits and provisions, as invariably occurs with other so-called odorless Refrigerators.

The "Odorless" is built strictly upon scientific principles, and consequently is a Scientific Preserver of Food. The circulation of air is so perfectly arranged that odors are carried off and out, and do not come in contact with the ice as in other Refrigerators.

If you are in need of a Refrigerator, or if yours is old and unsatisfactory, write for our handsome Catalogue S and our Special Offer; even if you do not care to buy now it will interest you.

THE KEYSER MANUFACTURING CO., Chattanooga, Tenn.

Other Styles of this Refrigerator:

With Water Tank.
With White Enameled Provision Chamber. With Nickeloid Provision Chamber.
With White Enameled Provision Chamber and Tank. With Nickeloid Provision Chamber and Tank

SPECIAL 60 DAYS' OFFER

To Introduce Our Latest Large, Powerful, Achromatic Telescope and Microscope Combined— The Excelsior

POSITIVELY such a good Telescope was never sold for this price before. These Telescopes are made by one of the largest manufacturers of Europe; measure closed 12 inches and open over 3½ feet; 4 sections. They are BRASS BOUND, BRASS SAFETY CAP on each end to exclude dust, etc., with POWERFUL LENSES, scientifically ground and adjusted. GUARANTEED BY THE MAKER. Telescopes of this size have heretofore been sold at several times this price. Every sojourner in the country or at seaside resorts should certainly secure one of these instruments, and no farmer should be without one. Objects miles away are brought to view with astonishing clearness. THEN PRESTO! it can be changed to a powerful microscope, to examine seeds, insects and infinitesimal matter of any sort. This wonderful instrument sent by mail or express, safely packed, prepaid, for only 99 cents. Our new catalogue of Watches, etc., sent with each order. This is a grand offer, and you should not miss it. WE WARRANT each instrument JUST AS REPRESENTED or money refunded.

What Our Customers Say: Could tell the time on a tower clock 4½ miles away.—LUTHER O'NEAL, Otisville, Ind. Saw houses 10 miles away.—RUSSELL CAMPBELL, Bluff Creek, Ia. Cannot get one here as good for $5.00.—T. ROSE, Poland, N.Y. Could count sheep 4 miles away.—C. GARDNER, Woods, O. An astronomical student writes us he could see the rifts in the moon with our Excelsior Telescope.

Send 99 cents by Registered Letter, Post-Office Money Order, Express Money Order or Bank Draft, payable to our order, or have your dealer order for you. Address

EXCELSIOR IMPORTING CO., Dept. 34, 296 Broadway, New York

Digitized by Google

Mr. Charles E. Mitchell
1018 Lincoln Neb.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 44 PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 28, 1900 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

The Curtis Publishing Company Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

Knowing Cyclists

will not ride without a reliable "mile teller." Only ONE has stood the test of time.

Veeder CYCLOMETERS

ORDINARY "TRIP"

are perfect instruments—dust proof, water proof, positive action—as useful as your watch. Made for 24, 26, 28, and 30-inch wheels.

Ordinary, 10,000 miles and repeat, nickeled, $1.00
Gold-plated and engraved $2.50
Trip Cyclometer, nickeled $1.50
Gold-plated and engraved $4.00

ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET FREE. VEEDER MANUFACTURING CO., Hartford, Conn.
Makers of Cyclometers, Odometers, Counting Machines and Fine Castings

The "Columbia Grand"

At $75.00

Graphophone

Is the centre of attraction in the talking machine world to-day.

The New Home Grand, just out, $100
Graphophone Grand, $150

All reproducing with the same volume and naturalness as the original itself, and with the same pleasing effect.

COLUMBIA RECORDS ARE SUPERB

The finest talking machine records are those "Made for the Columbia Phonograph Company." They have the richest quality, purest tone, most brilliant effect, smoothest surface, and are the loudest, best and most durable. Entire Catalogue in both large (Grand) and small sizes.

Price—Small Records—50 cents each; $5 per dozen
Grand Records, $1.50 each
Graphophones using small cylinders, from $5 up
Toy Graphophone for children, including five disk records, $1.50

Write for Catalogue "B2"

COLUMBIA PHONOGRAPH COMPANY

NEW YORK, 143-145 Broadway.
Retail Branch, 1155, 1157, 1159 Broadway.
PHILADELPHIA, 1032 Chestnut Street.
BALTIMORE, 110 East Baltimore Street.
PARIS, 34 Boulevard des Italiens.
BUFFALO, 313 Main Street.
SAN FRANCISCO, 125 Geary Street.
ST. LOUIS, 720-722 Olive Street.
CHICAGO, 88 Wabash Avenue.
WASHINGTON, 929 Pennsylvania Avenue.
BERLIN, 55 Kronenstrasse.

PACKER'S

A PLEASED CUSTOMER IS THE BEST ADVERTISEMENT

TAR SOAP

H. & W. CORSET WAISTS

ARE MORE SATISFACTORY IN FIT, QUALITY AND PRICE THAN ANY WAIST MADE

The above is a photograph of the H. & W. Plaited Bust Waist for Young Ladies. Price 75c. H. & W. Waists are made for Boys, Girls, Babies, Ladies and Misses. Seventy-seven varieties—25c to $1.25 each.

SOLD AT ALL STORES

GEORGE C. BATCHELLER & CO.
NEW YORK - AGENTS

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A.D. 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1909, by the Curtis Publishing Company

Published weekly at 425 Arch Street

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE

By Richard Henry Stoddard

I HAVE sometimes regretted that it did not occur to me when I was young that it might be worth my while to keep a diary, not for the purpose of filling its pages with details about myself and my own doings—things in which I can never remember to have been much interested—but for the purpose of preserving an accurate record of the times when, the places where and the circumstances under which first met certain persons whom I was proud to meet, either for what they had done, or for what they were, and whom I am fain to recall now through the impression they made upon me then, clad in their habits as they lived, rather than from the fading tablets of a blurred and uncertain memory. Such a record, if I could have persuaded myself to keep it, would have been illuminated with several names which, popular or famous then, have since become illustrious, unforgetable, immortal; and chiefest among them would be the name of Nathaniel Hawthorne.

I made the acquaintance of Hawthorne through the kindness of a member of a Boston firm who were his publishers, and, in a small, unprofitable way, my publishers, Ticknor, Reed & Fields. They were not a great firm, nor an old firm, in the sense that the Harpers and the Appletons are old and great, but they had a position among the tribe of tradesmen to which they belonged, which may almost be called unique, it was so uncommon and so precarious. They published nothing that was not sufficiently literary to merit the exacting demands of the most select corps of American readers, the best literature of the time, "books which are books," as Lamb phrased it, their list of which was blazoned with the names of such poets as Tennyson, Browning, Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, Holmes, and such prose writers as De Quincey and Hawthorne. They made no display of the treasures they disposed of, as is now the wont of their guild, in marble structures of their own, but were content to occupy an old brick building on the corner of Washington and School Streets, a little shop with a door on each thoroughfare, the larger one opening on the former, with windows on both sides, through which a leisurely passer-by might note a line of intending buyers within, standing, book in hand, at the wide filled counters, and, if the gods were propitious that day, a glimpse of two or three of their writers, Longfellow, perhaps, or Emerson, but most likely little Doctor Holmes.

This old book store was a Mecca to me at this time, as it has since been to hundreds of others, but more literally to me than to many of these, for in order to visit it I had to make an actual pilgrimage from New York to Boston, a nightly pilgrimage on the lumbering Sound steamers, where, scantily supplied with scrip, but amply sustained by enthusiasm, I whiled away the lagging hours in anticipating my arrival. There was a corner in this old book store, at its left-hand back end on School Street, and in this corner, opposite a dingy window, stood a tallish, upright desk, where, hidden by a green curtain from all but pilgrim eyes, was the Kaaba of this Mecca—Mr. James Thomas Fields. He was the younger member of the house, its literary representative, the reader of manuscripts offered for publication, the selecter of its choicest reprints, inquisitive in the discovery of new writers and sagacious in the recovery and reanimation of old ones like De Quincey. He had an instinctive love of books, which was enriched by the education that comes from reading only the best, by correctness of taste, catholicity of judgment, and, what does not always accompany these qualities, intelligent sympathy with, and kindly regard for, their makers. He had also an inclination to share their pursuits, which he occasionally exercised in the shape of a gentlemanly gift of versification which was believed to resemble that of a well-known English publisher, Edward Moxon, and which led to his being called the American Moxon. It was not a complimentary epithet, whatever it was meant to be, for his verse was what Moxon's sonnets never were; it was poetry, though not of striking and showy kind. Courteous, considerate, friendly everywhere, Mr. Fields was never so charming to me as during these pilgrimages of mine to Boston, and never so interesting anywhere as when standing at the upright desk, behind the green curtain I have spoken of. Busy as he must have been, he always found time to take me there, and tell me of the literary folk whom he had lately met in London, for he was constantly going to and coming from the mother country—how they looked, what they said, of what they were doing, and, better still, to read their last letters to him, letters from Barry Cornwall, from Miss Mitford, who knew of me through him, and other famous pen people whose names I have forgotten. Older than I was by some eight or ten years and more conversant with the usages of the world than I was ever likely to be, we were as companionable as boys, giggling or making giggle at everything, and chaffing each other so freely that no listener, had there been a listener, would have believed that one was a poor young author and the other a middle-aged, prosperous publisher.

I remember one of these pilgrimages more distinctly than many others which preceded it and followed it, and I had abundant reason to do so, for it led to my acquaintance with Hawthorne. It was in the summer of 1852—about the middle of July, I think—and I had wandered to the old corner book store to have a chat with Mr. Fields. He saw me when I entered, gave me his usual salutation, and, taking me behind the green curtain, closed it carefully and pointed to a package of manuscript on a corner of his desk.

"What is it?" I asked.

"The Blythedale Romance," he replied softly and handed it to me guardedly, as if it had been a costly treasure, with a sense of satisfaction in his voice and the joy of possession in his eyes. I received it in the same spirit, though it was not a sightly object, for the fingers of the compositors who had set it up had left dark smears along the lines of fine, clear writing.

"See how they have smudged it!" he cried, "and I told the varlets to keep it clean."

I was curiously interested in this manuscript, more so, perhaps, than I might have been on another occasion, for I was fresh from reading The Blythedale Romance, and writing about it in a staid, old New York journal, the editor of which, a prosaic, elderly Englishman, occasionally (and gratuitously) permitted me to exploit my crude, critical judgments in his columns, after subjecting them to fussy supervision, which, professing to correct my slovenly construction, generally emasculated my meaning and often destroyed my sense.

While I was examining this soiled manuscript the green curtain was thrown aside by an attenuated hand and the owner of this hand entered hurriedly. It was Mr. Edwin Percy Whipple, a personal friend of Mr. Fields, and, I presume, a serviceable friend of his firm. A professor of the ungentle craft of criticism, he had recently published two volumes of Essays and Reviews, from the reputed excellence of which he was christened "The American Macaulay." A careful reader of many books and a cautious, conventional judge of all, his dicta were anxiously looked for and (when of novels) widely quoted. Mr. Whipple was an authority.

"Stoddard, my boy," said Mr. Fields, "Ned and I are going to see Hawthorne and you are going with us. A military person whom he wishes to see, or wishes to see him, is to call here and accompany us. It is something to do with the Life of Frank Pierce, I suppose; for this person, I am told, was on his staff in Mexico."

"I understand," I replied.

But I did not in the least. I knew from the newspapers that Hawthorne was supposed to be writing a Life of General Pierce, the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, but I did not know that General Pierce, who had been a student of the same college as he and was a life-long, valued and loving friend, had earnestly desired him to write this life; nor did I know that, even in New England, it was a heinous political sin for a Democrat to be nominated for the Presidency, and elected, if he could be! Mr. Fields knew what Hawthorne's feeling in this matter was, for some six or seven years after his death he printed one of his personal letters, within about a month before my visit, in which he said:

> "General Pierce, of New Hampshire, the Democratic nominee for the Presidency, was a college friend of mine, as you know, and we have been intimate through life. He wishes me to write his biography and I have consented to do so; somewhat reluctantly, however, for Pierce has now reached that altitude when a man, careful of his personal dignity, will begin to think of cutting his personal acquaintances. But I seek nothing from him, and therefore need not be ashamed to tell the truth of an old friend."

While the American Macaulay and the American Moxon were discussing somebody sotto voce, a well-trained servitor of the latter approached the sanctum with a stranger.

"Colonel Whipple, whom you are expecting."

Colonel Whipple, as I remember him, was somewhat tall and sparely built, of an erect figure and soldierly bearing, of dark complexion, with keen, sharp, black eyes.

"Colonel Whipple," said Mr. Fields, "here is a namesake of yours. You know Mr. E. P. Whipple?"

"I know Mr. Whipple very well by reputation, sir."

"And Mr. Stoddard, the poet?"

"Whom I do not know, though I hope to have that pleasure."

I bowed, as in duty bound, and took the hand which he suddenly extended. It had a strong, firm grasp—a friendly,

PHOTO BY GEBFORD & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

RICHARD HENRY STODDARD IN HIS STUDY

Digitized by Google

hearty, manly, soldierly grasp—and I liked it, as I did the man himself the moment I set eyes upon him.

"We wait your orders, Colonel," said Mr. Fields, lifting his hand to his head as if he were an orderly.

"Forward, then, gentlemen," commanded our Colonel, and offering his arm to Mr. Fields he marched to the door on Washington Street, and, followed by Mr. Whipple and myself, we proceeded to the Concord Station.

I have forgotten where it stood, but it does not matter, for wherever it was then it is now, fronting some dusty, crowded business street, lined with loading and unloading trucks, the sidewalk obstructed with long skids, across which we stepped briskly, watchful of descending and ascending bales, crates, casks and barrels, and the jostling rush of travelers inward and outward bound.

Mr. Fields guided us to the right car, in which we were fortunate enough to find four unoccupied seats grouped together, into which we hurried, the Whipples taking the front two and Mr. Fields and I the rearward two, into which we dropped heavily, wearied with our brisk walk, heated with the July sunshine, and more than ready for our well-earned furlough of quiet shade and light conversation.

We reached Concord on time and sauntered leisurely along its old road until we came to the house in which Hawthorne was living and which he had named The Wayside. He met us at the gate in the low fenced railing that inclosed it from the rest of the town and led us into the front yard—a grassy plot of ground crossed by several well-worn foot-paths. Mr. Fields introduced me to him. He gave me a cordial handshake, and said a few words which placed me at once at ease. Then, with a kindly nod, he disappeared in the house with Colonel Whipple, leaving the rest of us to take care of ourselves in his grounds. Mr. Fields played our guide here as elsewhere, but with less success, for though he had often been in Concord he was not yet familiar with the innings and outings of The Wayside. What was it like? I will not try to recall it as I seem to see it through the misty recollections of nearly half a century, but let Hawthorne himself describe it, as it was at the time of our visit, in a letter to his quondam friend at Brook Farm, Mr. George William Curtis: "My dear Howadji: I think (and am glad to think) that you will find it necessary to come hither in order to write your Concord sketches; and as for my old house, you will understand it better after spending a day or two in it. Before Mr. Alcott took it in hand it was a mean-looking affair, with two peaked gables; no suggestiveness about it, and no venerableness, although from the style of its construction it seems to have survived beyond its first century. He added a porch in front and a central peak and a piazza at each end and painted it a rusty olive hue, and invested the whole with a modest picturesqueness; all of which improvements, together with its situation at the foot of a wooded hill, make it a place that one notices for a few moments after passing it. Mr. Alcott expended a good deal of taste and some money (to no great purpose) in forming the hillside behind the house into terraces and building arbors and summer-houses of rough stems and branches of trees, on a system of his own. They must have been very pretty in their day and are so still, although much decayed, and shattered more and more by every breeze that blows. The hillside is covered chiefly by locust trees which come into luxuriant blossom in the month of June and look and smell very sweetly, intertwined with a few young elms and some white pines and infant oaks, the whole forming rather a thicket than a wood. Nevertheless, there is some very good shade to be found there. I spend delectable hours there in the hottest part of the day, stretched out at my lazy length with a book in my hand, an unwritten book in my thoughts. There is almost always a breeze stirring about the sides or brow of the hill. From the hill there is a good view along the extensive level surface and gentle hilly outlines, covered with wood, that characterize the scenery of Concord. We have not so much as a gleam of lake or river in the prospect; if there were, it would add greatly to the value of the place in my estimation. The house stands within ten or fifteen feet of the old Boston road (along which the British marched and retreated), divided from it by a fence and some trees and shrubbery of Mr. Alcott's setting out. Whereupon I have called it The Wayside, which I think a better name and more morally significant than that which, as Mr. Alcott has since told me, he bestowed on it—The Hillside. In front of the house, on the opposite side of the road, I have eight acres of land—the only valuable portion of the place in a farmer's eye—which are capable of being made very fertile. On the hither side my territory extends some little distance over the brow of the hill and is absolutely good for nothing, in a productive point of view, though very good for many other purposes. I know nothing of the history of the house except Thoreau's telling me that it was inhabited a generation or two ago by a man who believed he should never die. I believe, however, he is dead; at least I hope so, else he may probably appear and dispute my title to his residence."

Such, in the summer of 1852, was The Wayside, the master of which reappeared with Colonel Whipple after a short time, which we had spent in rambling about his environments, under the confident guidance of Mr. Fields. He invited us to enter and we followed him into the hall, where we removed our hats which we hung up on a little stand, whence we were ushered into a room on the left where a midday meal awaited us, and where, as the only stranger present, he introduced me to his wife. Never, I fear, an accurate observer of others, and certainly not a close or curious one, at a first meeting, I will not try to describe the personal appearance of Mrs. Hawthorne, whose presence I rather felt than saw. Five or six years younger than her husband, who had just passed his forty-ninth birthday, she was a fine-looking gentlewoman, with courteous, refined manners and a motherly air which became her. Whether any of her children were actually present I am not sure, though I think I saw the youngest, Rose, a baby in her second year. Mrs. Hawthorne sat at the farther end of the table, opposite her husband, who sat at the head; on his right hand sat his spare military guest, whom she saw for the first time that day, and on his left his prosperous publisher, with whom she was well acquainted. Hawthorne seated me on his right, Mr. Whipple seated himself on his left, and thus grouped we partook of this meal, which was a simple one, consisting of a boiled leg of mutton with the usual esculents, a pudding, or perhaps a pie afterward and a bottle of claret, the solitary sentinel of hospitality, which seldom quitted its post of duty at our end of the table.

At last Hawthorne arose, feeling no doubt that he had sufficiently performed his part as host, offered me a cigar, and, lighting one himself, proposed that we should go outdoors and have a talk. The proposal delighted me, for beyond the customary social courtesies when I was introduced to him and our desultory nothings at the table, no conversation had passed between us. Never a volunteer of speech with my betters, I divined the wisdom of silence now, and resolved to hold my tongue until encouraged to use it. My respect for Hawthorne as a man of letters, the most eminent one I had met, restrained all forwardness on my part, and almost restrained me from observation of his face and person. I might perhaps have recognized him from some resemblance in the portrait by Thompson, prefixed to the new edition of his Twice-told Tales, which I had lately been reading, but I should not, I could not, have known him from that portrait, which was, I imagine, what painters would call an academical one—that is to say, a superficial likeness of his features in repose, well composed in form and color, with the right light and shadows and the proper expression of a well-bred sitter, correctly conscious of himself and what was expected to be seen in his counterfeit presentment. Outdoors I saw for the first time the kind of man that Hawthorne was. More than handsome, more than fine-looking, there was distinction in his face and form—the distinction of manly beauty in the one and manly strength in the other. Nearly six feet in height he did not appear tall, his shoulders were so broad, his limbs so shapely and well-proportioned. His head was large, harmonious in its outlines and noble in its bearing: there was an air of grandeur about it, the certainty of reserved power in its repose. And his eyes—those large, deep-set, dark, luminous eyes that saw such visions and read such secrets—I will not try to describe them here. And happily for me I do not need to, since our common friend, Mr. Fields, accomplished that baffling task in his illuminating recollections of Hawthorne a few years after his death. "I remember to have heard in the literary circles of London," Mr. Fields wrote, "that since Burns, no author had appeared there with so fine a face as Hawthorne. Old Mrs. Basil Montagu told me, many years ago, that she sat next to Burns at dinner, when he appeared in society, in the first flush of his fame, after the Edinburgh edition of his poems had been published. She said among other things, that although the company consisted of some of the best-bred men of England, Burns seemed to her the most perfect gentleman among them. She noticed particularly his gentle grace and deferential manner toward women, and I was interested to hear Mrs. Montagu's brilliant daughter, when speaking of Hawthorne's advent in English society, describe him in almost the same terms as I had heard her mother, years before, describe the Scotch poet. I happened to be in London with Hawthorne during his consular residence in England, and was always greatly delighted at the rustle of admiration his personal appearance excited when he entered the room. His bearing was modestly grand and his voice touched the ear like a melody."

Emerging from the porch of The Wayside and taking a worn path in the grass-grown yard, Hawthorne leading the way, we passed along and around the right front of the house into the rising and wooded grounds in the rear. Not sufficiently conversant with forestry to distinguish, nor under the circumstances to care for, the leafy populace there, I rather scrambled after than accompanied the strong, alert figure of Hawthorne as we ascended his terraced hill. He helped me lightly up its steepest ascent, and when we reached an old summer-house on its crest I found myself clinging to his arm and out of breath. We seated ourselves in a couple of willow chairs beside the remains of a rustic table, whereon I suppose the philosophic Alcott in summers gone by regaled his reverent disciples with esthetic tales and orphic sayings, and baring our brows to the grateful caresses of the light, cool breeze we fell to talking.

Not hesitatingly and tentatively, like two new-made acquaintances, but naturally and easily, frankly and freely, with a sense of personal understanding on the part of each as if we had been comrades for years. In the course of our talk Hawthorne spoke of an early poem of mine, and with a circumstantiality of remembrance which showed a careful reading, and which in itself was, I felt, a distinction from Hawthorne. "How did you come to write The Castle in the Air?" he asked. Whereupon I proceeded to divulge the germ, the conception and the metrical embodiment of my airy architectural diversion.

"In the fall of 1848" (I said in substance), "Mr. Richard Monckton Milnes published the Life and Literary Remains of Keats, a poet with whom I felt more intellectual sympathy than with any modern English poet with the exception, perhaps, of Byron, and I was greatly impressed with a fragment among his posthumous poems which somebody, probably Mr. Milnes, had christened The Castle-Builder. It consists of forty or fifty lines and was written, I judged, from its versification, in careless, slovenly couplets, after he had finished Endymion, and before he began Hyperion, and was rather the suggestion of a poem that he meant to write at a later day than the actual commencement of a poem that he seriously contemplated writing then—a hasty outline of picturesque effects in a chamber at night, let us say a lady's chamber in a romantic, medieval period; a secret alcove, where all manner of costly and splendid things were heaped and scattered in profusion, where the summer moonlight struggling through the embowered casement discovered the personality of its occupant in a tambour-frame, a guitar-ribbon and a glove, and where her lately vanished presence still seemed to linger, adding its sweetness to the fragrance of the flowers without, which the enamored air was perpetually smuggling into this enchanted chamber.

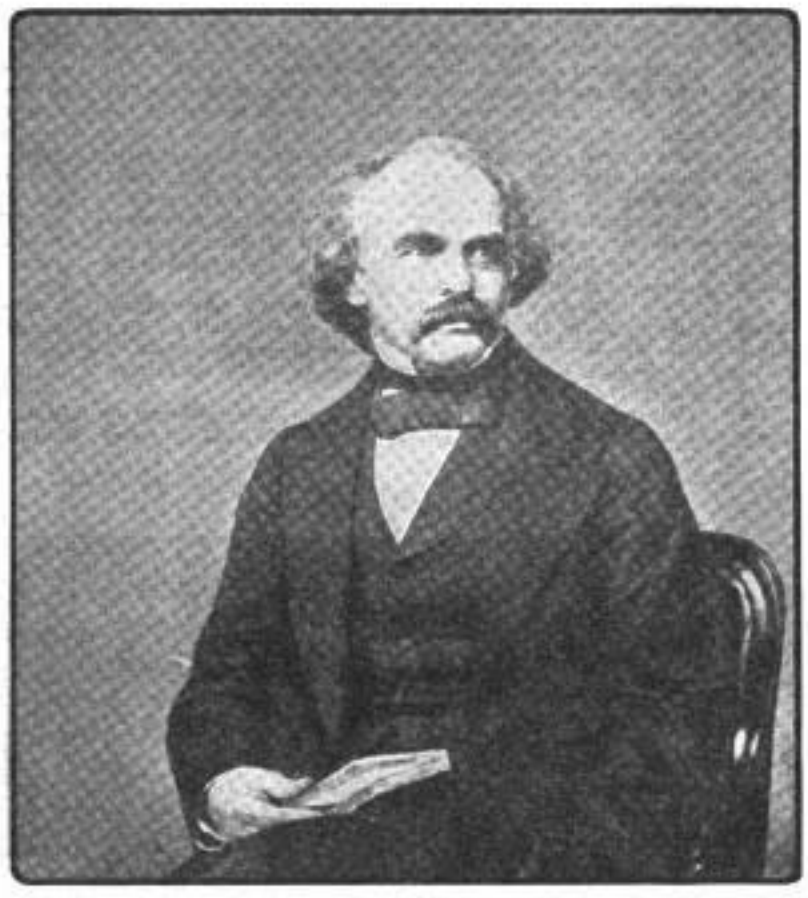
"Admiring the prodigality of color which Keats had lavished on this fragment of castle building, and deploring the unlucky chance which arrested his hand before he could finish it, I determined some day to build a castle of my own on the same scale of magnificence. Some day! Days passed, months passed, I watched, I waited, and the happy day did not come until a little more than three years ago, and it was a May day. What May days were in the old Puritan time you have told us in The May Pole at Merry Mound. What they have dwindled to in our time I once had a transient glimpse of in a little basket of flowers hung stealthily over night on the knocker of an old house at Hingham where I lived when a boy. We still observe May day, however, in New York. Indeed, we have to, we poor people, for we lease our houses, our tenements, our apartments only for the twelve months between one May and another, and when the second comes, willy-nilly, we have to move. You should see us then, the streets thronged with trucks, carts, wagons, vehicles of all sorts loaded with our household stuff, chairs and tables, bedsteads and bureaus, pots, kettles, pans landed together anyhow, some of us mounted on top of the furniture to keep it in place, others with fragile, breakable things in baskets and boxes straggling along behind the mourners at a funeral. Outcoming and ingoing tenants jostled in the dingy hallways and mingled with one another in the disordered room beyond.

"Escaping from such a hurly-burly, my people were beginning to settle for the twelvemonth in an old house into which we had managed to gain admittance a day or two before. It was the first of May and a Sunday, dismal outdoor and uncomfortable within. The sky was dark with clouds, and rain now began to splash against the dusty panes; gusts of wind shook the rattling casements and banged and battered the dilapidated shutters. Either because we had forgotten it, or perhaps from a shortage in the finances, there was a scarcity of fuel in this wintry house. Wrapping a blanket around my shoulders, I retreated to the room where my few books were, and a table with pens, ink and paper, and seating myself sullenly, shivering with cold, I determined to divert or benumb my mind by reading or writing. I picked up the volume of Keats' Remains, which happened to be on the table, and turning once more to the fragment of The Castle-Builder I looked over it until I saw a way of completing it with a castle of my own. I would not begin with its interior, as Keats had done in his brilliant picture of the sumptuous moon-lighted chamber, but reversing his impression method with its exterior, its architectural appearance and natural surroundings, and so work my way within doors, a process of gradual description which afforded an opportunity for the exhibition of my uninjured architectural taste and my confessed ignorance of the fine art of landscape gardening and other and ampler opportunities in other misadventurous directions, which I embraced and abused. I wrote and wrote until the pen dropped from my tired fingers, and not altogether in vain, for whatever might be the result, this mutual exercise of mind and body had quickened my languid circulation and imparted something like warmth to my fireless room.

"What did I think of it when it was finished? Certainly not so well as I would have some two or three years earlier, and not so well as I might have done now if I had possessed a sanguine temperament and more confidence in myself. I saw its faults when I saw it in print, one of the worst of them, I hope, its too great length, to begin with, its superabundance of description, its unceasing fluency, its long, billowy succession of words, words, words, words, its excess of pictorial effects, the sense of over-muchness everywhere, the extravagance, the immaturity! No. The Castle in the Air and its builder were shadows, fleeting shadows. The Wayside and its Master are solid realities this happy summer afternoon!" Here I heard the word, "Stoddard!" shouted without and from somewhere below, "Stoddard! Stoddard!" It was not one of those airy sounds that syllable men's names, of which Milton sung, but the insistent voice of Mr. Fields, who, model of punctuality that he was, had come to tell me it was time for us to take the train back to Boston. I started up hastily, Hawthorne helping me down as he had helped me up, and I was soon at the porch of the house, where the rest of our party were waiting. Paying our parting respects to Mrs. Hawthorne, we took our way to the station, reached it with time to spare, seated ourselves on the shady side of the train and, chatting as we rode, returned to Boston, where we parted company, my new-made military friend to return to his Presidential principal in New Hampshire, my older literary friends to return to their respective Lares and Penates, and myself to the humble lodgings of a boyish acquaintance who was hospitable enough to house me occasionally, during my very short pilgrimages to the old corner book store.

A month or so after my return to New York I had occasion to write to Hawthorne on a matter of literary business, in which I hoped he might be somewhat interested, since it concerned him as well as myself. It was to write about him in a new periodical, The National Magazine, which, following the demise of The International Magazine, of which Doctor Griswold had been the unsuccessful editor, had possessed itself of some of its assets, the most important of which consisted of several portraits of popular writers drawn on the block, big burly John G. Saxe being one, little insignificant Buchanan Read another, and Hawthorne a third. Would I care to write anything for our pages relating to these blockheads? inquired the gravely clerical editor of this national-international projection of fertility into our sterile literature.

Digitized by Google



I said I would, and out of the number which he showed me I selected the three I have mentioned, and wrote to Hawthorne asking him, if he were not averse to coming into my unskillful hands, whether he would not kindly write something about himself which, or the semblance of which, I might incorporate in my proposed sketch of his life and writings. In a few days I received a long letter in reply, containing more than I had a right to expect, an unhesitating, frankly communicative piece of personal biography, written in his own simple, matchless, perfect style.

An extract from this letter, which appeared in due time in The National Magazine, must, I think, have interested its literary readers, as showing a more intimate knowledge of the ancestry, early years and personality of Hawthorne than anything that had yet found its way into print.

> "I was born in the town of Salem, Massachusetts," he writes, "in a house built by my grandfather, who was a maritime personage. The old homestead estate was in another part of the town, and had descended in the family ever since the settlement of the country; but this old man of the sea exchanged it for a lot of land situated near the wharves and convenient to his business, where he built a house (which is still standing) and laid out a garden, where I idled on a grass plot under an apple tree, and picked abundant currants. This grandfather (about whom there is a ballad in Griswold's Curiosities of American Literature) died long before I was born. One of the peculiarities of my boyhood was a grievous disinclination to go to school, and (Providence favoring me in this natural repugnance) I never did go half as much as other boys, partly owing to delicate health (which I made the most of, for this purpose), and partly because much of the time there were no schools within reach. When I was eight or nine years old, my mother with her three children took up her residence on the banks of the Sebago Lake, in Maine, where the family owned a large tract of land; and here I ran quite wild, and would, I doubt not, have willingly run wild till this time, fishing all day long, or shooting with an old fowling-piece; but reading a good deal, too, on the rainy days, especially in Shakespeare and the Pilgrim's Progress, and any poetry or light books within my reach. Those were delightful days: for that part of the country was wild then, with only scattered clearings and nine-tenths of it primeval woods. But by and by my good mother began to think it was necessary for her boy to do something else, so I was sent back to Salem, where a private instructor fitted me for college. I was educated (as the phrase is) at Bowdoin College. I was an idle student, negligent of college rules and the Procrustean details of academic life, rather choosing to nurse my own fancies than to dig into Greek roots and be numbered among the learned Thebans. It was my fortune, or misfortune, just as you please, to have some slender means of supporting myself; and on leaving college in 1825, instead of immediately studying a profession, I sat down to consider what pursuit in life I was best fit for. My mother had now returned and taken up her abode in her deceased father's house, a tall, ugly, old, grayish building (it is now the residence of half a dozen Irish families), in which I had a room. And year after year I kept on considering what I was fit for, and time and my destiny decided that I was to be the writer that I am. I had always a natural tendency (it appears to have been on the paternal side) toward seclusion; and this I now indulged to the utmost, so that for months together I scarcely had human intercourse outside of my own family; never going out except at twilight, or only to take the nearest way to the most convenient solitude, which was oftenest the seashore — the rocks and beaches in the vicinity being as fine as any in New England. Once a year, or thereabouts, I used to make an excursion of a few weeks, in which I enjoyed as much of life as other people do in the whole year round. Having spent so much of my boyhood and youth away from my native place, I had very few acquaintances in Salem, and during the nine or ten years that I spent there in this solitary way, I doubt whether so much as twenty people in the town were conscious of my existence. Meanwhile, strange as it may seem, I had lived a very tolerable life, always seemed cheerful and enjoyed the very best bodily health. I had read endlessly all sorts of good and good-for-nothing books, and in the dearth of other employment had early begun to scribble sketches and stories, most of which I burned. Some, however, got into the magazines and annuals, but being anonymous or under different signatures, they did not soon have the effect of concentrating any attention upon the author. Still, they did bring me into contact with certain individuals. Mr. S. G. Goodrich (a gentleman of many excellent qualities, although a publisher), took a very kindly interest in me and employed my pen for The Token, an annual. Old copies of The Token may still be found in antique boudoirs and on the dusty shelves of street book-stalls. It was the first and probably the best — it could not possibly be the worst — annual ever issued in this country. It was a sort of hothouse, where native flowers were made to bloom like exotics. From the press of Munroe & Company, Boston, in the year 1837, appeared Twice-Told Tales. Though not widely successful in their day and generation, they had the effect of making me known in my own immediate vicinity, insomuch that, however reluctant, I was compelled to come out of my owl's nest and hoot in a small way. Then I was gradually drawn somewhat into the world and became pretty much like other people. My long seclusion had not made me melancholy or misanthropic, nor wholly unfitted for the bustle of life! and perhaps it was the kind of discipline which my idiosyncrasy demanded, and chance and my own instincts, operating together, had caused me to do what was fittest."

I visited Hawthorne a second time, probably after the appearance of my paper about him in The National Magazine, and upon a personal matter which proved of considerable importance to me then and for several years to come. It was the getting of a position under the Government which had passed into the hands of his friend, General Pierce. Who first suggested the bettering of my private circumstances by public employment I have forgotten; the idea was too brilliant, I think, to have originated with myself, for never exacting in my demands, nor sanguine in my expectations, but on the contrary, inclined to accept whatever came in my way, I was content to cultivate literature on a little oatmeal. "Contented wi' little," like poor dear Bobbie Burns, I never hoped to be "cantie wi' mair." Some common friend, possibly Mr. Fields, must have intimated to Hawthorne the desirability of my procuring an office and the certainty of my securing it with his help, for I never would have ventured to ask such a favor. I would not have ventured to make another visit unless I had known beforehand that I would be welcomed, nor then, except on the day and hour that he might appoint.

I made this second visit to Hawthorne in the late winter or early spring of 1853. It was a dull and dreary afternoon; the sky, which had been overcast since morning, threatened snow, and the wind, what there was of it, a stealthy consciousness of cold, penetrated to the marrow of one's bones. That I was expected was evident from Hawthorne's meeting me at the door and taking me at once into his writing-room, which was on the right side of the hallway, directly opposite the dining-room, with windows facing leafless shrubbery and the frozen wagon ruts of the yellow road. We seated ourselves in two old easy chairs, in front of a bright, warm wood-fire, and talked and talked and talked. Not about the personal business which had brought me there, which was so well understood by both that reference to it in words seemed unnecessary, but chiefly about three men of letters in New York whom I knew, and concerning whom he manifested considerable curiosity. They were early friends of his, his comrades and brothers in exile at Brook Farm — Mr. George Ripley, Mr. Charles Anderson Dana and Mr. George William Curtis.

FROM A PHOTOGRAPH GIVEN BY HAWTHORNE TO THE AUTHOR

"What are they doing now?" he asked me. "They are working on the Tribune," I answered, "in different capacities. Dana, I believe, conceives and controls the conduct of the paper, directs its policy from day to day, its minor politics, local party issues; Ripley, I know, is its literary editor, author of its heavy reviews, writer of its light book notices — Jeffrey of the hour; and Curtis is its music and art critic in one — Orpheus at the Opera House and Ruskin at the National Academy of Design."

"But what do you think of them," he continued, "personally and intellectually? Do you like them?"

"You have given me a very hard question," I said, "three very hard questions. Can't you give me something easier? Personally I think I like them; I ought to, for they always seem to like me. Intellectually, I am less certain what I think of them, they possess so many advantages which have been denied me, the incalculable advantages of education, to begin with. They are college bred, I take it, conversant with the Greek and Latin classics and able to read French, German and other modern European languages. They know so many things of which I know nothing, I feel abashed in their company, humiliated with a consciousness of my ignorance. Ripley is, I imagine, the most learned — learned, that is, in more directions than Dana and Curtis are — in divinity and philosophy, metaphysics and physics, philology and psychology and all the other ologies that constitute and consummate bookish wisdom. Smiling and suave, polished and agreeable, Ripley charms me with his double personality — now as the round, oily man of God and now as the perfect man of the world. Dana looks the man of business that he is, pleasantly intelligent, prompt and clear in speech, with a frankness that borders on the brusque. His mind being already made up, he spares others the labor of convincing him. He does what he can, well or ill, as well at one time as another, and always ready, never hesitates. Woman may be lost through deliberation, he never will. Curtis is a more complex character. More elegant of person and more formal appearing, there is that in him — a cultured courtesy, a considerate graciousness — which embarrasses me. They tell me it is only his manner; he was born with it, it is his birth-mark, his hall-mark, and it may be so. But, all the same, I do not like it, I cannot accustom myself to it, it is so like patronage. He has much talent as a writer, but so far, it appears to me, ill-directed. His Howadji books may be good of their kind, but I cannot think the kind a good one for prose. They are too mellifluent, too over-languaged, too purposely pictorial, and altogether too riotously sensuous. They are written, I opine, as the early verse of Keats was written — from their enamourment of words — rich, rare, ripe words which the young poet rolled like sweet morsels under his tongue. I knew of Curtis before I met him from Dana, who, when he was abroad, showed me a little manuscript volume of his verse. It was like his prose, only more so, flushed with fancied feeling, uncertain and inept of technique, and as crabbed and unmusical as some of the clumsy lyrics in Browning's Bells and Pomegranates. This much for my elders and betters. For myself, sir, you are quite right in not liking my book of childish stories and I thank you for telling me so plainly. The title, as you say, is a pretty one, Adventures in Fairyland; but it was not mine, it was suggested by Mr. Fields, and it is certainly not an appropriate one, since there are no fairies in the book, and consequently no adventures. I don't know how to write prose. It is a jargon, a dialect which I have not learned; my native speech is poetry. But poetry generally spells poverty, and, in my case, if I should persist in it, it would spell positive privation. I must live, however, though you may not see the necessity for it, so in order to live I tried to write prose and failed as I feared I might — how badly I am beginning to know."

Here, conscious of the personal egotism of my talk, and noting by the flickering light of the fire that it was growing dark without, I arose, and refusing Hawthorne's hospitable offer to house me till morning, said I must go, bade him good-night and departed, plunging down the dark road against the sharp east wind that whirled the snow in my face, threatening to blind me and throw me down before I could reach the station. I returned to New York, where, after an interval of eight or ten days, I received a delightful letter from Hawthorne, who — begging my pardon for not writing before, having been very busy and not particularly well — proceeded to enlarge on the object I had in mind during my late visit and to advise me as to the best means of obtaining it. I was to roll up and pile up as much of a snowball as I could in the way of political interest, for there never was a fiercer time among office-seekers, and I had better make my point in the custom house at New York, for, from what he could learn, there would be poor chance of clerkships in Washington. He inclosed a letter to me to the Honorable Charles G. Atherton, Senator from New Hampshire, who had a good heart, at least for a politician of a quarter of a century's standing, and if he were certain that he could not help me he would probably tell me so. Perhaps it would be as well for me to apply for some particular place that had a literary fragrance about it — librarian to some department, the office which Lanman held. Then, diverging from generalities to specialties, like a wise and friendly physician who questions an intruding patient with careful carelessness before he prescribes for him, he asked me:

> "Are you fond of brandy? Your strength of head (which you tell me you possess) may stand you in good stead at Washington; for most of these public men are inveterate guzzlers and love a man that can stand up to them in that respect. It would never do to let them see that you could, however. But I must leave you to find your own way among them. If you have never associated with them heretofore you will find them a new class and very unlike poets."

I pondered this light paragraph seriously, wondering whether it was not meant as a caution to me, and wondering also if I stood in need of it. I thought not, though I might be mistaken. The next paragraph brightened me up with a glimpse it gave me of Hawthorne personally:

> "I have finished The Tanglewood Tales and they will make a volume about the size of the Wonder Book, consisting of six old myths — the Minotaur, the Golden Fleece, the story of Proserpine, etc., etc., etc., done up in excellent style, purified from all moral stains, re-created as good as new, or better, and fully equal in their own way to Mother Goose. I never did anything so well as those old baby stories."

Armed with Hawthorne's letter to Senator Atherton, I did not delay to roll up and pile up preliminary political snowballs in New York, but hastened to Washington. I was favored, however, while on the train by an unexpected

(Concluded on Page 1016 of this Number)

Digitized by Google

The Love Chase

By Van Tassel Sutphen

FOR twelve years Blondel Hardinge had served as Honorary Secretary of the Marion County Golf Club, and for thrice that period of time he had been the particular pet and pride of his two maiden aunts, the Misses St. John. Add that he was a bachelor and the pen portrait is complete. Up to the psychological moment at which this story begins, there was absolutely nothing more to be said about Mr. Blondel Hardinge.

When a man has reached the age of thirty-six years without complicating his existence with matrimony, he may with some justice consider himself immune. But that very sense of security may be in itself a source of danger, and the Misses St. John had never been able to feel quite easy in mind about their favorite nephew. From their simple standpoint, to know him was to love him, and the dear boy seemed so pathetically unconscious of the daily peril in which he stood. At any cost he must be guarded against a mistake which might have serious consequences upon the whole of his future. When the woman came along who might be trusted to make Blondel happy, why, then it would be time enough to make other arrangements.

"You understand, Joanna, that there cannot be two opinions upon a matter of such importance. Blondel must be protected, and, if necessary, even from himself." Miss Honor St. John spoke as one having authority and Miss Joanna hastened to acquiesce.

This was the theory promulgated upon the occasion of Blondel's first tail-coat, and it had never been discarded; these excellent women had never for an instant lost sight of their self-imposed trust.

They had their reward, for their guardianship had been wonderfully efficacious. Here was Blondel Hardinge at the age of thirty-six absolutely heart-whole. There was no smell of fire upon his garments; his lips had never even approached the magic cup of Love's elixir. It is true that the draught had often been described to him as exceedingly pleasant, and perhaps he might have been tempted into taking a sip had it not been for the elder Miss St. John's terrifying description of the serpent lurking at the bottom of the vessel. She had looked over the edge more than once and had seen the monster distinctly.

Blondel was conscious of being short-sighted and he knew that his Aunt Honor possessed excellent eyes. So, being a proper youth, he would not allow himself to be dazzled by the seductive sparkle of the love philter. The homely draught of the soda-water fountain was quite enough in the way of effervescence, and, if he really felt thirsty, he had only to wend his way to the Dovecote, where a brew of Soochong "golden tips" was always at his service, fragrant, non-inebriating, and prepared by the hands of Aunt Honor in person.

Yet once or twice during the critical decade of the twenties the guileless Blondel had strayed uncomfortably close to the danger line. There had been moments in his quiet youth when he had been strangely stirred by the flash of a dark eye, the cadence of a silvery laugh. Several times he had happened in the company of young ladies who had seemed to him to converse remarkably well and whose artless natures were unspeakably attractive to contemplate. But Blondel's Aunt Honor always succeeded in dispelling these illusions before they had time in which to cloud, permanently, his sensitive mind. He learned that soulfulness, as well as beauty, may be only skin deep, and he was soon able to distinguish infallibly between angel plumage and ordinary goose feathers. With Aunt Honor at his elbow, Blondel Hardinge was not likely to make any mistake in his bargaining at the matrimonial counter, but the years had rolled on without even a purchase on approval. It is possible, of course, to be too particular and so to end where one began—with nothing.

Being wise in their (past) generation, Blondel's aunts had realized that something must be found for idle hands to do. It was not necessary that he should actually work for a living, since he possessed a comfortable income in his own right and was heir to the St. John estate, but clearly Blondel ought to have some vocation in life. The Army and Navy were manifestly out of the question, and in the Church there were pitfalls innumerable of the sentimental variety. The confinement of ordinary business would certainly injure his health, and he had no inclination for a professional career. What was to be done?

It was at this critical moment that golf suddenly became a fixture on the national calendar of sports and the question was answered. Blondel Hardinge went in for golf, and for twelve years had filled the honorable post of club secretary.

But Blondel Hardinge was something more than a golfer—he was a sportsman as well. And as a sportsman he had no use for the "ulterior motive," whether it concerned the future welfare of his liver or the present disposition of a fifty-cent piece. To him the game was the thing; and the sentiment was all the more creditable, considering the fact that Blondel Hardinge had no game worthy of the name.

Having taken up the sport after the impressionable days of childhood had gone by, he was emphatically a self-made golfer, and a poor job at that. But he looked at life bravely from the platform of forty in the club handicap list, he had no illusions about the length of his drive (even the clean hits), and he never allowed himself to disparage another man's game. As a consequence, Blondel Hardinge was popular with his brother golfers, and no picked-up foursome was complete without his cheerful presence and inimitable foozling. To paraphrase one of the late Mr. Ruskin's genial characterizations, Blondel Hardinge by his golfing life and actions had earned the respect always accorded to honest, helpless, hopeless imbecility.

As a bachelor and golfer he had lived for thirty-six years a pure and blameless life; so far as human foresight could determine, he would probably round out his threescore and ten under the same equable conditions. He played his daily match at golf without even a glance in the direction of that unattainable prize list, and the Misses St. John kept his linen and his affections in unimpeachable repair. A simple, wholesome, normal existence, but already Destiny was knocking at the gate.

The automobile, that very latest toy of Fashion's jaded fancy, had made its appearance in Lauriston. Challis and Alderson and Robinson Brown and Rivers and all the rest of them had, one by one, been drawn away to worship at this new shrine, and in the erstwhile crowded temple of the goddess of golf the faithful might now be counted upon one's fingers. It was disgraceful!—this wholesale defection. Blondel Hardinge resented the schism with a feeling almost personal. Twice now he had been obliged to hold over the regular monthly handicap for want of a qualifying number of entries in the several classes; if this sort of thing went on, the course might as well be closed up and presented to the moles and rabbits in perpetual fee simple.

"To the deuce with the automobile, anyway! Granted that you can go to Hackensack at an expense of half a cent a mile, why the dickens should you want to go there at all?"

In Blondel Hardinge's opinion there could be no reasonable reply to this clincher.

But in spite of all opposition the automobile continued to multiply itself in Lauriston. Whereupon did Blondel Hardinge, heroic champion of a dying cause, inaugurate a campaign of extermination. Under the highway laws an automobile could not be excluded from the roads, but its owners could be held legally responsible for all the willful damage that it might cause. So Blondel borrowed of the Misses St. John a ramshackly "one-hoss shay," and hired a wall-eyed equine brute, familiarly known as "the Limb," from a local liveryman. Thus prepared he sallied forth on the Monkton road to meet the enemy.

Within a week he had taken part in eight different smash-ups, and in every case the courts had awarded him substantial damages as against the offending automobile. A remarkable record, and yet Mr. Hardinge's plan of operation was simplicity itself. He made no attempt, directly or otherwise, to bring on a collision; on the contrary, he did his utmost to avoid it. Whenever an automobile hove in sight Blondel immediately pulled "the Limb" into the gutter and waited patiently for the horseless carriage to go by. Strange to say, this apparently harmless procedure always aroused the suspicious temper of the automobile and caused it to wobble in its mind.

"What the deuce," it would say, "does this impertinent fellow insinuate? The road is wide enough for three vehicles to pass; does he doubt my ability to steer clear of his wretched vehicle? Why, dash it all!"——but at this point in the argument the automobile invariably ran plump into the "one-hoss shay," and it was in order for the chauffeur and Blondel to exchange cards.

As time went on, however, the amateur stokers began to fight shy of Blondel Hardinge and of his terrible "shay" that fell to pieces at a touch, and yet was always on hand for the next customer by four o'clock of the following afternoon. And so the automobilists got in the habit, whenever they saw Blondel in the distance, of turning down convenient side streets or of pulling into the gutter themselves until the "one-hoss shay" was safely past. The heart of Blondel Hardinge flamed with a vindictive satisfaction. "Now to carry the war into Africa," he said to himself.

The buckboard was constructed on ice-wagon lines, and in point of solidity it would have compared favorably with a South African armored train. It was guaranteed for heavy work, and after two or three trials Blondel was so well satisfied with its powers that he would not have hesitated to tackle a steam roller or road ditcher.

One after another the Lauriston automobiles had met and gone down under its terrible iron tires, the hunter had become the hunted, and in less than a week there was not a horseless carriage in commission throughout the whole of Marion County. The damage suits were now piling up on the other side, but Blondel did not care. He could stand a good deal of legal pounding, and Miss Joanna St. John had offered to back him up to the last penny of her fortune. To Aunt Joanna the automobile was an accursed thing. The steam carriages might be expected to blow up at any moment, the storage-battery affairs were always looking for a chance to run away, to say nothing of the ever-present danger of electrocution, the gasoline machines—well, nothing would ever convince Miss Joanna St. John that the odor of carburetted gasoline could be a healthy thing to breathe into your lungs, and dear Blondel had always had tendencies, etc., etc. And so the merry war went on, and it was Thursday, the fifteenth day of May.

Blondel Hardinge, lifting up his eyes, could not believe them for the moment. An automobile had turned in from the side road and was actually bearing down upon him. What impertinence! Blondel drew his whiplash smartly across "the Limb's" flanks and pulled into position for the encounter that was now inevitable.

"The near back wheel," muttered Blondel Hardinge, and so neatly had the calculation been made that he got it without even a turn of the wrist. There was a shrill cry from the driver of the automobile as the axle snapped. Then the motor car lurched heavily to one side, and the unfortunate chauffeur went flying, like a stone from a sling, clean over a hedgerow and into a field that lay beyond. Such accidents were bound to happen now and then, they were part of the fortunes of war, and Hardinge did not pretend to any hypocritical regrets for what he had done. Still he could do no less than proceed to the assistance of his vanquished foe; he must at least leave a card upon him.

The automobilist lay quite still where he had fallen and for a moment Blondel's heart beat tremulously. But a hasty

DRAWN BY E. MARTIN JUSTICE

—IMMEDIATELY PULLED "THE LIMB" INTO THE GUTTER AND WAITED PATIENTLY FOR THE HORSELESS CARRIAGE TO GO BY

Digitized by Google

examination showed that it was only a faint; the chauffeur's winter costume of heavy furs had saved him from broken bones or serious injury, and a cupful of water would soon bring him around. A little brook gurgled within a few paces. Blondel saturated a pocket handkerchief and clumsily belaved the pallid forehead. The teeth were clenched and he tried to force them open that he might get down a few drops of brandy. With an impatient hand he unfastened the clasp of the high sable collar and a tendril of golden hair twined itself about his finger. . . .

It was too late to think of flight, for the soft hazel eyes were looking straight at him.

"Where am I?"

"With friends," answered Blondel vaguely. He was conscious of a genuine desire to set himself right in this young person's esteem, and, after all, he did not know who owned the field in which they were.

Mademoiselle Incognita sat up very straight and contemplated Blondel with judicial eyes.

"I've seen you somewhere"—she spoke hesitatingly. And then with positive conviction. "You are the—the imbecile who ran into me just now. How could you have been so stupid?"

Blondel winced. She seemed willing to accord him the amnesty of contempt, but this he could not accept. Better the mark of Cain than the stigma of the incapable.

"Pardon me, but I did it on purpose, don't you know. If you'll let me explain——"

"Pray do."

He told her the story of this modern crusade, omitting nothing and varnishing nothing, and she listened with a flattering interest.

"A latter-day Don Quixote," she commented with cruel distinctness. "Really, Mr. Hardinge, egotism in you has reached its perfect and consummate flower; thank you so much for permitting me to inhale its exquisite perfume. And now, if you please, we will discuss the question of reparation. What do you propose?"

Hardinge reddened. "Of course I will have the material damages made good, and you must know that every apology that language can convey——"

"To me personally, yes; but how about the great and glorious cause that you have so persistently vilified and attacked?"

Blondel Hardinge mumbled some unintelligible words.

"I thought so," she continued pitilessly, "and I shall therefore reserve the forgiveness for which you plead. It shall be yours only on the day that you bring me the Monkton Cup."

The Monkton Cup! It was nothing less than the open road-race trophy of the Marion County Automobile Club, and it had just been put up as an annual fixture by the genial president of the organization, Mr. J. Robinson Brown. The first contest was to be held on Saturday, July 3, and chauffeurs from all over the country would be present to compete for what was already regarded as the blue ribbon of automotor achievement. This, then, was the price that my Lady Disdain set upon the forgiveness to be accorded Blondel Hardinge. His face paled as he listened, but he did not attempt to protest. In silence they passed through a convenient stile and proceeded to the scene of the wreck.

"If you will accept a seat in my buckboard," said Hardinge stiffly, "I can have the automobile sent for later and taken to the machine shop."

"Not on any account," returned his implacable antagonist. "Our house is only five minutes' walk, and nothing would induce me to ride behind such a dangerous animal as a horse. Good-day, Mr. Blondel Hardinge, and Heaven send you the understanding with which to interpret the handwriting upon the wall of progress. Perhaps a term at night-school—but take your own way about it. And so again, good-by."

Blondel Hardinge watched the lissom figure out of sight, and then drove homeward in a mood so abstracted that he never noticed a gas-motor tricycle that was performing its impertinent evolutions under his very nose. And yet the olfactory organ is generally sensitive to the odors arising from the imperfect combustion of gasoline vapor.

"I don't believe that Blondel has been near the golf club this week," said Miss Honor St. John to Miss Joanna a few evenings later as they were about to sit down to their solitary tea. Blondel, as usual now, was dining out.

Miss Joanna started guiltily. She was thinking of a discovery that she had made that afternoon while engaged in putting away Blondel's shirts. In the upper bureau drawer lay a newly purchased scarf, its color—an automobile red.

"Honor must never even suspect it," thought Aunt Joanna miserably.

"Those new people, the Edmunds," said Aunt Honor to herself. "There's a girl in the family, a minx named Clarice—Blondel took her out to dinner at the Alderson's. Joanna must not know; it would break her heart."

The two old ladies looked at each other stealthily. "It's golf elbow, dear," said Aunt Honor with a little gulp. The Recording Angel wiped away a tear.

Blondel Hardinge and Clarice Edmunds had met not once but several times since that fatal Thursday, but their relations continued to be coldly formal. Miss Edmunds was a young woman of character, and she quickly gave Hardinge to understand that she had meant every word she said. He tried to persuade himself that he did not care, but failed miserably, and the revelation of his weakness was as though the solid ground had been cut away from beneath his feet.

At the end of the fortnight he informed the Misses St. John that he should stay in town for the month of June. Business was the specious plea, and, though the excuse deceived no one, it answered its purpose in staving off discussion.

"Anything to keep him out of Lauriston while this ridiculous automobile fever is raging," said Aunt Joanna to herself. "I am confident of the strength of dear Blondel's principles, but it is better to avoid temptation altogether."

"He won't see that minx for a month," was Aunt Honor's mental comment, "and time is everything just now."

So, receiving their blessing and a six months' supply of shirts, Blondel kissed his aunts good-by and took the train for town.

Arrived at the metropolis he registered at an obscure hotel under an assumed name, and forthwith avoided sedulously the principal thoroughfares and the club and theatre centres. Blondel Hardinge had come to the city for a purpose, and the very next day he arranged with a celebrated French professional for a course of private lessons in the noble art of stoking a gas engine. At the end of the first lesson he was constrained to admit that there was something more in this

DRAWN BY S. MARTIN JUSTICE

"OH, A LOVING CUP!" HE SAID EAGERLY

"feuf-feuf" business than he had supposed; he even found himself comparing it with golf, and to the latter's disadvantage. There is a problem here, but its solution is not a difficult task for even the amateur in psychologic research. For example:

It had been the artless and yet baffling simplicity of the game of golf that had originally fascinated Blondel Hardinge and had kept him enthralled through so many years. There must be a secret somewhere; he would find it. And so he might have worked on to the very end of the chapter, for, as all the scratch players know, there isn't any secret in golf except just to hit the ball clean and hard. But it seemed mysterious to Blondel Hardinge and it gave him an aim in life, something to work at, a riddle to solve, a secret to discover.

And yet what child's play it had been! all this inutile wrangling about stance and grip and follow-on, when compared to the ordinary, every-day exigencies of running a petroleum motor-carriage. A golf ball might have moods and tenses, the gas engine had its "accidents" as well, and sometimes the chauffeur got mixed up with the latter and an ambulance call would be found necessary. It was the element of personal risk that made the pursuit of knowledge in the automobile field so fascinating, and Blondel Hardinge was quick to feel the insidious seduction. At the end of the week he would not have stepped down from the box-seat of his newly purchased gasoline mail-cart to fill the shoes of any golf champion on earth. Reduced to philosophic terms, Blondel Hardinge's mental attitude was a remarkable illustration of the expulsive power of a new affection. Le roi est mort; vive le roi!

It was the third of July and the appointed day for the first annual road race in competition for the Monkton Cup. Public interest in the event had been growing steadily, and the race had already been acclaimed as the great sporting fixture of the year. At all events, it was indisputably a novelty, and as such it commanded universal attention. Over one hundred entries had been received; all the important newspapers were represented by their ablest space writers; enormous crowds blocked the starting and terminal points and stood three deep along the entire line of the course; all was color, noise and animation, a gala day indeed!

The course, as laid out by the committee of the Automobile Club, ran from Addison, in a neighboring State, to a point directly opposite the entrance gate of the Marion County Golf Club, in Lauriston, and was exactly one hundred miles in length. The road was macadamized for the most part, but there were several stretches of unimproved highway and some rough hill work. It should be an admirable test of all-round endurance and some of the contestants considered it too severe; but any excuse will serve a competitor who realizes that his chances are small, and the malcontents would probably have scratched in any event. Still the percentage of withdrawals was unusually large, for out of the hundred entries only twenty-two vehicles put in an appearance at the starting post in Addison. Among them was the Butterfly, a charming white and gold gas-phaeton, driven by Miss Clarice Edmunds, and the Avalanche, a business-looking petroleum nondescript with Mr. Blondel Hardinge at the levers.

It had been a keen shock to Blondel when he realized that Clarice herself was among the competitors. According to the conditions of the contest each vehicle must carry one passenger and he had cherished the insane hope that Miss Edmunds might occupy the right-hand box-seat of the Avalanche. But here she was driving her own trap and her companion was that odious Major Topham, a beast who sported impossibly luxuriant Dundreary whiskers and who was suspected of corsets. Blondel's heart was heavy and sore. Surely the chances of his success had been small enough without her taking a hand against him.

"But anything, I suppose, to keep me from a win," thought Blondel Hardinge. "How she must loathe me, and I—I who was fool enough to think——"

Bang! went the gong and the contestants prepared to get into position. The conditions governing the race were few and simple. The carriages would be started separately at two-minute intervals, which should permit them to get well away. Each contestant was provided with an ordinary coach whip, and if he could get near enough to touch with this whip any part of the vehicle ahead, that touch was to be considered equivalent to the "bump" of an English rowing race. The "touched" vehicle was thereupon to give way instantly and allow a free passage to its conqueror. The first carriage to arrive at the golf club in Lauriston would win the cup, proper allowances being made, of course, for the handicaps in the starting time.

The first carriage was sent away at exactly ten o'clock, and with any kind of luck the contestants should all be on hand at Lauriston for tea at five o'clock.

Morgan Gordon had hoped for great things from his new electric seven tonner. But his tires went flat at the last moment and he was glad to accept Hardinge's invitation to the box-seat of the Avalanche. By this time half a dozen of the contestants had been sent away, and Miss Edmunds was No. 8, Hardinge being almost at the tail end with No. 19.

As the Butterfly puffed up to the starting line she glanced over at him. It was six weeks since they had met and she seemed surprised to see him here. It was only then that Blondel realized that he might have been a trifle hasty in his previous judgment. Now that he thought of it, he had left Lauriston without giving her any hint of his intentions. No wonder that his appearance as an actual competitor for the Monkton Cup was somewhat disconcerting even to so well-poised a young woman as Miss Clarice Edmunds. She blushed unmistakably as she bowed to him, and the heart of Blondel Hardinge bounded in his breast with the exuberant elasticity of a toy balloon.

"No. 8!" bawled the starter and the Butterfly dashed over the line, with Major Topham in the act of kissing his hand to the admiring multitude. "Beast!" muttered Blondel Hardinge, his fingers closing involuntarily about the grip-stock of his coach whip.

Twenty minutes later the Avalanche was started, and for the first few miles Blondel kept a restraining hand on the speed lever. One hundred miles is a long course, and machinery, like a horse, should be warmed up gradually to its best work. He even permitted the Ghost, a vulgar steam runabout, to "touch" and pass him, but five miles farther on the Avalanche stopped for a moment to pick up the senseless form of Bob Challis, erstwhile stoker of the runabout. The Ghost itself had vanished into thin air; the disappearance, indeed, was so complete that the Society for Psychical Research heard of the case and sent up a commission to investigate it. (See the journal of the society for 1900, page 21 et seq.)

By noon the Avalanche had got into her stride and was fairly eating up the miles. Strange to say, Blondel had not been obliged to "touch" a single competitor although he had now gained eight or ten numbers upon his original position. Rivers, in his acetylene dog-cart, had been put out by the Addison fire department immediately after the start. Traphagen, using compressed air and unparliamentary language, had barely managed to cross the State line, and six electrics had perished in a bunch at the first piece of sandy going. By four o'clock in the afternoon the goal was but fourteen miles away, and, judging from the disjecta membra of valuable machinery that the Avalanche had been passing for the last two hours, it did not seem possible that even one practicable automobile besides their own could be still in the race.

Digitized by Google

"Go it, Avalanche!" shrieked J. Robinson Brown imprisoned under the wreck of his hopes, a beau chauffeur who was being slowly poisoned by his own carbureter.

"Anybody ahead?" asked Morgan Gordon as the Avalanche swept by.

"Only the Butterfly."

"And behind?" But already the Avalanche had gained the crest of the divide and they had only to look back for the question to answer itself. Hardly a mile away and coming strong was a long, low machine of the four-cylinder, balanced-motor type. An umbrella-like cloud of dust hovered above the monster and marked its progress.

"Talfourd Jones!"

"The Jolly Roger!"

The exclamations broke simultaneously from the lips of Morgan Gordon and of Blondel Hardinge. "Tchick!" and the speed lever of the Avalanche rattled into the last notch.

Twelve miles farther on and the Butterfly was not more than a hundred yards ahead. Evidently the continuous strain had been too much for Miss Edmunds, for she had changed places with Major Topham and the latter was in charge of the levers. Now the Avalanche was within striking distance and Blondel cracked his whiplash smartly against the tail-board of the Butterfly. According to the rules governing the contest, Major Topham should instantly have pulled over to the right and permitted Blondel to pass. But instead of doing that Topham actually drove the Butterfly diagonally to the left, thereby closing the road completely. Believing it to be a misunderstanding Blondel again gave the required signal and again he was coolly and unmistakably blocked off. For an instant Blondel felt a wild desire to wind his whiplash about the villain's shoulders, but soberer reflection prevailed and he slowed up to consider what he ought to do.

Could it be possible that Clarice—Miss Edmunds—did not desire a reconciliation, or, what was even more incredible, did she value a bauble like the Monkton Cup above his friendship? She had apparently made no effort to interfere with Topham's unwarrantable proceedings; her face, as he had seen it, had been like marble, the lips tightly pressed together. What ought he to do?

The Butterfly had been lost to sight around a curve, and as the Avalanche rounded it in turn Morgan Gordon raised an exultant whoop. The Butterfly, apparently disabled, stood motionless in the middle of the road.

It was the simplest and yet the most irremediable of disasters—the gasoline tank had been permitted to run dry and the parable of the Foolish Virgins had received its truly modern application.

Without a word Blondel caused the Avalanche to come into gentle contact with the rail-board of the Butterfly and the two automobiles moved forward again. Not the faintest suspicion of his surpassing magnanimity entered Blondel Hardinge's mind; it was enough that Miss Edmunds wanted the Monkton Cup—well, Major Topham had only to keep the Butterfly straight and she should have it. And the goal was now but a short mile away.

There was the rumble of flying wheels, the clank of machinery working at its highest speed. Blondel glanced over his shoulder. Talfourd Jones and the Jolly Roger were a scant two hundred yards in the rear and coming like the wind. The Avalanche was working at its utmost power, but it was carrying a double load and the struggle was a hopeless one. It would be Jones then—maddening thought!—who would carry off the coveted prize.

The mind of Blondel awoke to a supernatural alertness. The two leading vehicles were already on the crest of the gentle quarter of a mile slope leading down to the golf club. A vigorous parting shove and the Butterfly went spinning on alone. It, at least, was sure to arrive at the goal. Blondel turned to Morgan Gordon; an old principle of golf strategy had occurred to him.

"Did you ever play a match with Jones?"

"Why, yes; but——"

"Supposing that the game was all square at the eighteenth tee and you sliced your drive out of bounds, what then?"

Morgan Gordon grinned. "It would be a hundred to one that Jones' ball would be found within a foot of the first one."

"Exactly. Hold on tight!"

The Avalanche swerved with a sickening lurch into the ditch. Crash! and it brought up squarely against a telegraph pole and turned completely over, its wheels still feebly rotating. Smash! and the Jolly Roger had added itself to the scrap-pile.

Talfourd Jones crawled out of the wreckage. His face was white with passion and he drew his whiplash threateningly through his fingers.

"Imitation," remarked Blondel Hardinge coldly, "is the sincerest form of flattery."

The committee could do nothing less than award the cup to Miss Clarice Edmunds, driver of the gas-phaeton Butterfly. Talfourd Jones entered a protest of foul play, but what was there to be said? The committee would cheerfully disqualify Mr. Hardinge, but how would that help Mr. Jones, it being admitted that neither of the gentlemen had finished the prescribed course? The only one to arrive had been the Butterfly and the committee could not go behind the returns. And that was positively the last word—good-day, Mr. Jones.

Blondel Hardinge had witnessed the presentation of the trophy, but his spirit was ill-attuned to the gayety about him. Hardly knowing what he did, he went to his locker, took his favorite niblick and an old ball and made his way to that famous bunker, "Grimshaw's Grave." With furious, feverish strokes he began again upon the old, hopeless task; after all, this was his métier and he should never have left it.

A shadow fell athwart the yellow sand and Clarice Edmunds stood before him. In her hand was the Monkton Cup; she held it out to him.

"No, no!" and Blondel hastily backed away.

"As you will, but"—pleadingly—"don't you see that it has double handles."

Blondel Hardinge had a brilliant inspiration. "Oh, a loving cup!" he said eagerly. Miss Edmunds blushed rosily.

The crunching of wheels on the gravel drive of the "Dovecote" aroused the Misses St. John from their blameless post-prandial somnolence. "Blondel!" exclaimed Aunt Joanna looking out of the window, and then in a still, small voice: "A white and gold gas-phaeton! Oh, Honor!"

"That minx!" ejaculated Miss Honor, drawing herself up stiffly.

And yet time works wonders. To-day the Butterfly and niece Clarice stand second only to Blondel himself in the affections of these estimable women. Miss Joanna has several times been induced to take a little spin in the Butterfly and she has privately decided that the sensation is delightful. As for Miss Honor, has she not formally bequeathed to Clarice her hitherto unpublished collection of household receipts, including the priceless formula of the celebrated St. John blackberry jam? Indeed but she has, and she knows that her treasures are in the right hands.

"Golf, the automobile and now me," said young Mrs. Hardinge one day. "How can I be sure, Blondel dear, that your wandering fancy is fixed at last?"

Blondel colored. "But there never was any real secret about golf, you know, and as for a gas engine, why once you have taken it apart——"

"I see," said his wife decisively. "As with all other men, it is only the pursuit of the apparently unknowable that attracts you. I shall have to protect myself by always keeping just around the corner."

That was five years ago and Blondel Hardinge is still running—breathlessly. But everybody says that he is the most devoted husband in all Lauriston, and the Blondel Hardinges are certainly a happy couple.

DRAWN BY CARL HUBSCHMANN

At the life-saving station

The Humorous Side of Politics

By Ex-Senator John J. Ingalls

CHARLES SUMNER had no more sense of humor than a hippopotamus, but there was something excessively humorous about his colossal self-consciousness, of which it is no paradox to say he was apparently unconscious.

His egotism was inordinately vast, though innocent in its simplicity. It was far from conceit and led to no disparagement of his associates. Indeed, I doubt if he ever instituted comparisons.

Probably Grant, whom he hated and abused, came the nearest to sizing him up when he said: "The reason Sumner doesn't believe in the Bible is because he didn't write it himself!"

He had large intellectual powers, but not so large as he imagined. He had no influence on legislation. He was unable to endure opposition. If he could not have his own will he would do nothing. But this is not intended as an analysis of his work or his character. I started out to say that soon after I entered the Senate we were riding up the Avenue in a street car, and by way of conversation he asked me about my predecessor, Senator Pomeroy, who had met with an accident politically. He spoke of his early fidelity to the cause of freedom and the unusual degree to which he held the confidence of his associates till the impeachment of Andrew Johnson.

"Indeed," he continued with great gravity, "had he died before that time Kansas would have owed him a monument, and I should myself have pronounced his eulogy!"

Roscoe Conkling in the Meridian of His Power

The self-consciousness of Roscoe Conkling was quite as egregious as that of Mr. Sumner, but his egotism was tinged with vanity and compounded with scorn, contempt and disdain. He was a past-master in the gentle art of making enemies and well versed in the vocabulary of derision and hatred. Hamlet might have had him in mind when, in his soliloquy, he mentioned, among other things that make life not worth living, "the proud man's contumely." The hinges of his knees were not pregnant and he had none of the thrift that follows fawning. When I first knew him he was in the meridian of his great powers. He possessed an extraordinary assemblage of physical and intellectual attributes that made him by far the most prominent, picturesque and impressive figure in public life.

His presence was noble and commanding; his voice and elocution were superb; his bearing and address somewhat too formal, but marked by dignity and grace. His vocabulary was rich and ornamental, sometimes almost to the borders of the grotesque, but fertilized with apposite quotations and allusions that showed wide reading, especially in poetry, romance and the drama. Some hostile critic described one of his speeches as a "purple earthquake of oratory." But he was always heard with delight on any theme.

Had he possessed greater flexibility of temper, been less inexorable in his animosities, and learned how to forget where he could not forgive, there was no height he might not have reached, even the highest in the people's gift. But he would not flatter Neptune for his trident, nor Jove for his power to thunder.

In that state of moral typhoid which always follows great wars, an era of profligacy, of sudden wealth at the price of honor, of crédit mobilier and Star Route scandals, he was not contaminated. He walked through the furnace with no smell of fire upon his garments.

Toward the end of his career in the Senate he fell out with the newspapers, and sometimes, when he arose to speak, every reporter in the press gallery closing his notebook, the whole crowd would rush noisily out into the lobby, leaving every seat without an occupant.

He flushed at the insult, but speaking of journalism afterward, he was moved to remark in his propitiatory way that the only people in the world authorized to use the first person, plural, "we," in speaking of themselves, were "editors and men with tapeworms!"

His allusion to Governor Cornell as "that lizard on the hill," and to President Arthur, after his refusal to abdicate in favor of Mr. Conkling, as "the prize ox in American politics," and his refusal to speak for Blaine in the campaign of 1884 on the ground that he was "not engaged in criminal practice," are well-known illustrations of his methods of compelling his political associates to be either his vassals or his enemies.

But Jove did not always sit on Olympus. Sometimes he descended to the plain, though never quite on terms of absolute equality with mankind. He was inclined to "jolly" those whom he did not feel disposed to bully.

When Thurman once asked him in a debate on some legal proposition why he kept looking at him all the time, Conkling replied with elaborate raillery that he turned to him as the source and fountain of the common law as, at the call of the Muezzin, the Mussulman turned to Mecca.

The Elephantine Inertia of Judge David Davis

Another favorite bust for his chaff, banter and ridicule was Judge David Davis, a native of Maryland who migrated early to Illinois, where he laid the foundation of an immense fortune by sagacious investments in farming lands. He was an original friend of Lincoln's and a delegate to the convention that nominated him for the Presidency. Riding with him once from Bloomington to Quincy, he gave me a most interesting inside history of the movement for Lincoln, one of the extraordinary facts being that the entire expense of his nomination, including headquarters, telegraphing, music, fare of delegations and other incidentals was less than seven hundred dollars.

He was a Falstaff in proportions and good nature, and the best guesser in American politics. Lincoln appointed him Justice of the Supreme Court in 1862. The greater part of his active life was passed on the Bench, where he was accustomed to have the last word and to delivering opinions rather than defending them—which is not a good preparation for the deliberations of the Senate.

He was an inveterate compromiser and composer of strife, which led Conkling to allude to him in debate as "the largest wholesale and retail dealer in political soothing syrup the world had ever known!"

Later, in the discussion of the same measure, Davis interrupted Conkling by way of correction or anticipation, which Conkling resented by quoting ore rotundo two lines from one of Watts' hymns:

> "He knows the words that I would speak
> Ere from my opening lips they break!"

To Davis' elephantine attempt to smooth over his break by some far-fetched eulogy, Conkling replied:

> "Praise undeserved is censure in disguise."

The stenographer did not recognize the quotation, so that one of Alexander Pope's most polished lines stands as an original, extemporaneous phrase of Mr. Conkling's.

The Vanished Magic of Roscoe Conkling's Name

It seems incredible that a personage of such vast and unusual powers, who for twenty years was a most prominent actor in the great drama of public affairs, who filled so large a space in the thought of the people, who was caricatured, lampooned, praised and reviled without stint or measure, should have faded so absolutely from the memory of men. Even to those of his contemporaries who survive he has already become a gorgeous reminiscence.

Digitized by Google

Patriotic, arrayed always for truth, right and justice, his name is identified with no great measure, and his life seems not so much an actual battle with hostile powers as a splendid scene upon the stage, of which the swords are lath, the armor tinsel, the bastions and ramparts painted screens, the wounds and blood fictitious; on which victories and defeats are feigned, with sheet-iron thunder, and tempests of peas and lycopodium—and the curtain falling to slow music, while the audience applauds and departs.

The Genial Urbanity of Senator Evarts

William Maxwell Evarts came to the Senate in 1885, at the age of sixty-seven. He was a candidate in 1861, and waited twenty-four years for the realization of his ambition. The interval was opulent in noble achievements at the bar, in statesmanship, in oratory, and the highest civic and social activities.

He was Attorney-General of the United States under Andrew Johnson, and his counsel on his impeachment. He represented the Government before the Geneva tribunal of arbitration on the Alabama claims. He was the leading attorney for President Hayes, in behalf of the Republican party, before the Electoral Commission, and Secretary of State from 1877 to 1881.

He was a scholar without pedantry, and a man of the world in the highest sense, without cynicism or frivolity.

There is always a dull suspicion in leaden, opaque and barren minds that wit, brilliancy and imagination, and the corruscations of the intellect are incompatible with great mental power and solidity of judgment.

Mr. Evarts refuted this fallacy, for in addition to his triumphs as a lawyer, in politics, and as a practical man of affairs, he was altogether the most brilliant and versatile talker of his time.

The characteristic of his conversation was a genial and humorous urbanity. He never wounded or stung. He seldom told stories or related anecdotes. His wit was like a spring that makes the meadows green. He appreciated what was best in society, art, literature and life, and had the keenest interest in the virtues and foibles of humanity. His manner was refined and suave. He never posed, nor monopolized, nor strained for effect; and as he never hurt self-love by irony, nor vanity by ridicule and satire, so he never shocked the devout by profanity, nor offended the modest with impudicity.

The Story of Washington and the Silver Dollar

Probably the most of Mr. Evarts most widely flown concerns the apochryphal feat told of George Washington in "jerking" a silver dollar across the Rappahannock.

The story goes that a party of tourists, visiting the haunts of Washington in Virginia, came to the spot, where the anecdote was related by some local antiquary, to illustrate the prodigious strength of the man whom Providence made childless that he might become the Father of His Country.

Aside from the unlikelihood that the thrifty George would throw a silver dollar over the river when a pebble would have done as well, the distance was so great that the skeptics were incredulous, and another legend seemed on the edge of being destroyed when Mr. Evarts came to its rescue with the suggestion that "a dollar went much farther in those days than now!"

The explanation is so simple and so satisfactory that the wonder is it occurred to no one before.

Among the guests at a dinner to Daniel Webster in New York was Dr. Benjamin Brandreth, the inventor of a celebrated pill known by his name. Mr. Evarts united these two great men in a volunteer toast to "Daniel Webster and Benjamin Brandreth: the pillars of the Constitution!"

Objections had been filed with the Judiciary Committee to the confirmation of a nomination on account of the dissolute habits of the appointee.

When the case came up for consideration the chairman called for the affidavits. The clerk produced a number from the files. Consulting his docket, Mr. Edmunds thought there were more, and others were found. A search disclosed another batch that had been overlooked or mislaid.

"The papers in this case," said Mr. Evarts, "appear to be more dissipated, if possible, than the candidate!"

Senator Evarts' Reply to His Critics

Mr. Evarts was a bon vivant, an inveterate diner-out, and giver of most elaborate and artistic dinners himself. To a lady who expressed surprise that one of such slender frame and fragile physique could endure so many feasts with their varying viands and different wines, he replied that it was not so much the different wines that gave him trouble as the indifferent ones.

President Hayes was a total abstainer—at home. Scoffers said he only drank the "O. P. brands." His State dinners, otherwise very elegant and costly, were served without wines. The only concession to conviviality was the Roman punch, flavored with Jamaica rum. Evarts was accustomed to allude to this course as "the life-saving station!"

Rising to address informally the guests at a Thanksgiving dinner, he began: "You have been giving your attention to a turkey stuffed with sage. You are now about to consider a sage stuffed with turkey."

When he was Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President Hayes the struggle for places in the diplomatic service was very active. As he was leaving the elevator at the close of a very busy day, he said the conductor since noon had "taken up a very large collection for foreign missions"; and when asked what had been done, he replied, "Many called, but few chosen."

As an orator Mr. Evarts was not limpid. But he confounded the critics who condemned his long sentences by saying that, so far as his observation went, the people who objected to long sentences belonged to the criminal classes.

General Grant was popularly supposed to be habitually grave, reserved and taciturn, but on occasion was very vivacious in conversation, with a keen sense of dry, quiet humor.

One evening, after a stag dinner at the White House, the company assembled in the library to smoke. Talk fell upon the happiest period of life—childhood, youth, manhood, age.

Grant listened, but said nothing till asked for his opinion.

"Well," he replied after a pause, "I believe I would like to be born again," which indicated that he had found existence enjoyable all the way through.

Mr. Edmunds' Quotation of St. Paul

One of Grant's Secretaries of the Navy was George M. Robeson, of New Jersey, for whom Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, a great jurist and advocate, conceived a violent dislike. His mildest definition of Robeson was that he was "a great lawyer among sailors, and a great sailor among lawyers."

DRAWN BY CARL ALEXANDROFF

"A dollar went much farther in those days than now!"

Some one took Thurman to task for having referred rather contemptuously to the beneficiaries of a certain measure as "things."

"Things," replied Thurman testily, "why we are all things——" "'To all men,'" interrupted Mr. Edmunds before he could finish his sentence, and the discussion ended.

Holman, of Indiana, for many years waged vigilant and unrelenting war on amendments to appropriation bills, which gave him the name of the "Watchdog of the Treasury." He was very strong in his district and had an unusually long service, which gave him great power and influence in the House, by his knowledge of the rules and practice.

Toward the end of his term an amendment was offered in which a near relative was much interested. The familiar "I object" was not heard and the amendment went through with his support; whereupon a member sitting near exclaimed:

"'Tis sweet to hear the honest watchdog's bark Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home!"

Nothing brighter and more apt has been said in either House of Congress since the inauguration of Washington.

The Reporters of the House

BY APPOINTMENT of the Speaker, an additional official stenographer will soon be added to the staff of the House of Representatives, making the number eight in all. This step has been rendered necessary by increase of work, the labors of the shorthand men being so extremely arduous that three of them have actually died of nervous prostration within the last few years. It has come to be a saying that each great tariff debate costs the life of a reporter. Messrs. McElhone, Edwards and Lord have succumbed successively to the stress of such legislative struggles.

McElhone was the head of the reportorial corps, and as such drew a salary of $7000 a year; but when he died this ranking position was abolished, and now all of the official stenographers have the same status. Each of them gets $5000 a year, and their places are held for life, inasmuch as they can be dismissed only for cause and by a resolution of the House. Five of them report the House debates, while the remaining two attend to the proceedings of committees.

The casual observer, looking down upon a debate in the House from a vantage point in one of the galleries, might be puzzled for some time to discover any evidence of reporting in progress. He would see nobody writing at the so-called "reporters' table," which, as a matter of fact, is practically not used at all for such purposes by the official stenographers, inasmuch as the hall is too large to make it possible to hear from any one point whatever may be said in various parts of the chamber. After a bit, however, the stranger may notice that whoever may be speaking at any length, there is always to be perceived a man standing or sitting with notebook in hand not far away. This man, indeed, is one of the reporters, who for the time being is taking down everything that is said on the floor.

The task which the reporter is engaged in performing is one of the most difficult imaginable. Remarks are interjected by members here and there; there are frequent interruptions, and to a person unfamiliar with such scenes it is a veritable Babel. But the shorthand man must not miss a word, and the best he can do is to keep near the Congressman who has the recognition of the Speaker. Thus he is in the centre of the disturbance, and, while faithfully reporting the discourse of the speech-maker of the moment, has his ears open to catch replies or comments from this side and that.

The strain is very great, but fortunately it only lasts for a few minutes, the official scribe limiting himself to one thousand words, which represent a page of the Congressional Record. He knows just about how many leaves of his note-book are required to make this stint, and the moment he completes it he holds up his thumb, another reporter, conveniently at hand, taking up the thread where he drops it. Two of the five reporters of debates, as they are called, are always present while the House is in session, one working while the other waits to relieve him. Having finished his thousand words, Number One hastens downstairs to a room on a floor below which is set aside for the exclusive use of the stenographers. There he seats himself before a graphophone, and dictates into it the "stuff" just recorded in his notes. So soon as he is through, an amanuensis transcribes it from the cylinders into clean print on a typewriter.

Meanwhile Number Two's place on the floor of the House has been taken by a third man, who picks up the thread of the discourse as soon as Number Two has finished. Then Number Two goes downstairs and dictates his thousand words into a graphophone, and in this way the business steadily proceeds, the reporters succeeding each other in regular order. As fast as the matter is dictated from the notes it is converted into typescript, and thus the whole of it is ready for the printer within a few minutes after the close of the day's session. An assistant puts all of the "copy" together in proper order, and hands it to a messenger who carries it on his bicycle to the Government Printing Office, four blocks away. It reaches there usually about six o'clock, though in case of a night session the last of it may not be delivered until one A. M.

One department of the Government Printing Office, as large as the composing-room of a big newspaper, is devoted exclusively to the Congressional Record. Indeed, the Record is "set up" and sent to press just like any newspaper, being delivered every morning to about nine thousand subscribers. Each Representative in Congress gets twenty-two copies daily, while a Senator is entitled to forty-two. Anybody may subscribe, the price being a dollar and fifty cents a month; but the publication is not directly profitable to Uncle Sam, inasmuch as it costs $125,000 yearly.

The oldest of the reporters of debates for the House, in length of service, is David W. Brown, who has held his honorable post for thirty years. Next in point of seniority comes John H. White, whose employment dates back twenty-five years, and after him A. C. Welch, Fred Irland and Reul Small. The two reporters for committees are Will J. Kehoe and George C. Lafferty. Messrs. Welch, Irland and Small took the places made vacant by the deaths of Messrs. McElhone, Edwards and Lord. All of the stenographers are appointed by the Speaker of the House, but merit, and not favoritism, rules in their selection.

Up to 1848 the only record of what was said in the House of Representatives or in the Senate was kept by newspapers, which, very naturally, took memoranda only of what happened to be useful from their view-point, and it was not until 1873 that stenographic experts were officially attached to Congress, the daily paper written and edited by them, known as the Congressional Record, being started simultaneously.

In 1812 Joseph Gales and W. W. Seaton began the publication of the National Intelligencer in Washington, and for some years they took the only regular stenographic notes of the doings of the Senate and House for their paper. But for Gales, the famous reply of Webster to Hayne would have been lost to posterity, the speech, it is said, being recorded by him at the request of Webster himself, though at that time Gales had dropped out of active service. His original notes, with a transcription in the handwriting of Mrs. Gales, together with Webster's rough notes made in preparing the speech, and also the revised version of the latter in the orator's own hand, were bound in a volume which is now in the Boston Public Library.

Digitized by Google

The American Spirit in British Society

By Lady Jeune

IT IS no exaggeration to say that among the many wonderful changes that have come over England during the last fifty years, none are so remarkable as those which have altered what was the most exclusive and aristocratic society in the world into the most cosmopolitan and democratic that has ever existed. Nothing could have been more narrow, more borné, than the circle which fifty years ago represented the highest, as well as the best, political milieu in England; and the change has been so sudden as to have almost amounted to a revolution.

There was an unwritten law that good society was the privilege of birth and descent only; riches or power constituted no right, ability or beauty no pass, into its sacred precincts, and whatever of social life then existed outside that order was not worthy of the dignity of being styled society. The change that has come has been so sweeping that only those who remember it can have even a faint conception of the contrast. Perhaps what can best convey an idea of the difference is to read a list of the presentations at Court, or of those who were then, and now are, invited to Court functions—of course eliminating from that list the official guests who are present ex-officio.

Where there was a dull propriety is a spritely license

It is hardly necessary to describe the constitution of that society, or the laws which governed it—there are so many facilities open to every one to acquire that knowledge; but they were, roughly speaking, those which limited and curtailed the independence of women, their interests and occupations, and which exacted a greater stiffness and formality in the intercourse of life; and they were, no doubt, strengthened by the political power being in the hands of two aristocratic factions. Decentralization was the pervading tendency of thought and life, and the great change that was coming was hardly appreciated. Like all the great social and political changes which have swept over our country, this deluge has been overwhelming. Where there was a dull propriety is a spritely license; where there was exclusiveness is a cosmopolitanism exceedingly comprehensive, and where there was a class distinction there is now only a distinction of talent, or ability, in some form or other.

The Contrast Between the New and Old Orders

Now that we have accepted the new order of things, and are beginning to realize its defects, as well as its advantages, we naturally turn, in the true, analytical spirit of the age, and endeavor to discover the causes, or influences, which have brought about such a totally different condition of life. And various are the answers to the problem we have set ourselves. The predominating forces are very evident, but we will deal with them later, and, for the present, mention but one, and one which has been made to bear the brunt of the lamentations and abuse of those who regret the disappearance of the "old order of things."

The "Americanization" of English society is a very plausible and claptrap expression, for it has an undoubted ring of truth; and our society has altered just as, in the same way, the lives, amusements and occupations of persons change, as their children grow up. The most staid, serious parents find an atmosphere of gayety and frivolity surrounding them, as their children become men and women and enter into the life of grown-up people. The father finds his study invaded, the furtive perfume of tobacco lurking in rooms hitherto sacred to the most profound erudition and reflection; the mother her nights interrupted by the necessities of chaperonage, the early hours of the day devoted to a slumber which she is only able to obtain as the sun throws his rosy, early beams over a sleeping town, and the sacred precincts of her boudoir relegated to the occupancy of her daughter's partners.

Many of us have gone through such a phase, for the influence and fascination of the young is so strong that we throw ourselves into their life, really enjoying it as much as they do and carried away by their vigor and sense of happiness. Perhaps the analogy may be permitted, and we may compare ourselves and our grown-up child across the Atlantic to the young lives which govern every happy household in England; and there is no doubt that much of the change we are describing is due to the strong, virile influence of American thought and life on us in the old country. The cry, "You are Americanizing our institutions," was more often heard some fifty years ago than now, for in those days, when old ideas and sacred beliefs were crumbling around us, it had a ring in it which appealed strongly to the mother country, whose daughter was just making her real début among the nations, and showing them, in her wild, untrammeled, glorious youth, what her influence over life and thought was to be.

Undoubtedly she was the cause of the cry, but the conditions of social and political life in England were ready and prepared to carry on the crusade she had inaugurated; and, having given the impetus to the movement, it was certain to spread among a people as adaptive as the English undoubtedly are. In discussing the changes in England which are due in some measure to your influence, we must be allowed to criticise, and point out where we have been benefited, and where we have suffered; because the whole movement has not been one of unmixed advantage to us.

The Revolution in English Journalism

The influence of the American on the English press is perhaps the most striking example of the subject we are discussing, for the whole character and tone of ours has altered absolutely during the last twenty years. The increase of population, the postal facilities and the spread of education have increased the demand for cheap newspapers, which have in turn multiplied indefinitely; but that in itself is not a sufficient reason to account satisfactorily for the alteration in the literary character of English journalism. The change is more easily explained by the fact that we have adopted the weakest points of American journalism, while closing our eyes to other aspects which we might have studied with advantage.

Another influence which no one will dispute is distinctly American, and which has introduced an entirely new element into journalism, is the system of interviewing which has added a new terror to life in this country. For the interviewer is ubiquitous, and it needs an almost superhuman ingenuity to escape him. Every person of any importance, social, literary or political, lives in public, for whatever concerns them is considered public property, just as are telegrams, sporting news, or any other subject which interests the community at large. And alas! the curtain is not drawn down at any door at which the interviewer will not seek to enter. At the bedside of the dying, at the most sacred, joyful, painful moments of life, he must be present. Hitherto the new-born infant only has escaped his scrutiny, and that solely because he would be unable to give him any information which would do for "copy." The adoption of interviewing has taken away much of the privacy and secrecy of life, and made some of its most trying moments almost unbearable. For the purposes of advertisement, however, it has its advantages, and has grown into the system it now is partly because many find it a useful way of introducing themselves to the ignorant or indifferent public, and often obtain undeserved notoriety by using it.

The American Reporter in British Politics

The newspaper reporter, who is twin brother to the "interviewer," is almost as ubiquitous, but he is content with much less; his powers of expanding information, however, are marvelous, and he can deal with subordinates while the interviewer must get his copy "first hand." It would be unfair to lay the blame of this very disagreeable system on America alone; its adoption was due, doubtless, to American example; and though there are persons who do not object to profit by the so-called advantages of being known, the interviewer and reporter will flourish. But while discussing the influence of American life and example on England one cannot overlook this very distinct innovation which we have adopted absolutely from our American brethren, for what is called the "Americanization" of English life springs largely from this cause. Our politicians have adopted it when desirous of expressing their opinions, also our literary men, our doctors, our actors, and, at last, a Royal Duke has consented to give his opinions to an American review by means of an interview, though the interviewer is an Englishman and a late member of Parliament.

The practice is increasing, and behind the scenes in the life of many successful men and women it is very entertaining to see how carefully, and with what good results, the system has been worked. Public men of high position like Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, and the other political men in England, have kept clear of it, and avoided any communication with the new movement, feeling how deeply the dignity of a country is dependent on the silence and isolation of its public men, but it does not require much imagination to see how easily the system might be adopted by less scrupulous politicians to "fly kites" at a moment of national excitement. Even our distinguished Generals, on returning from a successful campaign, are besieged at Dover, and questioned on the most important and delicate points of strategy, but we have hardly yet brought the system to that perfection it has attained on your side of the Atlantic—though probably it will surpass it in time, for no one can deny that the influence of American thought and life is dominating the English press daily more and more, and the increasing competition among English newspapers must tend still more to develop it.

—until English men married American women

New Leaven in the English Social Loaf

The adoption of trade as a profession by the upper classes in England has, I think, been also due in great measure to American influence, or rather, its more general adoption, for Englishmen have always had a tendency to "dabble" in business, without seriously adopting it as a means of livelihood. The inauguration of the railway system in England, and the speculation which it gave birth to, was utilized by the upper classes, who speculated deeply, though not successfully; but commerce and business were, until English men married American women, almost exclusively the monopoly of the middle class. The American wife who required more in her life than the English woman gave the impetus to her husband's endeavors to continue to her the luxury she had been accustomed to in her own country, and the facility with which large fortunes were made by Americans stirred Englishmen to adopt the same mode of life. The upper classes in England had already, by their intermarriage with the daughters of those in trade, in a few cases, perceived the wisdom of opening up a new profession, but the quickening influence and the strongest was undoubtedly transatlantic.

Some of our literary purists affirm that much of the slipshod writing and modes of expression of to-day are also the result of American influence, and that, though the new words and phrases we have in use are exceedingly piquant and expressive, they lack the grace and dignity of the mother tongue. No one will deny that the conversational English of to-day is largely affected in this direction, nor will they, I apprehend, also deny that there is a directness and appropriateness about many of the more familiar Americanisms that have grown into our mother tongue, and been largely adopted. Our language has become so interspersed with slang and colloquialisms that it has lost the polish of its classical days, but no one objects to calling certain railway operations "a shunt," and the still more well-known word "boss" expresses to our minds the idea we wish to convey with simplicity and quickness. The tendency of modern thought and life is to abbreviate everything, and the pressure of to-day does not give us time to round our sentences; therefore, we strive to express our thoughts in the shortest and most forcible manner.

The peculiar humor of the American people appeals to us very strongly, and their literary humor has influenced our literature not a little. The dry, quick character of American expression has a peculiar charm for the staid, sober Englishman, whose own sense of humor is less acute and subtle; and though, as a young country, America can hardly claim to have created a great literature, she has among her writers many men whose works are characterized by a delicate humor, which appeals strongly to us, and which is influencing, and will go on influencing us more than, perhaps, is generally conceded. There is an increasing class of readers of American books in England, and every new work of any importance is eagerly read.

Digitized by Google

A Powerful Influence in English Letters

In discussing the literary influence of America on England it is impossible to pass over the name of one who has interested English readers perhaps more than any other during the present century. Captain Mahan's writings on naval matters have had an effect that is most striking here, and have riveted the attention of every class. His books on naval subjects appeared at a moment when the attention of the country was being seriously directed to the wants of our navy, and there are many thousands of Englishmen who feel that we owe our increase of naval power to the indescribable strength and force of his writings. Hardly any writer of modern times has made so profound an impression, and it is a remarkable instance of how American opinion and observation appeals to us when it comes from so weighty a source.

It is in the social aspect of life in England that American influence is most obvious. The hurry and pressure of existence has increased here as across the Atlantic, and our life has been forced to conform to it. Its excitement, bustle and energy increase every day, and whether or no we owe it to the direct influences of the nervous organization of America, one cannot decide accurately (the influences that have brought it about there are also at work here); but we are inclined to think that the change is due more to the modern conditions of life which influence both countries, though, being the older, we are hardly as susceptible to them as the younger community.

The First Attitude Toward the Fair Stranger

That the American woman is also a new factor we readily recognize and admit. Her influence on dress, society and life is most obvious in certain sets, and though the set is a small one and somewhat peculiar from its composition, its influence is out of all proportion to its numbers. And the greater freedom of life which women enjoy in England in every way is in a great measure the result of the constant interchange of thought and ideas with the Americans, and we can trace many of the changes that have come into the lives of women here to that source alone.

There is a peculiar quality about your women which is singularly attractive, and which appeals very strongly to us, because their whole mode of life and their way of regarding it is so strangely at variance with anything we had seen or imagined before. The emancipation of their life, the originality of their ideas, their camaraderie with men, and the general atmosphere of freedom which surrounds them give a charm and piquancy which are irresistible. There was a good deal at first which frightened and alarmed our strongly conservative and deeply rooted ideas about women, and our forebodings as to the effect the American woman would have on English women were endless. We did not dread her influence over our married women, because, with all the freedom and intimacy of her relations with men, her standard of morality is high and her nature is colder and less passionate than ours; but the baneful effect of it on our girls was what we feared, for the American girl represented all that was attractive, but dangerous, in maidenhood.

The idea of friendship between young people of opposite sexes, based on a perfect equality of tastes and amusements, the disappearance of the chaperon, the weakening of parental control, and the complete arrangement of the lives of the young being handed over to themselves, was such a reversal of all we held sacred that no wonder we felt the foundations of society tottering to their fall, or that the American girl in these early days was spoken of with bated breath, as a siren too dangerous and seductive for us to contemplate her appearance here with composure.

The March of Thought Toward the Ideal Type

We made ourselves unnecessarily anxious in those days, for the character of English women and the traditional tone of society here rendered the complete adoption of the American mode of life for girls an impossibility. There was no attempt to deny the peculiar charm of your girls, nor that the liberty and freedom of their lives was perhaps one of the most potent causes of that charm, making them more self-reliant, and capable of acting with greater independence in the arrangement of their lives, but the strong conservatism of English opinion about women was too much in opposition to any movement or influence which would materially alter their lives or character.

The railway and the telegraph, however, which have brought all the world into touch, were the most powerful allies of the new order of things, and it was impossible for the Old World to remain entirely unmoved by the evolution of her young offspring. It was not, however, the American nation which affected the change we are discussing, nor the American girl, beautiful, emancipated, willful as she is, which has altered our lives, but the stern, inevitable march of thought, and the distinct tendency of modern life to throw off the trammels of an older society, and adapt them to the new conditions of society.

With the last years of the century, the influence of the young seemed to absorb and divert into new channels what vitality there was left to the old and, in its overbearing strength and vigor, to sweep away all that was conventional and old-fashioned. Your type of woman represented the ideal, and gave a personal exposition of the new aspiration of women all over the world. In France the movement affected them differently; in Germany very little change has been made; in Russia the tendency has been revolutionary, but in England it affected neither their religious nor their political position, but has taken the form of a determination among women to attain to some of the independence of their sisters across the ocean, and made them less willing to submit to the restraints and customs which suited their mothers and grandmothers. Among the middle classes of women it has enabled them to earn their living by developing them intellectually, and given a great stimulus to education, and among the upper classes its tendency has certainly been to allow greater freedom of intercourse between the sexes, which has admitted girls to a position of independence and a freedom of speech and conduct unknown before.

—a good wife and good mother

To contrast the lives of girls twenty or thirty years ago with those of to-day is perhaps the best object lesson one can see. It does not appear to have injured them, and it has no doubt made their position at home happier, and one of much less subjection to the parental authority, while it has lessened the desire to marry early, which was formerly so strong a characteristic of English girls. The independence and happiness of home life has in these times made marriage much more of a restraint than a liberation from control. Formerly marriage meant a wider, freer life, and greater independence, but in these days a girl often enters into bondage when she leaves her home. The marriage of American women and English men was the beginning of the change, for, though at first we were a little startled, and rather anxious as to the influence of the young American bride, we consoled ourselves by the reflection that a woman generally becomes one of her husband's family and adapts herself to their ways of life.

Loyal American Women and True English Wives

The American woman, however, has never really become acclimatized in her conjugal capacity here; she is beautiful, charming, affectionate, a good wife and good mother, tolerant of our prejudices and broad-minded as to our opinions, but she is always an American, and about her own home is the subtle atmosphere of her American antecedents; and her influence is strong and unmistakable. The American woman in England—that is to say, the woman who has "Americanized" our life—belongs generally to one set in society, one that is considered the smartest, because its members have nearly all large fortunes which they spend with great lavishness and generosity, and so give a tone to the society into which they live. And when we talk of the particular aspect of English life which we are discussing, and which we think is the effect of American influence, we cannot but confess that it is only in its exaggerations and excrescences that it is harmful; it may be that it has been brought about by other causes too numerous or obscure to enumerate here.

Among the middle and intellectual classes of women

In hasty generalization one complains that the extravagance and luxury of English life is due to American influence, but we are not prepared to admit that it is more to blame than the Jews and Anglo-African millionaires, who now also form a large and powerful element in English social life. One often wishes that some of the exclusiveness of real American life could be engrafted here, and that money was not one of the most potent passports into English society.

There are, however, many American wives in England whose names rise to our mind, and we see them adopting the customs and habits of the old country, throwing themselves into the pursuits and ambitions of their husbands, and making the most attractive and dainty châtelaines; women who have devoted the dower they have brought to the country of their adoption for its benefit, realizing to the fullest extent that the interests and objects of the two countries are the same, and that no better rôle can be given to a woman than to bear an honored name, one respected in the annals of both lands, and in reality belonging to each. We prefer to look on the Americanization of England from this point of view, not grudging or deploring its power, for some of the most beneficial changes in the lives of women in England are the outcome of American influence, especially as regards education, professions and mode of life.

The alterations in women's lives were inevitable, were in fact beginning—the influence of America has only accelerated their adoption. The steady tide of progress, the awakening of new ideas, the adoption of new ways of life has been the silent creator of these changes, which were accepted by America with all the alacrity of youth and, after a period of uncertainty, with some modification by England.

The Americanization of England is only, after all, the superfluous energy of the child who likes to sweep its parent along the same road, and at the same pace as himself.

The Reorganization of Chautauqua

By Waldon Fawcett

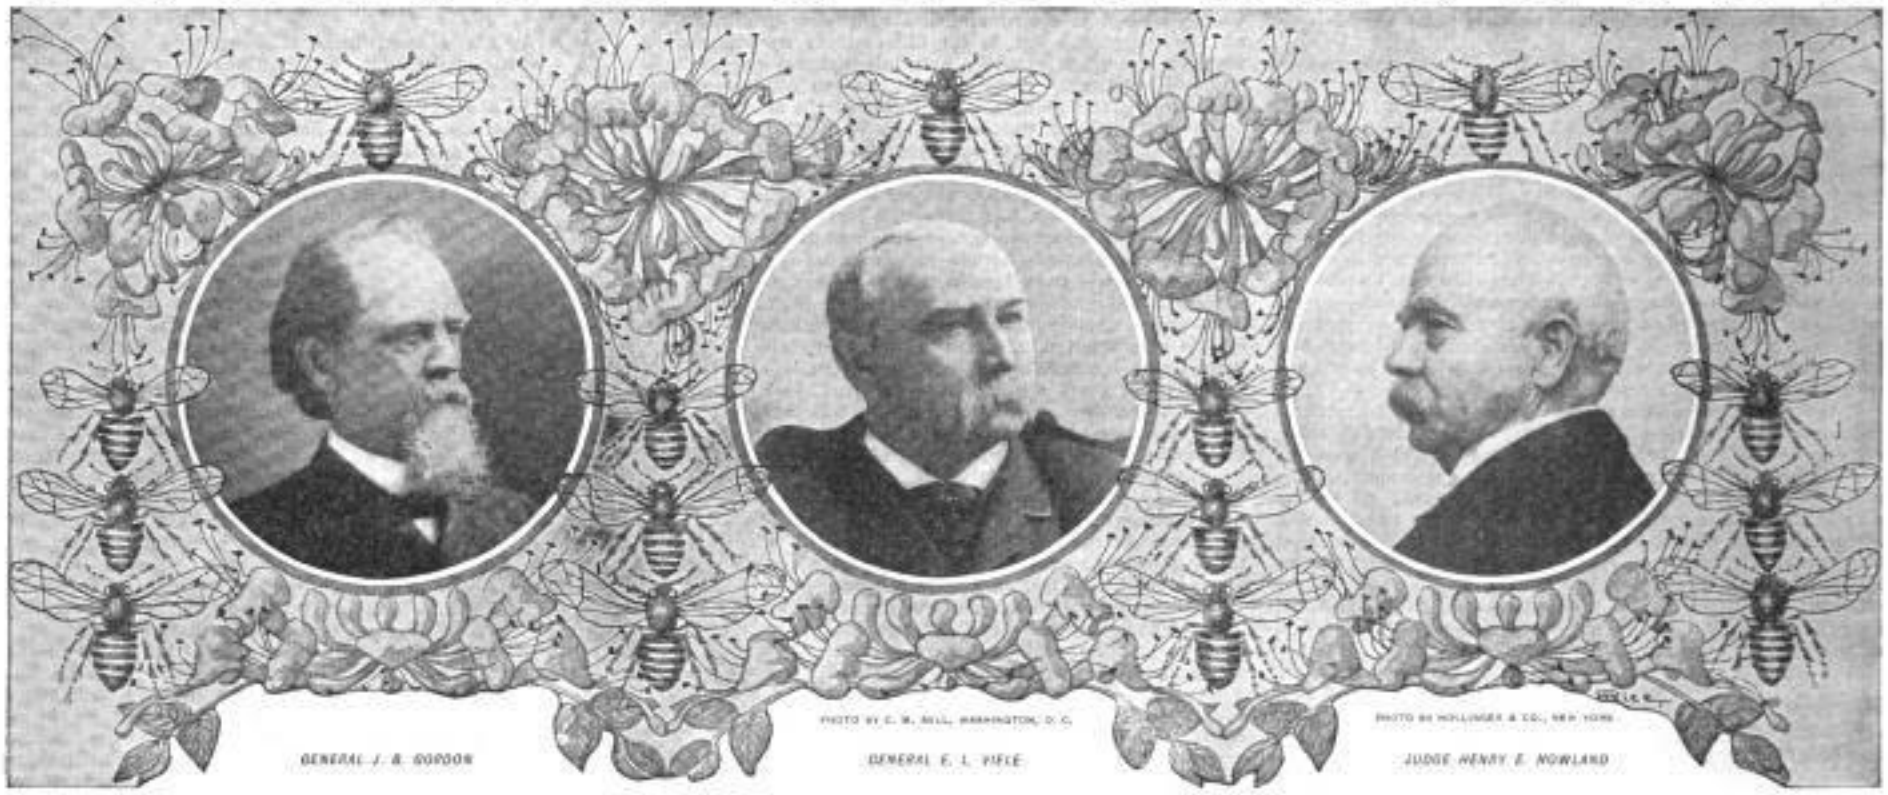
A NEW era of usefulness is dawning for that unique educational movement which has been the outgrowth of the Chautauqua Assembly. The general reorganization of the main institution and its branches, which has been in progress for a year past, opens a field of far vaster scope than any which they have heretofore occupied.

To those not familiar with the Chautauqua movement its manifold phases are likely to appear a trifle confusing. First and foremost there is the Assembly, the annual gathering in "the city in the grove," which is now entering upon the first year of the second quarter century of its career. Next in importance is the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circles, an organization to promote systematic home study, hundreds of the members of which regularly make Chautauqua the Mecca of their summer vacations. This organization came of age last summer. Finally, there are the courses of instruction by correspondence and the summer school, offering courses in a number of departments of study, both newer adjuncts of the great project.

Something of the scope of the Chautauqua work may be imagined from the fact that more than forty thousand persons have graduated in the course prescribed by the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. A quarter of a million names are to be found upon its roll, while more than half a million people have been participants in one way or another in Chautauqua projects. There are branch organizations in Great Britain, Australia, Russia, Japan, Mexico and South Africa, and students in India, China, Persia, Korea and almost every country on the globe. Even in the Hawaiian Islands and our other new possessions the novel movement has gained a foothold. Finally, Chautauqua has been the pioneer in a great movement of national scope. There are in this country alone at the present time more than threescore summer assemblies which have been patterned after Chautauqua.

But to return to the subject of the rejuvenation now in progress. Up to within a year ago the general offices were located at Chautauqua, New York; the headquarters of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle at Buffalo, and the publication office of the Chautauquan magazine and books at Meadville, Pennsylvania, while the principal officers had places of residence widely scattered. Now all of these interests, or nearly all of them, have been consolidated at Cleveland in a magnificent new fireproof building, designed with especial reference to their needs. This concentration of departments means not only added facility in the transaction of business, but a reduction of the expenses of which all the members will be given immediate advantage.

The Leading Spirits of Chautauqua



The men who have been given places of authority in the reconstructed organization are business men. Foremost is Clem Studebaker, who has just been elected to the presidency. The new president is a striking example of the self-made man, and his life story ought to prove sufficient to fire the ambition of any young man starting in life with few advantages. Mr. Studebaker as a boy learned the trade of a blacksmith. Later, he and his brother operated small blacksmith shops in various places and finally established one at South Bend, Indiana, where they made a specialty of wagon repairing. From this small beginning, and with practically no capital at the outset, there developed a great plant which to-day gives employment to thousands of workmen.

Possibly the most interesting figure among the men into whose hands the destinies of Chautauqua have passed is Wilson M. Day. At the opening of the present year, Mr. Day was chosen first vice-president of the organization and chairman of the executive board, but as the general direction of affairs is in the hands of this board he is in reality the general manager, and upon his business acumen will depend much of the success of the project for "a new Chautauqua." Mr. Day, who is a man of fifty, is a clergyman's son, but the greater part of his life has been spent in the printing shop, first as a newspaper-man and later as an independent publisher. His side duties would have been sufficient to occupy the entire time of a less industrious man. He has been president of banks and manufacturing companies and commercial bodies; was one of the World's Fair Commissioners, and took an important part in the compilation of the manufacturing statistics of the eleventh census.

Bishop Vincent, who has been aptly termed "the very pulse of the machine," is now approaching his seventieth year. As a mere boy he gave up dreams of college and entered the ministry. The inception of the idea of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle was due primarily to his realization of the defects of its few forerunners in the field of home reading upon prescribed courses. Bishop Vincent continues as Chancellor of Chautauqua, but much of the work in which he has heretofore been active will devolve upon his son, Dr. George E. Vincent, of Chicago. The latter, who has literally been in Chautauqua work since he was old enough to read, is officially designated as Principal of Instruction.

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

A Decade of American Patriotism

In discussing the questions that have led to the broadening of American interest and character and the increase of patriotism, it would be very foolish to give the whole credit to our present experiences in the far East, or to the events which led up to them. As a matter of fact, the great work has been done, and is being done, in our own country. We are rounding out the greatest decade of patriotism that we have ever known, and it has largely sprung from the organization of societies which, by associating the descendants of persons who played active parts in the Colonial and National life, have directed and stimulated that larger feeling which has become a power in the land. It has improved education, increased real charity, and given more interest and value to the thought and conversation of society. Furthermore, it has helped wonderfully to kill sectionalism and to strengthen the common loyalty. There are to-day more than half a million good people who are members of these various societies, and the number is increasing every year. The ordinary tendencies of these organizations are for improvement, but even better than that are the active influences that they exert upon the life and thought of the day. They did much to arouse enthusiasm in the war with Spain, and to help the wounded and suffering.

Possibly the work of these patriotic organizations offers one of the best offsets to the enthronement of the almighty dollar in this age of trusts. It is a good thing to be rich, but there is something better than money. It may not always be ancestry, but ancestry has its value. At any rate, it offers the stimulus to, if not the means for, culture, and it is the antithesis of plutocracy. It is thus that the patriotic societies have their value in the economic problems of the day, and the keen rivalry between some of them, which often affords entertainment to philosophers, only helps to increase their activity and the attention they attract from the general public.

Perpetuating the Names of Our Heroes

It gives us a larger idea of our history to view the number of patriotic societies which have taken up the periods and persons of American history. They cover almost every chapter from the settlement of the country to the close of the war with Spain.

When the Continental Army was on the Hudson at the close of hostilities in the Revolutionary War, in May, 1783, the American and French officers formed the Society of the Cincinnati, and since then it has stood possibly first among the patriotic organizations of the United States. The conditions of membership at the beginning prescribed officers who had served with honor for three years, and since the membership has descended to the eldest lineal male descendant. The first President-General was George Washington, and it is noteworthy that, in the 117 years since, there have been only ten President-Generals, the present one being the Hon. William Wayne, of Pennsylvania. On somewhat similar lines is the Aztec Club of 1847, of which General Egbert L. Viele, of New York State, is President. The society is composed of officers of the United States Armies who served in the war with Mexico, and it was formally organized in the City of Mexico in 1847, in order to keep alive the memories and traditions of that war. The membership is exclusively confined to officers who served in the war or their blood relatives, and at present there are 240 members. There are several societies of the War of 1812 where the same line of policy is carried out. Still better known is the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, of which Lieutenant-General John M. Schofield is Commander-in-Chief. Its membership is confined to officers and ex-officers who took part in the Civil War, and, as in the other societies, the membership passes to the eldest direct male descendant. This order has a membership at present of over 9000, and the little button which is its distinguishing badge is highly prized by its members.

War Organizations that Help the Needy

It is not generally known that the Southern States are paying in homes and pensions over a million dollars to old Confederate soldiers. One of the greatest organizations in the country is the United Confederate Veterans, of which General John B. Gordon, of Georgia, has been President for several years. There is a membership of 45,000, and this year the reunion is to be held in Louisville, Kentucky. Another Confederate society is the United Sons of Confederate Veterans. Of large importance also is the order of United Patriots of the Confederacy, which has over 400 chapters in the United States and 8000 members. The work of all these organizations is along social, historical and benevolent lines, and it is largely due to their activity that the Confederate veterans in the South are cared for at the expense of the public.

Of course, the Confederate Society is nothing like as large as the Grand Army of the Republic, which has a membership of nearly 290,000, but it is an interesting illustration of the coöperation that is going on all through the country. Both North and South the old soldiers are not only caring for their unfortunate brothers, but they are erecting monuments to their heroes and are doing much to save the battlefields and make them attractive. There are a half dozen different societies of Union soldiers, and now we have a new organization called the Sons of Veterans, in which the descendants of the old soldiers take keen interest. There is the National Society of the Spanish-American War, and the Naval and Military Order of the Spanish-American War, and the Society of Santiago de Cuba, and the Rough Riders' Association, and the Naval Order of the St. Louis, and the United States Veteran Navy; all of which came out of the war with Spain. The Philippines are yet to be heard from, but it is quite certain that they will supply their quota of patriotic orders.

All Kinds of Patriotic Societies

It seems that almost every phase of our history and development is covered by a patriotic society, and more are constantly being formed. There is, for instance, the Society of Mayflower Descendants, which has a membership of 2000, and of which Judge Henry E. Howland is President. There is the Huguenot Society of America. There is the Irish National Federation of America. There is the American-Irish Historical Society, whose special aim it is to study the part the Irish element has played in the growth of the nation and the formation of American character. There is the Scotch-Irish Society of America—it claims as its patriots such men as Andrew Jackson, John C. Calhoun and Sam Houston. The first society of Tammany, or Columbian Order, began 111 years ago, and even it is nominally historical and charitable, although Tammany Hall has monopolized its name. The last century in the matter of patriotism is thoroughly covered. There are other parts of the country's history which are well organized as far as patriotism is concerned, including the War of 1812 and the Mexican War and the Indian Wars, and the various societies of men and women, both Union and Confederate, that are connected with the Civil War. All have their particular interests.

Some Revolutionary Societies

There is an abundant list of Colonial and Revolutionary societies, from which any one with the necessary ancestry may select. If you want to join the Society of Colonial Wars you must be an adult male descendant of one who fought in battle sometime from the settlement of Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607, to the Battle of Lexington in 1775, or who served officially in the service of the Colonies or under Great Britain. If you prefer it you can enter the Order of Founders and Patriots of America—a more recent organization which takes in the first colonists and their ancestors and descendants. Then there is the Settlers and Defenders of America, a hereditary order formed last year. Two of the best known societies are the Sons of the American Revolution and the Sons of the Revolution, the rival organizations which cover practically the same ground. The first has a membership of 7000 and the second of between 9000 and 10,000.

The Patriotism of the American Women

Even more zealous than the men in the patriotic memories of the past are the ladies, and in various societies they have interesting competitions that have caused the wits to enter the lists of the critics, but which have all worked toward a broader appreciation of the history of the country.

The Colonial Dames of America, of which Mrs. John Lyon Gardiner is President, was organized in New York in 1890. It was the first society of its kind in this country. Its purposes are for the advancement of patriotism and education, and it designs to collect and preserve relics, manuscripts, traditions and mementoes of the founders and builders of the thirteen original States of the Union and of the heroes of the War of Independence, and to promote celebrations of great national events. Distinct from this is the Colonial Dames of America, another organization of the same name, of which the President is Mrs. Justine Van Rensselaer Townsend. It has State societies in thirty-five States and a membership of nearly 4000. Its membership is through Colonial descent; the ancestor must have lived in this country prior to 1750 and his name must be distinguished for something in the early history of the country. Next is the Daughters of the American Revolution, of which Mrs. Daniel Manning is President-General. This is probably the largest of the women's societies, its membership exceeding 27,000. It has chapters in all the States and Territories of the Union. A woman to become a member must be eighteen years old and must be descended from an ancestor who was a patriot in the Colonies. Next is the Daughters of the Revolution, of which Mrs. Henry Sanger Snow is President-General, in which membership is confined to the lineal descendants of participants in the Revolutionary War or in the Continental Congress.

Then there are the Dames of the Revolution, of which Mrs. Edward Paulet Steers is President, and to which those only can be admitted who are descended from the patriots during the Revolution from April 19, 1775, to April 19, 1783.

These five organizations with their various conditions of membership offer opportunities to all who are so fortunate as to be descended from the early fighters and workers.

For the War of 1812 there is one national organization called the United States Daughters, 1812, of which Mrs. William Gerry Slade, of New York, is President, and it not only takes in that conflict, but allows its membership qualifications to begin with the descendants of ancestors who distinguished themselves any time after the close of the War of the Revolution. This gives it a large constituency.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

Senator Elkins' Account with Blaine

One of the warmest political friends of the late James G. Blaine was Stephen B. Elkins, Senator from West Virginia. Their friendship began this way. Early in the seventies, when Mr. Elkins was a Territorial delegate to Congress from New Mexico, privileged to speak but not to vote, he wanted to make a speech upon a subject dear to the hearts of his constituents. Mr. Blaine was Speaker of the House and Mr. Elkins was a new man and, being unknown, was without influence. He determined to be heard, nevertheless, and planned to meet the Speaker privately. As luck would have it, one night while Mr. Elkins was dining in Welker's restaurant Mr. Blaine walked in and took a seat near him. Waiving all formality, the young member introduced himself and laid his case plainly before the Speaker.

"All right," said Mr. Blaine, when he had ended. "As soon as you get your speech ready I'll recognize you and you shall be heard."

And heard he was. The speech was in a small way Mr. Elkins' political beginning, but it was of even more importance to Mr. Blaine, for the young man promptly pushed himself into a commanding place in national politics and soon afterward married a daughter of Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia. He became a Senator from that State. From the date of that speech until 1892, when Senator Elkins marshaled the forces of President Harrison at Minneapolis, he was among the foremost champions of Mr. Blaine's presidential candidacies.

All of this is history and has been written, but the following has never before been printed. The Post's informant is the gentleman who mailed the letter that aided in making Mr. Blaine Secretary of State and in paying to the last iota the political obligations incurred more than ten years before. General Harrison had delayed naming his premier. Mr. Blaine was the leading name mentioned for the place. In December Mr. Elkins wrote to the President-elect saying that nine-tenths of the Republicans throughout the country would be greatly disappointed if the giving out of Mr. Blaine's name as Secretary of State were delayed much longer. This letter was mailed from a post box uptown in New York, and two days later, to the assembled reporters in Indianapolis, General Harrison announced that Mr. Blaine had accepted the post of Secretary of State in his Cabinet. The letter had had its effect.

Quick Success of an Editor-Novelist

Will Payne, author of Jerry the Dreamer and The Money Captain, is putting his powers to a severe test in a new novel dealing with what is popularly regarded as the most commonplace strata of metropolitan existence—the life of the clerk, the accountant and the stenographer: the slaves of the counter and the desk. Mr. Payne, however, is rarely equipped, both by instinct and experience, to delineate modern commercial life. His boyhood and youth were spent in Morrison, Illinois, and in Nebraska, from whence he went to Chicago and became a reporter upon the Daily News. Soon he was given a more attractive class of "general assignment" work. Next he wrote editorials, and finally was promoted to the city editorship. His keen scent for financial news and his ready grasp of its scope and significance caught the eyes of his superiors and he was advised to make this his special field. He did so and with brilliant success. When Mr. Frank Vanderlip was called from the editorship of the Economist to Washington, his position on that journal, which is often spoken of as the financial authority of the West, was offered to Mr. Payne and accepted.

The eye of the young novelist is as quick, however, in the course of a day "on change" or among the brokerage offices to see an artistic possibility or a pathetic situation as he is to read the meaning of a movement in stocks. His first novel was accepted ten days after it was sent to the publisher.

William Winter's Copy

William Winter, the dean of the dramatic critics of New York and the poet and essayist of the Tribune, is spare and short, with wavy gray hair, and his smooth face is singularly youthful. He belongs to the old school—the school of Greeley, George Ripley, Bronson Howard and Cogden—and until recently he always climbed the stairs to the Tribune editorial rooms instead of using the elevator. But one night, which was colder and stormier than usual, he rode up on the elevator and put his copy on the desk. His handwriting is neat, but almost undecipherable to the ordinary man.

That very night a new man was reading copy—a fresh young man just out of college—who did not know Mr. Winter's copy went direct from the man who received it to the printer who put it in type, and that it was only read in proof and in the paper. No one had told him that with Mr. Winter's copy corrections were sacrilege and criticisms rank blasphemy. So, in his ignorance, he began to transcribe and edit the hieroglyphics. At a quarter to one o'clock the night editor, full of trouble and anxiety and looking for this identical copy, came across the young man at his task.

"I have been waiting for that just one hour," he said.

"Well, you will have to wait another hour. I was not employed to translate. I have struck a sentence in this copy that paralyzes the English language, and I will straighten it out if I——"

"The sentence you struck," returned the night editor as he lifted up the copy and started with it upstairs, "will be in the managing editor's plainest English, and you will receive it to-morrow, unless I am mistaken."

Mr. Winter's copy as heretofore goes direct to the printers.

Mrs. McLean's Beautiful "Piece"

Mrs. Donald McLean is Regent of the New York City Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution. She is one of the most active and most earnest of the workers in the patriotic societies of this country, and her name is well known in every part of the United States. She takes a great interest in all that appertains to American history. Several times she has been almost elected head of the national body of which she is one of the most distinguished ornaments. Mrs. McLean is a daughter of the late Judge Ritchie, of Maryland, and she holds an enviable place in the social life of the metropolis. Among Mrs. McLean's varied charms is the gift of oratory. She is a forceful and eloquent public speaker, and her addresses upon patriotic topics would make a small library in themselves.

Last winter there was a meeting of the national order in Washington and, of course, Mrs. McLean was present. She spoke in various places, and one of them was the Adams school where she appeared by special request. The mother of one of the pupils knew of this engagement and impressed upon her little daughter the need of remembering every word that Mrs. McLean said. When the child returned home her mother asked her how things went.

"Beautifully," replied the little one.

"Did Mrs. McLean make an address?"

"Indeed she did. She just spoke her piece beautifully. You ought to have heard it."

Mr. Lauterbach's Convenient Telephone

The trials and tribulations of the Third Avenue Railroad, of New York, have brought again into prominence its legal adviser, Edward Lauterbach, once President of the New York County Republican Committee. While holding this office Mr. Lauterbach, who is one of the busiest and most prosperous lawyers in the metropolis, was overrun with applicants for political places. Their perseverance would have driven a less wily man to the bad, but Mr. Lauterbach rigged up a dummy telephone, of which this is the first written description. The wire was grounded, and secrets poured into its receiver were as safe as if spoken in a tomb without witnesses.

A man would come into Mr. Lauterbach's office and query him thus:

"How about that job in the appraiser's office, Mr. President?"

"Let me see, your name is——?"

"Jones—Thomas J. Jones, of the Ninth District."

"Oh! yes. I remember perfectly. Haven't you heard from that yet?"

"Not a word."

Ring, went the dummy telephone bell, and the following single-handed dialogue between Mr. Lauterbach and himself took place:

"Hello! Central. Give me the Republican County Committee. Is that you, Mr. Manchester? I'm Lauterbach. All right. How about that job in the appraiser's office for Jones, of the Ninth? Eh? More delay? I'm surprised. I told you I wanted that fixed up a month ago. Get at it at once. Well, it is time. What's that? You think there is something better in view if Mr. Jones can wait? That's good. You will write to him about it? All right. Don't let any more delays occur. Mr. Jones is one of our best men and we can't afford to keep him waiting. I'll ask him to call down and see you next week about it. Good-by."

Ten minutes after Jones, of the Ninth, left the office, his chest inflated with honest pride, while Secretary Manchester was reading a hastily written note from the President, and was wondering whether the supply of plums would hold out until all the hungry patriots had their fill.

The Goddess of Liberty at the Photographer's

The tallest woman on the American stage is Miss Mary Tull, who, besides her decided histrionic talent, has won world fame as the favorite model of some of the foremost American sculptors for their recent goddesses of liberty. Miss Tull's height, which is considerably over six feet, naturally limits her field of endeavor on the stage, but in her especial line of parts it is not exaggerating to say that she stands head and shoulders above her rivals. On a Western tour some time ago a program printer misspelled her name, calling her "Miss Mary TALL." The management at first declined to pay the printing bill, but after the program man, who was also the manager of the local theatre, had visited the show and seen the actress he refused to deduct a cent, claiming that if Tall was not her name it ought to be.

Last fall, in New York, Miss Tull was photographed as the Goddess of Liberty in a Broadway studio, and in answer to a telephone call, she hastily left the gallery and went into the adjoining building, neglecting, meanwhile, to remove her classic draperies. As she stepped on the street a small crowd gathered to view the unusual sight. She was only in evidence a fraction of a minute and then she returned. A man asked a boy what the excitement was.

He replied: "They've moved the Bartholdi statue from the bay and are making a picture of it in the gallery."

Digitized by Google

The Man from Montana.

By Ellen Mackubin

WHEN Madame de Poix announced her sister's engagement, the world to which they belonged—the world of self-exiled Americans which vibrates between Paris or the Riviera and Switzerland or Homburg—was volubly amazed.

"It is the old story of the porcelain pot and the iron kettle, disguised as a bit of bric-à-brac and a silver nugget," somebody suggested. "Silver comes from Montana, does it not?"

"But beauty is not improved by growing rocaro, as is bric-à-brac," somebody else laughed. "Madame de Poix doubtless feels even Montana a good haven after Claire's extended voyage."

"Claire will never go to Montana," still another declared. "Nevil is multi-millionaire, and Madame de Poix will settle him in Paris; she is such a capital manager."

The lady who deserved this eulogy was that moment occupied in her own apartment with the costs of her sister's trousseau.

"He really is delightful, Claire," she was saying complacently. "He could not be more anxious to hurry the marriage and arrange things as I desire if he were a romantic boy, instead of a man who has made a fortune which might justify him in some exactions."

"I am afraid he is rather romantic," Claire answered, looking up wistfully from a contemplation of her superb engagement ring. "He talks so much of—of love."

"What else should he talk about, you foolish dear? Especially as you can still blush as charmingly as when you were eighteen!" Madame de Poix laughed.

"But I am twenty-eight, and love seems as far from me as——"

"As the next room," her sister interrupted gayly, while a servant announced that Monsieur Nevil was in the salon.

"Duty," Madame de Poix added gravely—for duty, according to her perception of it, was as entirely the law of her life as of a soldier's—"duty will make love for your husband as easy for you as it has made it for me."

The color deepened yet more in the delicate oval of Claire's cheeks as she arose.

Though hitherto her sister had been confessor to every action and nearly every fancy, she could not tell Adelaide that Nevil had received her promise to marry him with a fervor she was sure Baron de Poix could neither have uttered nor understood, and which she felt to be, if not beyond her own comprehension, yet quite beyond her repetition.

Six weeks since, in the perfumy Swiss garden where chance of travel had brought together two whom every law of environment and circumstance had set far apart, she had shrunk from this new interpretation of that which she had been taught to believe a merely necessary episode in every woman's life.

"I—I do not think what is called 'love' can be as worth trusting as liking," she faltered to the big man who held her slim fingers in his strong grasp and smiled at her—a smile so confident, yet so tender, that something fluttered oddly in her throat. "I—I am not a girl; I have heard of 'love' before, but it never really meant much—and affection such as my sister's is strong—oh! the very strongest thing I know!"

"But not so strong as the love I shall teach you," he declared. "How am I sure? By my own heart! You have been asleep all those years, like the Princess in the fairy tale, and I thank God for it—because love woke her at last, and I love you enough to make a plain man from Montana into a Prince who will rouse you from dreams to realities. Only give me time, my Princess," he added, his eager voice steadying as she turned away.

All her life Claire Sylvester had been a beauty, a treasure wherewith her mother and sister hoped to retrieve a lost fortune. Gentle, reserved, she yielded herself to this home affection which formed the centre of her existence within the pageant of gay flattery which surrounded her abroad. But marriage for a portionless beauty, however admired, is difficult of achievement in continental society, where every bride is expected to bring a dower; and there had been no marriage offered to Claire which either mother or sister could press upon her fair youth. Four years since the mother had died, and Adelaide had unexpectedly married an elderly Baron, who condoned her lack of "dot" for the comfort so excellent a ménagère would bring to his widowed household, where soon there would be a couple of daughters old enough to require a chaperon. Faithfully, during the succeeding seasons, Madame de Poix had taken her sister from one fashionable resort to another, and Claire, her heart aching for her mother's loss, had grown weary of this exhibition, though justifying it as a woman's natural vocation, because Adelaide so considered it—and Adelaide was the wisest, the most conscientious of beings.

Then, in the previous summer, the eighteenth birthday of the Baron's eldest daughter had forced Adelaide's unwilling admission that her appearance in society must mean Claire's retirement, as financial reasons forbade toilettes for two demoiselles.

And on that very day came the man from Montana!

Possessing a fortune and a reputation which his bankers and the American Minister alike vouched for as being beyond question, eager to make a settlement for Claire, he seemed, if not the titled ideal of Madame de Poix's fancy, yet a husband with whom her sister's future would be safe. She had welcomed him as answer to prayer, and without doubt of Claire's content.

"Tell me that I have not hurt you!" he exclaimed

Their wedding day was only a week distant on a certain afternoon, when Claire found in his greeting something beside the joy at sight of her with which his glance was always eloquent.

Presently he grew silent, gazing into the fire with such preoccupation that she spoke twice before he became aware of her speaking.

"I beg your pardon!" he exclaimed. "Do you mind saying that again?"

Claire was not used to divine the moods of even those most familiar to her, but she understood the troubled eyes which six weeks since had been a stranger's.

"I am afraid you have had bad news," she began.

His eyes brightened swiftly.

"Does that fear bring you nearer to me?" he asked, lifting her hand to his lips, and Claire found that she was bending toward him as he sat beside her sofa. "It is worth considerable anxiety to see you stir a little, my Princess."

"There is bad news, then?" she insisted, and did not withdraw her hand.

"No news at all, since I have asked for it," he answered, while his look of anxiety returned. "There are rumors in to-day's papers of a big crash in Western mining stocks, and a mention of my name as the chief victim. But, though I cabled at once and there has been more than time for a reply, I have heard nothing."

"A big crash? You a victim?" she repeated confusedly; "surely you are safe?"

"You remember my doctors sent me over here for a thorough holiday after a close call with typhoid fever?" he said slowly. "Well, my partner, whom I trust as I trust myself, has acted for me in every deal during nearly half a year, and I am responsible for his losses, even as I profit by his gains."

"If one trusts, I think one's trust should not be shaken by a rumor," Claire murmured, her glance drooping to the clasped hands lying on her knees—his so brown and strong; hers so white and fragile.

"That theory is worthy of your sweetness," he said, and the subtle doubt in his voice brought Claire's glance back to his eyes again, "and you are little given to theories. Is it because those you hold are well tried, or because——?"

He arose restlessly.

"I'm going to my hotel," he exclaimed. "I did not tell my man to bring a cablegram after me, and one may come at any moment."

He stood frowning at his boots for an instant, while Claire gazed at him wistfully. How vigorous, how courageous he looked. Yet how much he wanted comfort just now—and wanted it from her!

Claire was accustomed to have comfort bestowed upon her with caresses and soothings. But to have comfort sought from her, with such dumbly obvious desire, was a new experience, and one which fluttered her breath to speechlessness.

"Will Madame de Poix let me come back after dinner?" he asked, picking up his hat. "I daresay I shall have news by then which will make me better company."

"Of course you may come," she answered, and, coloring softly, she held up her cheek to him in dainty, deliberate, French fashion.

"Au revoir!" she said.

He turned from her with an unsteady laugh.

"That is not the way the Princess awoke!" he exclaimed, and left the room.

Again Claire withheld her confidence from Adelaide. She felt vaguely that in her sister's esteem the anxiety which disturbed Nevil would discredit him, and she dreaded that lady's astute conjectures thereupon. Never had she been so impatient of the slow movements registered upon the drawing-room clock. Yet slow as the moments seemed, eleven sounded at last, and Madame de Poix, whose nap came to an end at the same moment on each of their stay-at-home evenings, arose with a yawn.

"Chérie, did you quarrel with him this afternoon?" she asked gayly, while Claire put away her embroidery.

"He had correspondence which probably detained him," Claire answered serenely.

But she stared at her image in her bedroom mirror with curiously shining eyes.

"That is not the way the Princess awoke!" she repeated half aloud—and hid the shining eyes.

When Nevil's card was brought to her next day she entered the salon by one door as her sister appeared by the other.

He took Madame de Poix's offered hand briefly, and turned to her.

"You have heard?" she exclaimed without greeting. "You——"

"I have heard that my partner is dead and that I am ruined," he said.

He was exceedingly pale, and there were lines under his blue eyes which had not been there yesterday, yet his glance was calm, his voice was steady. Emotion and uncertainty had vanished together.

"Ruined!" gasped Madame de Poix; "surely that is impossible! A fortune of millions does not disappear in a night like Aladdin's palace!"

"It did not disappear in a night," he said gravely. "It has been weeks, perhaps months, in going. I do not know the details, but the result is certain."

"Good Heavens!" cried Madame de Poix. "This is very terrible!"

She looked from the stern truth written in his face to the startled wistfulness of Claire's mien.

"Chérie," she said, "you know nothing of business, and Mr. Nevil has, of course, some business to discuss with me. Wait a little in your own room and I will send for you—if necessary."

"Please do not go," Nevil exclaimed. "I have little to say, because I have heard little, yet your sister, Madame, is entitled to be told that little by me."

He paused. He grew visibly paler.

"The bitterest loss with which this news confronts me is not the collapse of my fortune, nor even the death of my friend: it is that I am in honor bound to offer your sister release from her promise to marry me."

Claire's beautiful frightened eyes flashed one glance at him, which saw in his steadfast gaze only a somewhat haughty composure.

She turned away, covering her eyes with her hands.

There was silence.

"Your words, Mr. Nevil, anticipate my request," Madame de Poix began presently. "They are all that can be said by an honorable man, who, I am willing to believe, was as deceived as we concerning the condition of his affairs when he led my sister into this unfortunate position."

Nevil made a step toward Claire:

"The wealth I have lost shall be mine again before I am five years older, and I do not shrink from the struggle!" he cried. "But you—perfect flower of luxury and of cultivation—you would droop in sharing such a struggle. Unless you found strength where other sweet women have found it who have gone into exile with the men they loved." His voice sank.

Madame de Poix—her own eyes dim—prayed that Claire might not see the passion of tenderness and longing which transfigured him, and her prayer was granted.

Claire neither spoke nor lifted her face from her shielding hands—and how should Nevil guess that her silence was guarded by a dread that, once away from the pain of this parting, he would be gladly rid of so helpless a burden?

"We do not blame you, Mr. Nevil, for a disaster which, we are convinced, finds you as unprepared as ourselves," Madame de Poix said smoothly, "but, both as our due and from sincere friendliness, I must ask some explanation of how such a calamity has been brought about."

Claire sank into the nearest chair, her arms upon its tall back, her shut eyes pressed against her arms.

She heard his voice, firm though monotonous; she heard questions and ejaculations from her sister, but of the words either spoke she heard not a syllable. She, who never in her life had thought for herself, was bewildered in this chaos of fast-crowding thoughts. He was going from her, he whose presence during six weeks had dimmed her memory of the years which had gone before his coming. He was going, and she could not keep him. He did not even ask her to go with him. He who had been sure that the love of which he talked so much was a worker of miracles. He accepted without dispute a belief that her silly, helpless self could never find place in the struggle for which he was already eager.

Digitized by Google

The voices ceased. An instinct that he was beside her roused Claire. She arose to her feet and faced him as he stood holding out his hand.

"Tell me once, that I may repeat it to myself a thousand times—tell me that I have not hurt you!" he exclaimed.

But Claire was dumb. The strange language her heart was learning is no easier to utter in its first lessons than others which mean less.

A great yearning—a great surrender, burned in his gaze.

"A little more and I should have won you, my Princess, but as it is—good-by!"

He caught her in his arms. Quivering kisses, which until now had reverently touched her fingers, rained on lips and cheeks and brow.

"Forgive me, sweet!" he panted. "Next week you would have been my wife!"

Then she was free—and a door closed heavily.

How long was it before Claire became aware of her surroundings again? She found herself mechanically drinking orange-flower water in her bedroom, while Adelaide, busy with the same French panacea for disordered nerves, regarded her with kindly anxiety.

"Say something, chérie," she implored. "Such a change in your life surely needs some words."

"I have just learned them," Claire said slowly; "I will write them to him."

"What will you say?"

"What a woman must say to the one she loves when he is troubled—'Come to me!'"

"Loves?" repeated Madame de Poix. "You who yesterday declared that you knew nothing of love?"

"To-day I know only the beginning," Claire answered humbly, "but he has taught it to me, and he—I think he will be glad to go on with the lesson."

"Nonsense! He is fond of you, naturally—you are very charming—but his mind is too filled with money getting for his heart to ache——"

"Adelaide, if the Baron should lose his fortune, would you give him up?"

"It would be my duty to stay with him. I am his wife."

"And next week I should have been Nevil's wife," Claire said dreamily.

Adelaide sat down beside her. She was very kind, very sensible, and though after half an hour of argument in a circle she was also very much vexed, yet she remained the careful sister whose will had been law to Claire for nearly thirty years.

Nevil was gone, Madame de Poix in substance remarked. There should no blame be said of him which her influence could prevent. He had behaved like an honorable man of the world in releasing Claire without more ado. It was not his fault that he had left her in a position which it was difficult to contemplate calmly. The trousseau, for example, had advanced too far to be countermanded, and must be paid for. Yet, with alterations, some of the dresses would do for Elise, and perhaps, if God were good to them, Claire might yet require a trousseau with another bridegroom. But she must not fret. She must bear her position with dignity and without tears—tears which faded a complexion and dimmed eyes uselessly.

There were no tokens of such devastators as Claire listened, her head drooping a little, and all she said was a murmur between the pauses of Adelaide's eloquence:

"I must see him again!"

After a while a servant announced the carriage for Madame la Baronne, and Adelaide arose at once. She never kept the horse waiting—he was a well-bred horse, though past his prime, and the Baron, with perhaps a fellow-feeling for him, did not like his time in harness wasted.

She kissed Claire with a sigh and went away. To-morrow everybody would know, and therefore it would be unseemly that Claire should have been seen driving in the Bois on the day of her fiancé's departure.

When her sister was gone Claire remained motionless half an hour longer, while the light which had dawned in her soft eyes burned steadily.

She paused again after she had opened her desk.

She meant to tell Nevil all her heart held for him. Yet nothing was written when she sealed her note but the three words she had told Adelaide she should send him.

Then she rang—once—twice. There was no response.

This was an obstacle she had not anticipated.

Nevil was to leave Paris that evening, Adelaide had said. Some messenger for her note must be found at once. She dared not risk delay and she walked to the door. It was locked.

Claire stood staring at the white panels, a flush, which was the red flag of her first revolt, stealing into her pale cheeks.

Adelaide had resolved that her will should rule in the future as it had ruled in the past. The past had been ruled in kindness. Kindly should the future be ruled also. But between the past and the future Nevil stood.

"I will see him again!" Claire cried aloud.

Through the stillness which followed that cry there floated up from the courtyard the voice of a woman singing. Though the air ran riot and the voice was coarse, Claire's soul thrilled to it.

The concierge was sitting outside her loge, in full view of this bedroom window. The concierge owned keys of every apartment and of each room in the apartment.

Claire possessed that boon bestowed upon those who lack imagination: if she saw but a little way she saw that little very clearly and quite unperplexed by cross lights.

"Bon jour, Madame Martin," she cried from her window.

"Bon jour, Mademoiselle," the concierge responded.

"I cannot find my key, nor can I make the maid hear my bell. Will you come up and free me?"

"At once, Mademoiselle."

Five minutes later, drooping her discreet eyes that they might not betray her perception that Mademoiselle had been obviously a prisoner, the concierge took the note and promised its immediate dispatch.

Claire went into the drawing-room and stood watching the clock on the chimney.

Nevil's hotel was only half a mile distant, near the Arc de Triomphe. His train, which must be the "Calais Express," would not start until eight. There were yet several hours before his departure. Suppose the messenger did not find him in his rooms? Suppose Adelaide returned before he came to her?

Claire's heart beat yet faster. Not easily does a gentle soul fling aside the fetters of a will which has hitherto held it imprisoned—none the more easily when those kindly meant fetters have scarcely been felt until now.

Yet the delicate lips set themselves; the light burned steadfastly in the soft eyes.

Face to face with Adelaide she would say to him——

Dear God! What should she say to him? She who grew breathless at the sound of a closing door and of a quick step in the corridor. Within the threshold Nevil paused.

"I know why you sent for me," he said hurriedly. "You were frightened this morning. Not until I was gone did your conscience remember that you owed me some faithfulness—or protest of faithfulness—you who were to be my wife next week! You sent for me to tell me that you are ready to fulfill what would have been your duty a few days later——"

He broke off. He stepped nearer, flinging out his hands with passionate repudiation.

"I release you from any claim or fancied claim of duty. To know that you were so bound to me through the years of struggle which must come would make me helpless for that struggle. I will not accept your self-sacrifice——"

She had doubted what she should say to him. She had trembled at the saying of it, but now, in the very presence of his vehement rejection, she doubted no longer.

She went swiftly to him and put her arms about his neck.

"Was this the way the Princess awoke?" she murmured—and kissed him.

When, somewhat later, Madame de Poix entered her salon she displayed that rare endowment of experienced generalship which bears defeat in such manner as to give it some appearance of victory.

Perhaps she was not sorry to have her sister's future provided with a happiness of which Claire permitted no doubt—since her own responsibility for its wisdom had been forcibly prevented. At all events, a quiet marriage took place in her apartment a couple of days earlier than that fixed for the ceremony—and the world, when it heard fragments of the story, declared the man from Montana to be more classic than barbarous, since he had inspired a fair statue with life.

DRAWN BY WILL GREFE

"RUINED!" GASPED MADAME DE POIX; "SURELY THAT IS IMPOSSIBLE!"

One Disposal of the "Unearned Increment"

NOT long ago a young man in St. Louis attracted some attention by refusing to accept $2000 sent to him by the managers of an estate in which he was interested. He said that he did not want the money for the reason that he had not earned it. Certain property had increased in value to such extent that there were profits to divide. In the payment of dividends the check for $2000 was sent and refused. The young man, whose name is James Eads How, a grandson of the man who built the St. Louis bridge and the New Orleans jetties, and son of James How, for many years Vice-President of the Wabash Railroad Company, said that he preferred that the money should be given to the poor. He suggested that a committee of five men should dispose of the fund in the interest of the needy. The committee was selected and the money was so distributed.

Mr. How was genuinely sorry that the story got out. For two years he had worked quietly, spending his time and money in St. Louis and other cities where it would do the most good. He had abandoned the profession of his father—railroading—in order to devote himself to actual work among the needy. He left the home of his family and took up lodgings in a part of St. Louis where it was possible for him to be in daily touch with the subjects of his interest.

Mr. How does not believe in organized charity as the phrase is generally applied. He wants to know for himself whether this or that family, if intelligently helped, will be the better for it. If not, he wants to know the reason, for its value in estimating the worthiness of another case. Labor and its reward form the basis of all of Mr. How's reckonings. He believes that the unequal distribution of wealth—even granting that the man of wealth applies his talents and his energies, and that the exceptionally poor man fails to master his opportunities—is subject to correction. His practical experiences and observations may help him to work out a solution of the problem that has disturbed all of the thinkers of the century. Mr. How thinks that, as a rule, large inheritances are not good for the fortunate beneficiary, and he is quite sure that their bestowal upon a young man is not good for community interests.

He believes that much of the great wealth of the land should pass to the community. Distribution should begin anew, always with the consideration of fitness and worthiness in mind.

Mr. How contends that alms given right and left cause an increase of crime and pauperism. The community brings wealth to the individual, and it is this community and its intertwined workings, he thinks, that should be considered by the individual in the redistribution.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA

421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Ordeal of Laughter

SINCE Thersites attacked the great son of Atreus, and would have prevailed through ridicule had not Ulysses beat him about the shoulders with his sceptre, every man who has aspired to a high place, every statesman who has argued for a great cause, every scientist, inventor and discoverer who has blazed out a new path for progress has had to dread the shafts of ridicule more than the attacks of ignorance.

Trial by fire is a hard test, but trial by laughter is the supreme ordeal. Men will face death when they would run from ridicule. A serious attack on a new movement serves but to solidify it, where a sneer would often disperse its forces. And so laughter has become the logic of unreason; a sneer its final argument. For it is hard to think and easy to laugh, and most men fear not to laugh with the crowd lest it turn and laugh at them.

In religion, in literature, in politics, what man would destroy he first makes ridiculous. Ingersoll, laughing and sneering at religion, crowded the lecture-rooms of the country, where Ingersoll, serious and logical, would have faced empty benches. Hobson, the hero, was swallowed up and forgotten for the moment in the great guffaw that greeted his indiscretion. It is not the abilities, but the waistcoats of Woodruff that are attacked; not the record, but the teeth of Roosevelt that serve the cartoonist in good stead. In the Senate, a few weeks ago, it was not the able argument of Beveridge that was answered, but his mannerisms that were burlesqued. Thersites was on hand, and the Senate roared at a bit of humor as crude as its own peculiar idea of courtesy.

All this is as it should be. A great idea or a great man is never laughed down and out. In the end the sceptre of common-sense prevails. For, though the crowd loves its laugh, it usually distrusts the man who provokes it, and unconsciously begins to respect the one who perseveres in his purpose despite it. And if ridicule has its abuses, it has its uses. It punctures the sham for all time and strengthens the real to its final triumph.

Success or failure is more a matter of character than of cash, more a case of doing than of dollars.

The Right of Private Opinion

THERE is a growing feeling among persons of culture that a man's private convictions are sacred, and that it is impertinent to question them. Bishop Williams, of Connecticut, when asked by a meddlesome person if he had any religious belief, replied in the same spirit, "None to speak of."

Every individual, however humble, should insist strenuously on the right of private judgment, and repel the assumption that there is any culpability in not absolutely accepting the prevalent political or religious beliefs.

I have been surprised at the number of intelligent people who publicly echo the current beliefs for fear of social odium, though confessing grave doubts regarding them in private.

The dread of sweeping criticism makes cowards of us all, and prevents honest expression of convictions. People applaud the accepted doctrines, yet all the time, like the ancient augurs, they are laughing in their sleeves. They expect men to say conventional things in public, and then complain that they talk platitudes.

Therefore it is wise not to meddle with individual opinions. Even children should not echo their elders' views like little parrots. Every rational man should read John Stuart Mill On Liberty, and cultivate a tolerant spirit toward those who entertain contrary opinions. Otherwise, democracy is a failure and freedom of thought impossible.

We should display "sweetness and light" in argumentation, and concede that there is a reverse side to the shield, and that others may be at least partly right. It is idle to bandy epithets or to brand men as "traitors," "infidels" or "anarchists" because they differ from us.

Sagacious persons decline to discuss politics or religion in mixed gatherings to avoid hard feeling. Franklin's tactful and suggestive manner should be imitated by every one who seeks to persuade. Matthew Arnold practiced the same suave and insinuating methods, and Gladstone converted his bitterest opponents by his candor and fairness.

—CHARLES F. WINGATE.

It is easy to revere friendship—it is hard to trust it.

How Figures Lie

"I DO NOT believe in theories; I believe in facts and figures," says the practical man. Here is an individual who can be made to believe anything. Suppose he should say, "I do not believe in logical processes that lead to conclusions, but I do believe in facts that may be misrepresented and figures that can be juggled," you would say, "The man is a fool." And he is.

Let this individual open part three of the census of 1890. He will find that there are 79,032 more married males in the United States than married females! As the widowed are separately tabulated and as the women of Utah would incline the balance the other way, the numbers, making deductions for Utah, should exactly correspond.

A few months ago the Rochester Herald took the annual report of the New York State Board of Charities, where it is stated that the inmates and other beneficiaries of State institutions number more than 2,500,000, and said that "two and a half million people in a population of 7,000,000 receiving charity may well create a surprise in the foremost State in the Union." Indeed it may, but it is not nearly so surprising as the Rochester Herald's failure to see how such figures are obtained. Obviously there are a number of individuals who figure more than once.

That very curious conclusions can be made to follow from statistics may be illustrated in those which deal with pauperism. England has the greatest number of paupers in the world (twenty-eight in each 1000), and Italy very nearly the lowest (ten in each 1000). This ought to prove to your devotee at the feet of the statistical Buddha that Italy is more prosperous than England! All it does prove is that organized poor relief in England is more systematic and thorough. In the United States paupers will not number more than two or three in each thousand, but this would not be a measure of our prosperity over England, for we certainly are not four times as prosperous as England. Sig. Lombroso not long ago stated that "wealth leads to crime," and this is the way he proved it: Rhode Island, the richest State in the Union (with an estimated wealth of $2200 to each inhabitant), shows a high percentage of crime, while Dakota and Alabama (the first having thirty dollars, the second twenty dollars to each inhabitant), show the very lowest percentage of criminality!

Another wonderful fact which the statistician has discovered is that so few great men have great sons, and this, in common understanding at least, has been established as one of the laws of heredity. But look at it. If great men had great sons there would soon be an overplus of great men, or, to have great men at all, the level of greatness would have to be raised much higher. If a large proportion of the sons of great men were idiots, that would be an important fact, but as most of them are, like most of the rest of us, men neither greatly above the average in ability, nor greatly below it, the equilibrium which Nature strives to preserve is not seriously imperiled. If we consider the proportion of great men to the rest of us, the number of those who have had offspring greatly endowed is not small.

It used to be thought that the sons of clergymen were apt to be worthless "ne'er-do-weels," and there were statistics for that. But De Candale, the distinguished French savant, says that the sons of ministers have contributed to science more eminent men than has any other class. He might have added, too, that they have also swelled the ranks of the poets, theologians, and not a few of the military heroes of the past.

On statistical absurdities such as these great reputations are built. Belief in them is a world-wide superstition; Germany is probably most profoundly deluded by them, but England and America are not far behind. I do not say that statistics have not their use; the contention I advance is that everywhere they are made to supply the place of pure reasoning, and that to multitudes of minds they stand for conclusions almost always irrational, and not infrequently immoral.

—JOSEPH DANA MILLER.

Keep the dollar moving, but don't let it roll too far away.

Going with the Current

A GREAT French poet, in a moment of exhilaration, exclaimed, "Fear nothing, man: Nature knows the great secret and smiles"; but a smaller French poet, not able to interpret universal life, felt only the hindrances to his own selfishness and cried out, "I have arrived too late in a world too old." The point of view makes all the difference.

Each man takes his stand where his own character finds most congenial footing. In religion, politics, philosophy, art, we obey the law of personal gravitation. Voltaire would have perished had his intellectual nature been fed upon what nourished Gladstone or Bismarck. Darwin moved the intellectual world with a lever so different from that used by Martin Luther, or Milton, or Leibnitz, that we can scarcely grasp the extremes of influence. Napoleon I rearranged the forces of civilization; so did George Washington; but how antagonistic were the currents of energy going out of those two batteries! Contemporary, mutually repellent, yet working together like mighty cog-wheels in a vast machine, the tyrant and the father of freedom unwittingly joined their forces to urge forward an era which should represent the splendid materialism of one and the exalted philanthropy of the other.

It is worth while to be serene and thoughtful in a time when all around us the cables binding us to the past are snapping like rotten whipcord. Let us not be hasty in concluding that any one force is breaking the old lines. "Nature knows the great secret and smiles," even though some of us may have "arrived too late in a world too old." It is of little moment, indeed, what any one of us thinks or needs; the movement of things proceeds by a law of majorities. What the prevailing aspiration dictates is the trend of civilization.

Many of us may fondly dream that Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison and Franklin set the bounds of republican institutions and chalked out the periphery of political permanence. But the gravitation of life is greater than the wisdom of any generation of statesmen. We individuals may differ touching what ought to be; yet what will be is the resultant of all the world's forces, good and bad. Europe's conflict of interests permitted us to set our flag on many islands and to thrust a splinter of freedom deep into the Orient. To save its own equilibrium for a brief time, the Old World stood by and saw a thing done which makes certain a general disturbance of its cherished plans for the future. Press the crust down here and it will rise yonder. England helped us to add a great importance to our civilization—she waved a hand of restraint in our behalf when powerful nations threatened interference—and now the inevitable reciprocity makes it sure that British civilization will inundate Africa.

We may have our qualms; some of us may feel that we have "arrived too late in a world too old"; but the cables will continue to snap under the strain of a resultant composed of all the world-influences. Call it Destiny, call it Progress, call it Decadence, call it the waxing of Maturity; but, by any name or no name, the movement goes on irresistibly, to glory it may be or to cataclysm. This is not fatality; it is the flow of life, the current of which obeys the prevailing aspiration of the world.

—MAURICE THOMPSON.

The modern temptations: for men, politics; for women, bargain sales.

The Essence of Good Judgment

GOOD judgment is a perfect balance struck between intuition and reason. The masculine mind is capable of good judgment when to its indigenous reasoning powers is added the intuitive sensibility of a woman—to a moderate degree. A woman has good judgment when to native intuition she prefixes and affixes temperately masculine logic. To Hermia's lament, "I would my father look'd but with my eye," the intelligent Theseus replied, "Rather your eyes must with his judgment look."

There are two distinct methods of making worldly success: one is by means of bold, speculative strokes; the other by patient accumulation; but one way is as dependent upon good judgment as the other. Before a speculator is worth his wage his mind must both feel and think, whether he deals in wheat, pig-iron, copper or manuscripts—the latter being perhaps the most uncertain of all quantities.

The deliberate accumulator must judge wisely in order to balance one stone while adding others to the pile he is building. The successful stock-broker says he "feels the market"; the politician "feels the pulse of the people"; the publisher "feels the public taste"; but all of this feeling would be no more conclusive nor productive than that of the woman who in argument insists upon a fact being so "just because," were not the stock-broker, the politician and the publisher familiarized with speculative cause and effect by a variety of previous experiences pertaining thereto. On the other hand, if these gentlemen claimed their impulses entirely, depending solely upon reasonable conclusions in the matter, great opportunities would invariably be lost, and frequently minor ones.

If the mother of a son who has acquired a harmful smoking habit were able to sort out in her own mind the floating ends of conviction from intolerable prejudice, she could strike a balance of temperate judgment enabling her to assist her son to control his weakness wisely, easily, instead of goading him into worse intemperance by indiscriminate nagging and opposition.

Good judgment in minor daily matters hinges upon a clear understanding of the relation of things gained by experimental comparison of order with disorder, harmony with the inharmonious. Judgment is invariably bad when colored by prejudices confining our vision to one standpoint—that at which we have arrived by means of arbitrary personal inclination irrespective of extraneous motives and standpoints bearing pertinently and logically upon the matter.

Good judgment may be pronounced deliberately or swiftly, according to the temperament of the judge, and quick judgment need not necessarily be bad judgment, although it often is so. Any fair-minded person with an eye for both sides of a question can cultivate good judgment.

—ANNA FARQUHAR.

Digitized by Google

Americans in Paris

THE most popular comic artist in France, I really believe, is F. M. Howarth. There is not a comic paper from the Sourire to the little Illustré Amusant that does not reproduce his grim and extraordinary little pictures without words. In the French "Comics" for this week he figures five times. You might not think that Mr. Howarth's humor was essentially Parisian. It had never struck me that it was. But, after all, your Parisian is a good deal like other men, a home-keeping, amiable creature, fond of a joke with harmless merriment in it.

And when he is done with Mr. Howarth, the average Parisian, it would seem, reads Marion Crawford. Two of Mr. Crawford's stories are appearing serially in the daily newspapers. I have heard so much of our great American writer, "Monsieur Crav-fore," that I have come to believe that Poe, Hawthorne, and all the rest are not worth remembering.

Queen Wilhelmina's Marriage Problem

JUST at the present moment it is Mr. Robert W. Chambers who is having his hour of success. Every really intelligent Frenchman comes at you with: "Changbare! quel génie!" As that is a little my own opinion I bought La Vie Illustrée yesterday and read an installment of Les Conspirateurs—part of the tenth and eleventh chapters. Now, there is nothing so fascinating as finding yourself in the middle of a stirring novel, without quite knowing how you got there. For instance, in Mr Chambers' conspiracy I found a German Prince and a young American Captain who looked so much alike that even the Grand Duchess herself couldn't tell them apart. On the next page I discovered that the Prince loved either the Queen of Holland or a peasant lass who looked so much alike that you couldn't tell one from the other—at least in photographs. Will Prince Edric marry the Queen of Holland in the last chapter? And what will become of the peasant lass? I do not know. Probably I never shall know. And that is the charm and beauty of it. For months, it may be for years, I shall go through life hypnotized by Mr. Chambers' problem. And when in time the Queen of Holland marries some one (as I shall see by the newspapers), I shall always wonder whether it is the Captain disguised as the Prince or the Prince masquerading as the Captain.

Unless—but I do not know—still it is not impossible—unless the Prince and the Captain are one; and the Queen is really the peasant girl, changed in the cradle; it is possible. At any rate this is the problem that is keeping all Paris awake these rainy days and nights.

Huck Finn a Boulevardier

THERE are two American names that you can conjure with anywhere in Europe—Mark Twain and Bret Harte. Huckleberry Finn is as well known to the small French boy as he is to the tanned youngster of the States. And perhaps it would surprise you—though it should not—to know that the great French critics consider this the best book written in America since Hawthorne's day. They will explain to you that it is not only fine literature, but that it is, as well, essentially racial and American. As for Bret Harte, he has almost been adopted into French literature. All this is agreeable to the right-minded American. He is pleased to see the spread of American ideas and grateful to the men of letters, those torch-bearers. In this connection I should say that The Red Badge of Courage will shortly appear in a French translation—the work of Monsieur Henri D. Davray, an accomplished translator—and thus Mr. Stephen Crane will become, vicariously at least, an American in Paris.

General Kitchener's Optimism

A FEW months before the Transvaal war broke out General Kitchener was in Paris. A French journalist whom I know called on him and brought away a very definite impression. General Kitchener is a calm, self-centred, steely man, who has only one passion and one aim in life—his business of being a soldier. His opinion of women is anything but flattering—probably because he is not married. In Egypt he used to assure his young officers that "falling in love ruins more good soldiers and spoils more promising careers than anything else." It is the old theory of the painter who "loved his art" and feared that, should he marry, his paint-brush might be jealous of his wife.

"What do you think of the project of disarmament and universal peace?" General Kitchener was asked.

"I don't think of it," said the General.

"Do you think there is any chance of a European war?"

"Well," said the General thoughtfully, "this confounded peace has been so violent it can't possibly last much longer."

The Awful Weight of a College Education

IN THE offices of the American Commissioner to Paris there are ten or fifteen—they flit about so I've not been able to count them—slim, young college boys, with brushes of football hair, yellow shoes, creased trousers and other appurtenances American. They feel the dignity that weighs upon them as representatives of the land across the sea, and are doing all they can to spread the United States language in Paris. Underneath Mr. Peck's offices in the Avenue Rapp there is a big and new and spick-and-span café. It has become almost an annex to the offices above stairs. I dropped in there yesterday to see Mr. John B. Cauldwell, the head of the art department. He was chatting with some of his friends, so I sat down, ordered a cup of coffee and waited. A half dozen of the college boys came in and took a table near me. One of them wanted ginger-ale. He asked for it calmly: "Oh, give me a bottle of ginger-ale."

The unhappy waiter shook his head.

"Ginger-ale," the young man repeated crushingly.

The waiter waved his hands in helpless agony.

"Why, don't you talk French?" one of the young fellows asked; "I thought you could talk French."

"So I can," said the other indignantly; and he added, "Garsong, coffee!"

It was a compromise.

Where Mr. Woodward Got His Accent

THE one man in the American delegation to the Exposition who speaks really good French is Mr. Woodward, the associate commissioner. He has attended dozens of meetings and banquets since he has been here and on almost every occasion he has been called on for a speech. He gets up, smiles, says the prettiest things imaginable in a French that is at once academic and perfect—perhaps just a bit too perfect to be a Frenchman's French—and then he sits down and is applauded. The other day at a breakfast of the foreign commissioners he made quite a hit.

"His French is capital," I said.

"Yes," said a Parisian confrère, "but he has that—that American accent."

Mr. Woodward overheard the remark.

"Yes," he said with the air of one disclosing a secret, "I'm an American."

It was a wise remark; I have never understood why an American should be expected to infect his French with a German accent or Japanese inflections.

Mr. MacKenna's Misadventure

THE youngest of the American correspondents in Paris is Mr. Stephen MacKenna, who represents a syndicate. He has a theory of life that, to me at least, is peculiarly attractive. His idea is that a young man should get through life on his own legs. When the Greek war broke out he decided that one who could read Homer should go and fight the Turk. When he landed in Athens an amiable Greek picked his pockets—taking watch, money and letters of credit. Mr. MacKenna set out on foot for the scene of the war. One day he came upon a little troop of Greek soldiers. The lieutenant could talk French in a way, and Mr. MacKenna explained that he had come to save Greece. The lieutenant kissed him on both cheeks and made him a corporal. They went to battle.

When the fighting was over the corporal was mustered out and paid off. While saving Greece he had earned eighteen dollars. When he reached Marseilles he discovered he did not have money enough for a ticket to Paris. He determined to walk. Day after day he tramped along the pleasant roads of France, conning Greek poetry. One evening as he entered a little village the peasants shouted:

"There he is—that's the man!" and fell upon him, tied him and stowed him away in a dungeon under the church.

The next day they put him in a cart and drove him to the nearest town. As they jolted along the peasants would come and poke him with sticks and say, "Assassin!" At last he was arraigned before some tufted official, and without much trouble convinced him of his identity. They had taken him for a murderer who made a specialty of killing lonely shepherd lads. A few days later he walked into Paris and returned to the university.

Mr. Whistler Again

A COLORADO millionaire—extremely millionaire—one who is getting up an art gallery, went to Whistler's studio in the Rue du Bac. He glanced casually at the pictures on the walls—"symphonies" in rose and gold, in blue and gray, in brown and green.

"How much for the lot?" he asked, with the confidence of one who owns gold mines.

"Four millions," said Whistler.

"What!"

"My posthumous prices," and the painter added, "Good morning."

—VANCE THOMPSON.

PIERROT'S RETURN

By Bliss Carman

Over the roofs of the town
The smoke-red moon goes down.
The winter settles on the lost sky-line
And on this heart of mine.

The days are come, Pierrot,
Wherein thou must forego
The broad green open world and mountains blue
Thy happy summer knew.

No more the whispering leaves,
The rain-drops on the eaves,
The woodland voices of hill-brooks at noon,
The leisurely wind's rune.

No thrushes now for thee
At break of day, to free
The largo of their silvery interludes
Through the green solitudes.

No sea-turn from the shore
Will come with pebbly roar
And lull, where the quiet marshes bright and wide
Are brimming with the tide.

Wood-path and orchard air
Exchanged for street and stair,
The simple habitude of old earth's joys
For motley and madcap noise

Immured within a room,
Pierrot, must thou resume
The customs of the city, gray and cold,
That make thy spirit old!

Freedom and air and light
And golden age, good-night!
Ah, lonely moon, where heaven and roof-line blend,
Be thou Pierrot's friend! . . .

A step on the entry floor?
And pausing at my door?
Surely my comrades cannot have found me yet
Entrez . . . Pierrette! Pierrette!

Digitized by Google

Aquatic Gardening for Amateurs

By René Bache

WATER gardening—a branch of horticulture hitherto neglected and almost unrecognized—is beginning to attract a great deal of attention in this country as well as abroad. One beneficial result of the new departure is the awakening of popular interest in an extensive though little-known class of plants which possess characteristics of form and beauty peculiar to themselves. An immense variety of such "aquatics" can be grown so easily in any pond that it seems a shame to leave any water surface in a landscape bare, for with the help of only one or two water plants the ugliest mudhole in a meadow may be transformed into a patch of blossoming loveliness enchanting to the eye. The cultivation required is so simple as to demand little labor and no special skill, while the seeds of all plants desirable for this kind of gardening are readily obtainable, only a few—such as the seeds of the Victoria Regia, which cost five dollars a dozen—being expensive.

Half a century ago water gardening was practically confined to a few show places in Europe, such as Chatsworth, the country seat of the Duke of Devonshire, where the first Victoria Regia fetched from Brazil unfolded its incomparable blossoms; but not until twenty-five years later was the art introduced into the United States. Since then, however, it has made rapid progress, and to-day water plants are under cultivation in most parts of the country. In fact, the propagation of them has become an important industry, several firms making a specialty of growing aquatic plants for public parks and for sale to private individuals.

Any area of fresh water is rendered so much more interesting by green and flowering growths that it is rather unusual at the present time to find in a pleasure ground an artificial lake destitute of vegetation, while even the fountains in most city parks are made beautiful in summer with vari-colored lilies and other plants—aquatic gardens, one may call them, on a small scale. Some of the earliest experiments in this kind of horticulture were begun twenty years ago at the Government fish-ponds near the foot of the Washington Monument at the National Capital, and now the half-dozen glassy lakelets are fairly covered each summer with lilies of nearly every hue of the rainbow, only a few of them being native to the United States. Doctor Hessel, the superintendent of the ponds, is an enthusiast on the subject of water plants, and he has effected a number of crosses between tropical water lilies and hardy Northern varieties, obtaining hybrids that will winter out-of-doors in this latitude.

These lilies are easily crossed, and many very beautiful and striking ones have already been produced by such artifices, the most notable achievements in this line being credited to a Frenchman named Latour-Narliac, after whom one of the most exquisite hybrids is named. But the finest of all was originated at Chatsworth—the superb Devoniensis. The first blue water lily was fetched to Europe from Zanzibar twenty-one years ago, and the loveliest pink ones are likewise African, but some of the latter hue are native to the United States. Of hardy varieties now under cultivation, six are white, four pink, four yellow and one is dark crimson. Of tropical kinds, five are blue, from sky to very dark; three white, three red, and one pink. Five varieties open their petals at night, about eight o'clock, and shut them at 10 A. M., each blossom unclosing itself three nights in succession.

The first public park in America to make attempts at water gardening was that of Fairmount in Philadelphia, but since then the beauty of Central Park in New York has been greatly enhanced in this way. There are now two aquatic greenhouses in Pittsburg and two in Chicago. Formerly there was such a hothouse attached to the Executive Mansion in Washington, but it was destroyed by fire during Andrew Johnson's Administration and it was never rebuilt. In the White House conservatories there are two or three brick tanks filled with water, in which rare blue lilies from Australia, purple ones from Zanzibar, red ones from India, and yellow ones of domestic breed are propagated for the fountains. It is an interesting fact, by the way, that the first Victoria Regia that bloomed in the United States was grown in the White House aquatic nursery.

The Victoria Regia, which may fairly be considered the most remarkable of all aquatics, is a native of Brazil, where travelers first found it blooming in streams tributary to the Amazon, its leaves, six feet in diameter, looking like enormous trays, with edges turned up four inches all around. Indian women in that part of the world, while gathering the seeds of the plant for food, put their children upon the floating platters, which afford so good a support that a single one of them is capable of upholding an ordinary man. It is said that the leaves grow sometimes at the rate of half an inch an hour, or eight inches a day, while the flowers attain a width of more than a foot—in fact, they can be made to reach fifteen inches if the water is artificially warmed. They are white when they first open, and exhale a delicious perfume resembling that of pineapples; but on the second day they turn pink. One of them will serve very well as a corsage bouquet—or might do so were it not for the prickles which cover the stalk up to the very petals.

Landscape gardeners nowadays are accomplishing wonders with waste water spaces and bog holes which happen to offer themselves for utilization. If you are so fortunate as to have a pond on your premises, you may choose for your gardening among many kinds of ornamental aquatics. There are water poppies, with bright, lemon-colored flowers; water snowflakes, whose blossoms look like star-shaped snow-crystals; beautiful blue water hyacinths, and parrot's-feather plants of exquisite foliage; wild rice, with panicles of bloom on stalks six or eight feet high; and, by no means to be forgotten, the famous Egyptian papyrus. This last is a kind of reed, from which in ancient Egypt the inner rind was cut lengthwise in strips. The strips being laid parallel and close together, another set of strips was placed transversely across them, and thus was formed a sheet which, after being pressed, hammered and dried, presented a fair surface for ink.

The seeds of all these plants may be bought from dealers, as well as those of a number of curious and interesting floating ones which have no roots in the soil, but gain their sustenance from the water, being upheld by bulbs filled with air. These latter, indeed, are among the oddest of vegetal species, possessing as they do no fixed habitation, and spending their lives in drifting about, like so many aquatic tramps. Another queer pond-dweller is the lattice-leaf plant, the living skeleton of the vegetable world. Its long, fleshless leaves consist simply of a midrib and the primary nerves.

The most interesting and beautiful of all water plants, however—with the possible exception of the Victoria Regia—is the lotus, which seems originally to have been native to India, though, perhaps through transplantation, it grew wild on the banks of the Nile before the earliest of the historic dynasties.

In ancient times the people of the Nile Valley made bread of its big seeds, which were called "Egyptian beans" by the early Greeks and Romans. At feasts the guests wreathed their heads with lotus flowers, and at a funeral it was customary to give one blossom to each mourner. The lotus, indeed, was considered sacred, being an emblem of the Nile and the symbol of the creation of the world from the waters. Its influence on architecture has been enormous, its leaves and buds appearing in the capitals of classic columns and in every sort of antique decorative carving, while in sculpture it is a constant motif. The art of Japan, into which country the plant was imported long ago, is inspired by it to a greater extent than by anything else in Nature.

A single seed of the lotus, thrown into a pond, will soon cover the water surface with a wealth of huge leaves and superb blossoms, the latter resembling gigantic pink tulips. When the petals fall they leave behind them seed-cups, which in appearance are curiously like the "rose" in the spout of a watering-pot, each hole containing one large seed.

Mr. E. D. Sturtevant, an authority to whom the writer is indebted for much of

PHOTO BY LOTHROP, RIVERTON, N. J.

VICTORIA REGIA — HENRY A. DREER, RIVERTON, N. J.

PHOTO BY LOTHROP, RIVERTON, N. J.

POND LILIES (Nymphæa William Doogar) — HENRY A. DREER, RIVERTON, N. J.

PONY
Premo
No. 6

The most successful camera of the season
Premo Cameras
Have lens and shutter better than furnished with other hand cameras
Price, $10.00 and upwards
Catalogue on application.
ROCHESTER OPTICAL CO.
59 South Street, Rochester, N.Y.

A FEAST
For Photographers!
Lloyd's Encyclopedia
Over 300 subjects and more than 300 pages. 300 illustrations. Every implement, auxiliary and accessory used in Photography catalogued at list prices. Lloyd's Prices on Discount Sheet accompanying. Hundreds of valuable formulæ. Instructions for development, printing, toning, enlarging, etc. All the up-to-date ideas in optics and optical instruments.
Price 20 Cents
FIVE ORIGINAL ARTICLES: A. Horsley Hinton, of London, on "Renaissance of Artistic Photography in America"; Dr. John Nicol on "Use and Abuse of the Hand Camera"; John A. Tennant on "Portraiture at Home for Amateurs"; F. Dundas Todd on "Flashlight Photography," and H. Snowden Ward, the great English authority, on "Instantaneous Photography." The five greatest living writers on these topics. Edition limited. Advance orders booked now. Delivery about May 1st. Send price with your order to Dept. K.
ANDREW J. LLOYD & CO.
321-325 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and load in daylight. $10.00 to $12.50.
Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

Photographs of a Model Dwelling For Sale. Also Photographs of a Model Cottage. Each set Fifty Cents. Address
S. C. JOHNSON, Lawrence, Kansas

Digitized by Google

When your Summer Tour
Is decided upon, ask your ticket agent to route you via the Big Four
Magnificent through train service maintained in connection with the
NEW YORK CENTRAL BOSTON & ALBANY
CHESAPEAKE & OHIO
East, North, West
W. J. LYNCH, Gen. Pass. and Ticket Agt.
W. P. DEPPE, Assistant G. P. and T. A.
CINCINNATI

THE ORIGINAL
25 Calibre Repeater

THE 25-20 MARLIN is one of the handiest arms made and accurate to 300 yards, with light report and little recoil. Its bullet is more reliable than a 22 calibre and the barrel does not foul as rapidly. It will kill cleanly and quickly without tearing. Smokeless powder can be used in a large variety of loads, and the ammunition is cheap.
ALL MARLINS
Rifles or Shot Guns, have a SOLID TOP ACTION and eject at the side.

OUR CATALOG, an illustrated encyclopædia on arms and ammunition, with colored cover by Outhaus, mailed for 3 stamps.
THE MARLIN FIRE ARMS CO., New Haven, Ct.

Artistic Brick Houses

Even tho' you intend growing vines on the walls of your new house, let us talk with you about
Hydraulic Front Bricks
Our Old Reds, Grays, Golds and Mottled Effects make beautiful homes at about the cost of all wood, with better style and durability.
Sample Bricks and Booklets free
New York Hydraulic-Press Brick Co.
Chamber of Commerce, Rochester, N. Y.

A New Departure in Photography
Fine Views of Principal Points of Interest in and around Chicago and Chicago's Beautiful Parks. Send for our SPECIAL OFFER OF FOUR VIEWS, MOUNTED AND STRUNG ON RIBBONS, for 25 cts., postage prepaid. 1 doz. 60 cts. With this offer we will send our Price-List for Views, Mounted or Unmounted, for Albums; also Albums complete, containing 25, 50 or 100 Views. Address:
SNAP-SHOT VIEW CO., No. 940 S. Sawyer Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

A Revival of the Dainty Portraiture of the 17th Century
Exquisitely Hand-Colored Miniatures, Set in Handsome, Genuine Rolled-Gold Brooch, 1 or 1½ inch in Diameter. These Miniatures retail regularly at $2.00. To introduce them, we will copy from any photo sent us one of these at 50 cents and mail free on receipt of $1.00, currency or P. O. Order. Copies returned. Address the material of this article, says that "the hardiness of the lotus having been demonstrated, there is no reason why it should not be made to cover shallow ponds from Cape Cod through all the coast region of the Middle and Southern States; or why it should not become as conspicuous a feature in American life and art as it is in Japan."
ANGLO-AMERICAN ART CO., York, Pa.

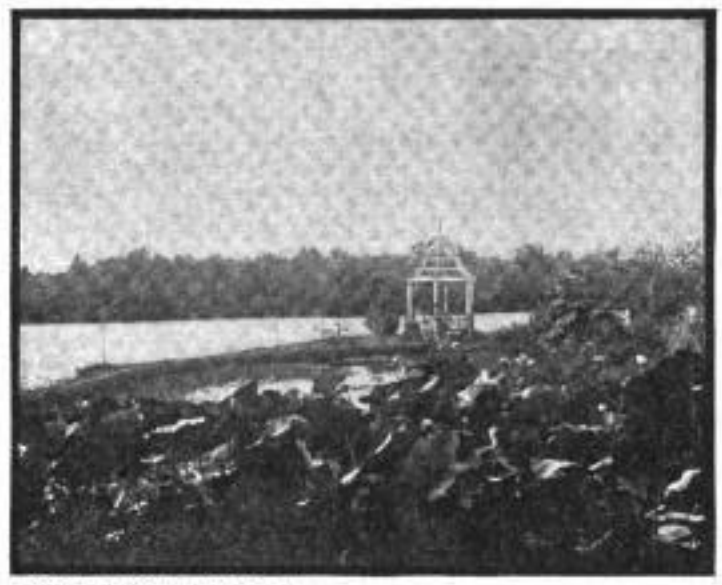

PHOTO BY J. H. HALL, JR., RIVERHEAD, N. Y.

WATER GARDEN IN THE ESTATE OF TIMOTHY W. GRIFFING, ESQ., AT RIVERHEAD, L. I.

If you are an aquatic horticulturist, and feel so disposed, you may build in your pond a miniature island, just a few inches higher than the surface level of the water, and on it you may cultivate various interesting bog plants, among which the most curious are certain carnivorous species, such as the "vegetable butcher," known to science as the Dionæa muscipula. This last is the famous plant, found only in North Carolina, whose every leaf is a trap—a pair of gaping jaws that wait patiently to capture any fly or other insect which may walk in attracted by the sweetish stuff inside. A victim once enticed thus far, the jaws close with a snap, and the "butcher" digests its prey at leisure.

Not less remarkable are the various pitcher plants, likewise at home in boggy places, which distil alcoholic liquors in graceful receptacles and make drunk the hapless cockroach or the imprudent bluebottle and afterward devour them. There is a pitcher plant in Borneo, by the way, that captures frogs and eats them—nor is this a fable, be assured, though it sounds like one.

Supposing that you have no natural pond convenient for your aquatic farming, you can always construct an artificial one. You build it of stone or brick—say, thirty feet long by twenty wide, and two feet in depth—and for the bottom of it you use old brickbats or broken stone, overlaid with cement. Into this tank, when filled with water, you put boxes of mould, covered with an inch or two of clean sand; but the soil must be very rich, for in Nature water lilies grow in shallows, where alluvium full of plant nutriment is deposited, their roots, often as thick as a man's arm, forming a network over the bottom. Of course, the artificial pond must be in a warm and sunny place, and the water must be freshened often enough to supply the waste of evaporation and to prevent it from becoming stagnant.

Some water lilies may be propagated from seeds in shallow earthen saucers overflowed with water, and, after they are well sprouted, should be planted separately in pots of rich earth. From the pots, when big enough, they are to be transplanted to the boxes in the tank, and thereafter they will manage their own affairs. Other kinds are raised from bulbs, while some hardy species native to this part of the world are reproduced by chopping up the roots and planting the pieces. The Victoria Regia may be grown in the simplest fashion by putting the seeds, which are as big as peas, into a tumbler of water and leaving them to sprout, after which they should be potted. This ought to be done in early spring, and the water must be kept warm, at a uniform temperature between eighty and ninety degrees Fahrenheit. In June the young Brazilian wonders are ready to be transferred to the tank or pond, when they will develop with astonishing rapidity, a single plant covering a space thirty feet in diameter.

Requiring so much room, the Victoria Regia is better adapted to a natural waterspace than to cultivation in a tank; but lesser water lilies will make a fine show in an artificial pond of the size described. In autumn the boxes should be removed from the tank, the lily roots being then divided and placed anew in pots of fresh loam, so as to be ready for planting out again in spring. The tubers of tropical species, however, in order to remain alive and dormant, have to be kept over the winter in damp moss in a place where the temperature is not over fifty degrees. If the latter precaution is neglected they are likely to sprout prematurely.

Speaking of building an artificial island in a pond suggests a word or two about the celebrated "floating gardens" of ancient Mexico, which represented a very singular and interesting development of aquatic horticulture. A century or two ago these gardens were quite common on the lakes of that country, being made raft-fashion, with a wicker substructure overlaid with earth, in which plants, and sometimes even trees, were made to grow. They were used chiefly for purposes of pleasure, being anchored out and fastened by means of long poles driven deep into the bottom. Usually they were rectangular in shape, averaging forty feet in length by fifteen feet in breadth—though some of them were much greater in size—and on the larger ones there was apt to be a small hut in which the cultivator lived. The soil spread upon the rafts was exceedingly rich, being scooped up from the lake bottom, and, being continually moistened by the water from beneath, produced a wonderful luxuriance of vegetation, including the choicest vegetables and most exquisite flowers.

These raft-gardens must have been very beautiful, but none of them are now to be found in Mexico. The so-called "floating gardens" of these days which are so great an attraction in the neighborhood of the City of Mexico do not float in reality, but are formed of strips of solid ground intersected by canals through which visitors are propelled in canoes. They are made by heaping up the earth to a height of two feet above the water, and yield plentiful crops of vegetables, fruits and flowers. In the canals beautiful water lilies often line the way, while many of the gardens are one mass of vari-colored flowers.

VIEW OF SECTION OF WATER GARDEN WITH LOTUS IN BLOOM—HENRY A. DREER, RIVERTON, N. J.

The improved Shingle Stain and preservative. Imparts an artistic finish to shingles and prolongs their life by penetrating the pores of the wood and retarding decay.
Shingletint is made in all desirable shades, is easily applied, the colors are permanent, and money is saved by its use.
Full information and finished samples of wood mailed free for the asking.
BERRY BROTHERS, Limited
Varnish Manufacturers, DETROIT, MICH.
NEW YORK, 232 Pearl St. CHICAGO, 35 and 37 Lake St.
BOSTON, 509 Atlantic Ave. CINCINNATI, 304 Main St.
PHILADELPHIA, 18 and 20 N. Fourth St.
ST. LOUIS, 110 S. Fourth St. BALTIMORE, 21 E. Lombard St.
SAN FRANCISCO, 117 and 119 Market St.

KoKo
PRINTS AT NIGHT
FOR BUSY PEOPLE
A PHOTOGRAPHIC paper, superior to platinum, producing matt, black and white pictures of unusual finish and beauty.
Send for our CONTRACT plan, which will enable you to procure special prices on all our photographic papers.
For twenty cents we will send you a dozen 4 x 5 paper, with developer and beautiful sample print.
Our Papers sold only by ANTI-TRUST dealers, and direct from us.

WESTERN PHOTO PAPER COMPANY
No. 1011 Cable Building, Chicago, Ill.

Electric Lighted Trains
Chicago & North-Western Ry.
THE North-Western Limited to St. Paul and Minneapolis, 6.30 P. M. daily from Chicago, cannot be excelled. Three other first-class trains from Chicago also—9.00 A. M. Daylight Train, 10.00 P. M. Fast Mail and 10.15 P. M. Night Express. All agents sell tickets via this popular route. W. B. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago.

Ladies' Watches
OUR BLUE BOOK
Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.
The Blue Book sent free.
New England Watch Company
21 and 23 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Sprockels Building, San Francisco

Digitized by Google

A welcome guest in every home where a tasty, pretty and healthful dessert is appreciated.

Do you know "Knox's Gelatine"?
It knocks now at your door.

I WILL MAIL FREE my book of 70 "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People." Send for it to-day. For 5c. in stamps, the book and a full pint sample. For 15c. and the name of your grocer, the book and a full 2-quart package (two for 25c.).

Pink gelatine for fancy desserts in every package.

CHAS. B. KNOX, 53 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N. Y.

DELICIOUS DESSERTS

Easy and quick to make, follow a few minutes' work with a

Triple Motion White Mountain Freezer

Lacking nothing a perfect freezer needs, it has good points no other freezer possesses. More than half of all the freezers in use are WHITE MOUNTAIN FREEZERS

Frozen Dainties Sent Free

A book of practical receipts, compiled by Mrs. Lincoln, of cook-book fame. Address,

The White Mountain Freezer Co.
DEPT. F, NASHUA, N. H.

Hot Waffles

Nothing Better. Or DELICIOUS WAFERS

With "Wagner" Ball-Bearing Waffle and Wafer Irons

These delicious articles may be had without any trouble.

For sale at leading housefurnishers' at $1 each, or if your dealer does not handle them, we will deliver both to you upon receipt of $2. Book of recipes, with catalogue, mailed for 3-cent stamp.

Wagner Mfg. Co.
Sidney, Ohio

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples
WILL NOT COLLAPSE

And therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.

WALTER F. WARE, 512 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

STARK TREES BEST by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Fruit Book free. We PAY Cash Weekly and want More HOME and traveling salesmen.

STARK BROS, Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N. Y.

The Island of the Innocent

By Elia W. Peattie

I HAD just buried my treasure.

This was the most important event in my life up to that time—more important by far than the mere acquirement of the treasure. Many boys of eight—I was eight—as well as other persons, have treasures, but few, since the time of Captain Kidd, have had the charming sense to bury them.

We were leaving home and going to a far-off place. It was not at my suggestion nor even with my approval. In permitting it I was merely indulging a whim of my father and mother. But, as a provision against future poverty, the sensible thing for me to do was to bury my treasure.

This treasure was interesting. It consisted of three silver dollars, gloriously large, of fifty cunning little dimes, of a gold bracelet made in semblance of a serpent, and all springy openwork so that it nearly scared me to death when I put it about my arm, because it seemed to leap and coil and cling; and a silver snuff-box, set with red and blue garnets in imitation of the American flag.

Hiding a treasure is not a thing to be done in open daylight. No, no—no, no! It should be done in the mysterious hours. I knew that. I slept but little the night before my great incident. There were reasons.

On ordinary occasions two brown earth urchins came trudging down out of the Hills of Silence and sat themselves hard upon my lids and stayed there immovably the night through. But on the eve of great events, such as Christmas or the Fourth of July or my birthday, these little friends of mine had, apparently, to go off about their own business, and they sent to me, in their lieu, two fluttering, inconstant sisters from the world of opening and shutting flowers, and these pretty creatures seemed no sooner to poise upon my eyes than they were off again and my naughty lids flew open with as much energy as the cover of my beautiful snuff-box. The comfort of all this was that I became acquainted with the gray thoughts that come hooded in the night, and the curious misshapen dwarfs called fears that skurry about the bed of a child who sleeps alone. Moreover, I had been enabled to see the sky in the early dawn when it was like one of my mamma's Japanese prints—gray like a dove's dark breast, with two broken bars of pale pink marking it. It seemed to me that Nature was often very Japanese.

The morning of the treasure-hiding I arose at four. That is what the clock said—four. There were some stars out, and a large, low, yellow one in the West looked at me very hard. I ran out my tongue at it. No star could scare me.

The apple trees had been in bloom a trifle the day before, but something had happened over night—I had heard the wind calling to me like a big boy in the dark—and now the orchard was all pink and white. As the warm air came creeping up from around the earth I saw the white veils of the blossoms part and the pink faces look out. There was perfume all about me and the wind kept blowing it to and fro.

I cannot tell what made me do it, but I sat my treasure—it was in a pretty tin box—down on the ground and ran up and down the orchard as hard as I could, and I laughed so loudly that a number of birds advanced to the utmost twig of their home-trees and reminded me that the sun was not yet up.

But in the very thick of these reproaches the sun advanced a ruddy face above the hills and shamed them, and reminded me that it was time to be at work.

I climbed a tree which stood, by actual count, exactly in the centre of the orchard, and crept out on the longest branch till I got to a certain hollow knob.

"It will be easy to remember that hollow knob," I said to myself, "and when I am old and poor I shall come back here and climb out on that branch—I shall be all in rags, with a long white beard—and drop my head and find my treasure."

I sat still for several seconds thinking about this, till a squirrel came from his hole and questioned me from a neighboring tree. Then I sank my plummet, let fall my line, and dropping after it recklessly, I dug and dug till I had an impressively deep hole.

Then I buried my treasure and scattered twigs and leaves and blossoms over it, refraining, with a wood-craft which commended me marvelously to my own approval, from overdoing it. Then I went back to my home, and, by the exercise of all of my will, forced myself to eat breakfast as if my life were the same open book it had been only yesterday.

The next week I and my parents moved away. We went very far and settled in a place where I could no longer hear the sea. Neither could I see apple trees in bloom, nor hills flushed with green. There were hills, it is true, but the smoke of many smelters—blue and green smoke, corrosive and evil—quenched the glory of the hills and forbade the trees to grow.

I learned many new things and became acquainted with some new boys, and, almost before I knew what was happening, I grew up.

Growing up has its penalties. I was sent away from home to college, but instead of going East as I had expected I would, I went West and studied at the university nearest the sunset. I met a dear girl there whom I married later, and, as I had no wander-year after my college course, I and my young wife started around the world together.

I told her about the treasure one night when we were sailing up the Yang-tse-Kiang. She clapped her hands gayly.

"We will go dig it up together," she said. "We will do it by moonlight. Can you hear the surf from the orchard, Ted?"

"Oh, quite plainly! And, if the moonlight is not too bright, we can play that the treasure consists of 'pieces of eight' and Spanish doubloons."

"No, no!" cried my dear. "It is not necessary to pretend anything. This is one of the first times in my life in which I have found everything so delightful that I do not need to pretend."

"Very well," I laughed, "then what we shall find will be a red tin box containing three dollars, gloriously large, fifty cunning dimes, a serpent of gold that springs and coils and clings, and a silver snuff-box set with blue and red garnets in the pattern of an American flag."

My dear young wife died before our long marriage-journey was completed, and I, dreading to go back to the town where the sulphurous smoke killed the green things and poisoned the air, determined to begin seriously the work for which I had endeavored to fit myself at college.

Metallurgy had been my study, and now I turned all my attention to it, and, because my energies were so concentrated, I presently made something of a mark for myself. I began to receive commissions from institutions of one sort and another, and so it came about that, in the course of the next thirty years, I traveled much.

I got into a foolish way—because my life was so nomadic, I suppose—of thinking a great deal about the time when I was a boy and really had a home. I had entered a formula in the first notebook which I ever possessed, of the place of the buried treasure, and I never got a new notebook without devoting the top of the first page to this entry:

"Centre tree of apple orchard—long limb pointing to the South—directly under hollow knob—seven paces from the tree."

I planned to go some time and forget all the knowledge that burdened me and the people I knew and the work I had to do, and follow these directions explicitly and dig till I came to my treasure. It seemed to me that when I found it the labor and pain of the years would slip away like a river that flows to the sea.

The time came at last. I had two months for a vacation before setting off for the Andes. So I went to the old town and up the dusty road—it was late in the summer and the grapes were ripe—to the house. It looked ludicrously mean. I laughed aloud when I saw it. I went in and told the woman who lived there who I was.

"You are quite welcome, Mr. Barton," she said. "You must stay right here with us, of course."

"I wish I might have the room I used to have when I was a boy, Mrs. Edwards. It was the room with the double gable-window."

"It is my son's room, but you may sleep in it."

"You have a son?"

"He is back of the house. See him yonder. He is marching up and down with a wooden gun over his shoulder."

"I am going out to speak to him," said I.

When the lad saw me he touched the képi of his little military cap. I returned the Fine Furniture From Factory to Fireside

Be your own jobber and retailer. You can order from a catalogue just as well as they can. By ordering from our catalogue you save their large profits.

$49.75 For this exquisite table and six upholstered chairs

The six chairs, one arm and five side, are made of selected wood—quartered white oak, golden finish (like table), hand rubbed and polished, have French legs and rails, claw feet, spring seat, stuffed with best quality of moss and hair, and covered with the best machine-buffed furniture leather—green, tan, maroon and red. The side chairs sell at $5.50 and the arm at $7.00.

The table individually sells at $21.50. It is quartered white oak, with golden finish (hand rubbed and polished), has French legs, claw feet, and opens to six feet.

The set of six chairs and table at our regular prices would cost $50.00, and through a dealer would cost from $75.00 to $100.00. For cash with order (only $49.75) we will send the set, prepaid, to any point east of the Mississippi, with the understanding that it may be returned at our expense and money refunded if not found to be the best ever offered at such a low price.

Send for new elaborate catalogue.

JONES FURNITURE COMPANY
Dept. J, Syracuse, N. Y.

Ye Old Hickory Chairs

No. 332 CHAIR delivered Free to any R. R. Station east of the Rocky Mountains for $2.75. Two for $5.

(BUTT ANTIQUE) Are old-fashioned comfort with modern workmanship, wrought from Nature's best and most-lasting material,

Rustic Hickory

This most beautiful and lasting furniture, made from the choicest white hickory saplings, with the bark on, is in vogue to-day as in your grandfather's time.

If your dealer does not keep them, write for illustrated catalogue, free, showing 68 patterns and unique Twentieth Century styles of Rockers, Settees, Tables, and all varieties of Rustic Furniture for Lawns, Verandas, etc., for Homes and Clubs.

Pretty settee for $7.50.

The Old Hickory Chair Co., Martinsville, Ind.

BACK RESTERS

For Stenographers, Bookkeepers and Office Men

McCloud Adjustable Spring-Back Chair

(Successor to Davis Chair Co.)

Gives delicious comfort. You can work three times as long without fatigue, because the back can be adjusted forward or backward at any angle over the seat to give support where it is most needed, between the shoulders or at the small of the back.

It is superior to all other Chairs for use of Typewriter, desk or piano. Made in wood, cane, leather seat or back, including high chair for standing desk, in endless variety, all combining grace and elegance never before attained. Send for free catalogue and prices that will please you.

THE DAVIS CHAIR COMPANY
S. N. McCLOUD, Manager. Marysville, Ohio

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER

Is the Best

Does Perfect Work
Easy to Operate
No Jagged Edges

Sample 25c, postpaid

Correspondence solicited by the trade. Money refunded if not satisfactory.

CHAS. G. HOPPER, Mfr.
Germantown, Pa.

PURE WATER

How to Obtain It. 40-page Catalogue FREE.

WRITE THE

NATIONAL STILL CO., Columbus, Ohio, U. S. A.

Digitized by Google

Every One May Now Drink Tea!

Tannin Conquered at Last

Tea-Ette

Healthful Nutrition	The Greatest Discovery of the Age

Tea-Ette is pure Tea of the best grades, treated by a process which modifies the Tannin without destroying the good qualities of the Tea. TEA-ETTE is the result of careful scientific research. It aids Digestion, Builds Up and Strengthens the Nervous System. It is rapidly finding its way into the best families, who recognize the evil effects of Tannin on the Lining Membrane of the Stomach. TEA-ETTE is the purest tea in the market. If your grocer has not yet included it in his stock, ask him to get it; or on receipt of 50c. we will mail one-half pound package. State kind of Tea you drink: Oolong, English Breakfast or Mixed.

ROYAL TEA-ETTE COMPANY
43 Wallabout Market, Brooklyn, N. Y.

TYRIAN RUBBER GOODS

THE STANDARD

Our successful record of 40 years is due, we believe, to the quality of our goods. You can buy lower-priced goods, but they are not "Tyrian" quality.

"Tyrian" Combination Fountain Syringe and Hot-Water Bottle

Our latest addition to this well-known specialty is the addition of the "Globe Spray" pipe, which doubles its value. In hard-wood box.

Sold by all druggists; if you fail to find it, we will mail a 2-quart size direct for $2.00.

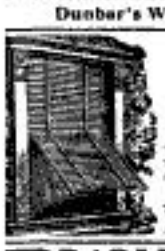
A special circular, "Advantages and Use of the Globe Spray Pipe," free for the asking.

Other Specialties: Syringes, Atomizers, Nipples, Air Cushions, Rubber Gloves, Sheeting, Letter Bands, Plant Sprinklers, etc.

Ask your Druggist for "Tyrian" Rubber Goods.

TYER RUBBER CO., Andover, Mass.

Color of Your Walls.



s it faded, greasy or scaling off?
Are your walls full of cracks?

Muralo

s the only sanitary wall coating that is satisfactory solution. It is a disinfectant, made in 24 bright tints, and a booklet, hich is free, will tell you how to decorate ric-à-brac in relief, as well as to renovate our walls and ceilings.

rite Dept. S. THE MURALO COMPANY
New Brighton, Richmond Borough, N. Y.

THE MURALO COMPANY
Dunbar's Wharf, Limehouse, London, Eng.

Wilson's NEW OUTSIDE Venetian

Blind and Awning Combined

Operated from inside; rolls up into small space. Easy, simple and perfect. Admits air, excludes sunlight. Catalog No. 1 free.

J. GODFREY WILSON
74 West Twenty-third Street, New York
Also Rolling Partitions, Wire Screens, etc.

BRADLEY Platinum Paper

For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Sample photos free.

The Paper on which Photographic Masterpieces are made.

JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 13th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

salute. He presented arms with his wooden gun. "Lieutenant, what is your name?" I asked. He grinned, delighted.

"Ted," said he.

"No!" I cried, "it can't be!"

"Why not, sir?"

"Because that is my name. At least it used to be." I thought of how it looked now, Edward Thomas Burton, with a lot of joyless titles strung after it, and sighed. Times had been much better in the days when I had been called Ted.

"Come, walk in the orchard," I urged.

"The orchard is no good any more," said he. "It is too old."

"But I am as old as the orchard, Ted, yet I hope I am some good."

He was shy and said nothing, and I felt that he was thinking that he had not yet made up his mind.

"Did you ever search for buried treasure?" I inquired.

A light came into his eyes. "No," he exclaimed.

"I know where there is some," I said.

"Where?" he half whispered. I opened my notebook and read:

"Centre tree of apple orchard—long limb pointing to the South—directly under hollow knob—seven paces from the tree."

"In this orchard?" queried Ted.

"In this and none other!"

He began to run and I followed him. But when we had got to the heart of the orchard I had a good deal of trouble in identifying my tree. Some of the dead trees had been cut down and the centre of the orchard was no longer a thing definitely to be determined. I decided upon my tree with hesitation, for the long branch which I had expected to find had been broken, some prodigal season, with its weight of fruit.

"I fear we shall have great trouble in finding our treasure," I said. I took seven paces from the tree, and then I remembered that my present pacing must be at least a third greater than the pacing of my short legs in that unforgotten dawn.

"Ted," I directed, "you pace."

He did and we drove a stake.

"But we must not think of making our search by daylight!"

"Oh, no, sir!"

"Arrange for me to sleep in your room to-night and we will creep out by moonlight."

We were too excited to say more. We waited for the night. We were clever—our ingenuity and cunning were really unsurpassed. We secured permission to sleep in the same room, I in the bed, Ted on a cot.

At four I arose and put on my clothes.

"Come, Ted, come! The moon is high, the tide rising. We must be gone."

Ted sprang out of bed dizzily and I helped him into his clothes. Passing the mirrors the bright moonlight afforded me a glimpse of my whitened head.

"Out upon it!" I muttered. "Can a man never forget?"

I crawled out upon the woodshed. Ted followed me. I had desired the sensation of an awful drop, but my feet touched the ground when I let myself over the lowest end of the shed.

We started for the orchard, stopping every few steps to listen.

"No sound of a keel grating upon the beach, messmate?"

"No, sir."

"No hoof-beats on the highway?"

"No."

We went on to the place. By my directions Ted had brought his wooden gun.

"Pace you here!" I commanded. "The success of this adventure depends upon your watchfulness." I dug for ten minutes. Then I relieved the sentry.

"I will watch and you may dig," I said. I put the gun over my shoulder and began my beat. Suddenly there was a cry.

"The box, sir!"

I no longer had need to feign an interest. I dashed to the spot.

"Give me the shovel," I commanded, earnestly this time.

"Must I go on guard?" asked my little friend wistfully.

"No, no! We may both be needed to exhume this mighty treasure."

We did, indeed, together lift the tiny box from its resting place. I pried back the rusted lid. We bent our heads together in our eager curiosity. Within were three dollars, gloriously large, fifty cunning dimes, a snake of gold that leapt and coiled and clung, and a silver snuff box set with blue and red garnets in the pattern of the American flag.

"Who does it belong to?" whispered Ted. It seemed great riches—a king's bounty.

"Half and half," I replied. "It is ours by half and half." We divided with amicable agreement. Then we crept through the orchard, past the pump, past the chopping block, to the shed. I paused there.

"No keel grating the beaches?"

"No, sir!"

"No hoof-beats on the road?"

"No."

"Our treasure is saved!" I cried devoutly.

I lifted my messmate to the roof and climbed up after him.

The next day I left to visit my people in Montana. I might have stayed longer in the shadow of the orchard. But something warned me to hasten away while the dew was fresh on my delight.

"How I work my plummet"

As Fresh as To-day's Bread and almost as indispensable. That's Uneeda Biscuit. It's not a noon-day novelty—it's an every-day necessity. You can always rely on the goodness, crispness, delicacy of

Uneeda Biscuit

Better now than ever.

Uneeda Jinjer Wayfer

are baked in the same way and packed in the same unrivalled way as Uneeda Biscuit.

National Biscuit Company.

A BATH FOR 2 CENTS

Is Furnished by the

VICTOR INSTANTANEOUS WATER HEATER

Waits to accept but little more; is ready for use night or day; for... whites but never uselessly for heating, shaving, dishwashing, and all domestic purposes where hot water is required. Uses Gas or Gasoline. Ask your dealer for it, or send for free catalogue.

W. J. ADAM, Joliet, Ill.

EVEN THE MOST DELICATE PERSONS FIND THAT

Royal Dutch Coffee

AGREES WITH THEM

ROYAL DUTCH is simply a pure and safe coffee, unequalled in flavor, aroma or wholesomeness. It is the highest grade of bean, roasted and refined by the

Beach Process

(Controlled by Us)

Which extracts the tannic acid and all the impurities which are allowed to remain in the ordinary brands of coffee—the direct causes of the harmful effects of coffee-drinking. Our free booklet tells all about it, and worth reading. Its story is convincing and coffee facts are given that you should know about.

Insist on Royal Dutch at your Grocer's.

A one-pound package will be mailed to any address in the U. S., postage paid, on receipt of 40c in express or Post-Office money order.

A Postal brings that Booklet.

WALTER McEWAN
Albany, N. Y.
Importer and Roaster of High Grade Coffees.

Digitized by Google

LOVELY LAMPS
May be slangy, but not when said of Solar Lamps
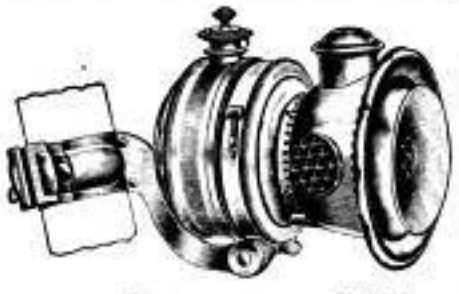
FOR CYCLES AND CARRIAGES



THEY are beauties, and better still, they satisfy. As they are the standard acetylene lamp of the world, all bicycle dealers carry them. Price $3.00, at your dealer's, or by express, prepaid, from us. Their success is due to the system of water feed, whereby water is fed through a wick to the carbide. This device is patented, so it cannot be used by other lamp makers.

Send for booklet, "Solar System." It tells all about them.

BADGER BRASS MFG. COMPANY
Station C, Kenosha, Wis.

Moving Picture Machine
$100.00 PER WEEK
And upwards is being made by many young men (without previous experience) exhibiting with our
PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT OUTFITS
WE START YOU, furnishing everything at lowest prices.
WRITE FOR OUR SPECIAL OFFER
On our EXHIBITION OUTFIT and SPECIAL IN-SIDE PRICES on Moving Picture Machines, Films, Stereopticons, Lights, Lectures, Posters, etc.; also SPECIAL POINTERS on How to Make Big Money This Season. Enc. Dept. S.
CHICAGO PROJECTING CO., 225 Dearborn St., Chicago

That is the
O. K. 1900
Acetylene
Gas Lamp

And it is "O. K." The disadvantages of heavy weight and cumbersome size overcome. But material and workmanship, and all the latest improvements in gas lamps. Reversible bracket, allowing change in elevation of four inches. No other lamp has this. If your dealer doesn't carry it, we send, express prepaid to any point in the United States, for $2.50. Descriptive Booklet free.

SEAL LOCK CO.
160 Washington St.
Chicago, Ill.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, April, 1900.

THERE is no Canaan in politics," declared Wendell Phillips, and I think from present indications that there is scarcely a Republican in Congress who won't heartily indorse Wendell Phillips. I know for certain that Robert will, for his experience in explaining himself to his constituents and to the Legislature proved a Herculean task; for the more he explained the less they understood. I was becoming very uneasy after Robert went out to Spruce City when I received from him an urgent telegram that was in the nature of a desperate appeal for help. It read thus:

> "See Senator P——. Ask him to get permission from headquarters to reveal source and reason for coercion of my vote in House."

I was almost paralyzed by this telegram, for it was proof positive that there was something more under all this business than any politician has yet admitted, and it proved that Robert had been dragooned in his vote in spite of his denial to me, and that his position in consequence was trying, even untenable. I wasted no time in thinking over the situation, for it is only a fool who stops to think at the wrong time. I made an impressive toilet. I masked my uneasiness with a bland, sweet smile, for I felt that my face should be "no February face, full of frost and storm." I called my carriage and drove forth like any damosel of old to do battle against the wicked for my liege lord. I made up my mind that I would face the whole Committee of Ways and Means, or the "peace committee," or even the Napoleon who is thought to have the Senate in the hollow of his hand and to command the party and its mercenaries. I might, perhaps, even be driven to beard the Caucus in its den. I assumed a bravery I was far from feeling, and decided not to let "I dare not" wait upon "I would."

When I reached the Senate Chamber I found no Senator P—— anywhere visible. I sent to his committee-room to no avail, and finally I had recourse to the ever-delightful, obliging Mr. Ransdell, the Sergeant-at-Arms, who promised to unearth Senator P—— if he were in the Capitol. So I took up my place in an inconspicuous corner of the gallery and idly watched the Senate while I waited. There was not much to engage the attention unless it was the spick and span new spring suit of Senator Wolcott with its glimpse of pink and white striped shirt. I found myself trying to decide which was the better set-up man in the Chamber, Senator Wolcott or Senator Hale. The latter looks like a well-to-do Wall Street broker dressed in the height of fashion, and while I was comparing these two men a third one entered who pushed them both closely as to style and get-up. This was the new Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Bennett, who was resplendent in a brown suit with a shirt that was decorated with wide bars of sky blue.

From these three exponents of spring styles my attention wandered to Senator Hanna, who always gives the beholder the idea of being the most rushed man in the chamber. His mail was just being brought in when my eye chanced to light upon him. He clutched at it with his chubby hands, tore it open, snatched at his eye-glasses in a breathless sort of way, adjusted them, and then began to roll his eyes from side to side all down the pages of his voluminous letters. When he was at last through with his correspondence, from the débris of crumpled sheets and torn envelopes that lay all about him one would have supposed that a paper manufactory had been wrecked close to his desk.

But I was not long diverted by the Senate, for just here I heard my name spoken and found Senator P—— beside me.

"Still searching for the mystery of it all, Mrs. Slocum?" he asked in debonair fashion. Then he added abruptly:

"You've heard something that worries you?"

Alas! for the mask that I thought I was wearing, for this keen-eyed man had penetrated to my anxiety at once. I answered:

"I'm in that perplexed state, Senator P——, which somebody says is worse than worst necessity, and I've come to you with 'What shall I do?' on my lips," and I handed him out Robert's telegram.

He read it once, carefully, then again, and folded it between his fingers while he contemplated me gravely.

"Come down with me to the café. We'll talk it all over while you take a cup of tea."

At this I laughed, for the idea of taking a fateful cup of tea, knowing the reputation that tea served in cups has in the Senate restaurant, was most amusing. The Senator laughed at his own little slip and said:

"Oh, well, you know that I did not mean literally tea; tea is only the generic name with me for luncheon. Will you come?"

"No, not to-day. I feel that I must work, not play. I do not know what is at stake perhaps, and Robert needs help. Can you help him?" I asked.

"I will do my utmost. Did he tell you the exact position before he went away?"

"No, that's just it; I am working wholly in the dark."

"That is only what most of us are doing, Mrs. Slocum. I think I know exactly what the position is, for we had talked this thing all over. I think I know what pressure I can bring to bear to secure this permission, and I will use it."

"But what of me?" I asked, seeing that my rôle was to be cut.

"Well, you would better go home and on your way telegraph him that you have left it all in my hands, and that I will wire him and keep him advised all the afternoon of what I am able to accomplish. I will report to you later in the day of my success or failure."

"Senator P——, you do not believe it possible that Robert could have been led into anything by all this pressure that will impugn his——" I hesitated to put it into words.

The Senator answered heartily:

"By no means, Mrs. Slocum. His only error, if there be any error at all, has been that they applied the party lash to him, and he has been made to believe that there is nothing more powerful or worth while than party allegiance. It is only when we are old and tough and thick-skinned, and have nothing more to lose, that we learn to defy the party lash, and to pretend that there is something stronger and better than party allegiance."

"And that is ——?"

"National allegiance."

"I will send Robert a telegram that everything is in your hands and that you will wire him, and this evening you will come and dine with Page and me and you will tell me all that happens?"

"I will tell you all that I can, but I may not be able to give away the secrets of the prison house in their entirety, Mrs. Slocum."

This was agreed upon, after which I left the Capitol.

All that afternoon Page and I roamed from one end to the other of the District of Columbia. By roaming I mean, of course, driving. Page, seeing that I was anxious, tried to divert me by telling me many interesting things about the District. My attention was attracted to a crowd of negroes in which there was a sprinkling of white men, and I exclaimed:

"It is a fight, Page."

"Ah reckon that's jus' what it is, Mrs. Slocum. They're jus' havin' their primaries."

"Primaries!" I echoed in surprise. "Why, Page, I thought there was no voting in the District of Columbia?"

"Neither is there, Mrs. Slocum. We're a Te'itory. We sen' delegates to the convention who mos' always disgrace us. You see, in the District it's like the old cause of complaint, it's taxation without representation; an' when people get all outdone with the way things go an' kick an' kick against what they think are wrongs, why then Congress jus' steps in an' wipes it all out, all 'cept the taxes. We never heard of their wipin' out any of the taxes."

"But why doesn't somebody get up in Congress and introduce a bill to change the form of government and give you the vote?"

"Oh! my gracious, Mrs. Slocum, we don' wan' to vote. That would be only pilin' up our miseries. But we would like somethin' like home rule here. Why, mos' all our local offices are filled by outsiders. You see it's jus' like this," and Page waxed eloquent

Editor's Note—The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife was begun in the Post of February 3. Each paper is complete in itself.

Does your father make you take care of his Bicycle Lamp? If so, make him get

The Majestic

For it's the easiest lamp

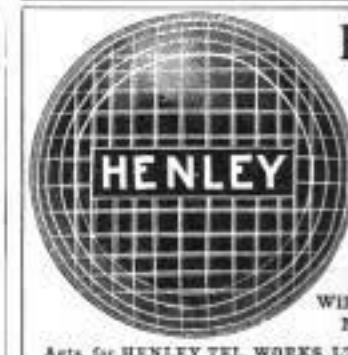
To Fill—because the carbide pot is marked so the quantity of carbide is easily gaged.

To Light—because the water-feed is perfectly controlled by a lever.

To Clean—because the reflector and its glass protector are removable by simply pressing a button.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE and give it to him

EDW. MILLER & CO., Box 125, MERIDEN, CONN.



Thousands in use in all parts of the world. In no experience A Cyclist using the Morrow for a few weeks would give up cycling rather than give up the Coaster-Brake. Ladies' skirts keep down when coasting. Feet always on Pedals. When ordering your new wheel be SURE to specify the Morrow Coaster-Brake.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

Our ACETYLENE BICYCLE LAMP is superior to any yet offered

Illustrated pamphlet, giving detailed information regarding Brake and Lamp, sent on application.

ECLIPSE BICYCLE CO., Box H, Elmira, N.Y.

Henley
Golf
Balls

Samuel Buckley & Co.

100 William Street New York

Agts. for HENLEY TEL. WORKS, LTD., London

EVERY GENUINE KREMENTZ
ONE-PIECE COLLAR BUTTON

Has the name "Krementz" stamped on the back, showing quality, whether solid or plate, as our plate outwears some solid buttons. Beware of imitations. You get a new one without charge in case a genuine KREMENTZ button is damaged from any cause. Special styles for Ladies' Shirt Waists and Children's Dresses. Sold by all jewelers.

The Story of a Collar Button gives valuable information, free on request.

KREMENTZ & CO.
40 Chestnut Street
Newark, N. J.

MONITOR and MOGUL
Marine Gas Engines

MONITOR Vapor Engine and Power Company, Grand Rapids, Mich. Send for Catalogue

SHIPPED ON APPROVAL

And trial to any address before you pay a cent. 1900 MODELS, best makes, $11 to $20. '99 and '98 MODELS, high grade, $8 to $12. 500 Shopworn and Second-Hand Wheels, $3, $5, $6 and $10.

Great Factory Clearing Sale. Write for Art Catalogue and Bargain List

MAKE MONEY fast and easy as our representative in your town. First applicants may obtain FREE USE of sample wheel to introduce them, or can EARN A BICYCLE distributing catalogues for us. Get our special offer and inducements to agents.

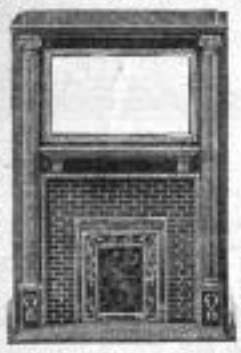
MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. 117 K, CHICAGO

Digitized by Google

KLEINERT'S
OLYMPIA
Dress Shields

The Olympia is the only perfect shield, and the shield that gives more satisfaction, wear and comfort than any other. It is the only shield that can be

WASHED and IRONED



It is Odorless

And will not rot or deteriorate with age. Our guarantee with every pair.

Send 25c

For sample pair and be convinced.

I. B. Kleinert Rubber Company
721 Broadway, New York

Let Us Assist You

In settling the mantel question. The greatest help will be our new catalogue, containing more than fifty entirely new designs of Artistic Wood Mantels, and all the latest things in fireplace furniture. We sell direct to the consumer at manufacturer's prices and

We Pay the Freight

Send for our little book, "How" tells all about how to select and arrange everything belonging to the fireplace, free.

KING MANTEL COMPANY
619 Gay Street, Knoxville, Tenn.

THE PUTMAN BOOTS

Are practical Sportsmen's Footwear. We have for 25 years supplied Western Hunters, Prospectors, Ranchmen and Engineers (who demand the best), and have learned through our personal contact with them to make a perfect boot. SEND FOR CATALOGUE OF OVER 30 DIFFERENT STYLES OF BOOTS. ALSO INDIAN TANNED MOOSE-HIDE MOCCASINS. This cut shows No. 408, 14-inch Boot. Uppers are Special Chrome Tanned Calf Skin. Tanned with the grain of the hide left on (our special tan-rough), making the leather WATER-PROOF. Large eyelets, wide leather laces, laced at side to fit right around top. Sole genuine hand sewed. (Making it soft and easy.)

Made to measure and delivered to any part of U. S. for $7.50

Send for blank showing how to measure your foot.

H. J. PUTMAN & COMPANY
20 Hennepin Avenue. Minneapolis, Minnesota

Dunlop Pneumatic Tires

For Bicycles
For Carriages
For Automobiles

Send for Booklet.

The American Dunlop Tire Co.
Belleville, N. J. Chicago, Ill.

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES producing buggies by automatic machinery, from materials bought for cash. We sell direct and

Save Dealers' Profits

Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS SACRIFICES on overstocked lines. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 36-48 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

$5 BICYCLES CHEAPER THAN EVER

From the OLD RELIABLE CO. Great Special Sale. Nearly 8000 BICYCLES, every one a BARGAIN. MUST BE SOLD. All makes, 50 kinds, $5 AND UP. Late Models, new, $11.50 AND UP. Shipped anywhere on approval. A few more good agents wanted. Big Money. Write today for big list and special offers never before approached.

BROWN-LEWIS COMPANY, Department A D, Chicago, U. S. A.

as she turned to me in her explanation. "You see, Mrs. Slocum, there ain' really anythin' here for men to do, no openin'. There's no business but the small trades that supply the town, an' the professions hol' little or no inducements. No lawyer can get beyond a local reco'nition; they never can hope for the Supreme Bench, nor even hope for an o'dinary district judgeship."

"I don't see why not," I said.

"You ain' goin' to catch any President makin' a local appointment, if he can help himself, for he has always a political debt to pay, or a political future to think of, an' what's the use of wastin' anythin' on a community behin' which is no State an' no vote. An' this hol's good with every position in his gif'."

"What a queer state of affairs! I don't see why men stand it. I should think that this condition of the local offices could be remedied if you had the vote," I said.

"Ah think the las' state would be worse than the firs'. But you jus' ask Senator P—— about all this, an' see if he don' tell you the same thing. Look at the young men growin' up here. I don' recall many native-born men who have attained anythin' in the District. There seems to be a lazy, pa'alyzin' atmosphere here which kills any ambition any one might have, an' then there ain' any openin's if there is any ambition. I don' know jus' where the mischief is, but it's somewhere in the sixty square miles that make up the District of Columbia."

I was depressed by Page's outlook and gazed at her dismally. She added laughingly: "One thing, Washin'ton is the pa'adise of all womankind. We have equal rights with men, for if we can't vote neither can the men, an' another blessed good thing, women who own real estate can sell it if they want to without so much as yea or nay from a husban', while no man can sell a stick or stone of his prope'ty without his wife's consent."

When we got home that afternoon the time seemed interminable until night and the dinner hour arrived. I had been in hopes of having a telegram from Robert, but none had come for me, and the evening papers contained no news of any change in the situation at the Capitol, save that the "peace committee" had been discharged and that several hot speeches had been made in caucus, one of which had been by Senator P——, in the course of which he had done some plain speaking.

SENATOR HALE LOOKS LIKE A WELL-TO-DO WALL STREET BROKER

Scarcely had Senator P—— arrived and dinner been announced when Page and I were all eager attention. Senator P—— looked faded and careworn, and I would not begin the subject that was uppermost with me until his face had relaxed its tension somewhat. Finally he said:

"Well, Mrs. Slocum?"

"Well, Mr. Senator?" I returned. Then I asked, "What success did you have?"

"Well, my success has been of the sort that Henry Ward Beecher says is 'full of promise till you get it,' and that has been about the way of it to-day. I have sent various telegrams to your husband this afternoon and am expecting one final one from him here to-night."

I could scarcely wait to have the Senator tell his tale in his own way and rushed precipitately to the main issue.

"Will they permit him to tell the true inwardness, or the truth in this matter?" I asked anxiously.

His face darkened, and he said slowly and dubiously, "Yes."

I drew a long breath of relief and was about to speak, when he interposed:

"Your husband is to explain to his constituents by telling the truth, and telling it so that no one will understand or be any the wiser."

Silence fell upon the table, and I suppose I was looking very downcast, for Senator P—— spoke again in a cheerful and confident voice:

"Mrs. Slocum, when I found how things were going this afternoon and that I could get no satisfaction at headquarters, I determined to take the matter into my own hands. I've seen too many young politicians turned back in their careers by this fetich of party obedience, and so I mapped out a course of action which I have telegraphed your husband in all its details, and if he follows it out I think that all will go well and that no serious harm will have been done him. I am expecting to hear from him again to-night. I asked him to wire before midnight so that you should know the best or the worst before you sleep."

I don't know that I ever before felt such a lump of gratitude as rose in my throat. I was about to rush into a volume of sentimental though genuine thanks, when a furious peal of the bell, followed by the appearance of my footman with a card, changed the scene. I put out my hand for the card, but the man passed on to Senator P—— and said:

"Some gentlemen in a carriage, sir, are waiting at the door and would speak with you upon something urgent." And he handed out the card.

Senator P—— looked at the written message on the card. A hard, determined look settled upon his face. He spoke in a quiet, even voice:

"Say to the gentlemen that I am engaged and that I shall not attend—— Stay, though I will write it," he added.

He hurriedly scribbled something on the card, and as he wrote a dark flush mounted to his face. It was clear that he was controlled by some powerful emotion either of anger or resentment. When he held the card up to read what he had written, I saw plainly on the other side of it a name. It was that of the "Napoleon" who is thought to be pulling the strings of the legislative puppets. I said hesitatingly:

"Do not let us interfere with your——"

He shook his head, and when the footman had left the room, said:

"It is a plan laid to force me into a compromise, but I gave them my ultimatum to-day. I will neither be coerced nor shaken from my position."

Page brought out her banjo and half-sang, half-crooned quaint negro melodies, until all three of us were soothed into a peaceful frame of mind, from which we were roused late in the evening by Robert's dispatch to the Senator.

While he was tearing off the cover I was breathless with a half-dread of what it would contain. The Senator drew a long breath and ejaculated a satisfied "Ah." Then he handed the telegram to me. It read:

"Have put your plan in operation. It will work. I shall pull out. Will wire to-morrow."

The Senator rose to take his departure and I tried to express to him my gratitude for what he had done for us, but he bluffed me off as men generally do when it gets down to that part of a transaction. It was only after he had gone that I realized that I had been all day in an atmosphere of plots and counter-plots, that Robert had committed a blunder, had been pilloried, had been saved, and not one blink of the truth did I have. Truly, "there is no Canaan in politics."

HEALING! BEAUTIFYING!

Hyomei Antiseptic Skin Soap

Made from the fresh green leaves of the Tasmanian Blue Gum Tree.

"A bath with Hyomei Soap is a rare luxury"

Sold by druggists everywhere or sent by mail. Price 25c.

Send 5c. for sample cake of Hyomei Soap.

THE R. T. BOOTH CO., 35 Avenue Y, Ithaca, N. Y.

RUBIFOAM

A dainty dentifrice for dainty people. Should be found on every well-equipped toilet table.

Price, 25 cents, at druggists'; sample vial of Rubifoam mailed free on receipt of postage, 2 cents.

Address:
E. W. HOYT & CO.
Lowell, Mass.

CALDER'S
Saponaceous
DENTINE

Points ye Way to perfect Teeth.
It makes ye Teeth strong & white ye Gums firm & red, and keeps them so. Ye standard Tooth-powder for 50 Years 'Tis sold everywhere. A sample on request

Albert L. Calder, Esq.
Providence, R.I.

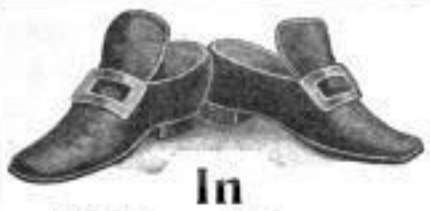
WATCH PROTECTOR
Mailed for 15c. Secures watch from pickpockets.
LOGAN SUPPLY CO., P. O. Box 4453, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

Sozodont

in a new size of the Liquid

25c



Antiseptic
Alkaline
Absolutely
Non-Acid

Delightfully fragrant and refreshing. The oldest and best of the dentifrices.

AVOID SUBSTITUTES

If necessary, send direct to the Proprietors, P. O. Box 247, New York City.

HALL & RUCKEL
New York London

In Olden Times

Silver shoe buckles, coin and odd pieces were made into spoons by Rogers Bros. After perfecting the process of electroplating, they discontinued making solid silver spoons, and stamped their plated ware

"1847 Rogers Bros."

"1847" indicating the year the brand was first made. This mark, wherever seen, is a guarantee of the highest grade of silver-plated ware.

For new designs, send for Catalogue I.

International Silver Co., Successor to MERIDEN BRITANNIA COMPANY
Meriden, Conn.

For sale by leading dealers everywhere.

The style they made in 1847

You Don't Have

To suffer with Varicose (or enlarged) Veins, Swollen and Inflamed Limbs.

Our Patent Seamless Heel

Elastic Stockings

Knee Caps, Leggins, Anklets, etc.

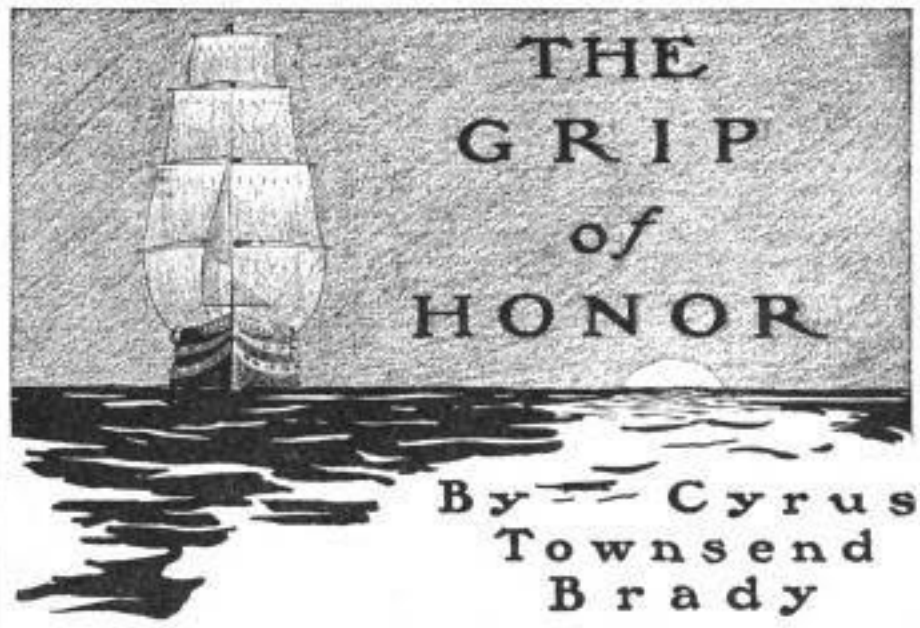
Promptly overcome all troubles of this kind.

They Fit Because we make them to your measure.

Small Expense Because you get them from factory at factory prices.

Send for Catalogue, Measuring Directions, Prices, etc.

CURTIS & SPINDELL CO.
"Alley Building," Nahant Street, Lynn, Mass.



Genuine Farina Cologne

Is imitated so closely in bottles and labels that even dealers are sometimes deceived. The genuine bears the words,

"gegenüber dem Julichs Platz," the address of the great Farina distillery; "gegenüber dem Julichs Platz" (opposite the Julichs Place).

Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

CHAPTER XXII

AND now happened the incident which finally decided the battle. By Jones' order, quantities of hand grenades, a small, highly combustible and explosive shell, about the size of a large apple, had been placed in the tops. After the battle in mid-air, in which the Americans had gained possession, he shouted out that they be used in accordance with his instructions. Fanning sent a man with a bucket of grenades out on the extreme end of the mainyardarm. Wrapping his legs around the yard he sat down and, leaning against the lift, deliberately threw his bombshells, one by one, down the open main hatchway of the Serapis. The powder boys of the latter ship had been bringing charges of powder for the various guns from the magazine, and, as many of the guns had been put out of action by the American fire, the supply had been greater than the demand. A large pile had been carelessly allowed to accumulate upon the deck. One of the grenades caromed against the hatch combing and fell into the centre of the charges.

There was a detonating crash, so loud, so terrific, that it actually seemed to annihilate even the roar of the battle. Twenty or thirty men were killed or badly wounded by the explosion, and the rest of the English seamen were dazed and driven from their stations by the concussion. The clothes of many were actually ripped from their bodies so that they stood naked and wondering, though they were otherwise unhurt. A long moment of ghastly silence followed this catastrophe on the Serapis. Men everywhere paused with bated breath to wait the issue. The Serapis, dragging the Richard, reeled and rocked under the shock. The last calamity broke the strength of Pearson's endurance and ended his resistance. He could fight no more. Was it the Devil himself who commanded the other ship? The English Captain sprang aft to the flagstaff. A great English standard had been nailed to the spar. With his own hands he tore it down.

The battle was over! At the same moment the mainmast of the Serapis, undermined and eaten away in its heart by the gnawing attack of the quarter-deck guns of the Richard, came crashing down, a hopeless ruin, carrying down some of the Americans as it fell.

"They have struck their flag!" cried Jones, who had sprung upon the rail at the moment of the explosion and had witnessed Pearson's action. "Cease firing."

His voice rang through the ship with such a note of proud triumph as has rarely been heard within the fought-over confines of the narrow seas.

"They have struck! The ship is ours!" rang from man to man among the Americans. Wild cheers broke into the night in an ever-increasing volume of sound.

"Send Mr. Dale to me," said Jones to young Brooks as the flag came down. The midshipman had been wounded but still kept his station. As Dale came running toward his Captain, Jones cried:

"Muster a boarding party and take charge of the prize. The fight is over."

But no, the battle was not over. A few moments before, an English shipmaster among the prisoners had succeeded in escaping through the rents in the shattered sides of the two ships and had told the plight of the Richard to the First Lieutenant of the Serapis. With this information the men on the gun-deck had been rallied, and, led by their officers, had returned to their quarters and had resumed the battle. They, too, were heroes. Mayrant, who ran aft from the forecastle as he saw Pearson strike his flag, jumped on the rail by Jones' orders and followed Dale upon the deck of the English ship.

Such was the confusion of the moment, that as Mayrant leaped on the deck he was actually run through the thigh by a pike in the hand of a wounded British sailor. Pearson was standing alone as if dazed on the quarter-deck of his ship, holding one clenched hand against his breast, with the other grasping his trailing flag. In his face was that look of defeat and despair which is the saddest aspect of baffled, impotent humanity.

"Have you struck, sir?" cried Dale, stopping before the English Captain.

"Yes," was the grim reply. Pearson's voice was a broken whisper.

"I am come to take possession."

"Very good, sir," said Pearson bitterly, and, dropping the flag, he reached for his sword.

Just at this moment the First Lieutenant of the Serapis came bounding up the hatchway from the deck below.

"A few more broadsides, sir, and they are ours," he cried impetuously. "They are in a sinking ——"

"The ship has struck, sir, and you are my prisoner," interrupted Dale quickly, seeing the necessity of promptness.

"Struck! This ship! Your prisoner!" cried the astonished Englishman.

"Yes, sir. Your sword," demanded Dale. The man hesitated.

"Disarm him," cried the American. Two or three of the boarding party closed around them.

"Sir," asked the Englishman, turning to his Captain, "is it true that we have struck?"

"Yes, sir," answered Pearson hoarsely.

"My God!" cried the junior officer of the prize. There was a momentary silence.

"I have nothing more to say, sir," he added. "I will go below and call off the men."

"No, sir," interrupted Dale, "you will accompany your Captain on board our ship at once. Pass the word to cease firing. The ship has struck."

As the English Captain and his First Lieutenant stepped over the rail upon the high poop of the Richard, the roar of the guns died away, this time for good. Seizing a dangling rope they swung themselves inboard and found themselves face to face with a little man in a tattered uniform, hatless, covered with dust, powder-stained and grimy with the soil of battle. Blood from a wound in his forehead had coagulated upon his cheek. Nothing but the piercing black eyes which burned and gleamed out of his face in the darkness bespoke the high humanity of the man.

"Is it ——?"

"Captain John Paul Jones, at your service, gentlemen."

"My sword, sir," said Pearson, tendering it to him formally. "I regret," he added

"PERFECTION"

Self-Heating, Reversible

GAS SAD IRONS

HEATS IN TWO MINUTES

Is an ideal Iron. Insures comfort. Saves time, labor and expense. No more sweltering over hot stoves. No soot, dirt or smell. No waste of fuel or loss of time. Any child can safely learn to use it.

Burns Two Feet of Gas an Hour
Costs Two Cents Per Day

Can be attached to any gas bracket. Surface of Iron becomes heated in two minutes. By pressing the lever on the front of the Iron it becomes released and is then reversed, and ready for use on other side.

Can be kept in constant use, and because of its economy and convenience, excels all others.

Free. Full particulars and Price-List sent on receipt of a postal.

HOUSEHOLD SPECIALTY MFG. COMPANY
43 Leonard Street, New York City

SPECIAL CORNER STAY

WARRANTED TO WEAR WELL

DOUBLE DUTY POUCH

TRADE MARK

This is the best tobacco pouch made (special rubberized rubber), containing new features that appeal at once to every pipe and cigarette smoker. The separate pocket, made of a single strip, holds matches or paper, keeping them always ready and dry. Athletes, bicyclists, yachtsmen, yachtsmen, canoeists, and smokers, generally, say they are the best and most convenient pouches they ever used. The corners are reinforced, ensuring double wear. Three standard sizes: No. 4, 60c.; No. 5, 70c.; No. 6, 80c. Ask your dealer. If he cannot supply you, one will be mailed on receipt of price in money order or stamps.

"Look for the Pocket"

COSMIC UTILITY COMPANY, Dept. A
15 Cortlandt Street, New York

Can be enlarged 1 inch and strengthened 50 per cent. in one month by using the Hercules Graduated Gymnastic Club and Strength Tester Five Minutes each day. It will develop and strengthen the arms, chest, back and waist in less than one-half the time required by any other apparatus known. The weakest man may become strong and healthy by its use.

Write for descriptive pamphlet and price-list to HERCULES, Box 5553 Y, Boston, Mass.

It's Slick

It's smooth, it's flat. There's nothing about the Brighton Silk Garter (for men) that will cause its wearer the slightest annoyance. The

BRIGHTON Silk Garter

Is as subtle as it is comfortable. Very best silk elastic web; all colors, and the newest cross-bar patterns. At furnishers', or mailed for 25 cents a pair.

PIONEER SUSPENDER CO.
718 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

THIS WILL REMIND YOU

To get a piece of smoked glass and watch for the approaching

Eclipse of the Sun

MAY TWENTY-EIGHTH, 1900

Visible partially or totally throughout the whole of North America, between the hours of 7 and 9 in the morning. Put your ruler on a map of the United States and draw a line through Norfolk, Va., and New Orleans, and you have the path of the Total Eclipse. In all other parts of the country the sun will be only partially obscured; then buy a Phonograph: it is the perfect talking machine.

IN EVERY HOME

The charming music and exquisite tone quality of the

Columbia Zither

Can be appreciated. It is the most ingenious of perfect musical instruments. Admirably suited for vocal accompaniment and home entertainment. Also instructive. Even a child can play it without knowledge of music from chart fitting under the strings. Beautifully finished and very durable.

Style shown in Cut, $6 Others $4.00 to $8.00

Inquire of your music dealer. If he hasn't the Columbia Zither, send price to us, and we will ship, express prepaid. Catalogue free

The Phonoharp Co., Dept. F, 152 Liverpool St., E. Boston, Mass.

WEBER PIANOS

In addition to the regular styles of Grands and Uprights in the choicest woods, we are displaying some special designs in LOUIS XIV. RENAISSANCE and COLONIAL cases, and will give estimates on other designs conforming to any architectural requirements.

Inspection Invited. Correspondence Solicited

OLD INSTRUMENTS TAKEN IN EXCHANGE

WAREROOMS:

Corner Fifth Avenue and 16th Street, New York
268 Wabash Avenue, Chicago

BRASS BAND

INSTRUMENTS, DRUMS, ETC.

REDUCED PRICES. Don't buy until you send for new 88-page Catalogue R. MAILED FREE.

The Rudolph Wurlitzer Co.
121 E. Fourth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

STOP STAMMERING

Write for our new Illustrated 100-page book, "The Origin and Treatment of Stammering." Sent FREE to any person who stammers, with full particulars regarding treatment, for 6 cents, in stamps, to cover postage.

The Lewis School for Stammerers, 110 Adelaide St., Detroit, Mich.

ungraciously, "to be compelled to strike to a man who has fought with a halter around his neck."

"Sir," said Jones with a magnanimity as great as his valor, "you have fought like a hero, and I make no doubt that your sovereign will reward you in the most ample manner. . . . Mr. Brooks, escort these gentlemen to my cabin."

The two ships were now cut adrift, Dale remaining on the Serapis to take command. He had sat down a moment for rest, and as he attempted to rise to his feet he fell to the deck, discovering only in that way that he had been severely wounded.

By the most heroic efforts of the prize crew on the Serapis and the remaining men on the Richard, the English prisoners were driven back into the hold, the flames subdued and some semblance of order restored. Cottineau had captured the Pallas after an hour of good hard fighting and the victory was with the Americans. But it had been purchased at a fearful cost. There is no battle on land or sea in the world's history in which the percentage of loss was greater than in the battle between the Serapis and the Richard.

About seventy per cent. on the Serapis and over fifty per cent. on the Richard had been killed or wounded and the Bon Homme Richard was in a sinking condition. She had been literally beaten to pieces. It was not safe to remain upon her decks. Consequently the prisoners and the wounded, groaning in anguish, were removed to the Serapis. In the early morning, the brave ship which had earned undying immortality in her worn-out old age, because for three brief hours John Paul Jones and his men had battled upon her decks, sank forever beneath the sea. The great battle-flag under which she had fought had been reset and fluttered above her as she went down.

The refitting of the prizes for the returning voyage was at once begun. To anticipate events, it is recorded that Captain Landais, the jealous and false-hearted Frenchman who had so treacherously manœuvred the Alliance, was subsequently court-martialed and dismissed the service. He should have been hanged from her highest yardarm.

CHAPTER XXIII

"THE battle is on," said O'Neill in the small boat to Elizabeth, "and I am not there. O God! give us a little breeze," he cried. In anticipation he swung the oars inboard, stepped the mast once more, and then resumed his place by her side.

"God is good to me," she said at last; "He will not let you be there to be killed. You have had trouble enough and have run enough risks. He wishes to keep you for me."

O'Neill shook his head.

"My place is there, my duty is on yonder deck. Would that I had returned to the ship without going up to the castle!"

"Why, then," she said reproachfully, "you would not have seen me."

"I know," he replied, "but then I should be in my rightful place, fighting where I belong, Coventry would be honored in doing his duty, the Admiral would be happy, your marriage would take place——"

"And you," she cried, womanlike placing him in the balance as opposed to all the rest, "would you have been happy?"

"Happiness has nothing to do with it," he answered impatiently, "it is a question of duty. I have been a fool."

"Has the fool been rewarded in accordance with his folly?" she asked him. "Nay, look at me before you reply," she cried imperiously, turning his head until his eyes looked into her own. The face of the girl, the limpid light of her magic glance allowed but one answer.

"I say no more," replied O'Neill, kissing her softly. "You are right; I have you; you are worth it all. I will try to be a philosopher about the rest."

Meanwhile the intermittent cannonading had been succeeded by a steady roar of artillery which reverberated and rolled along the surface of the water. The Scarborough, some distance to the northwest of the Serapis and the Richard, was apparently hotly engaged with the Pallas, while the Alliance seemed to be sailing back and forth between the two groups of combatants pouring in a random fire upon friend and foe alike. Great clouds of smoke, punctured by vivid flashes of light, overhung the ships.

Back on the heights above the town the people swarmed. O'Neill could picture the old Admiral walking up and down the terrace, glass in hand, while he surveyed the battle. There seemed to be little manœuvring, except on the part of the Alliance, and the combat appeared to be a yardarm-to-yardarm fight. Once or twice the roar of the battle died away temporarily, and the smoke, blowing off to leeward, disclosed the

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBB

"HAVE YOU STRUCK, SIR?" CRIED DALE

THE PLAIN IRONING

For a large family can be done in one hour with a

Gem Ironing Machine

Saves Time, Work, Clothes, Money

Keeps your servants happy, by using it as a hand ironing while a steam machine is in hand rinsing.

Simple in construction, indestructible. No modern home laundry is complete without it. Don't use methods a century old when you can buy this great labor-saver for $40.00

Booklet, "Clean Linen," with good laundry hints FREE with catalogue of Ironing Machines, Mangles, Washing Machines, Clothes Dryers, etc., for homes, clubs, hospitals, small hotels, boarding schools, etc.

STEEL ROLL MANGLE CO., 218 Washington St. Chicago, Ill.

Letters Copied While Writing

Keep a copy of all letters; no press; no water; no brush; no work. Any ink; any pen; any paper. Our Pen-Carbon never smuts; our clip holds paper firm. Write with no extra pressure, and our Pen-Carbon Letter Book produces a perfect copy. Can be used anywhere. If your stationer does not keep it, write for free specimen of work.

Pen-Carbon Manifold Co.
145 Centre St.
New York
Dept. G

"SUPPOSE I DIE"

We have helped people to answer that question for half a century or more; to make provision for their survivors. We do more: We assist men in making provision for their own old age, when the money-producing power is waning. Get our free booklet, "The How and The Why." It brushes cobwebs from the brain.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

"Do Not Stammer"

Lewis S. Johnston.

"The cure was very rapid and truly wonderful."—Hon. John Wanamaker.

"The cure is eminently successful."—Prof. Wm. H. Brewer, Yale University.

Summer Session at Atlantic City, N. J., from May to Sept.

Send for new illustrated book to the PHILADELPHIA INSTITUTE, 1033 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Established 1884. Edwin S. Johnston, Founder and President, who cured himself after stammering forty years. Please mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST when writing.

HOME STUDY

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, etc.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL open up to Young Men and Women good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No interference with work—only spare time required. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed, national reputation, established 40 years. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Trial lesson, 10c. A fine Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 155 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

ILLUSTRATING

Taught by Mail and in Our Personal Classes

Students all over the world. Practical, successful instruction by well-known illustrators. Develops your talents.

Call or write for catalogue.

N.Y. School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

Shorthand

Intensely practical instruction by experts. We teach shorthand only, and we teach that thoroughly. No lightning systems nor fabulous claims. Money refunded if dissatisfied. Send stamp for booklet or 25 cents for beginner's book.

Correspondence Shorthand School, 488 Bourse, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

two ships side by side. Sometimes great wreaths of flame, which told that one or the other ship had been set on fire, would leap up into the air.

The feelings of the young officer can be imagined. Adrift in that little boat and watching the awful combat, not even the presence of the woman he loved could compensate him for his absence. The fever of the conflict possessed him. His breath came hard, the sweat stood on his forehead. He prayed as never before for a breeze to take him to the fight. He murmured incoherent words which told the tender listener something of the terrible longing in his bosom. So the long hours wore away.

Toward eleven o'clock they heard a terrific explosion, and then the roar of the battle slackened and finally died away. When the smoke drifted off the two ships were lying side by side. Farther off, almost hull down, were the Scarborough and the Pallas, which had ceased their fight some time before. The battle was over. Who had won? It was a question he could not answer.

The breeze so long wished for now sprang up once more and the little boat gathered way and began to slip through the water again. The sky had become overcast; it grew very dark, the wind freshened steadily, and finally blew so strong that it required all the skill and address of which O'Neill was possessed to keep his unsteady little craft from capsizing. At length he was forced to drop the sail and take to the oars to keep afloat at all. About two o'clock in the morning a squall of rain came down and they lost sight of the ships. Toward daybreak the wind moderated again and they were enabled to set sail once more. The ocean was covered with a dense mist, and they could see nothing. As nearly as O'Neill could judge without the aid of a compass, he headed the boat toward the place where they had last made out the two ships.

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBBS

TWO FIGURES HUNG OVER THE TAFFRAIL AND WATCHED THE WHITE SAILS OF THE LITTLE BOAT

"We ought to pick them up in a few moments now and learn our fate," he said to the frightened, exhausted girl crouching in the stern-sheets in her wet, clinging garments. The night had been too much for her, her physical strength had almost given way, though nothing could abate the affection he saw shining still in her tired eyes.

"Learn our fate? How is that?" asked Elizabeth, rousing herself a little.

"If Commodore Jones has been captured," he answered, "I have but to give myself up and redeem Coventry, and—you know the rest."

"Yes," she replied wearily and listlessly, "let it come—we have fought a good fight, you and I—we can do no more; and the other alternative?"

"Why, in that case," he said, "we will be there, under our own flag, he too will be saved, and our troubles are over."

"What think you of the prospect?" she asked, brightening a little.

"It is difficult to say. The Serapis and the Scarborough should easily be more than a match for our whole squadron. The Richard is almost worthless as a fighting ship; as I said, Landais, who commands the Alliance, is insane. I can't prophesy what Cottineau will do with the Pallas; but we have one advantage."

"And is that a great one?"

"The greatest—it may have decided the battle in our favor."

"What is it, then?" she asked.

"It is not 'what,' but 'who,'" he answered smiling.

"Who, then?"

"John Paul Jones himself! He alone is worth a thousand."

The light from the rising sun, assisted by the fitful wind, began to dispel the mists of the morning.

"See!" cried the girl, "there, right ahead of us. Are not those the sails of a ship? What ship?"

As she pointed at a rift in the mist there appeared for a second the light canvas of a great ship. Following her outstretched finger, O'Neill caught a fleeting glimpse of it, but saw nothing to reassure him as to the result of the battle; the sight struck terror to his heart. Such canvas as that was never set above the decks of the Richard. As he gazed, the mist closed around them again, and the ship had vanished.

"Ah! 'tis gone, but I am certain I saw it. Which was it?" she continued, hastily rousing herself at the prospect of decision. "'Tis a ship, but which one?"

"The mist is thinning again, 'twill clear away in a moment, and we shall see more distinctly then," he answered evasively. "She was making toward us, I think."

He could not bear to dash her hopes with the assurance that it was not the Richard, though he had at once resigned himself to death in consequence of his glimpse. It was useless to try to fly, for the mist was rising in every direction, and before they could go a hundred yards they would be visible to the ship in front of them, now shoving her huge bulk through the thin clouds of vapor which enshrouded her. The next moment the mist rolled away. The sunlight flooded the heavens, the breeze tossed the sea into a thousand white-capped waves. It was morning. Some one on the ship had apparently seen the little boat with its two occupants at once, for an officer had leaped to the rail.

"Boat aboy!" rang out over the water. The great white frigate, deep-sunken as if deeply laden, was moving sluggishly through the water and was almost upon them.

"The ship!" screamed the girl.

"It is the Serapis," answered O'Neill sorrowfully.

"Ah!" she said, sinking back exhausted, "after all, it is over. I shall never survive you."

"Boat aboy, there!" again cried the officer standing on the rail, pistol in hand; "answer my hail or I fire. Who are you?"

"I am your prisoner, escaped last night from that ship," cried O'Neill. "I wish to deliver myself up."

"Come alongside, then," said the officer, turning inboard and giving a sharp command. The way of the ship was checked and she was thrown up into the wind. As her broadside slowly swung opposite O'Neill he saw that her mainmast was gone and that she bore evidence of having participated in a tremendous action. Away off to the northeast, too far off to distinguish them, a little

Combined Baby Jumper and Rocking Chair

Ornamental, indestructible, and a nursery necessity all the year. It is indispensable in hot weather

For Lawn, Porch or Indoors

It's light—it's cool—easily moved—it amuses and keeps baby healthy daytimes, and puts her to sleep at night; made into a chair or bed in a minute—saves buying a crib. You sew or read while baby entertains herself. Indorsed by physicians. A picture book telling all about it—FREE.

Glascock Bros. Mfg. Co., Box 31, Muncie, Ind.

IT PAYS TO BE A Writer

Journalists and authors win money, fame and power. Men and women can qualify themselves for practical literary work during their leisure hours. Practical training in reporting, editing and story writing at home.

Journalism TAUGHT BY MAIL

Thorough knowledge of newspaper work. Actual experience from the start. Corps of instructors composed of eminent journalists. An instructive book, giving full details, mailed free.

National Correspondence Institute (Inc.)
19-42 Second National Bank Building
Washington, D. C.

A Way to Change Your Work

Prepare for a better position without neglecting your present work. Our students advance in salary and position while studying. 150,000 students and graduates

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Mechanical or Architectural Draughting; Electrical, Mechanical, Steam or Civil Engineering; Architecture; Surveying; Bookkeeping; Stenography, etc.

Established 1891. Capital, $1,500,000. Write for circulars.

The International Correspondence Schools
Box 1171, Scranton, Pa.

Spanish, French and German

Taught by correspondence. We offer thorough instruction by mail in these languages. Especially prepared instruction papers, carefully graded lessons. Instructors are all university graduates, and members of our faculty. Further particulars on request.

New England College of Languages (Inc.)
218-220 Boylston Street, Boston

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it at a genteel and uncrowded profession paying $15 to $25 weekly? Situations always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Philadelphia

LEARN TELEGRAPHY

STUDY AT HOME

A few hours' evening study NOW will fit you for a position of responsibility for life.

Technical Education by Mail

Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Marine Engineering. Write for Handbook "L" and special terms.

American School of Correspondence, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

Digitized by Google

cluster of ships was seen on the horizon. There was no sign of the Richard that he could see. In a few seconds the boat was brought alongside the gangway. Elizabeth clambered up the ladder with his assistance, and they stepped upon the deck. A frightful scene presented itself.

The deck was covered with grime and blood, and a handful of men, most of them wounded, were endeavoring to effect some restoration to order. "How horrible," murmured Elizabeth. "Take me away; I cannot bear it."

O'Neill caught her in his arms; a little more and she would have fainted.

"Good Heavens!" he said. "In all my battles I never saw such a ship! What a frightful scene! They didn't get off without a fight," he added slowly. An officer, with head bound up in a handkerchief and his arm in a sling, was approaching them.

"Sir," said O'Neill, saluting the while, "I am the officer who escaped last night. I deliver myself up to—why! it's Stacey!" he cried, recognizing a brother officer of the Richard. "What do you here, man?"

"'Fore God, it's O'Neill!" exclaimed the other. "Glad are we to see you, man, but this lady—this is no place for her."

"She goes with me," said O'Neill briefly; "but you?"

"This is where I belong."

"And they have captured you, I suppose?"

"No, the ship is ours."

"And the old Richard?" cried O'Neill.

"Abandoned and sunk," answered the young officer. "She was cut to pieces by the Serapis' fire, but we have this ship."

"Thank God!" cried O'Neill fervently. "And Captain Jones?"

"Aft there on the quarter-deck."

"Come, Elizabeth," he cried, offering his arm; and, assisting her, they made their way with difficulty to the quarter-deck.

"Ah, O'Neill, thank God I see you alive again," said Jones, his face beaming. "We got there in time, then, I see."

"Yes, sir, thanks to this lady."

"Madam, you are fit for a sailor's bride," said the little Captain.

"'Tis high praise, sir, from Captain Jones, I protest," she answered, rallying herself in the relief of assured safety.

"Would to Heaven that I had been with you in this battle," cried O'Neill gloomily.

"I wished often for you," answered the Captain. "The poor old Richard was torn to pieces under our feet. We could not stay on her longer, so we had to come here. . . . How go your love affairs?" he added in a whisper.

"Well, indeed, sir. We are to be married at once, sir."

"You may have the Chaplain of the Serapis for the purpose."

"When he last officiated for me he was reading my funeral service," replied O'Neill.

"Ah, well, that's over now, thank God," sighed the Captain. "And this lady . . . Madam," he said, turning to Elizabeth, "I bade you welcome to a ship once before; it is a different ship now, but the welcome is the same."

"Know you aught of Major Edward Coventry, Captain Jones?" said Elizabeth. This time is was she who remembered.

"Why, he lies on the deck yonder, dying; he wouldn't let us take him below. Do you know . . . but I forgot; he was your friend."

"Take me to him," she cried hastily, and in a moment she was kneeling by his side. They had made him as comfortable as possible with cushions and boat cloaks, but his hours were numbered. His head was thrown back, his face ghastly pale. Blood stained the linen of his shirt about his breast. His eyes were closed, the end was at hand.

"Poor fellow!" murmured O'Neill. "He died for me," and then he briefly recounted the circumstances of their escape.

"Do you know how he was wounded, sir?" he asked.

"It was my own hand that struck the blow," answered Jones. "Would it had been otherwise. There was a moment in the action when they sprang to board; he leaped upon the rail, cutlass in hand; he was a fair and easy mark; I met him with a pike which I buried in his bosom. He fell back smiling. I remember that I thought it strange to see him smiling at that time, even in the heat of the battle—too bad—too bad!"

The man stirred a little and opened his eyes. He looked about him vacantly, but consciousness began to dawn again and with the dawn came recognition. It was the face of Elizabeth bending over him. There, back of her, was O'Neill. He began to comprehend.

"Elizabeth," he murmured, "my death—not in vain—then."

"Forgive me—forgive me!" she cried brokenly. "Oh, forgive me! I did love you."

"Yes, yes," he said, faintly smiling, "but—not like——" he glanced at O'Neill. "You, too!" he murmured, "make—her—happy. Father," he cried suddenly—his mind wandered a little—"I did it because I loved her."

"Oh, Doctor, can nothing be done; is there no hope?" cried O'Neill."

"None, sir," answered the surgeon.

"It is the Serapis," answered O'Neill mournfully

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

CHAPTER XXIV

"THERE'S a boat coming alongside, sir, flying the Admiral's flag," said a midshipman to Captain Jones.

"Ah, that will be our friend, Lord Westbrooke," he said, turning toward the gangway. "Show him to me if he comes on board." In a moment the stately form of the old Admiral stepped through the gangway and he looked about him in astonishment.

"Bless me, what a fight! I knew that rebel was a desperate man, but I never imagined anything like this. Captain Pearson?" said he imperiously. "Where is he?"

"Here, My Lord."

"I congratulate you, sir, on——"

"Stop, sir!" cried the Captain in great agony, "you do not understand——"

"What!" cried the Admiral, "the Serapis—"

"Belongs to the Navy of the United States, sir," said a calm voice at his elbow.

"Great Heavens!" exclaimed the old man, turning to Jones. "And the Richard?"

"We sunk her, sir," answered Pearson, "but it was useless."

(Concluded on Page 1016 of this Number)

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton

Says: "I take great pleasure in recommending the Lewis Union Suits for women in all stations. Dress has much to do with health, and nothing could be more beautiful and desirable than the various materials from which are knit the

LEWIS UNION SUITS

Verily they are a dream of beauty, and every one should try them for the coming summer."

A Prominent Officer Writes: "I have worn Lewis Union Suits for years with every satisfaction in style, material and fit, and my wife says she 'cannot get along without them'—she is now testing them in the Tropics. A summer campaign in Cuba convinced me there are none so good as your SILTRINE UNION SUITS."

"Send sample fabrics so that I may order for spring."—U. S. CONSUL, MEXICO.

THESE TESTIMONIALS PROVE THAT

For Summer Wear Siltrine Union Suits

Are the highest grade of knit-to-fit perfection, unsurpassed for coolness and comfort. For their perfection, finish, comfort, fit and durability in wear considered, although they are the best goods on the market they are absolutely the cheapest in the end. Ask your dealer for these Suits. Don't accept a substitute, but

Send 2-cent stamp for new illustrated (from life) catalogue, sample fabrics—linen, silk, "siltrine, lisle, Balbriggan and wool"—and testimonials that prove all our claims.

LEWIS KNITTING COMPANY, 220 Main Street, Janesville, Wis.

A Goodform Closet Set

Will make your closet look like this picture. Try it six months. Money back then if you say so.

Ladies' Set—12 Garment Yokes, 12 Skirt Hangers, 2 Shelf Bars and 2 Loops. (See Loop on door.)

Men's Set—12 Garment Yokes, 6 Automatic Trousers Hangers, 2 Shelf Bars and 1 Loop.

Sets, $3.00 each—two in one shipment, $5.50, express paid. Our Trousers Hanger is much prized by gentlemen; sample 30c., 4 for $1; 6 and 1 Loop, $1.50, prepaid.

Sold in first-class dry-goods stores and by clothiers and furnishers. If you cannot buy them from a dealer in your town, remit to us. Mention your dealer's name. We send free an illustrated descriptive booklet.

CHICAGO FORM COMPANY, 96 La Salle Street, Chicago

The ANGLE LAMP

"THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS"

Has been sent to thousands of purchasers all over the country on the unconditional guarantee that it will be found as represented or money will be refunded, and we have yet to be called upon to give back a dollar. You can, therefore, try this lamp without a particle of risk. While more brilliant than gas or electricity, it never smokes, smells or gets out of order; is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas, and burns but about eighteen cents' worth of oil a month. It gives comparatively little heat, and for this reason it is found to be the finest of all lights for summer use. Many summer residences are equipped with them to the exclusion of all other illumination. The unique feature,

"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

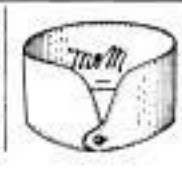
Insures all the light falling directly downward and outward. Thousands are used in homes, offices, churches, halls, factories, summer residences, etc., and give splendid service. Our Catalogue K shows all styles from $1.80 up. Sent on request.

The Angle Lamp Co., 76 Park Place, New York

It only Costs $1 More to Paint this House

With Mound City Horse Shoe Paint than ordinarily good paint. It costs no more for the color. We tell you exactly what Mound City Horse Shoe Paint contains. In this age of adulteration you can have pure paint if you want it. Send for free booklet, "The Use of Paint." Address Dept. U.

If not sold by your dealer, send us your order and we will have nearest dealer fill it, freight prepaid.



MOUND CITY PAINT & COLOR CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Birds Love BIRD MANNA

It will keep Song Birds in constant song, even when shedding feathers. It cures almost all diseases of the Feathered Kingdom. Especially valuable during Bleeding. A great delicacy. BIRDS LOVE IT. 25 cents per cake at all druggists' Same price by mail. Bird Book Free.

BIRD FOOD CO., 400 N. 3d St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WHY not sell the celebrated M. & M. white and fancy rubber collars, cuffs, fronts and waterproof neckties? All colors; goods in great demand; patented and guaranteed; 125 styles; catalogue free; liberal commission; exclusive territory; no better line to sell; free as good. 1500 agts. wanted at once. Write immediately.

M. & M. MANUFACTURING CO., Springfield, Mass.

Digitized by Google

The Money Matters of the Young Business Man—By Thomas B. Bryan

MONEY is so vitally related to morals that there need be no excuse for giving it first consideration in an examination of the personal side of a young business man's life. More than all else, perhaps, its use or abuse will determine his success or failure in the field of manly attainment. No matter how splendid may be his intellectual endowments, how pleasing his personality, or how satisfying his friendships, if he has not the capacity to master his private money affairs he will become their slave, and enter the struggle for the rewards of life with an annoying handicap always ready to discount the full force of his best endeavors.

Owing to the unfortunate fact that many men of superlative genius have been notoriously indifferent to the condition of their personal money affairs, it has become a common thing to regard this slackness concerning things material as inseparable from mental brilliancy. Nothing could be more absurd. Indeed so strongly is the opposite view entertained by men of keen observation and of successful business careers, that it may be asserted with confidence that the young man who voluntarily and deliberately faces his personal financial problem gives a striking proof of genuine moral stamina.

Always Know Just Where You Stand

There is far more cowardice in regard to this kind of stock-taking than is ordinarily believed. In fact it may be stated that, as a general rule, only the wealthy and the very poor are in the habit of knowing just where they stand. The former are apt to possess the financial instinct in a strong degree, and this reckoning is, therefore, temperamental. It is calculated, also, to minister to personal pride and satisfaction.

On the other hand, so minute are the affairs of the very poor man that he has no difficulty in determining at any moment his exact standing.

Between these two extremes is the great middle class of moderately prosperous persons. It is a large class, and contains many and varied elements, but, in the main, its members are neither so poor that the whole scope of their personal finances is indicated by the actual coin in the family purse, nor are they so accustomed to the system and exactness which attach to the management of large enterprises that the "trial balance" has become an established institution, a habit of life. Scores of men who apply a reasonable degree of system to the main enterprise engaging their attention stop short of the final application and do not strike a balance in their private affairs. This attitude often arises from timidity, from a hesitation to face the facts in their entirety. They are satisfied to know that this or that venture has done well; but to marshal all their obligations in one column, their assets in another, and then strike the balance which gives them absolute knowledge of their position, is an act which requires a peculiar kind of courage on the part of men of a certain temperament.

A vast number of calamitous failures might have been prevented had their victims formed the habit, early in life, of knowing the exact state and condition of their personal finances, and of making this accounting at regular and frequent periods, instead of waiting until confronted with final disaster. Know where you stand; look your "private finances" squarely in the face, put your worldly condition into "cold figures," and then apportion your expenditures in accordance with that showing. This will prove one of the most wholesome acts of mental discipline to which any young man can possibly subject himself.

The Choice of Living Quarters

In the proper apportionment of personal expenditures the most important problem is that of living quarters. If one is single, he is generally forced to choose between the private boarding-house, the hotel and the bachelor apartment. If married, his range of selection is enlarged by the addition of the flat.

There is one sure principle which may be applied in all matters of this kind: keep as close to the home as possible. The young man who does not often—let us say daily—come under the refreshing influence of a domestic atmosphere misses from his life a great sustaining force. For this reason every young man not able to live in his own home is fortunate if he can find the nearest approach to one—that is, to become a member of the household of a private family. His part in the family life may be very small, but he is the better by just so much. The daily contact, no matter how meagre, with a home is salutary and often vital to the development of manly character. Nothing is more certainly conducive to moral disintegration than existence without the purifying ozone of a home atmosphere. It is the vitalizing breath that steadies the head and feeds the heart. It checks the tendency to moral laxity, and compels the young man to recognize the soundness and wholesomeness of what may be termed the common moralities of life. A young man making his abode in a family home finds his moral anchorage exempt from that strain which usually exists in hotels and public boarding-houses.

Bachelor apartments are in growing fashion and favor among young men of fair incomes. Certainly this mode of housekeeping is not to be indiscriminately condemned; but it lacks that wholesome and steadying element so vitalizing to morality—genuine home atmosphere. The same observation applies with equal, if not greater, force to life either in hotels or public boarding-houses. Better find a place in a family of very modest circumstances where the true domestic feeling pervades the atmosphere, than to be surrounded by luxuries in a place devoid of a home altar. No close observer of the various forms of metropolitan existence can escape the conviction that there is something essentially frivolous in hotel life, and that this phase of existence fails to feed the heart, to nurture the richer faculties, and to stimulate studious application.

The Bachelor's Chambers and the City Flat

Next to the private boarding-house, the modern bachelor apartment offers the most comfort, cheer and seclusion. Intellectual and moral growth is practically impossible without a fair degree of isolation. Sound mental digestion requires solitude, and the reason why so many metropolitan lives are hopelessly shallow and barren is because this element of isolation and its consequent invitation to spontaneous reflection, self-examination and serious thought is lacking. Certainly the bachelor apartment is less liable to intrusion than the room in the hotel or public boarding-house, and therefore more conducive to habits of studiousness.

Thus far I have had in mind only the unmarried young man of business, but, within clearly evident limitations, most of the conclusions arrived at will apply with equal force and fitness to those who have assumed the responsibilities of marriage. The modern city flat seems peculiarly adapted to the exigencies of economical housekeeping—the kind with which family life is generally begun. Its compactness and studied conveniences make it easy for the young mistress of the new home to do her own work, and this is not generally to be regarded as a hardship, but welcomed as a wholesome and beneficent opportunity for the expression and cultivation of domestic tastes. Young business men set up their own homes in the city flats oftener than under any other kind of shelter, and therefore one word of counsel on this point may not be unwarranted. In selecting a flat be willing to stretch your purse a bit, or to curtail some other expenditure, in order to get quarters which are well lighted. No economy could be more ill advised than the sacrifice of sunlight in family rooms. This element is vital to the good cheer of the entire household; lack of it is enough to impair the health and cloud the temper of the family.

The Important Problem of Dress

The problem of dress is far from trivial, yet it is not one difficult of solution. When regarded in its business aspect it is well worthy of serious consideration. It is quite impossible, under ordinary circumstances, to separate the clothes from the man in the impression which the latter makes upon those with whom he comes in contact. The young man who fails to clothe himself in keeping with the prevailing modes, and with the character of his occupation, neglects a valuable, and often a powerful, ally. In so

Editor's Note—This is the first paper in a series of papers by Mr. Bryan on The Personal Affairs of the Young Business Man.

EASY COOKING

The kitchen is as pleasant as the parlor in the home where a Detroit Jewel Gas Range reigns. It makes cooking comfortable—makes it easier, cleaner, better than is possible with any other stove. Ask the housewife who has used a

Detroit Jewel GAS RANGE

If she would be willing to go back to other-day methods. Ask any woman who has learned the economy of time, labor and fuel that comes with cooking on this most modern of household helps how much she values it.

Our booklet, "Cooking by Gas," contains much to interest those who wish to know more about kitchen comfort and economy. Send for it—it's free if you mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

DETROIT STOVE WORKS
Detroit, Mich. Chicago, Ill.

FREE! Send for FREE BOOKLET on "Salads; How to Make and Dress Them," giving many valuable and novel recipes for Salads, Sandwiches, Sauces, Luncheon Dishes, etc. Sample 10 cents.

E. R. DURKEE & COMPANY, 125 Charlton St., New York

THE "Macey" SECTIONAL BOOKCASES
(Patented—other Patents pending)

$1.00 per Section

And upward, according to style and finish. Shipped "On Approval," subject to return at our expense if not better value than is offered elsewhere at the prices we ask.

Absolutely Non-Binding Doors

—Dust proof—moisture proof—will not stick or bind in any climate. This is only one of several features that make the "Macey" Sectional Bookcase positively the best bookcase in point of Construction—Convenience—Style—Finish and Price ever made.

Write for Sectional Bookcase Catalogue No. "R-1."

THE FRED MACEY CO., Grand Rapids Mich.
(Makers of Office and Library Furniture)

Card Indexes and Letter Files

We make a complete line, and our Quality and Prices are such that it will pay, and pay well, to write for our Catalogue No. "R-5" before you order.

Live Agents Make Big Money.
There is no equal to
The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.
THOUSANDS IN USE
Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.
Postpaid for 65c Stamps
With this order for one dozen before Oct 5th we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE. QUICK sell for free illustrated circular
QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Galien, Mich.

The IDEAL Steam Cooker

Cooks a whole meal over 3 burners, on gasoline, oil, gas or common cook stove.
Reduces Fuel Bills One-Half
MAKES TOUGH MEATS TENDER. Prevents steam and odors. WHISTLE blows when cooker needs more water. DINNER SETS, BICYCLES, WATCHES AND OTHER VALUABLE PREMIUMS GIVEN WITH ORDER FOR COOKERS. Send for illustrated booklet. We pay express. Agents wanted.
TOLEDO COOKER CO., Box 12, Toledo, Ohio

Digitized by Google

doing he makes a needless sacrifice of an important advantage, one, indeed, of greater consequence than he would believe—greater, perhaps, than could be wished.

Adequate and becoming apparel makes a stronger impression on the person it clothes than on any who observe it. If every business man now going about his affairs in garments which are a little below the reasonable standard of presentableness could be clothed with those which fully meet this requirement, the business world would feel a sudden and unaccountable impulse of no mean proportions.

So far as business apparel is concerned, there is a moderate limit beyond which the most favored may not go and still adhere to the canons of good taste. The suit in which the "merchant prince" goes to his desk does not present to the average observer a richer appearance than the business suit of the proprietor of a small and struggling enterprise, provided the latter dresses as well as he can afford, with due regard to his best interests. In these days, a well-made, well-fitted business suit may be bought for a comparatively modest sum, and little is to be gained in point of appearance by a more lavish expenditure, unless for garments not in keeping with the modest requirements of business use. Good taste is the most reliable guide to the selection and wearing of appropriate apparel.

Few graver mistakes can be made by a young business or professional man than that of withdrawing himself from society.

Such withdrawal is occasionally met with on the part of strong and serious aspirants for success in business, young men with kindling ambition, and of signal energy and ability. They labor under the erroneous impression that even a limited indulgence in the pleasures of social life makes too great a demand on both purse and time.

Social intercourse is a fundamental demand of human nature, and if this is not satisfied the development of the individual is checked and stunted. The normal mind has an irrepressible longing for the friction of social contact which corrects the sharp and unseemly corners and angles of personality, and fits the individual to a unity with his fellows. To neglect this influence is to put aside a sure and beneficent aid to development. The young man who affects the company of men to the exclusion of society in its broader sense, and shuns the private parlor to shine in the club, makes a grievous mistake. The influence of women of refinement and good character is the best that any young man can have, and, without it, he is sure, sooner or later, to suffer in the esteem of others, if not in his own opinion.

PHOTO BY HOIT, CHICAGO

THOMAS B. BRYAN

The Church, the Stage and the Concert

Since money is the theme now under consideration, contributions to the church should not be overlooked. These will naturally be made if there be church membership, as there should be. But, in any event, they are a perfectly legitimate item in the apportionment of a young man's income even in the absence of any active denominational connection. The non-church member should contribute on the broad ground that he is better for having something invested in this great civilizing agency. It gives him a personal and vested interest in the greatest moral enterprise of the Christian era.

For the same reason there may be warmly recommended the habit of church attendance independent of church membership or of doctrinal assent, if on no other basis than that of intellectual and moral progress. More exalted issues may follow.

One of the highest privileges of metropolitan life is that of seeing the best the dramatic stage affords, and of hearing the finest music.

Though the variety stage is always to be avoided, high comedy is one of the most refreshing, innocent and commendable forms of the drama. It relaxes the tension of the mind keyed too high by unremitted attention to business and helps to keep it in normal and wholesome condition.

The best tragedians only should be seen, and those plays only which are free from objectionable features, and which have exalted and unimpeachable motives.

More potent and subtle than the influence of the drama is that exerted by music. It elevates the sentiments, enriching and refining one's nature to a degree little understood. This is particularly true of classical and church music of the highest order. But in this, as in every other expenditure, let the rule be inflexible, never to go beyond one's means, or even so near to the limit as to incur danger of embarrassment, or the use of a farthing not one's own.

Safety and Progression in Investment

Where to place the savings is an important consideration not easily covered by general advice. The savings bank is the suggestion which generally comes first to mind, and for very small sums, a few dollars at a time, this may be well. But even here it is most desirable to exercise the greatest caution and to profit by the counsel of elderly and experienced business men in the selection of the bank. It is to be hoped that the Government will establish Postal Savings Banks to insure absolute safety of deposits.

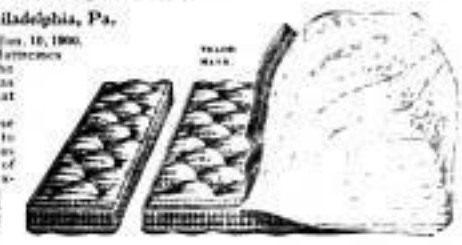
As soon as the savings amount to a sufficient sum to warrant it, more profitable investment may be had—with like reliable counsel—in well-secured bonds, or, better still, in the purchase of real estate in a growing city. It is not more difficult to select bonds which afford the maximum of safety than to choose a bank which is proof against dishonest management, or the disastrous runs in time of panic; and the bonds have the advantage, generally speaking, of bringing a higher percentage of interest than the large bank pays the small depositor. But well-chosen realty in a city of actual and inevitable growth, presents, perhaps, the most solid and remunerative form of investment.

To close this treatment of young men's savings, the writer ventures to versify a proverb worthy of constant remembrance:

"Despise not the penny, though petty it sounds,
For pennies breed pennies, and soon become pounds."

At the Window

By Margherita Arlina Hamm



A POT of lilies on the sill,
A face behind the pane,
Within my heart a sudden thrill
Which words cannot explain.
Faint echoes stirred within the brain
Of melodies long still;
Fair features brought to life again
Without or wish or will—
A pot of lilies on the sill,
A face behind the pane.

Send for Our FREE Book

Of 72 pages, "The Test of Time." In it you will probably find a letter from some neighbor or friend that is just as strong as the following from the Rev. JOS. A. SEISS, D.D., Philadelphia, Pa.

MESSRS. OSTERMOOR & CO., 1338 Spring Garden St., Jan. 16, 1900.
SIRS:—I have had one of your Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses in constant use for twenty-eight years past—it is not in the least matted down, but is just as soft, clean and elastic as when new, although the ticking is very badly worn, so that I think re-covering is necessary.
I certainly would not have a mattress for personal use except the Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt, for there is not, to my knowledge, anything so satisfactory and enduring as your mattress possible to be obtained. Surely the sight of this twenty-eight-year-old mattress, and my remarkable experience, must convince doubters, if any are left. The Lutheran Theological Seminary at Mt. Airy, we furnished throughout with your mattresses, where they are proving just as satisfactory. Yours truly, JOS. A. SEISS.

The Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt Mattress, $15. Express Prepaid to your door

Is always "SENT ON SUSPICION," which means just this: SLEEP ON IT 30 NIGHTS and if it is not even all you have hoped for, if you don't believe it to be the equal in cleanliness, durability and comfort of any $50 hair mattress ever made, you can get your money back by return mail—"no questions asked." There will be no unpleasantness about it at all.

Send for Our Book, "THE TEST OF TIME," whether you need a mattress now or not. It will interest you to know about the best and cheapest mattress in the world.

3 ft. 6 ins. wide, 25 lbs.,	$ 8.35
3 ft. wide, 30 lbs.,	10.00
3 ft. 6 ins. wide, 35 lbs.,	11.70
4 ft. wide, 40 lbs.,	13.35
4 ft. 6 ins. wide, 45 lbs.,	15.00

All 6 ft. 3 ins. Long

Made in two parts, 50 cents extra

Take Care! Don't be Cheated! There is not a single store in the country that carries our mattress; almost every store now has an imitation so-called "felt," which is kept in stock to sell on our advertising. Our name and guarantee on every mattress. Can be bought only of

OSTERMOOR & CO., 101 Elizabeth St., New York

We have cushioned 25,000 Churches. Send for our book, "Church Cushions."

Alois P. Swoboda

Teaches by mail, with perfect success, his original and scientific method of Physiological Exercise, without any apparatus whatever, and requiring but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring. By this condensed system more exercise can be obtained in ten minutes than by any other in two hours, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

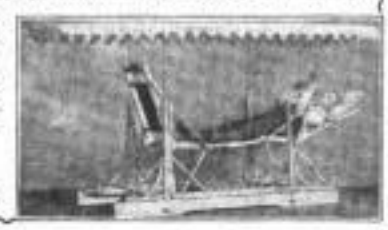
It is the only natural, easy and speedy method for obtaining perfect health, physical development, and elasticity of mind and body.

Perfect Health means an absolute freedom from those ailments which a well-informed mind knows are directly or indirectly due to a lack of properly arranged exercise.

Pupils are of both sexes, ranging in age from fifteen to eighty-six, and all recommend the system. Since no two people are in the same physical condition individual instructions are given in each case.

Write at once for full information and Booklet, containing indorsements from many of America's leading citizens, to

ALOIS P. SWOBODA
34-36 Washington Street, Chicago, Ill.



Rock the Baby or Yourself in the

WAYNE LAWN and VERANDA SWING

An outdoor delight in summer on lawn or porch—an indoor pleasure all the year 'round, in attic, playroom or nursery. Appreciated alike by grown-ups and little ones.

Safe, restful, strongly made, noiseless, adjustable to any reclining or upright positions. Supersedes the hammock. Can be occupied and operated by one to four persons. Gives the same sweep as a 10-foot swing, yet is only 4½ feet high, 7 feet long, 3½ feet wide. Takes no more room than a couch. Will sustain a ton weight. The pressure of the foot gives the motion. As easily operated as a rocking-chair. Price from $10.00 up, according to finish.

Free booklet, with descriptions and prices, upon request

LOUIS RASTETTER & SON, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

PRODUCT OF 1900

SUNART VICI MAGAZINE CAMERAS

Size 4 x 5, $8.00

At One Loading 12 Plates or 24 Films

Improved Pneumatic Shutter
Achromatic Lens
Every Camera Guaranteed

Folding and Cycle Cameras from $5 to $50

SUNART PHOTO CO.
32 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

Ask your dealer to show the latest Magazine Camera and Automatic Tripod. CATALOGUE FREE

THE LOZIER GAS ENGINE

Perfect { Reliable as a Steam Engine
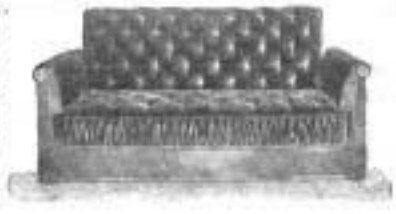
LUBRICATION—Automatic. Oiler sprays Piston every stroke.
COMBUSTION—The same rule as steam.
MIXING—Of gasoline and air.
CONSTRUCTION—Finest ever produced.



"OLER SPECIAL" is the name of our popular launch for fishing, hunting and general club use. Length 30 ft. 6 in. Perfectly safe and seaworthy. Write us for free advance catalogue of safe engines and good boats. Marine Department.

LOZIER MOTOR CO.
20 Gardner Block, Toledo, Ohio

The Leonard Sofa Bed

A luxurious Sofa, couch length, instantly convertible into a Large, soft hair-mattress bed, with receptacle for bedding or dresses. 10 styles, $28.00 to $75.00—equally luxurious and serviceable. Freight prepaid, catalogues free. Returnable if not entirely satisfactory. There is but One Leonard Sofa Bed. Patented, manufactured and sold only by

The Leonard Sofa Bed Co., 419 Erie St., Cleveland, O.

Digitized by Google

The American Girl in Musical Paris

By Madam Emma Nevada

PARIS is the one place on earth where one may make a truly great success, and the hardest place on earth in which to fail. Out of the fullness of many years' experience in the French metropolis, I counsel the American girl who would succeed in the musical world to go to Paris—under certain conditions; and by all means to remain at home if these conditions are not fulfilled.

When a young girl tells me that she is going to Paris, alone and with little money, to study music, I tremble. I know what it means. I do not care if she has the making of a real artist. If she is pretty, so much the worse, for the temptations in her pathway will be doubled. If she has no mother, brother, or constant chaperon to attend her wherever she goes, her struggle will be a very bitter one. I do not hesitate to affirm that to send a poor girl to Paris alone to cultivate her voice is nothing short of a crime.

I have seen American girls come to Paris by twos and threes, take up residence in some obscure pension, and travel about the boulevards with the independent air of American girls in our own great cities, under the impression that their very independence clothed them with divinity and protected them from insult. Such is not the case. Conditions in Paris are not those of New York, and public opinion is merciless. As for the many professors of music, they are very exacting; and the unchaperoned girl gets very close scrutiny. If she is found to be poor, even if her voice is of exceptional promise, she is politely bidden to apply elsewhere. There are plenty of American girls who aspire to musical honors who are not handicapped by poverty. In fact, the wealthy ones have made it very difficult for the poor girl, who must, by sheer force of genius, break through this barrier of indifference, if not of contempt, mingled with pity.

The Need of a Home for Women Students

I hope that there will be in Paris, before many years have passed, an institution where American girls can be made comfortable under pleasant conditions and in an artistic environment. The many millions that are spent in apparently useless charities would find here a worthier cause, to my mind. Such a refuge for the American aspirant who had taken honors in competitive examination, making her eligible to its privileges, would afford her a home during her student career, preserve her from the snares and pitfalls of Parisian life, hedge her safely against the scheming trickster, and afford her counsel to the surest end in her profession. At the present time such an establishment is sorely needed; for, whatever the discouragements of those who have gone before, and whatever their adverse advice, there will ever be a constantly increasing battalion of American girls from all parts of the Union seeking a hearing in the great metropolis, each girl imagining that she can lead all her sisters in the struggle and rank with the best of all time.

In nothing is there so much delusion as in the judgment of incompetent persons with regard to the voice; and great is the ruin that this delusion has brought about. In an institution such as I suggest the American girl could very soon discover her place and her possibilities in the musical world. Situated in the central part of the city, such a home could provide a place of comfort and repose as well as diversion and companionship; and, musically, its possibilities would be immense. Here is an opportunity for some millionaire to do a generous deed. At present there is no such hospice of homely comfort, encouragement and good cheer. The American girl finds her pension and settles down to hard work, and the struggle is often a very lonesome one.

Hard Work and Much of it the Price of Success

The first condition of success is that the aspirant shall have a voice; then she must have money, and she should have a constant friend and protector in her difficult journey and be prepared for the hard work which naturally follows. On the subject of hard work it seems that I could write volumes. The great bane to the musical profession nowadays is the prevailing delusion that long and bitter labor to the great end is not so necessary now as in times past. I do know, however, that there is more poor singing throughout Europe now than ever before. Indeed, I heard operas in Italy some months ago that ten years ago would have been hooted and hissed from the stage. The craving for the luxuries of the profession without its labors, the glamour of the footlights without a struggle to achieve a high artistic ideal, these account for the rarity of a perfect musical performance. Unwillingness to work and work hard, on the one hand, and the increasing inroads of wealth on the other, tend to reduce the standard of excellence. For, when young artists shirk their duty and managers are greedy for gold, pushing forward mediocre talent because that talent can pay for the privilege, we have a combination that seriously threatens musical standards the world over.

The Competition of Wealthy Students

I can recall scores of cases in point—young girls of exceptional beauty and voice, compelled by poverty to remain in the background, while others with only mediocre talent, who happen to have money with which to buy a Parisian success, are blazoned on every street corner and heralded as stars.

"What's the use?" said an impresario to me one day, when I brought to him an American girl who had a magnificent voice, hoping that he would interest himself in her welfare. "There are plenty of American girls over here whose frocks are lined with thousand-franc notes. Why, your candidate is so poor that she is actually dowdy in her last year's gown!" And this with an inflection that implied a crime on the applicant's part. He would not even try her voice.

Now another case in point, of the opposite nature. An American girl of great wealth was flattered into the belief that she had a phenomenal voice and that she must go to Paris to cultivate it. Her mother accompanied her thither, and together they went the rounds of the musical professors. Some of the better ones would not undertake the girl's musical education at any price, while others were willing—at a price.

But before very long the inevitable arose when there came complaints of lack of application and of mingling work with dissipation; and when the daughter of millions was spoken to sharply during a lesson the mother took exception and hurried her daughter away in high dudgeon to another professor. After three years of Parisian life the applicant has made no particular progress, while the good husband and father has been pining away with a broken heart in his native city, his home broken up, and only inevitable failure in store for his child. Meantime, while achieving nothing herself, the rich American girl has with her lavish expenditure of money made it more difficult for the humbler sister who really has the talent and the capacity for hard work, but who has not the money to push herself forward.

A Rude Health a First Essential of Success

Another condition which is not to be overlooked is the physical one. The training which the student undergoes is a very severe one. Nothing short of a perfectly normal physique is capable of maintaining it. I recall the case of a beautiful American girl with an exceptional voice who was compelled to give up solely on this account: she was always in the hands of her doctor, and certainly could not hope for an easier life when in the actual struggle for popularity later. The strain of a night's singing is immense, and the nervous tension calls for a thoroughly vigorous and sound vitality. Midnight suppers and other dissipations of Parisian life are fatal to artistic success. To a regular life and most careful diet I owe my success as a singer, for the voice is as tender as a soul, and the least departure from perfectly normal living manifests its corroding influence upon the vocal organs. The aspirant, then, must have a good physique

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS

Are acknowledged to be the best designed, finest fitting, and most comfortable corsets ever manufactured.

THE DOWAGER CORSET

FOR STOUT FIGURES

Worn by thousands and indorsed by them as

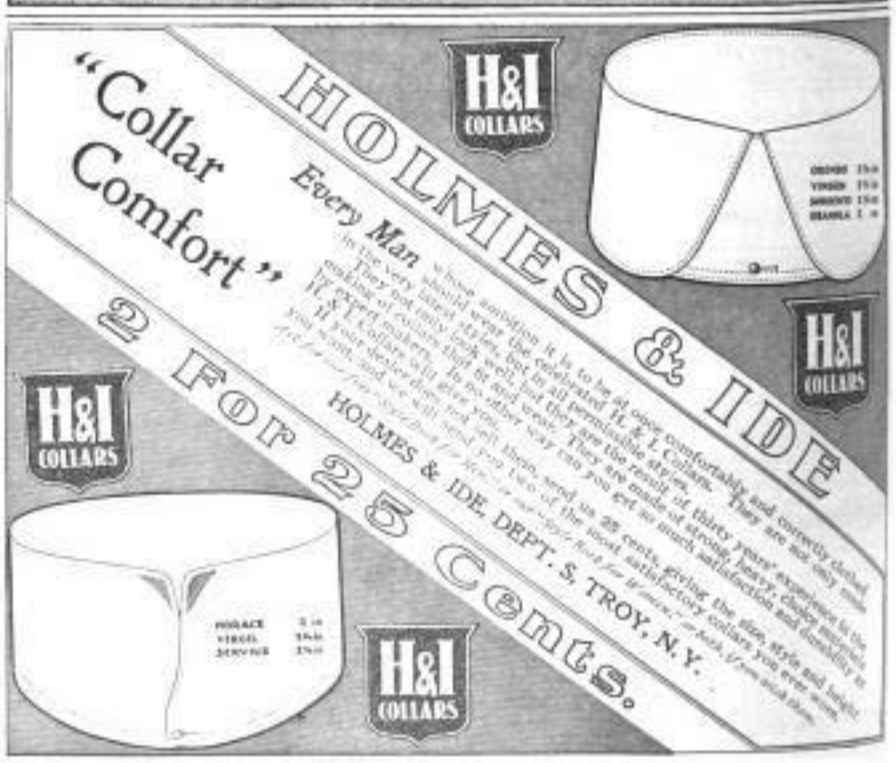
The Best Corset ever produced

MADE IN FOUR LENGTHS—Extra Long, Long, Medium, Short. Sizes, 22 to 43 inches.

STYLE 550, Heavy Coutil, Satteen strips. Sizes, 22 to 30, $2.00; 31 to 36, $2.25; 37 to 43, $2.50. White, Drab, Black.

STYLE 550, SUMMER NETTING. (White only.) Sizes and prices same as above.

ROYAL WORCESTER CORSETS AND THE DOWAGER CORSET



Are sold by leading dealers everywhere. Ask your dealer FIRST. If he can't supply you, a Money Order sent us, with size, length and color plainly marked, will bring corset to you free of expense.

LADIES ARE REQUESTED TO SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE

WORCESTER CORSET COMPANY

WORCESTER, MASS. CHICAGO, ILL.

Digitized by Google

HOOKON HOSE SUPPORTER

Holds the Stockings Up

Holds the Corset Down

Does away with Safety Pins

Being hooked on the lowest corset clasp it keeps the corset down and close to the body, preventing the point of the corset from protruding, thereby greatly reducing the prominence of the abdomen.

The HOOKON cannot become unfastened; always comfortable, no matter what position the wearer may assume. Made of best materials, and will wear longer than other hose supporters. For sale at leading stores.

Send 50c for sample pair—silk
Send 25c for sample pair—cotton

I. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
721 Broadway, New York

Rich's Patent
JULIA MARLOWE SHOES
THE MOST PERFECT FITTING FOOT WEAR EVER MADE

Write for Illustrated CATALOGUE

Proclaimed by thousands of wearers to Combine Comfort and Grace

Not equaled in any other style, owing to the Panel of "Hub Guro." The high shoes, as well as the Oxfords, Fit either High or Low Instep perfectly, at the same time yield and adjust themselves to every action of the foot. They are made of the Choicest (kid) Kid or with Fancy Vesting tops in Black or Tan, at the same prices, in all sizes, latest styles of toes and all widths from A—EE.

McKay Sewed Lace Boots, $3.25; Oxfords, $2.25
Hand-Turned Lace Boots, $3.50; Oxfords, $2.50

Sent, Express prepaid, upon receipt of price and 25 cts.

THE RICH SHOE CO.
Dept. O, Milwaukee, Wis.

For Summer, Porous

Jaeger PURE WOOL UNDERWEAR

Send for Illustrated Catalogue

New York: 16 West 23d St. / 166 Broadway.
Brooklyn: 504 Fulton St.
Boston: 160 Tremont St.
Philadelphia: 924 Chestnut St.
Chicago: 74 State St.

9 for 10 Cents

We will send to any one 9 handsome 7 in. embroidery designs, all different, stamped on colored cambric. Also our new 100-page catalogue of Fancy Work Novelties and Handkerchiefs. All for 10 cents.

C. S. DAVISSON & CO.
91 Broadway, N. Y. Dept. 69

New Hat 3c

HAT BLEACH cleans straw hats in 5 minutes. Makes an old hat look as good as new without injuring the straw or fibre. Large package (contains 8 hats), 25c postpaid. Trial package, 10c. Agts. wanted.

HAT BLEACH CO.
30 E. Market St., Louis, O.

For 20c I will send 6 BUTTER DOILIES and one 18 in. CENTER-PIECE Stamped on fine White Linen, and with them Latest Catalogue of BRIGGS' TRANSFERRING PATTERNS.

JOSEPH WALKER, Box E 3, Irvington, N. J.

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

H. C. WILLIS & CO., 124 South 11th Street, Philadelphia and maintain a high standard of health through all her student years. By that time regular life and ways will be so much a matter of custom that she will maintain them throughout her career as an artist.

Of the many professors in Paris I shall not speak, for that draws me toward a matter of professional choice. There are some who are at the very top, but precious few they are, indeed. From these few great professors of music there is a great army running down the whole gamut to the very depths of badness, alleged trainers who are in the business for the money that is to be extorted from the guileless and the innocent, who, while having no standing with the profession, make specious promises, and by flattery cajole the rich applicant into the belief that she is one of the chosen few. These harpies are the bane of the profession. They lie in wait for wealthy American girls who have little musical knowledge, and certainly no artistic ideal or standard to maintain.

The condition in which their dupes find themselves after a term of years under their instruction is very pitiable. It is needless to say that this is not one of the dangers that beset the poor aspirant for musical honors in Paris. The harpy will very soon drop his prey if he happen upon a poor girl under the illusion that she is the daughter of a millionaire.

Cost of a Musical Education in Paris

The time necessary to take a course varies. A few years ago it required eight years of good and faithful service, then six, and now four. Of course personal ability and willingness to work have everything to do in shortening the term, for really every aspirant is the architect of her own destiny, the mother of her own career. Though Madame Marchesi and others have daily classes from ten o'clock till four, every pupil receives virtually individual instruction. The cost of this instruction varies from fifty to eighty dollars a month, and living and other expenses bring the sum total to one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars a month. This amount will provide for all the necessities and some of the luxuries of Parisian life. Of course, some students get along with half these sums; but nowhere is it so necessary to dress and appear well as in Paris, and during no time of life is it necessary to live so comfortably, eating well and enjoying the most congenial of surroundings. The struggle is hard enough under the most favorable of conditions.

Paris is swarming with musical mediocrity. A scant one per cent. ever succeed in gaining a hearing, and probably one in thousands ever gain Continental fame. Yet each aspirant for honors believes herself the immortal one. It appears so easy when, by the very art of concealing art, the singer utters notes that seem spontaneous, yet which are the result of years of faithful effort. "Go to! I can do as well as that, or better," cries the neophyte, and she plunges into the struggle. Even if she succeeds in spending two, three or five years under the tutelage of a great professor, then her real struggle begins. I have known capable singers to plod and hope on, renewing their daily effort to win the interest of the imperious impresario, and for a term of years double that of their studentship. Indeed, there are thousands who never get any further than the very threshold of success, finding the narrow gate barred and bolted against them, with neither money, influence nor a great voice to afford them an open sesame. For these the struggle is very bitter, and it is no wonder that so many fall by the wayside, utterly overcome with the struggle and suspense, the indifference, and even the contempt of this city of contrasts. These failures rarely ever come back home to face their friends in defeat. Pride buoys them up to the last; and whereas they might many of them be good and even influential wives and mothers to good American citizens here at home, in a land of strangers they drift into obscurity and disappear. It is the history of untold thousands.

Let me say, then, that the American girl who has not a perfectly phenomenal voice, abundance of means at her disposal, a capacity for hard work, and a large fund of health and strength, had better stay at home, for Paris is no place for her.

Parisian life is the great alchemist of human nature. It changes everything with which it comes in contact.

There is no human suffering more keen than failure in a great cause of art; and where one succeeds, the ten thousand fail and retreat into oblivion.

Our NEW line of CHILDREN'S Stockings
With this Trade-Mark on the toe
Shawknit TRADE MARK

NOW ON SALE—
ASK YOUR DEALER
For STYLE SS 2

For years there has been a demand for a stocking that would resist the proverbial hard wear of the average young person, and yet be light, stylish and durable. We have at last perfected such a stocking for Children or Misses, sizes 5 to 9½, and guarantee every pair to have the durability that has made Shawknit Half Hose for men famous throughout the world.

STYLE SS 2

Is a fine gauge ribbed stocking, with French foot, reinforced knee, heel and ankle; also double sole. Equal to the best imported, and more durable. Dyed in our famous "Snow-black."

35 cts. a pair; 3 pairs, $1.00.

Sent postpaid, packed in a dainty box, on receipt of price, or from dealers

CATALOGUE FREE—Showing Colors, Weights, Styles and Prices.

Look for this little coon label and the famous Shawknit Trade-Mark—always found as in above cut.

THE SHAW STOCKING CO.
80 Shaw Street, Lowell, Mass.

"LIGHT OF ASIA" LAMP
A Small, Handsome, Portable Electric Light

Mounted in an Aluminum Shell; Covered with Fine Leather.

Batteries Do Not Deteriorate Unless Used. Will Last a Long Time. They are Easily Renewed

Weight, 5½ ounces. ⅞ inch diameter. 8 inches long. Can be carried in a vest pocket.

TAKE ONE TO THE COUNTRY.
IT GIVES A GOOD LIGHT.
EVERY HOME SHOULD HAVE ONE. By mail, $3.00.

ELECTRIC CONTRACT COMPANY
61 ELM STREET, NEW YORK

The Jewett

Built for service in every-day business. Its heavy hangers and typebars make it the most powerful manifolder. It

WRITES 30 COPIES AT ONCE

While being durable and ready for heavy work, the JEWETT also has a light, responsive touch, and is easy to operate.

Write for booklet, which illustrates and explains everything.

JEWETT TYPEWRITER CO.
632 Locust Street, Des Moines, Ia.

"Best in the World"

People used to say to the dealer: "I want a tooth brush." Now most cleanly persons say: "I want a Prophylactic Tooth Brush." Look at the brush and see how simple and common-sensible it is.

SOLD ONLY IN A YELLOW BOX—for your protection. Curved handle and face to fit the mouth. Bristle in irregular tufts—CLEANS BETWEEN THE TEETH. Hole in handle and hook to hold it. This means much to cleanly persons—the only ones who like our brush. Adults' 25c. Youths' 20c. Children's 15c. By mail or at dealers'. Send for our free booklet, "Tooth Truths." FLORENCE MFG. CO., 82 Pine St., Florence, Mass.

Three Sizes

Digitized by Google

Literary Folk as they Come and Go

NO ONE seeing Mr. H. G. Wells taking his regular afternoon walk along the sea front of Sandgate or on the Folkestone cliffs would think he was, or ever had been, an invalid. He walks with a swinging gait and climbs like a boy up the hill on which he is building a house, a picturesque structure, straggling along the hillside and commanding a view of thirty miles of Kentish coast and the white cliffs of France at Boulogne. Yet, as is well known, Mr. Wells came to Sandgate for his health.

H. G. Wells' Literary Partnership

AN ENGLISH invalid is, however, in some ways and according to some American standards, a hearty creature. The other day Mr. Wells had a transatlantic visitor. The sun was shining outside, but an occasional flying cloud brought a slight flurry of snow with it. The author's study faces the south and was flooded with sunlight as its owner brought his guest there for a cigarette after luncheon. But there was no fire anywhere, and the long French windows were flung open wide to the sea breeze.

"You don't feel cold, do you?" politely inquired Mr. Wells. "I know Americans heat their houses more than we do."

Mr. Wells works regularly every morning at his writing. In the afternoon Mrs. Wells transcribes on the typewriter the morning's work, and in the evening both of them go over the day's result. It is often changed tremendously by the night's criticism.

"It's no use my promising to send 'copy' to you by Saturday," said Mr. Wells to an editor. "I must wait and lay it before my wife. She will know whether I can do it and she will see that I keep my promise."

Mr. Wells' marriage is a literary partnership as well.

Canon Maccoll's Juvenile Physician

CANON MALCOM MACCOLL, the English traveler and author of many authoritative books upon the Eastern question, not long ago had an unpleasant experience, according to a literary friend, which he will remember to his dying day.

The Canon is troubled with a weak throat, and when preaching has, on a shelf under his pulpit, a cup of tonic. It was prescribed for him by his family surgeon and has been of great benefit. From long habit he no longer looked at the cup when he used it, but simply stooped, put it to his lips, drank half the contents and replaced it.

On the day in question he went through this performance, but before he could stop himself he had burst into a violent cough in which he expelled a stream of spray of all sorts of strange ingredients. He thought he was the victim of a practical joke and suspicious bystanders suggested an attempt at poisoning. The mystery was explained by a little child, a member of his household, who said:

"I tasted the stuff you take when you preach and it was so nasty and bitter that I felt sorry, and so, when nurse wasn't looking, I carried my bread and milk and some sugar, salt and pepper from the house and stirred it in, which made it a great deal nicer."

Sarah Grand's Opinion of Stepmothers

ACCORDING to Mrs. Sarah Grand, the English novelist, the popular prejudices respecting stepmothers and stepchildren are wickedly mendacious.

"I'm a stepmother myself and I ought to know," she said to an American friend not long ago. "My stepson is as near and dear to me as any son could be, and I am certain that his feelings toward me are equally tender and affectionate. In fact, a great deal of my literary success is due to him. I had a very hard time in the beginning, and often I was so discouraged that I felt like throwing up my hands and relinquishing the struggle. Whenever these periods of depression occurred my stepson came to the rescue, and by his advice, strong common-sense and kindly encouragement aided me to renew my efforts. It was seven years before I secured a publisher for Ideala.

"A similar fate almost attended The Heavenly Twins. Publisher after publisher declined it, until I thought there was no one left. At that point my stepson decided to publish it himself. He had made the preliminary arrangements and we were discussing the details of the enterprise when I received a letter of acceptance from a publishing house where I had given up all hope."

Mrs. Grand is of Irish birth but of English descent on both sides. Her husband died in 1898, and she now lives on an attractive little estate known as the Grey House, Langton, not far from Tunbridge Wells.

An Antique with a Wrong Pedigree

KIMBALL SCRIBNER, whose Continental Cavalier—a study of American life in the last century—is now engaging attention, is an enthusiastic student of the Colonial period. He is a wealthy young bachelor, and his apartments in New York City are fitted up in the style of the homes of the well-to-do in Revolutionary days. His friends say that he carries his hobby so far as to have Colonial dishes served at all his meals and obsolete beverages upon his board. His collections represent much labor. On one occasion he found an ancient chair which pleased him greatly. After he had ordered it the proprietor of the place—an ostentatious and patronizing man—said:

"Mr. Scribner, fastened to the back of that beautiful work of ancient art you will find its certified pedigree, which I have had made at great trouble in order to satisfy my patrons."

Mr. Scribner took down the manuscript and to his amusement found that it was the pedigree of an old hall clock instead of the old chair. He handed it to the antiquary, remarking:

"When I buy a pedigree I want one that fits."

He took the chair, nevertheless, and it holds a place of honor in his study.

A Drummer Who Writes Novels

CHARLES CLARK MUNN, the author of the story of adventure, Pocket Island, enjoys the distinction of being the only commercial traveler who is also a novelist. He explains in an apologetic way that selling goods is his trade and literature his weakness. He is a New Englander by birth and has probably a better knowledge of the topography of the Eastern States than any other writer. The information gathered in this way he has utilized in his writings, which describe with marked fidelity prominent or romantic spots in that section of the country. Most of his education was self-acquired, his schooldays having been confined to a little country schoolhouse which he attended irregularly in his boyhood. Speaking on this subject he said to a friend:

"My two best teachers have been the locomotive and the country store."

Pleasant Work for Spare Minutes

GENERAL LEWIS M. PECK, a distinguished veteran of the Civil War, is a bibliophile, if not a bookworm. He was the leading worker on the volunteer committee which prepared the famous index of magazine and other short articles for the Brooklyn Library, then under the management of the late Doctor Noyes. This work was an extension of Poole's famous index to periodical literature. Not long after the task was completed the General met at a reception a young woman who had just been elected librarian of a social club.

"I am thinking," she said, "of getting up a nice, complete catalogue of all the leading magazine articles for my library. I have considerable leisure time and like hard work. How long do you think it would take me?"

"It depends upon the amount of your leisure. The last one took a hundred men five years each."

$2500.00
IN CASH PRIZES

WILL BE PAID BY

THE PUBLISHERS OF "SUCCESS"

Contest Open to Every One

The McGraw-Marden Company, Publishers of SUCCESS, a large and handsomely illustrated family magazine, will divide $2500.00 in cash prizes among those who will help to introduce SUCCESS in twenty-five or more homes of their friends and neighbors by September 30, 1900. In addition to the Cash Prizes, a large Cash Commission is paid on each Subscription. This is a rare opportunity for Agents, Teachers, Students and others to earn good wages and establish a permanent and profitable business. There is no expense attached.

Sample Copy and Particulars Free

Those who are desirous of pleasant and profitable employment for all or a part of their time, should send at once for a free sample copy of SUCCESS, terms and the full particulars of our offers to Agents and Club-Raisers.

A $50 Bicycle Free

We give one of the best-known bicycles FREE for a small club of subscribers to SUCCESS. Any industrious boy or girl can form the required club in a short time, and thus get a wheel, which never sells for less than $50, without a penny of cost. We also give cameras and other popular premiums free for clubs. The bicycle catalogue, a sample copy of SUCCESS, and Club-Raisers' Outfit sent to any one on request.

A Scholarship Offer

Those young men and women who are willing to render a reasonable service in exchange for a Scholarship in the school or college of their own choice, will find that the publishers of SUCCESS offer the best, easiest and quickest way of earning next year's school expenses, and it can be done in three months' time. Others have won SUCCESS SCHOLARSHIPS—why not you? If interested, send for our circular, "How to Win a SUCCESS Scholarship."

Are You Reading "SUCCESS"

SUCCESS is the most widely quoted periodical published; but don't be satisfied with the crumbs—subscribe for SUCCESS itself, and receive monthly the most inspiring, most helpful and entertaining publication issued from the American press. Already it has over 100,000 regular subscribers, but a million families will gladly take it when they have seen and read a single copy.

SUCCESS gives 36 to 48 large pages in a handsome cover monthly. It is profusely illustrated with magnificent engravings. Its unique contents are extraordinarily interesting and valuable. In every number, SUCCESS gives a great variety of delightful and useful reading—always something good for every member of the family. The following are

A FEW FEATURES IN THE MAY ISSUE:

Senator Foraker

Discusses the question, "Should Young Men be Trained for a Public Career?"

Hall Caine and Israel Zangwill

Tell how they happened to write their first book, and the reception it met with. These are articles in a series on "My First Book," by the most prominent British and American authors, now running in SUCCESS.

Failures of the Century

A symposium by W. D. Howells and other leaders in different professions upon ways in which the nineteenth century has failed to bring about improvement.

Street Railroading as a Profession

Edward E. Higgins, editor of The Street Railway Journal, writes about the possibilities for young men in this great field.

The Happy Marriage

Ella Wheeler Wilcox tells the secret of a happy marriage, and gives timely advice to young women.

A Character Sketch

In this number there is an inspiring interview with Charles T. Schoen, who rose from a workman to the greatest car builder in the world in a few years' time, by the aid of his own talents alone. His advice to young men is exceedingly interesting and valuable.

Other Noted Contributors

To the May SUCCESS: General Coxhead, Max O'Rell, Maxim, the Gun-Maker; Elizabeth Grannis, Hezekiah Butterworth, General Joe Wheeler.

The May SUCCESS contains Choice Fiction, Talks to Young Men, SUCCESS Junior, Inspiring Editorials, etc.

If you want to know how to make the most of your opportunities, how to make stepping-stones of your obstacles, how to best utilize your energy and ambition, how to choose an occupation, how to find your place and how to keep it, how to increase your salary and get on faster, how to be worth more to yourself, to your family, and to the world, read SUCCESS. For sale by all newsdealers.

ONE DOLLAR A YEAR. TEN CENTS A COPY

A sample copy (of our own selection) sent FREE on request. Address

THE McGRAW-MARDEN COMPANY

Publishers of SUCCESS. 17 to 29 Cooper Union, NEW YORK CITY

Digitized by Google

For Sale by All Dealers.

Lead and Colored Pencils

Stationers' Rubber Goods

Inks

Mark the initials

A. W.

Before the name of

FABER

Established 1761

100 SKILLED LABORERS

At One Cent a Week

Servants can be employed in China for 5c. a day. To us, where conditions of labor are different, this appears marvelously cheap. But, with our modern method of production, we can give you the result of 100 skilled laborers for one cent a week, placed in your home once every month.

These 100 laborers are employed by us in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, London and New York.

DESIGNERS, producing styles of women's garments;
ENGRAVERS, engraving these designs on wood;
ARTISTS, creating new weaves and fabrics;
WRITERS, collecting latest information in the fashion and literary world;

All of which we print and illustrate in our monthly magazine, MODES AND FABRICS, containing over

1000 Different Styles of Garments During the Year

Send 50 cents for one-year subscription, or

Our Special Offer for May Only

For $1.00 We will send MODES AND FABRICS for two years, or two subscriptions to two addresses for one year, and mail you free of charge our dressmakers' chart, which retails at $1.00 each.

MODES AND FABRICS PUBLISHING CO.
550 Pearl Street, New York

Royal Engraved Wedding Invitations and Announcements
Samples Free

Royal Stationery

Two quires of finest Writing Paper, correctly engraved with your Initial or Monogram (choice of five designs), and 50 envelopes to match, for

	Initial	Monogram
Stamped in Plain Colors,	$ .75	$1.25
Stamped in Gold, Silver or Copper Bronze,	.85	1.35
Stamped, Illuminated in Two Colors,	1.00	1.50

Handsome sample book and sheet of souvenir engraved work mailed for 10 cents.

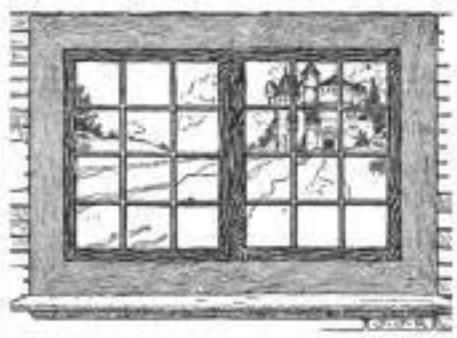
Royal Visiting Cards—Latest styles of engraving and sizes, including plate. Samples free. 50 cards, 75c.; 100 cards, $1.00.

ALL CHARGES PREPAID

ROYAL ENGRAVING COMPANY
18 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Ad Sense

Is published monthly as a palatable literary diet for the busy business man. Send 10 cents — coin or stamps — for sample copy to Ad Sense, 81 Fifth Ave., Chicago. One dollar a year. Every month, from cover to imprint, it is suggestive of better things in business.



Books at Liberal Discounts

When calling please ask for MR. GRANT
Whenever you need a book, address MR. GRANT

Before buying books write for quotations. An assortment of 200 bargains and special slips of books at reduced prices sent for 10 cent stamps.

F. F. GRANT, Books, 22 W. 42d Street, New York
(Mention this advertisement and receive a discount.)

Tolstoi's New Story of Prison Life*

IT IS a piteous task to read Count Tolstoi's latest novel and to realize but too plainly the clouding of a once noble mind. It is piteous beyond measure to sound the depths into which mental confusion and a morbid study of all forms of baseness can plunge the soul of man. The frank, explicit and repellent indecency of the book has been surpassed only by Zola's most terrible creations. This wholesale arraignment of humanity counts for nothing, partly because of its hideous insistence upon evil, and partly because of the author's inability to differentiate between that which is wholly vile and that which is mildly indecorous. Prince Dimitri Ivánovitch Nekhlúdoff, the hero of Resurrection, has dyed his soul scarlet with sin; but this does not prevent his being deeply scandalized by a portrait of his mother in a low-cut gown. He finds "something revolting and blasphemous"—why blasphemous?—in such a representation of triumphant youth and beauty.

The same confusion of moral perspective is noticeable in all Count Tolstoi's observations upon prison life, with which the novel largely deals. Of the enormous reforms wrought within the last twenty-five years he has nothing to say, and this silence is in itself slanderous. Of abuses still remaining he has a vast deal to say, but he makes no distinction between the pardonable impatience of officials and deliberate cruelty. In fact, were every jailer and every inspector as tender-hearted as a lamb, the wrong done the prisoners would be no less shameful in his eyes, because it is a salient point in his creed that nothing can give to man the right to judge or to punish his fellow-creatures.

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY

The iniquity of landlordism, however, the crime of owning more land than your neighbor, is one which Count Tolstoi handles at length and with severity, presenting many familiar arguments for our consideration. Strangest of all, he holds up to bitter scorn and derision the beautiful ceremonial of the Russian Church and the simple, unquestioning piety of her people. Voltaire himself might well have shrunk from ridiculing the mysteries of religion with the coarse vehemence of this northern iconoclast. Christ, he asserts, has forbidden men to erect churches or to pray in them, and those who do either disobey the Gospel law. Yet have churches played their part, not wholly without merit, in the humanizing and elevating of our race; and perhaps to jibe at any creed in which poor, stupid, stumbling mortals find help and comfort is more closely akin to blasphemy than the wearing of low-cut gowns. "Let every man believe what he will, or rather what he can," said one of the wisest of men; "but let him forbear to express his views if they are of a kind to disturb the heart of humanity."

—Agnes Repplier.

*Resurrection. By Leo Tolstoi. Dodd, Mead & Company.

Every Lover of Art

WILL BE GLAD TO LEARN THAT

The Masterpieces of America's Greatest Artists Are to be Reproduced in the Finest Photogravure Process

THESE photogravures represent paintings that have been sold for thousands of dollars, and others that are fresh from the artists' brush. They would sell rapidly at any art store at $5.00 each, but they can be purchased only from us, as we absolutely control the copyrights.

The Masterpieces of twenty-five of our Greatest American Artists now for the first time available in a single collection

Beautify Your Home

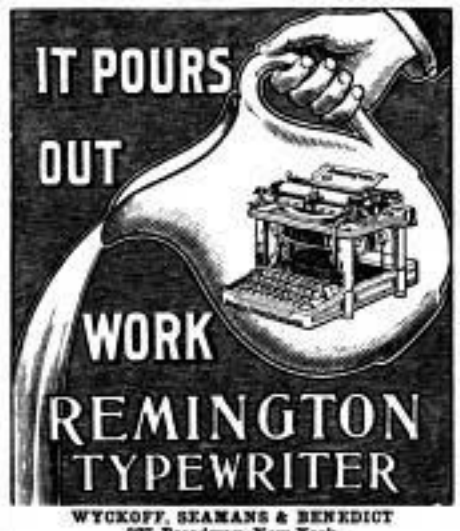
This collection of paintings, varied in style and color-tone, will superbly adorn any home. They are 18 x 24 inches in size, are placed in a beautiful portfolio, and so arranged that they can be conveniently removed for framing.

An Art Educator

This magnificent collection will at once stimulate and cultivate a desire for the artistic. A complete description accompanies each painting, also a portrait and biographical sketch of the artist, an interesting account of his early studies, how he was led to take up art as a profession, in what schools and under what masters he received his instruction. It describes his trips and sojourns abroad, where and when his paintings were first exhibited and the honors they received both in Europe and America. The titles of the artist's most notable paintings are also given, and where they now are. All of this information is not only interesting, but exceedingly instructive.

SPECIAL PROPOSITION
GOOD DURING MAY ONLY

To those who write at once we will send one of our original specimen sets, being the first sharp, clear impressions from the fresh, new plates. The price will be less than one-third their real value, and the payments easy, with the privilege of return if not satisfactory. Clip this special proposition and send with your letter.



The Artists

(Each represented by his best painting)

J. Carroll Beckwith
Carleton T. Chapman
Seymour J. Guy
Bruce Crane
Thomas Moran
James M. Hart
A. T. Bricher
J. Appleton Brown
J. G. Brown
William A. Coffin
Charles C. Curran
J. H. Dolph
Hamilton Hamilton
Childe Hassam
E. L. Henry
Francis Coates Jones
H. Bolton Jones
Robert C. Minor
H. R. Poore
F. K. N. Rehn
R. M. Shurtleff
A. F. Tait
Edgar M. Ward
Carleton Wiggins
R. W. Van Boskerck

WRITE AT ONCE FOR FULL PARTICULARS TO

American Art Publishing Company, No. 156 Fifth Avenue New York City

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT
327 Broadway, New York

Do you know about the Shaw-Walker Card System?

Do you know that with it you can so lay out the work in your office that all the details of buying, manufacturing, selling, shipping and collecting will be handled in less time and with fewer mistakes?

We have gotten out

AN INSTRUCTIVE CATALOG

Worth taking home and studying. It not only tells all about the SHAW-WALKER Card System, but it clearly explains and illustrates in active operation thirty-eight special systems, some of which will interest any business man.

Please send for it.

The Shaw-Walker Co.
Muskegon, Mich.

The largest exclusive Makers of Card Systems in the World.

A Corporation's Advantages

Over a firm or individual is clearly set forth in the "Corporation Hand-Book" $1.50 Post-paid.

"Corporation Management" $2.00 Post-paid.

Gives the most successful Corporation methods adopted by the RICH MEN TO-DAY

Organization Booklet, 25c (stamps taken). Circulars Free

BANKERS' STATIONERY SUPPLY CO.
146 Adams Street, Chicago

BOOKS BY MAIL CHEAP

Why pay publishers' price for books when by joining the Empire Book Club you can secure any book you wish, delivered at your home, at wholesale price? Write at once for booklet "P," which tells of the advantages we offer you and the terms of membership.

THE EMPIRE BOOK CLUB, 71 Broadway, New York

A New Idea in Trunks

The STALLMAN DRESSER TRUNK is constructed on new principles. Drawers instead of trays. A place for everything and everything in its place. The bottom as accessible as the top. Defies the baggage-smasher. Costs no more than a good box trunk. Send C.O.D. with privilege of examination. Send 2-cent stamp for illustrated catalogue.

F. A. STALLMAN
60 West Spring Street, Columbus, O.

Digitized by Google

Nathaniel Hawthorne

(Concluded from Page 987)

introduction to one of those cool accumulations in the handsome person of an accomplished young lieutenant in the civil service of St. Tammany, who, having taken to himself a wife of his own, was making his wedding journey with his new-made bride. Never having been in Washington, I went on my arrival to the first hotel which enjoyed a more than local repute—went to the National, as a stranger in New York would have gone to the Astor House, or a stranger in Boston to the Tremont, registered my name at the desk, had a room assigned me and pocketed the key thereof. Bustling and bustling inside and out, the city swarmed with an alien population, men, women, children from neighboring cities, adjacent towns and remote country villages, all sorts of peoples from all sorts of places, all, it seemed, on the same errand as myself—striving to serve their country and themselves! I did what I could, what I was advised to; delivered my letter to Atherton; was courteously received, promised whatever help he could give me, and straightway shuffled out by other impatient patriots, confused by the crowds, disconcerted by the delays, but not in the least discouraged. I concluded to return to New York and wait the result there.

I returned and waited, waited for the unexpected, which always happens in stories and sometimes in real life. It happened in my case through Colonel Whipple, who, as I casually learned, was stopping for a day or two in the city with his wife, and upon whom I called at once with my wife, of whose existence he was necessarily ignorant, for, as I had told him, I was a lonely Benedict when I had the pleasure of meeting him at Hawthorne's. He gave her the hearty grasp of his soldierly hand and introduced her to his wife, and while our better selves were making such acquaintance with each other as ladies can on such occasions, questioned me about my visit to Washington, whom I had seen there and what they had done for me.

"They have done nothing yet," I said, and told the story of my visit as briefly as I could.

"It is shameful, the way they have treated you," he exclaimed angrily. "But they shall give what you want. I will see that you have it."

He sat down and hurriedly wrote two notes, one to General Pierce, telling him that I was no common office-seeker, but Hawthorne's friend, another to the man in charge of the door to the White House, commanding him to admit me when I called, and take me himself to the private room of the President.

I returned to Washington and on the following morning, after an early breakfast, walked briskly up to the White House. Giving my Open Sesame to the doorkeeper I was promptly conducted to the President, to whom I presented Colonel Whipple's formal note. He read it silently, turned it over, picked up a pen—he was standing at his desk—and wrote something on the blank side of it, a few potent words addressed to the new Collector, which, coming from him, amounted to a command to give me what I wanted.

"There, Mr. Stoddard."

"Thank you, sir." I bowed myself out and departed. I got what I wanted, though not without further delays, there was so much pushing and shoving about, so many sanguinary squabbles between the Hard Shells and Soft Shells and other political crustacea. But I got what I wanted, for on the first of July, the day before my twenty-eighth birthday, the Honorable Greene C. Bronson signed an official warrant appointing me an Inspector of Customs at the Port of New York.

Such is the substance of my imperfect recollections of this great man which I cannot close better than by copying here the opening lines of his last letter to me, dated Concord, March 8, 1853, in acknowledgment of The King's Bell, a piece of narrative verse that I had sent him.

> "I sincerely thank you for your beautiful Poem, which I have read with a great deal of pleasure. It is such as the Public had a right to expect from what you gave us in years gone by, only I wish the idea had not been quite so sad. I think Felix might have rung the bell once in his lifetime and again at the moment of death. Yet you may be right. I have been a happy man, and yet I cannot remember any one moment of such happy circumstances that I could have rung a joy-bell at it."

Let me add by way of epilogue the first stanza of Browning's Memorabilia:

> "Ah, did you once see Shelley plain,
> And did he stop and speak to you,
> And did you speak to him again?
> How strange it seems, and new!"

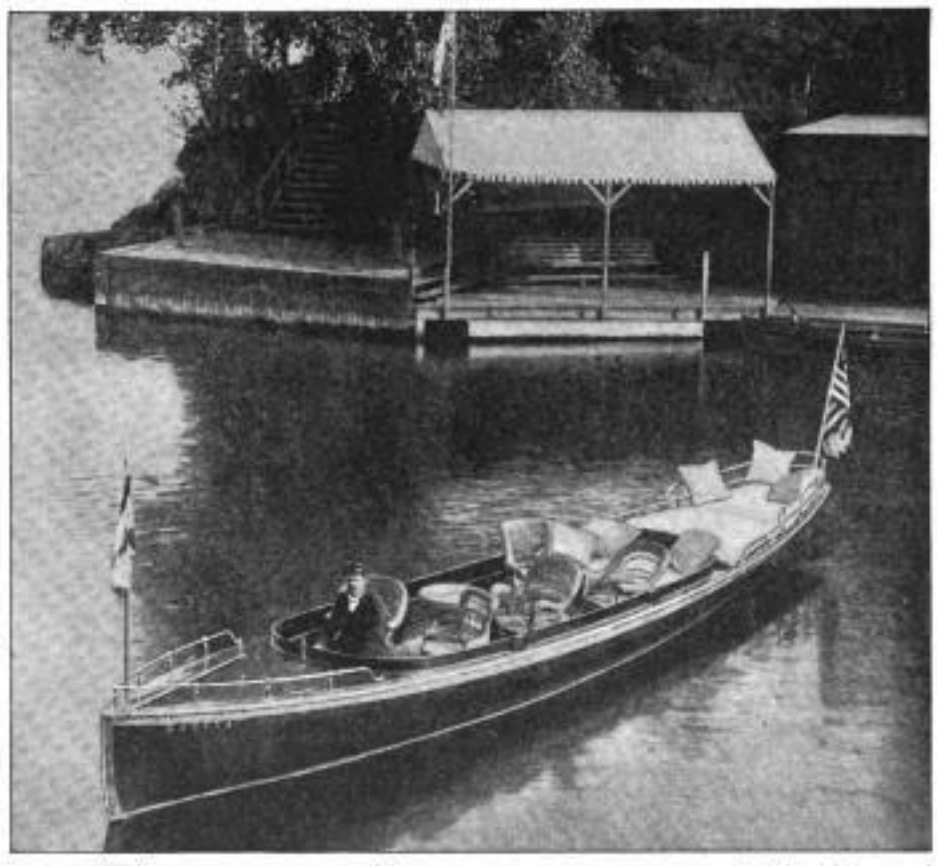
TABLE OF CONTENTS

COLORED COVER BY HARRISON FISHER

GENERAL ARTICLES

		PAGE
Nathaniel Hawthorne (Illustrated with Photographs)	Richard Henry Stoddard	985
The Humorous Side of Politics (Illustrated by Carl Hirschmann)	Ex-Senator John J. Ingalls	990
The American Spirit in British Society (Illustrated by John Cecil Clay)	Lady Jeune	992
The Reorganization of Chautauqua	Waldon Fawcett	993
Aquatic Gardening for Amateurs (Illustrated with Photographs)	René Bache	1000
The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife (Illustrated with Snapshot Photographs)		1004
The Money Matters of the Young Business Man (Illustrated with Photograph)	Thomas B. Bryan	1010
The American Girl in Musical Paris	Madam Emma Nevada	1012

STORIES



The Love Chase (Illustrated by B. Martin Justice)	Van Tassel Sutphen	988
The Man from Montana (Illustrated by Will Grefe)	Ellen Mackubin	996
The Island of the Innocent (Illustrated by Elizabeth Shippen Green)	Elia W. Peattie	1002
The Grip of Honor (Illustrated by George Gibbs and Will Crawford)	Cyrus Townsend Brady	1006

POEMS

Pierrot's Return (Illustrated by Fanny Y. Cory)	Bliss Carman	999
At the Window	M. A. Hamm	1011

DEPARTMENTS

"Publick Occurrences" (Illustrated with Photographs)		994
Men and Women of the Hour (Illustrated with Photographs)		995
Editorial		998
Americaps in Paris		999
Literary Folk as They Come and Go		1014
Book Review (Tolstoi's New Story of Prison Life) (Illustrated with Photograph)	Agnes Repplier	1015

Why ELECTRIC LAUNCHES are the Ideal Form of Marine Navigation

SAFE
Nothing to explode.
Nothing to take fire.
Cannot sink (air chambers under decks prevent).
Will not tip over (all machinery, etc., below water-line).

COMFORTABLE
No heat.
No odor.
No smoke.
No noise.
No dirt.

ECONOMICAL
Runs 50 to 75 miles on a single charge. Costs 2½ cents per mile.
No waste of power.
No waste of room.

SIMPLE
No government inspection.
No licensed engineer.
No engineer at all.
Can run your own boat.
Wife can do likewise.

RELIABLE
Always ready.
Always certain.
Always steady.
Always under complete control.

All machinery beneath the flooring.
Portable charging outfits furnished.
Search lights if wanted.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE MAILED ON REQUEST

THE ELECTRIC LAUNCH COMPANY, Avenue A, Bayonne City, N. J.
Formerly Morris Heights, New York City

Grip of Honor

(Continued from Page 1009)

"You have done well, Captain Pearson," said the Admiral. "'Twas a defeat as noble as a capture."

"Ay," said Captain Jones, "'twas such as I have never met before in twenty battles on the sea."

"Pearson, my—my—son——" said the Admiral huskily; "how did he bear himself?"

"Well and nobly, My Lord, as I can testify," answered Pearson.

"I, too," said Jones; "I saw him. 'Twas he who led your boarders, Captain Pearson, when they tried to sweep our decks."

"And is he well?" asked the old Admiral striving to school himself into composure. "That charge, you know, Pearson; I think we need not press it now?" he added.

"No, not now, nor ever, sir," said Pearson mournfully.

"I am a veteran," said the Admiral; "I have looked death in the face for fifty years. Speak plainly—you would say that he is dead."

"Not yet, sir," answered Jones gently.

"Where is he? Take me to him!"

"He lies aft there on the quarter-deck."

The little group around the dying man made way for the old Admiral. He knelt down on the deck opposite Elizabeth, not heeding the others, and gazed long and earnestly into the face of the dying officer. "Will he live to know me, think you?" said he simply to the surgeon.

"I think so, yes," replied the physician.

As if he had heard the question, Coventry opened his eyes.

"Father!" he murmured faintly.

"My boy—my boy!" said the Admiral bowing his head.

"I—My Lord——" said the young man, wandering again, "may it please the court—may it please the court——" he struggled for breath; "lift me up," he said.

"'Twill be his end," said the doctor, lifting a warning finger.

"Lift me up," cried the dying man more strongly than before. The Admiral nodded. The young Irishman lifted him a little.

"Higher!" he cried. O'Neill lifted him to a sitting position.

"Not guilty, My Lord!" said the young man resolutely in a loud, clear voice, throwing his arms out before him. The blood gushed from his lips, and when they laid him back his plea was heard in that higher court before which the admiral and the sailor equally must plead.

"The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord," said the Chaplain of the Serapis reverently. The men stood around him in a silence broken only by the woman's sobs.

"He died like a hero, sir," said Jones at last, removing his hat, "and I venture to say that no one of his gallant race in all the years of their history ever made a better end."

"Ah!" said the Admiral rising and mournfully regarding the little group, Elizabeth praying by the side of his son, O'Neill still supporting his head, "I made my plans; I tempted this honorable gentleman to do a shameful thing; he refused, and it has all come back upon me. I've wrought my own undoing, gentlemen." Gray-faced and broken, all his years upon him, he turned unsteadily as if to go to his barge.

"Stop, sir!" cried Pearson. "You forget. We are prisoners," he whispered.

"Ah, yes!" said the Admiral. "I had forgotten it; well, it matters little to me. Captain Jones," he continued, turning to the little Scotsman and proffering his sword with a painful gesture, "I am your prisoner."

"Sir," said the little Captain, "allow me to match the act of an American sailor against the word of an English officer. You are free, My Lord. Your boat awaits you. If I can do aught——"

"Be it so," said the Admiral simply; "let me have my boy, and we will go away together, and I shall remember you differently in the future. If in England you ever need a friend, remember this moment and call upon me. Farewell."

Two figures hung over the taffrail and watched the white sails of the little boat bearing away to the verdant shore where the old castle still shone in the sunlight—a man and a woman, sad, yet exultant.

"We ought to be very good to each other," said the sweet voice of the woman, "to make up to God all that He has preserved us from."

"Ay!" said O'Neill, "and to give due value to the sacrifice of him who loved you even as I do myself."

(THE END)

Digitized by Google

"A Thing of Convenience –

SAPOLIO

– and a Joy Forever"

Happy the Maid who uses it.

Papa's Spring things are all

"LION BRAND"

SHIRTS,
COLLARS
-AND-CUFFS.

He's thrown away his others

IT will pay you to make a clean sweep this Spring. Collars, Cuffs and Shirts unsuited pull out at the buttonholes, strain seams apart, and constantly wear on the nerves. LION BRAND Collars and Shirts, made for each other, with Cuffs to match, wear longer, feel better, and look best all the time. Throw out all the old stuff. Start fresh. It's cheaper.

Two Collars or two Cuffs cost 25c. It doesn't pay to pay more. Shirts cost $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, depending on the kind you want. Ask your furnisher.

UNITED SHIRT AND COLLAR CO., Makers, Troy, N. Y.

Libby's Veal Loaf

When placed on the market more than a year ago, was the first and only product of its kind ever offered the American people, perfectly cooked, seasoned and ready to serve from convenient-sized key opening cans.

It was the greatest food success of 1899. All who knew about it bought it, liked it, and told their friends about it. Success attracts imitators.

Libby's Veal Loaf is the Original

All other brands of Veal Loaf in tins are imitations of Libby's.

When you want a delicious lunch or supper of daintily seasoned meat, get Libby's Veal Loaf, Chicken Loaf, Cottage Loaf. There are 72 Varieties of Libby's Foods in tins.

We publish a neat little book, called "How to Make Good Things to Eat," which we send free to every one who requests it by letter or postal. It tells all about Libby's foods and gives recipes for preparing them.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago

$1000 for BOYS

Send 10 cents for 3 months' trial subscription to

The American Boy

A practical magazine for boys. Departments: Short Stories, Successful Boys, What Boys are Doing, Talks on Business—(Insurance, Savings Banks, Book-Keeping, etc.). Boys as money-makers, The Boy in the office, store, factory, home, church and school.

WM. C. SPRAGUE, Editor

Games and Sport, The Boys' Library, The Boy Journalist, Printer, Collector—(stamps, coins, curios, etc.), Photographer, Mechanic, Artisan, Orator and Debater, Boys and Animals, Prizes and Puzzles. Interesting, instructive, pure, elevating, inspiring.

$1000 in Cash Prizes And a choice from 300 elegant premiums given for subscribers. The magazine canvasses for itself. You need but show it. The best paper ever issued for boys. References in every city. $1.00 a year. Trial, 3 months' subscription for 10 cents.

SPRAGUE PUBLISHING COMPANY

120 Majestic Building, Detroit, Mich.

Digitized by Google

COLGATE & CO'S

CASHMERE BOUQUET

EXQUISITELY PERFUMED.—The Toilet Soap most in favor with persons of refinement.

Simply the Best Soap for the Toilet that the oldest and largest American Soap Manufacturers and Perfumers can make. Established 1806.

The name of "Colgate & Co." ON TOILET AND SHAVING SOAPS, PERFUMES, SACHETS, TOILET WATERS AND DENTAL POWDER corresponds to the "Sterling" mark on Silver.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 45 Philadelphia, May 5, 1900 5 Cents the Copy $2.50 the Year.

The American Army Officer In Action

By Senator ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

Digitized by Google

The American Army Officer in Action

By Albert J. Beveridge

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

Drawings by B. Martin Justice

"YOU will not have to wait until morning; you can see him to-night," said the officer in whose mess my headquarters in Manila were established. "He is still at work, and will be for an hour yet, perhaps longer."

It was ten o'clock at night of the day of my arrival. Wishing to lose no time, I had expressed a desire to make my formal call early in the morning; but I instantly decided to take advantage of my friend's suggestion. The streets of Manila were utterly deserted. The order confining every person to his home after eight o'clock was in force. The city was strictly patrolled. The low, sharp challenge of sentries stopped us half a dozen times in the two miles that separated our place of residence from the headquarters of the Military Governor.

As we entered the great door of the immense Spanish "palace" we felt ourselves among the stage settings of Gillette's Secret Service: to the left the busy click of telegraph instruments, soldier operators at the desks; now a report from MacArthur at San Fernando; now a report from Lawton at Laguna de Bay; now another from a distant quarter of the city. It was a spot of infinite vigilance and infinite order.

We sent up cards. A middle-sized, bald-headed, black-eyebrowed man, with gray side-whiskers, leaving clear and clean the "steel-trap jaw" of the thoroughbred American fighter, came down the stairs to greet us. His voice is low, rich, firm, wonderfully musical. His eyes are so dark a gray that you must not be surprised to hear some declare they are brown. It is an extraordinary eye. You cannot tell which quality predominates in it, alertness or calmness. He wears a simple uniform of yellowish khaki, with nothing but the narrow shoulder straps to indicate his rank. A fine courtesy distinguishes his manners.

We went to the office on the second floor. The walls were hid with maps. On a great desk lay a hand map. "The military situation is this," said he; "Aguinaldo, with his pretended government, is here. Luna, with ten thousand men, is there. Their relations are strained and becoming bitter. One will assassinate the other before very long. Pilo del Pilar is on this peninsula, with four thousand men; this force well armed. A large but indefinite number of armed insurgents are here in Cavite Province, where they are left undisturbed, in hopes that they will all finally concentrate there. Our plans are"—and in a few brief, luminous sentences I was given the disposition of every armed force of the enemy, of our own troops, of our plans as far as developed, of the situation of the other islands. In the light of after events it would appear that no other plan could have been pursued with better results than the course actually followed, except in the single particular of underestimating the work and the number required to do it. Still a few more of the same comprehensive and yet simple statements, and a bird's-eye view of the civil situation was before me. The reports of feebleness, of timidity, of a muddled head and a malignant heart, were certainly not confirmed by this first interview; for it was General Otis himself who was speaking.

A Big City Run by Military Clockwork

In the Governor's office in the walled city, at seven o'clock next morning, I again found General Otis at work. I had left him at nearly twelve o'clock the night before, still at work. Again I was impressed with the reign of system at headquarters, and the mastery of the Governor over all. Here were offices devoted to commissary and transportation, with an officer in charge whose talent in commercial life would place him at the head of a railroad system. Every man who studiously investigated affairs in the Philippines will gladly testify to this. The Governor had the details of the department at his fingers' ends. Here was an office devoted to communication with other islands; here another devoted to the legal department, and so on; and yet the Governor was a master of the minutiæ of each. Fault has been found with his attention to little things; but when one remembers that Napoleon stopped a wagon in an artillery train on one of his marches, asking the officer in charge for a statement of its contents, which, not being furnished, Napoleon supplied offhand himself, and had his statement verified by an examination then and there; when one recalls that Frederick the Great knew the equipment, to a musket, of every man in his army, was his own Treasurer, Secretary of State, and, in fact, his own entire Cabinet, and yet found time for flute playing; when one reads that Cæsar knew by name every man in all his legions; and, in short, when one recalls the fabulous mastery of detail which all great soldiers have possessed, one pauses before denouncing as a fault the same thing when found in one of our own soldiers.

General Otis' Mastery of the Minutest Details

I suggested that I had heard on good authority that a certain ship had been doing illicit trading. Instantly General Otis corrected me as to a slight mistake in one syllable of the name of the ship, giving its true name, the ports it had called at, the name of its officer, what it had carried, and every instance of an obscure transaction. Then he sent for records and verified all he had stated. It was a mere incident in the enormous task of the civil government of the islands.

The next moment a group of Mestizos was discussing with him the establishment of courts. General Otis is a good lawyer, and drives straight to the point. After this a conference with merchants; again an audience to a "commission" of insurgents. A soldier showed me the following comment in his diary: "General Otis is a graduate of Harvard, of a law school, a combined student, man of action, and administrator. He should not be interfered with."

"I had seen Lawton the target for an entire Filipino fusillade"

Universally, by friends and foes, General Otis is admitted to be incorruptible. His ideas of honor are so rigid that occasionally one may think them absurd. An influential gentleman who had arranged with all of the Spanish authorities, went to get, as a matter of courtesy, the permission of General Otis that he should receive from the arsenal one of the many antique Spanish halberds of use neither to them nor to us. The terms of capitulation, however, provided that all of the arms, etc., etc., were the property of Spain, to be shipped back to Spain. "I will not permit it," said the General. "It may appear all right to you, and I do not question your point of view, but from my point of view I call it iniquity, yes, iniquity, and my point of view is what I must act upon."

This sense of mingled Puritan and Roman virtue is invaluable. The Philippines have been the hotbed of bribery. With anything but the severest discipline they would now be the harvest field of the looter. One of our officers had detained the vessel of a certain firm. Afterward that firm sent him a letter notifying him of the departure of certain vessels for certain points ostensibly proper, but really upon different voyages from those stated. The letter inclosed a banknote of large denomination. Of course he instantly turned it over to his superior, with a full statement of the case. They had not learned the difference between the old and the new régime. With a man less stern than General Otis, and with officers of different quality from the matchless American officer, the whole service would become honeycombed with corruption.

The Young Lieutenant Who Wouldn't Rustle

Devotion to duty is the keynote to the character of the American officer in the field. I had arrived at the Baghag River, and resolved to ride on to our extreme front, if a horse could be found.

"Rustle a horse for the Senator, won't you, Captain?" I heard a superior officer attached to the staff say to a young Lieutenant of Regulars, with title as Captain of Volunteers.

"D——d if I do," came the reply like a sabre cut. "I am in charge of the whole line of communication and supplies from here on. The bridge is down; we have got to fix rafts; I will have to ride like h—l myself all afternoon to get the stuff in camp, and I wouldn't rustle a horse for the President. I ain't got time."

The words came clear and cool through the screen of bamboos that separated us. A horse was found, however, and I rode with that same young officer most of the afternoon. The sun poured upon our heads from a cloudless sky. We wore the gray wool hat that our army wears to-day. He paid no heed, but was lost to the danger from ambush or sunstroke in the doing of his duty. Paul Revere rode no harder. We fairly thundered over the road, the few scared amigos darting into the banana thickets that lined our way. That night, long after dark, he reported to the commanding General his task achieved, and sank on the floor outside the door in the unconsciousness of exhaustion. I thought he had fainted, but he was only sleeping. Next morning he was at it again. He was just a soldier of the Republic, "born in the army," as the proud and yet pathetic saying goes, with no Congressman or Senator, nor any other "influence" to back him—nothing but his blood and life's best efforts to give in purchase of advancement, and this he was giving. In my first interview with Secretary Root, the first recommendation I made was for the promotion of this gallant young devotee to duty. He does not know it even yet, but his promotion is now an accomplished fact.

The Rarity of the Carpet Knight

I wish I might mention the names of many of the minor officers, heroes, gentlemen, wise in counsel, fearless and swift in execution. I am greatly tempted to mention one or two, and detail their deeds, but to mention any one and not the rest would be to do that unnamed number injustice. You cannot meet the American officer without loving him. So simple, so honest, so unaffected, so devoted, not to himself or his own advancement, but to the glory of his nation and his flag. No medicine could be so effective an antidote to the poison of base-purposed agitators who declaim about our danger from an army of our own sons, than for the great common people to know these sons and brothers of theirs, who sprang from the very loins of the common people, and who still remain of the common people in every thought and every conviction and every purpose of their being—the gallant officers of the American Army.

I do not mean to say that they are all of this rare type. Now and then you meet a prig, a snob, a "carpet knight," a "lady soldier," with "airs," and the other familiar characteristics so abhorrent to American taste and instinct. I met one in one of the southern islands. He was full of talk. His speech was full of very broad "ahs." I was not able to run down a single gallant feat he had performed. One day, when I was with Lawton, a perfectly barbered, carefully groomed officer, immaculately dressed in white, with dainty watch chain making a decoration of gold from button to breast pocket, with a very rare piece of green jade pendant, and even with white shoes, came out to witness a certain movement. We were well out of range. He had escorted a lady to "show her the fight." The road from Manila was perfectly safe. Lawton refused him any attention. One looked from Lawton to him, and I appreciated Hotspur's experience under like circumstances.

General King, Deadly and Dainty as Aramis

Do not understand that merely careful dressing makes the poor soldier. By no means. Our officers are nearly all excellently dressed. I saw General Charles King, for example, only once, and that was at headquarters in Manila. He was in the full perfection of dress; yet he was one of the most daring and dangerous officers to the enemy that our campaign in the Philippines has developed. He was the Aramis of our officers, as deadly as he is dainty. When one knows King, one can hear the exquisite of the Three Guardsmen saying again, in his voice of music: "All in good time, dear sir; I will kill you, never fear—but permit me to insist on killing you like a gentleman." There is something in certain personalities of such peculiar human interest that they seize hold upon the imaginations of men, and from here, there and everywhere personalia grow up concerning them. This is true of General King.

"You should have seen him in our fight around Manila," said one of the private soldiers to me. "He was as pretty as a girl in springtime. He was dressed in a perfectly fitting fresh uniform, and I think even had patent leather boots on. And his gauntlets! he had a new pair, it seemed to us, each morning. He looked like a ballroom soldier; but, great Scott! you should have seen him, I say. Until time to charge or do rush work, or things like that, he would make us all lie down or go behind a tree or a stone, while he himself would walk daintily along the line, a target for the whole fire of the enemy, because of his conspicuous uniform, and because he was the only one of us in sight. He was all the time talking to us, and swore like—well he just swore, that's all. 'Lie down there, —— —— it, my boy! Do you want to get your head shot off? Be careful there; don't expose yourself so much, man! Do you want to get what little sense you have shot out of you?' and such talk, with the expletives in just the right places and all the time the bullets whistling around him. He put you in mind of a scolding mother, though he was directing us how and where to shoot best: and you should hear him order a charge; yes, and see him lead it.

Digitized by Google

too. And all this done so daintily that you kind o' felt as though there was a lady around. Well, maybe the boys don't love General King. We just felt we would not go out of our way to keep from getting killed, if we only knew that he could see us shot."

They say that at Santa Ana King had ordered a charge and simultaneously received orders to hold his men. He tried it, shouted the order and did everything, but stop the boys would not. Turning to a fellow-officer King said, in mingled disgust and admiration: "There goes the American Volunteer—God bless him! All h—l can't stop him." The expression got currency throughout the army, and is now a kind of a motto, a watchword. And it is so, too.

The American Officer a Thinking Sabre

"This war proves how profound are the ways of Providence. Here are the Philippines, American soil, right at the most strategic point of the world." Thus spoke that military philosopher, General MacArthur. We sat in his headquarters at San Fernando, looking out into the darkness. We were sixteen miles away from our base of supplies. The line of communication was almost unguarded, so limited were the number of troops. Around us, on either flank, was an army of Filipinos, well equipped with Mauser rifles, outnumbering our force five to one. In addition to the soldiers a population of over a hundred thousand was massed behind the Filipino lines. "Yes, we are in great danger," said General MacArthur, "or rather would be if these were any people but Filipinos. They could cut us off and crush us by weight of numbers; but a General must take into consideration not only the number and equipment, but the character of the foe." There again spoke the thinker, the reasoner. Then we walked down into the silent streets.

"Lie down there, my boy!"

The moon had gone down behind the horizon; the bamboo and banana thickets blended the sky and earth in a smudge of deeper blackness. Out over the fields that stretched southward came the hoarse howl of packs of starving dogs, left homeless and without food by the war, driven by hunger and desolation to a state of wildness like that of wolves. Once the weird sound was punctuated by a shot. A scout had just arrived, with the statement that Luna might attack that night or in the morning. The commanding General himself went to the headquarters of his officers and gave directions against any possible surprise. Our walk took us through the plaza and in front of the great church which the Filipinos had fired some days before, and which was still burning. The roof had fallen in, the flame had eaten out the doors, the ruins stood erect, like a spectre of the departed power which had dwelt within their walls. As the embers reached some buried inflammable material within, a bright flame shot up for a moment, fell, rose again, and then died out. The flame caused fantastic shadows to appear and pass and, finally, to fade; and also in its light a group of our men was revealed without, in all their rugged forcefulness of appearance and posture. "There," said the General, "are the ghosts of the old régime; here are the realities of the new."

The quality of philosophic analysis which the above remarks of General MacArthur revealed is characteristic of the American officer. No man in the world thinks out the problems that confront him more than he. No man in the world more carefully analyzes the deep meaning beneath events, and the infinite meaning beyond them. If our soldiers are "thinking bayonets," our officers are "thinking sabres."

Many a uniformed officer at the head of his troops has fallen in the far-off Philippines, and died with a smile, counting his life well given in advancing the destiny of his country and his race, whose large results are wrapped, as yet, in the unfolded centuries. Yes, he has thought it out, and where his analysis could not reach, his faith has ventured; for I have already noted the fact that the American soldier in the Philippines has some of the qualities of a fatalist.

Gen. Lawton's Contempt for Personal Danger

Such was our prince of warriors, the knightly Lawton. Coming in after one campaign, where I had seen him the target for an entire Filipino fusilade, and where, by all the laws of marksmanship, or even by accident, he ought to have fallen, I said to him: "General, you will certainly get killed if you much longer expose yourself like this."

"Yes," said he with perfect simplicity, "I know I shall, but I did this all through the Civil War; I have done it for twenty years in Indian wars; I did it in Cuba; I am doing it here. I am a soldier, you know, and that is our business. Danger is our profession. When my time comes I shall go. I have figured out the law of averages and have long since exhausted the chances in my favor." Then he named the number of chances which, according to the law of averages as computed by himself, there was of his being killed every time he went into action. "But then," said he, "that is the way a soldier should die," and added a wish of which he made me the custodian. An officer now in the Philippines wrote me the day after he was killed, recalling every word of this talk.

Directness was the key to Lawton's character. He went straight to the point, in thought, in speech, in action. He was superlatively intense. His dress, food, safety were forgotten in the absorption of the task before him. One day we ate a few mouthfuls of breakfast before sun-up. It was long past noonday before I could induce him to eat again, and then only a morsel. Sometimes his disregard of what he had on or did not have on left him grotesquely dressed. For example, at the close of a certain day of hard campaigning he was arrayed in khaki trousers, a gray wool undershirt, and a celluloid collar, not connected with it, buttoned to the front.

He rode in straight lines directly from the point where he was to the point he wanted to go, cutting across fields, regardless of roads, ambush or bullets. One day the firing line was behind a row of bamboo trees. Apparently nothing was being accomplished by the fire. Lawton did not send an orderly to have the Colonel report to him. He rode directly across the field, exposed to such fire as the enemy were returning, hunted up the Colonel and said: "What are you stopping here for? Get your men into that town." And without another word rode to another portion of the field, giving personally his orders.

On one occasion he was bitterly out of humor because of the failure of a certain plan made possible by the lack of initiative of the officer intrusted with the execution of a part of it. Not a smile lighted up that stern face the whole day. Not a soft word came from the lips. Every order was sharp and hard as a sabre blade. His very tones were tense with earnestness. Riding up a hill, the following morning, after passing in the greatest peril through a town deserted by the Filipinos only a few minutes before, rapid firing was heard immediately ahead. Our advance line was deployed on the crest of the hill, the men concealed behind rocks, trees, hummocks of earth, and what not. The rear guard of Filipinos were firing briskly from the valley below. As Lawton reached the top of the hill a bullet struck perhaps four feet away. He turned, with a pleased look and a smile like that of a child, and said:

"Ha! If that fellow had raised his gun a sixteenth of an inch it would have got you or me—one, sure."

Wheeling his horse from the road he galloped to the very edge of the declivity, and there calmly stood for perhaps fifteen minutes, the target of the entire Filipino force. It was not foolhardiness. It was disregard of his own safety in order to have the most complete regard for the safety of his men. He was simply calculating the number of the enemy left behind, and the probable intentions of their commander. He was simply calculating precisely what to do. In this calculating his mind became oblivious to personal danger. He was for the moment a mere machine of thought.

And yet courage was not the distinguishing characteristic of Lawton as a soldier; neither was his care of his men, although both of these qualities were abnormal in him. But his crowning quality was his absolute concentration of mind upon the plan on which he was engaged; upon the necessary modifications of that plan as the action progressed—upon the effect of this or that or the other order. Lawton was above all a planner, a contriver, a calculator. The brilliancy of his execution has blinded the popular mind to this more valuable quality, just as in all men the more showy quality is apt to obscure the stronger ones. Cæsar, you will remember, was known as a captivating orator long before the public ever thought of him as an organizer and a warrior; and, indeed, he was lightly considered, by the judicious, as a fashionable young man with a facility for speech and gambling, until destiny offered him opportunity to show the great creative qualities of organization and command. So, when Lawton, in the accounts of him that fill the popular imagination, appeared to be foolishly risking his life, he was, as a matter of fact, so intently thinking, that, at the moment, danger did not occur to him, although whirring deaths were flying past him all the time.

Lawton's Care for the Safety of His Men

I have mentioned his concern for the safety of others. An instance: We had advanced alone, along the road over which the Filipinos had retreated, so short a time before that bits of their food, which they had thrown away, were lying here and there, still fresh. On either side were the thickets, and perfect opportunities for ambush. Ahead of us, perhaps four or five yards, went the omnipresent military "point"—that is, from three to five men on foot, with guns in hand, ready for instant fire. Just before rounding a bend in the road, Lawton swung himself off of his horse on the outer side, that the animal might rest while he thought out, if he could, what had become of a column he had dispatched the day before, and which he had expected to meet many hours earlier. He happened to glance up, just before the "point" had gotten around the bend in the road.

"Hold on there, men! Stop! Stop! There is a barricade ahead of you. Don't expose yourselves."

And the men who were keeping to the inside of the road and had not yet seen around the bend, instantly halted, getting farther under cover. But Lawton sprang upon his horse and galloped straight up the road and into and through the skillfully constructed intrenchment across it. As we rode through it, his only comment was: "Well! that is the best road barricade ever I saw." It was of earth and stones about four feet thick, with bamboo walls on either side, perhaps six feet high, and with a space of four to five inches through which to shoot, and an aperture through which a horse could go. He was asked whether there might not have been Filipinos behind it. "Why, yes, like as not," he replied, "but after I told the men to stop down there, I made up my mind that if there had been Filipinos here, they would have picked us off when we were sitting on the hill over yonder. Anyhow I can't stop this morning for anything like that." It is the only instance I ever observed of apparently unnecessary recklessness on his part.

He was kind in the extreme to his soldiers, and yet not ostentatiously so. He did not "boney" them, as officers who seek popularity sometimes do—and mistakenly always. He did not hesitate to order them on exhausting marches; to send them on a charge where death was certain; nor to do anything else with them which, in his opinion, the situation demanded. He required of them service, service, service, as he required the same, and as hard, of himself. And yet the men's love for him exceeded that of any affection I ever saw men display for another.

One intensely hot day two thousand men had been marching and fighting. As Lawton came along they had halted and thrown themselves in the shade of bushes by the roadside, most of them panting like dogs, some of them climbing down the steep sides of the ravine to get a canteen of warm water from a stream below, and in all the attitudes of intense heat and exhaustion. They were growling and grumbling, as the Anglo-Saxon is wont to do when he is uncomfortable; but as Lawton rode along, looking neither to the right nor to the left, but, as his manner was, straight ahead of him, the low-toned exclamation, full of affection, was constantly heard: "There goes the old man, God bless him."

If he spared his men in any degree, however, it cannot be said that he spared his officers any more than he did himself. Arriving at Pasig, one night, orders he had given earlier in the day apparently had not been executed to his satisfaction. That night, at midnight, accompanied by one officer and his guest, he went up the Pasig River, in a boat run by a Kansas man and a Filipino engineer and fireman. The night was moonless. The Pasig River is full of sharp twists and turns, with banks of thick mud, in which boats frequently got stuck. At the point where the river enters the lake the Filipinos were supposed to be in force on either side. Lawton risked mudbank and Filipino, and finally reached the open lake. It was very dark; yet he found his gunboats and held a consultation with the officer in command and returned the way he had come. We arrived at Pasig about two o'clock in the morning. Lawton threw himself on a rude bed and slept for perhaps two hours. This is a fair sample of his daily and nightly program.

The Richelieus and Sidneys of Our Army

I regret that fear of doing injustice to the great majority, by giving the names of some officers and not giving the names of all, prevents me from mentioning the Captain in charge of those gunboats on Laguna de Bay, and several other officers whose character, intelligence and courage would, in a more sanguinary conflict, on a larger stage, with heavier stakes, win them a renown surpassed by that of no soldiers in history. Now and then the public catches a

The Star-Spangled Banner

Digitized by Google

flash of these "devils of courage," Richelieus of cunning and Sidneys of generosity. They are hard workers, every one. These even include the sons of those eminent men whose appointments to the army were supposed to be secured by influence, and at which much unjust criticism has been directed. In a certain General's headquarters at the front I found a young man hard at work at one o'clock at night. He was one of these sons of distinguished and powerful fathers, whose appointment was assailed as purely political; and yet no humble clerk, no hired laborer, could have toiled more faithfully, earnestly, uncomplainingly than he.

"Who is that soldierly fellow there, General?" I asked of Lawton, as a stalwart young officer dashed up, straight as a pine tree, saluting in that fine manner that no soldier on earth but the American soldier has, and handsome in spite of the dust and grime and sweat.

"Oh, that is Captain ——," said he, and he named the son of a very eminent man in the United States, whose appointment I have seen unfavorably commented on in a portion of our press. If he was appointed with the expectation of sport, he was not receiving it; if in the expectation of ease, he had not found it. No minor employee of his father was toiling half so hard, nor half so long, each dreadful day, as this gallant young fellow, who was doing his duty with the zest which consciousness of serving as a soldier of the Republic gives to the American officer.

The Diplomacy of the Governor of Cebu

The word "Richelieu," as descriptive of the constructive cunning and hazardous courage of our officers is a fortunate one. Their action is never inspired by mere recklessness nor show. Consequences are considered. Every command is tempered by its effect as a matter of civil policy, as well as by its consequences as a military movement. The Military Governor of Cebu was trying to prevent an outbreak. When he arrived to take command of the island our troops were confined to the city itself, with the line strictly drawn at the borders of the town and the insurgents in position beyond. No fighting had yet occurred, but, day by day and hour by hour, the feeling of hostility was growing, and an outbreak was becoming imminent. This young man (for he was under forty) made up his mind to conciliate them if he could, convince them of our good intentions, and to make some arrangements with the insurgents already under arms, and with their commander, Maxelion. To do this the first step was to convince them that we were not afraid of them in a civil sense as well as in a military sense, and that we trusted them. Accordingly, he boldly rode without arms across the lines and into the enemy's country. A few days afterward I arrived. The Governor and myself, an officer of the army and the navy accompanying us, crossed the lines and rode seven miles into the interior, into and through some old fortifications that, in a former time, they had thrown up, and examined the out-of-date cannon which they had collected. The Governor, myself and my interpreter (then condemned to death by the order of the commander of these very insurgents) went to see this Filipino General at his headquarters, the other officers preferring not to go. None of us was armed. The Governor introduced me, explained the nature of the office I held, and made clear to Maxelion the whole situation. We conversed for a time, and then simply took our departure. While there we were surrounded by Maxelion's entire staff and perhaps seventy-five or a hundred Filipino soldiers. We could have been captured? Yes. We might have been killed? Yes, again. But this young Governor of the Island of Cebu, a lawyer of a Western State, felt it necessary to show, in this manner, our good intentions, our complete trust in them, and Americans' absolute fearlessness of danger. In this way he hoped to prepare the ground for permanently peaceful relations without shedding a drop of blood. It was a bold and a well-considered plan.

But this is the way it worked: After returning to the city I had a long conference, among others, with Pablo Mejia, a rich old Filipino, moderate, trustworthy and well-disposed. That night, before my ship lifted anchor, a proclamation was posted all over the city, of the most bloodthirsty character, and signed "Maxelion." A week after I left Pablo Mejia was stabbed in the streets of Cebu, as a sympathizer with the "accursed Americans."

Maxelion was a forbidding-looking man. His face was full of malignity, although during our conversation his expressions were most polite and even full of the exaggerated terms and warmth of Spanish speech. His staff were very young men, all of whom scowled with great vigor upon us. Some of the soldiers looked the cutthroats which their assassination of Mejia proved them to be.

Every Lieutenant a Skilled Strategist

Above all, the American officer is a gentleman. Of course, this is taken for granted, and it is a certain kind of offense to call attention to it; and yet the sensitive observer is strikingly impressed with the fact that the roughness, the essential coarseness, even the brutality which accompanies campaigning, does not dull the edge of the fine conduct and spirit which makes of the American officer the ideal gentleman of the world. That does not mean that he does not work quite as hard as any private soldier; nor that he does not risk his life much more than the private soldier. Once at the front I saw an officer of high rank report to the commanding General at one o'clock at night, from a reconnaissance which he had made himself with only two of his men. The rest had been sleeping for hours. He was weary to the point of deadly exhaustion. He had come back to us with his life by a miracle. He stepped out of the night and into the presence of his commander like a cavalier out of an old picture. He saluted and made his report as simply as you would detail the most commonplace incident. In answer to the General's questions, he rapidly sketched what to him appeared the strategy of the situation, and then went to his bed, which was the bare floor of a bamboo shack. I was on my own horse and saw the sun rise next morning, but this officer was already gone.

The incident of his outlining what he thought were the salient circumstances of the situation which confronted us reveals another very prominent characteristic of the American officer. Most of them are excellent strategists; all of them are military thinkers. You cannot find a Lieutenant who has not a clear and plausible theory of operation in any given position. They are students of maps. They are map makers themselves. Their combinations are as definite as their execution is expeditious. A Lieutenant of Regulars, with title of Captain of Volunteers (and, I hope, now Captain of Regulars), described to me a plan of campaign with San Fernando as base which, in theory at least, was perfect. A portion of it was afterward adopted.

With some extraordinary exceptions the execution of any plan devised ought to be left to our younger officers. I participated in one campaign where the enemy were, on paper, mathematically trapped. The catching of them was a certainty. Neither Napoleon nor Von Moltke ever devised a more skillful plan. It involved the movements at given times, and in a given way, of several columns. The command of one was given to a gallant but very old officer, noted not only for his daring, his devotion to duty, but also for his lack of initiative and originality. He encountered a trifling obstacle in the execution of his general orders, and, instead of overcoming it by common-sense methods, instead of relying upon the vigor and courage of his men, he did what the books of strategy said that in general he should do under like circumstances. The result was that, like Grouchy, he arrived too late. The whole movement was spoiled, the enemy escaped, and, in spite of gallantry and unbelievable exertions of officers and men, the whole campaign collapsed. On the contrary, the columns that were in charge of young officers executed their movements with brilliancy, vigor and to the exact minute.

DRAWN BY E. MARTIN JUSTICE "THERE GOES THE AMERICAN VOLUNTEER"

"I think we ought to get out of this," said an elderly artillery officer of the regular army, as we stood in the bamboo thickets of one of our advanced outposts. "What in —— does the United States want with this country? What in —— and —— do they want with these 'niggers'? I tell you I am 'hot,' physically and mentally." (And he wiped the sweat from his face.) "I am uncomfortable," he continued. "I am tired of this, and I want to get back. Excuse me from being stationed away out here and having to bring my family." "Well, Major," said a blue-eyed young Captain (we were all engaged in desultory talk, and rank does not enter into that), "as for me, here is the place I want to be. You are uncomfortable, yes; but when was soldiering ever comfortable? We are taking part in the inevitable expansion of our great race, and, in my time, I shall have been able to win no glory equal to the glory of being a part of that predestined expansion."

There spoke the military man, who, in the long period of peace, had lost the idea and purposes of his profession, and considered the army as a sort of a necessary establishment without a mission, without active work to do, and himself as a rightful part of it. He felt that he practically owned his office; that the office consisted in wearing the uniform and going through the routine of the army establishment in time of peace. But a long period of domestic bliss, and all the allurements of our past generation of peace, had erased from his conscience all the sharp, keen and elemental ideas of soldierhood which makes the real soldier possible, and not only possible, but endurable and tolerable.

There spoke, too, the earnest, irresistible militant spirit of the young officer who wants active service, who asks only an opportunity to win his spurs, who is willing to pay his blood as the price of them, and to exchange his life for an honorable recognition in the service of his country.

The Star-Spangled Banner on the Luneta

If I have not made clear the religious and fatalistic adoration of the flag which inspires the American soldier and officer alike, let the following illustrate it now: It is a scene which you may witness on the Luneta of Manila any evening as the sun sinks behind the waters of Manila Bay. This famous combined park and driveway at that hour is thronged by a circulating procession of carriages, filled with Mestizos in their most effective toilettes, and with white-clad officers who are in Manila after duty for the day, or who are in the city on leave. The seats along the driveway, all the walking space, and the sward next to the beach are filled with our khaki-clad soldiers, their keen, young faces showing their enjoyment as they drink in every impression.

Now and then a young face looks wistfully out over the sea, with thoughts of home in every feature. On the bandstand in the centre is a regimental band rendering all manner of tunes and airs, lively and pathetic, jolly and sad. Around and around sweeps the circle of carriages, up and down move the walking throngs, gradually crystallizing, however, about the central point from which the fountain of music throws its sprays of sound into the air. Some lively, fantastic composition has ended amid laughter and applause. Then the strains of Home, Sweet Home float out upon the air, and a sadness and silence steals over the constantly increasing throng. It is finished in silence, and then a great wave of earnest applause comes up from thousands of hands. The sun is sinking rapidly in the west, and the whole horizon is a panorama of spangled flame. There are no sunsets in the world comparable to those gorgeous and astounding pictures that stream oceanward athwart the sky of Manila at close of day. To the east the heavens assume a hue of minor, mistlike and tender purple. The whole atmosphere is full of beauty, beatitude and benediction.

The Religion of Officer and Private

I have just returned to the city, and am taking an hour of the evening air with one of the most brilliant officers of the army, one of those gay, reckless, dare-devil, and sometimes profane men, whom you would never believe had a spark of religion in his champagne-like character—one of the type of that soldier of Napoleon, described by Conan Doyle, who went to death with a jest, who received his mortal wound with a laugh, and who said to his comrade: "Will you not kindly present my compliments to madame, and say that I cannot attend her dinner next week on account of circumstances over which I have no control?" and then, still laughing, died. Some quip even now was on my friend's lips. We had driven into a throng of fine young fellows, of whom he was the life and the soul. The band had, a moment before, ceased playing some ranting, rollicking air, and the laughter still echoed and the applause was just dying out. The sun now had touched the water beyond Corregidor. The leader moved his baton, and suddenly, with that slow, majestic and thrilling movement, the strains of The Star-Spangled Banner arose upon the air. The jest upon the lips of my merry friend was hushed, and, stepping from the carriage, he stood erect, his cap lifted from his head and held across his heart. His action was imitated by all the rest of that gay and careless crowd. Everywhere this beautiful phenomenon of patriotism occurred. Hardened regulars who had seen service with the Indians for years; fresh-faced boys just from the soft comforts of their homes; private and officer, servant and general, all arose, uncovered and stood in the attitude of prayer. And it was a prayer. When the last strains had died away, my friend turned to me and said:

"That, Senator, is my religion. We all believe in the divine destiny of that flag. We all believe that it is a sacred banner. We may jest and joke, but there is not a man of us who, in his heart, does not feel, and deeply know, that our people are a peculiar people; that our nation is God's chosen nation for the doing of His inscrutable work. Ours is an unquestioning, unarguing faith, we are Mohammedans of Christian patriotism, and to us the Flag is the symbol of all for which we are willing and happy and blest to die."

The sun had gone, the night was there, and in a silence whose meaning stillness was itself the very wine of eloquence, we rode to our quarters, while in our hearts and through the corridors of our brain the aspiring music of our national anthem still echoed. It was not a far cry for the imagination to see, not only our own soldiers with hats off, when the first notes of that sacred composition floats upon the air, but all the world, and even the crowned heads thereof, uncover to the sacred strains of The Star-Spangled Banner

Digitized by Google

A Sequence in Hearts

By Lilian Quiller-Couch

PATRICIA, dearest: Mr. Featherstone-Hope. Mr. Featherstone-Hope: Miss Pomeroy."

I bowed. Mr. Featherstone-Hope bowed. Mrs. Randall smiled on us.

"You must be my understudy, Mr. Hope," she protested archly; "Miss Pomeroy's caretaker, you know. The poor child is weary with handling bullion. So kind of you. I'm sure you'll get on together. Tea or coffee, dear?"

"Coffee, please," I answered, appropriating that remnant of Mrs. Randall's remark which propriety seemed to assign to me. Then she fluttered away to pair and set prattling some other two aimless individuals, and so prove herself a successful hostess. Mr. Featherstone-Hope accepted his part and set out to perform it. I sat in the tea-room and waited.

It was the evening of the E. U. Z. W. X. Bazar. I think the lettering is correct, but won't be sure. I had devoted an eight-hour day to violating taste and conscience selling things—and persons—in the interest of a charity which Mrs. Randall had been fearless enough to float but not strong enough to save.

For myself the commercial instinct had that day been born and brought to full vigor in me. I gloried, too, in nefarious acts. I pitied no one—but the E. U. Z. W. X.'s for whom I toiled. I had become hungry, however, and I turned now from the hall and looked anxiously for Mr. Featherstone-Hope. In Mr. Featherstone-Hope as a man I felt no interest, but as a bearer of sustenance I was concerned about him.

To be uninterested in Mr. Featherstone-Hope displayed, of course, an ill-balanced mind, but in my defense let it be said that for three months young men had been introduced to me with steady continuity; and, never having made a study myself of their obviously favorite subject, the weather, I had, during those three months, found myself at each introduction at a disadvantage. I was beginning, too, to feel a trifle groovy, and at the end of my hard days looked with a rather jaundiced mind's eye toward the barometer as about to be discussed by Mr. Featherstone-Hope.

When Mr. Featherstone-Hope did appear, followed by a waiter bearing cups of coffee and food, I selected the largest cup and the largest sandwich, and leaned back with a sigh of placid resignation to await the inevitable.

Mr. Featherstone-Hope sank down on one corner of the settee (I was already on the other) and absently pivoted his cup on his fingers. I watched it as I ate and waited.

"It is really quite safe."

I jumped.

"I beg your pardon" he added, with compunction, looking from me to the mirror facing us, "but your reflection seemed anxious. I startled you?"

"Oh, no; not at all, only it was so—so different."

"Different?" he questioned, a little puzzled.

"I was expecting—I mean, I thought—you would have said that it is a fine day," I explained in an injured tone.

"I don't see why," he remarked stiffly, "considering it has rained hard all the afternoon."

"Oh, has it? Still—you might have said—it wasn't."

"Of course, if you like that sort of thing——"

"Oh, it really doesn't matter, only——"

"To tell the truth, I know very little about it."

"Oh!" I sighed in relief.

"Why, I thought you missed it," he protested.

"Missed what?" I asked absently. I was thinking of his eyes.

"The weather," he said, seeming a little surprised.

"Oh! Ah! Yes, the weather. Thank you, but I would rather miss it."

"Suffered?" He smiled with understanding.

"A little," I admitted. "Three months ago I came from——" I hesitated.

"Greenwich?"

"I mean—for three months I've been hearing a good deal about it, and——"

"And now you consider you've probed human nature——"

"I hadn't to probe," I interpolated.

"And you think all men stupid?"

"Not so much 'stupid,'" I said graciously, "as faithful to—to their traditions, you know."

"Now I," he declared, "generally find less stupidity in persons than I expect."

"'Than you expect,'" I repeated. "That is just a personal pessimism. You should not blame over-hopefulness in another. Of course, if you start with low ideals—— Besides, I was speaking of men."

"You imply——?"

"Well, isn't it so?"

"Please tell me, Miss Pomeroy, where you came from three months ago?"

"Please tell me, Mr. Hope, of the persons who have less stupidity than you expect?" I returned.

I sighed as I looked around the tea-room. "I cannot imagine any of these, for instance, talking anything but meteorology," I persisted.

"You lack imagination, Miss Pomeroy. Look, for instance, at that fellow and that girl over there by the window. I can imagine that she is now telling him she can never be more than a sister to him."

"I shouldn't think he'd insist," I commented as I scrutinized the lady in question.

"On that couch," continued Mr. Featherstone-Hope, ignoring my trivial mind and looking in another direction, "sits the most dangerous woman in London. She is not talking at this moment, she is looking at us; and when she speaks to you—which she will make a point of doing as soon as I turn my back—I think it won't be about the weather. She will probably tell you that I am the stupidest man in London."

"She will be crueler to you than you are to her," I observed. "How did you ruffle her?"

"I disappointed her. We have mutual friends. In me she hoped for an encyclopædia; she found a platitude. She is now amazed at your toleration. By and by she will cross-examine you."

"She will begin by telling me it rained this afternoon," I affirmed mournfully.

There was a short silence. Mr. Featherstone-Hope looked at me. I know, because I was looking in the mirror.

"Mayn't I sell you something?" I said, rising. I had been forty-five minutes on that settee. He brightened. "My stall is needlework," I added faintly. He set his teeth but seemed undaunted.

"Is there anything left?" he asked anxiously when I had led the way to my derelict.

"Oh, yes," I declared cheerfully as I pounced on something striped and woolly and yards long. "This is a muffler. You see, you put it twice around your neck and tie the ends—fringed ends."

"Most comfortable," he agreed.

"Save you from endless colds."

"Exactly. The very thing for—for every one if he would only realize it. People are so narrow-minded in Piccadilly."

"One man of courage could revolutionize a street," I declared scornfully.

"Undoubtedly—with that muffler," he agreed.

"Of course—with that muffler."

"The price?" he asked.

"Half a guinea. You can see there are pounds of wool in it."

"Acres!" he declared, winding it around his arm and handing me half a sovereign and sixpence.

Mr. Featherstone-Hope looked nervous.

"I see a young man hovering," he said hurriedly. "He is waiting, I think, for a smile, but he might be pacified by an antimacassar."

"Ah!" I exclaimed, looking down the hall at the approaching Mr. Sandys. "That is one of my barometers."

"You are simply bigoted," Mr. Featherstone-Hope declared flatly.

I smiled upon Mr. Sandys as I shook out the tassel of a smoking-cap. He drew near.

"Howdy-do, Miss Pomeroy?" he began cheerfully. "Aw'fly nice day, isn't it? Jolly warm, really."

"Aw'fly nice—and warm," I agreed, by sheer strength of will refraining from glancing in triumph at Mr. Featherstone-Hope.

Then I sold Mr. Sandys the smoking-cap.

When he had gone I looked at Mr. Featherstone-Hope. Mr. Featherstone-Hope looked at me.

"I am abased," he said.

"I am going now," I observed.

"Miss Pomeroy. May I—may I go with you?"

"Where?" I demanded sternly.

"To the end of—I mean to your door."

I looked at the clock.

"An hour and five minutes ago," I murmured to space, "I did not know this man."

"May I, Miss Pomeroy?"

"Just sixty-five minutes——"

"It seems five. May I?"

"You are very kind, Mr. Hope, but I am driving."

As we walked to the carriage Mr. Featherstone-Hope turned to me.

"Miss Pomeroy," he said.

"Mr. Hope," I answered.

"Tell me, please, where you came from three months ago."

I took my seat.

"Tell me," he pleaded.

"You will be shocked," I protested timidly.

"No, I vow—where was it?"

I leaned forward and held out my hand.

"From school," I said faintly. "Good-by." And I smiled deprecation.

As Mr. Featherstone-Hope closed the carriage door I think he bit his lip. But there! that might have meant anything.

SECOND PART

"CHIVALRY is dead," said my cousin Letitia in tart tones as we turned from St. Aldate's into Christ Church quadrangle on our way to the river.

"Oh, I wouldn't go as far as that," I urged sweetly. "Let us say 'rather ill,' or just 'unconscious.'"

Some one had bumped Letitia's arm in passing, and she was resenting it. Little Mr. Tenterden looked dejected.

We had come to Oxford with Aunt Ethel for the 'Eights,' several persons having thought that it would be very good for us, and little Mr. Tenterden (whom we used to call Dickie when we went to school with his sister) having declared that we should have a good time were it to cost him the half of his kingdom. Mr. Tenterden, it seemed, had made two recent discoveries: first, that he was what he called "gone" on my cousin Letitia; and second, that he could get himself into the tight, pale, gray suit which had evidently been sent home to him by mistake. Neither discovery seemed to bring him much joy; neither Letitia nor the suit seemed to fit him. Mr. Tenterden is small enough, goodness knows; the suit was smaller. Letitia, I may remark, though distinctly feminine in many ways—even to the point of anxiety on the matter—is distinctly large in size; and Mr. Tenterden's admiration for her reminded me of a small child gazing at an elephant.

DRAWN BY JOHN WOLCOTT ADAMS

"AND YOU THINK ALL MEN STUPID?"

Poor Mr. Tenterden! he used to be very "slangy" when he was "Dickie," but awe of Letitia seemed to have melted it out of him (he had heard her speak on the subject), and, possessing no other vocabulary, he remained rather silent. He gulped now when he heard Letitia's diagnosis of chivalry. I felt sorry for him.

"I'm sure," I declared consolingly as I turned my eyes toward a string of young men dressed in little things which must, I think, have been handed up to them by their small brothers—with the exception of their scarfs—"I'm sure any of those men now passing would be as ready to take off his—well—his scarf and throw it down for you to step over as ever Cardinal Wolsey was for Queen Rosamond."

"I should be sorry to require any one of those men to appear in an inch less clothing than he wears at present," returned Letitia severely.

"And instead of a—a garter, you know, with 'Honi soit' and all that sort of thing on it," I continued blithely, "you could snatch your chiffon ruffle gracefully from your neck, and, tying it under his chin, declare—declare—oh, anything—anything womanly and effective, you know; Lady Jane Gray's own words, perhaps, 'I have but a little neck.' And I'm positive he'd feel just as chivalrous as Cardinal Wol——"

"How charmed Miss Narroway should be with the result of her history lectures," said Letitia grimly.

"Yes, it's the spirit of the thing I catch," I agreed. "Anyhow, I am convinced that it's only because chivalry is not called for nowadays that one doesn't get it. I am certain that any one—Mr. Tenterden, for instance—would sacrifice his coat in a moment if a water pipe were to burst or the river overflow; wouldn't you, Mr. Tenterden?"

"Like a shot," he declared eagerly.

"That is just what it would be like," she remarked witheringly, as her eye traveled over his straining buttons.

Again Mr. Tenterden looked dejected (Letitia does snub the poor little man unmercifully), and after that we walked rather silently along toward the barges; while Aunt Ethel and Penlip Challoner chattered away just behind us. The barge (Dickie's college barge) was rather crowded when we reached it, and almost the first person I saw was Mr. Featherstone-Hope coming toward us.

Digitized by Google

"You!" I exclaimed in surprise. "I pictured you in Piccadilly."

"It is good of you to picture me—anywhere; but, surely, Oxford would have been a kinder spot."

"Oh, I pictured all unhappy persons—in the mass, you know—panting in Piccadilly, or thereabouts, of course. The happy are, of course, here."

"Exactly."

"When did you come down—up, I mean—no, down. I don't know which I mean—whether to offend Oxford or London."

"I am of both, Miss Pomeroy."

"Which means——?"

"Entirely as you choose."

"Please be Oxford for the time, for," I confessed in a lowered tone, "I know nothing, absolutely nothing about all this," waving my hand toward the river. "And Mr. Challoner and the others, being young, naturally expect every one to know everything. Now you——"

"Thank you, Miss Pomeroy," he remarked stiffly.

That is so like a man to be huffy in a moment just because I happened to forget the seven gray hairs on his right temple, or whatever it is.

"Oh, it's no use going on like that," I protested. "You know quite well that I didn't mean anything of the sort—except that your mind and your shoulders are a little broader than the minds and shoulders of these nice little boys all round about us. Now, please don't go on being dignified, but just tell me——"

"Oh, Mr. Featherstone-Hope, you will be able to explain to me why the last boats go first and the first last. Look at my card; this is what I mean——" Letitia's voice trailed off as she moved away bearing my encyclopædic hope with her.

Letitia always does that. Why couldn't she have been content with her devoted slave, Dickie Tenterden? He wouldn't have laughed at her. However, the river was becoming very exciting, so I turned my attention to it.

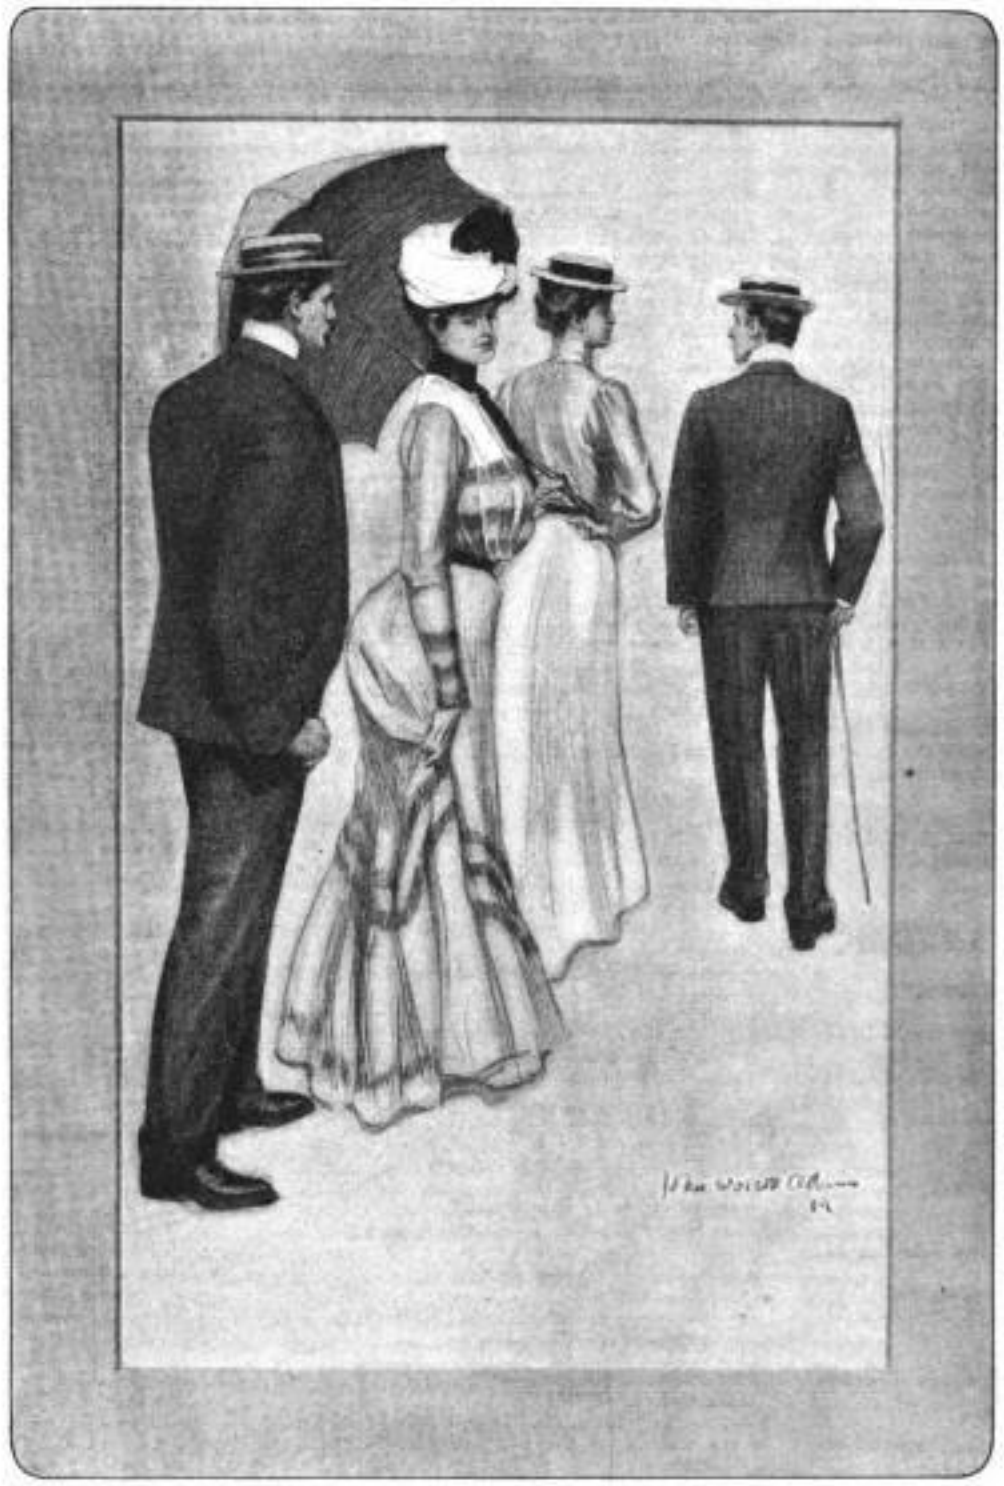
"Well!" I cried, after a few moments of absorption, "if many more persons come up on this barge I'm sure we shall never win. As it is, I can't imagine how any crew can manage to move it with all of us on top. And I'm sure some barges have heaps more persons on them than others. It seems horribly unfair. Even the frocks make a difference; mine is light enough, I'm thankful," and I patted my muslin frills.

Penlip Challoner, whose face had grown more and more radiant as I proceeded, swirled on his heel at this point and became hilarious. If I had not known him so well I should have considered him overexcited. He really guffawed. I felt that it was necessary for him to be calmed.

"Hush!" I said peremptorily. "You are interrupting, shaking the place like that. They are busy down below, trying to get the oars out, I think."

"No, it's all right," he said weakly, as he recovered a little. "It's not the oars; it's merely the crew."

Then he explained a few things to me, and it didn't seem so unfair after all; and I felt really rather glad that it was not the barges, only the boats, which were to be rushed along in a race, for I'm sure I should have shrieked. Then he and Dickie Tenterden pointed out "whiffs" and "skiffs" and canoes and things to me, and told me the difference between them; there seemed a good deal at the moment.



"'Eights' is such a curious name for boat races," Letitia's voice fell on my ear again as she meandered back to our group with Mr. Featherstone-Hope still alongside. "It reminds me of——" she wrinkled her brows in thought.

"Of gloves, dear?" I asked gently. Our good Letitia has what she calls "a strong hand," and says she is glad of it.

"No," she answered rather snappily. "I think it is some game it reminds me of."

"'Vingt-et-un?'" ventured Dickie Tenterden, laying his suggestion as a tribute before her. She wrinkled her brows again and looked down the river, vouchsafing no reply. Again Dickie looked dejected; and we all watched the water and waited.

Penlip Challoner came to the rescue at last and set things right for a while. It was at my expense, but I forgave him. He broke in upon our gloom and our ill-arranged positions by a repetition of my late remarks and gestures in illustration thereof. Every one ridiculed me, but as he had bettered matters considerably I contented myself with a threat.

DRAWN BY JOHN WILLCOTT ROWE.

"YOU!" I EXCLAIMED IN SURPRISE. "I PICTURED YOU IN PICCADILLY"

"I'll take you shopping with me one day," I declared with grim determination, "and let you flounder among chiffons."

Some persons seem to think that every one else must be born with instincts respecting all the immaterial little side-dishes of life, such as Oxford and Cambridge archaisms.

"They've started," said Mr. Featherstone-Hope. Then he stooped and picked up my sunshade, handkerchief and race card, which I had happened to drop.

"Oh, I'm afraid I trod on your foot," I exclaimed remorsefully a moment later.

"Don't mention it," he replied, smiling in an exasperatingly superior way. "If it would give you a better view, please——"

"I am not excited," I answered. He smiled on, so I ignored him and gave my attention to the boats.

"Well!" I exclaimed in disgust. "It does seem cowardly, downright cowardly, to put the little men in the horridest place—yes, actually, they have done it in every single boat—just with his back to the danger; and they rush him on, poor little man! There, look! I do believe they will knock him right into the boat in front of him!"

"Oh, Mr. Featherstone-Hope," broke in Letitia, "I am going to ask a great favor of you. Aunt Ethel says she thinks you won't mind. Will you take me on the river, really on the river, in one of those curious boats they call 'Canadas'? Just for a few minutes," etc., etc.

I repossessed myself of my sunshade and sundries in dignified silence. Mr. Featherstone-Hope just suddenly breathed something, but I did not catch the word. I was rather glad I didn't.

Then Penlip Challoner suggested that I should go with him in another canoe; while Dickie Tenterden should bring Aunt Ethel in yet another as a coup-de-grâce (I think he meant chef-d'œuvre). So we agreed and separated in couples.

"Oh, by the way, Miss Pomeroy," called Mr. Featherstone-Hope airily, as he righted himself in the canoe and took his paddle, "there is something I wanted to ask you this afternoon, only I hadn't time. Shall I see you at the 'Grill' concert to-night?"

"I can only say that I shall be there," I answered diffidently. "The tendency of the violet——"

"Of course. Thank you. I will ask you then—if you will remind me."

"Is it worth a knot in my handkerchief?" I demanded, looking ruefully at my square of embroidered cambric.

"Well, it may amuse you," he called back as he guided the canoe slowly out from the raft.

"I should like the change," I returned, as I tied the knot and held it up to show him. Then I looked at Letitia, and I could feel the price at which she valued me. And a sort of echo of herself murmuring, "Chivalry is dead," seemed to drop with disgust from her lips as she looked haughtily upon Mr. Featherstone-Hope paddling her out into the stream.

In the cloisters that night I happened to draw out the handkerchief to which I had transferred the afternoon's knot. I showed it to Mr. Featherstone-Hope and reminded him of the question he wanted to ask. And he asked it.

Something or other induced me to say "Yes."

That was the first time I became engaged to Mr. Featherstone-Hope.

THIRD PART

"MR. FEATHERSTONE-HOPE," announced Charlotte.

And Mr. Featherstone-Hope walked—as he might naturally be expected to do—into the room.

Indeed, I had been expecting him to do this any time during the past month, and in my solitude had rehearsed many greetings for him. Now that he really had come I kept my back turned toward him till I had finished the page of my book and tapped my foot upon the floor. I am bound to admit that this actual greeting was quite unrehearsed.

The effect was all that I could desire. Mr. Featherstone-Hope was annoyed. I could tell that by his first words.

"I hope you are quite well, Miss Pomeroy?"

"Quite well, thank you," I replied with chilly effusiveness.

It did occur to me that this was all rather ridiculous considering that we were supposed to be engaged; but, of course, he had behaved scandalously, and I was bound to resent it.

"I just called to inquire whether you received a letter from me about a month ago," he remarked nonchalantly. (I don't believe he was feeling a bit nonchalant really, but just as mad as could be.)

"You are very kind," I murmured sweetly.

"Did you?" he demanded.

"Did I what?"

"Did you receive a letter from me about a month ago?"

"About a month ago?" I repeated, pondering. "From you——? It is rather far back—but, let me see; yes, I think I did."

"Think?" he echoed, raising his eyebrows somewhat cynically. "Perhaps with another effort you will be able to remember if you answered it."

"Perhaps," I agreed pleasantly.

He looked at the ceiling with forced calmness.

When he grew tired of that he brought his eyes downward again and looked at me. I smiled politely.

"Will you answer my question?" he asked. His civility was most elaborate.

"Certainly, if you ask me one," I assured him.

"Can you remember whether you answered it or not?"

"Yes," I declared pleasantly. "I can remember."

"Did you?"

"Did I what?"

Digitized by Google

"Did you answer it?" he almost thundered.

"Please don't shout," I remonstrated soothingly. "It sounds as if—almost as if we were quarreling."

He immediately became nonchalant again.

"I should be obliged," he said with awful calmness, "if you would tell me if you answered that letter of mine."

"Oh, certainly."

"Did you?" indifferently.

"No," with equal indifference and a yawn in miniature. Then I rearranged my cushion and leaned back again.

"A man generally prefers——" he began with slow, biting sarcasm, intended to reduce me to powder.

"Pooh," I interrupted. "What's a man!"

"A man," he began; then he rose with studied langour and went over to a bookcase. (Our bloodless warfare was taking place in the library.) Hauling down a big dictionary, he proceeded to turn the leaves, and then ran his finger down a page. "'A man,'" he repeated, "you will see here, is 'the being that thinks.'"

"Thinks a deal of himself," I commented, unimpressed.

"That fact happens to be omitted in this edition," he remarked apologetically.

After that we waited for a few moments to gather strength. He spoke first. I knew he would have to.

"Patricia."

"Mr. Featherstone-Hope," I answered.

"No," he said firmly; "Patricia."

I sighed resignation and looked at the ceiling. (The ceiling seemed to be getting an unusual amount of attention this afternoon; as a rule, we rather neglect it.) Tom—I mean Mr. Featherstone-Hope—had dropped his bitingly sarcastic tone and was hovering near anger. I felt so glad I had happened to be at home when he called.

"Listen to me, Patricia. What can I gather from your action?"

"My *in*action," I corrected amiably.

I think he stamped.

"What can I understand from it?" he demanded.

"I can't say, I'm sure," I debated pleasantly. "You see" (confidingly), "so much depends upon your power of imagination."

He bit his lip. I saw him.

"Did you do it wilfully?"

"Do what? I didn't do anything!"

Crash!

He had placed his fist upon a little table, and the little table had moved from before him.

"Did—you—wilfully—leave—my—letter—unanswered?" he thundered.

"Yes—yes—yes—yes—yes!" I replied in mock thunder, thumping the cushions to punctuate the words.

Then we looked at one another. I could see that he was fuming. I was rather enjoying myself. If he chose to be careless about his letters it was only right that he should be punished.

"Then," he said, in his high-handed sort of way, "if that is your idea of what is decent treatment from a woman to the man she is engaged to, all I can say is our engagement had better come to an end at once."

"I was waiting to make the same suggestion," I remarked placidly, "when you had done prattling."

Then we paused to allow time for the sinking in of these portentous words. And we glared at one another; and for about the first time in my life I could not think of anything to say. It would have been ridiculous to ask him if he had been to the new play; and that was the only subject I could call to mind, try as hard as ever I could—except Charlotte's tooth which had been extracted yesterday.

And thus, for the first time, was my engagement to Mr. Featherstone-Hope broken.

At length, when the silence was becoming so awful that I felt I should scream if something did not happen, and we were glaring at one another, and I was just beginning to declare that Charlotte had had a tooth out yesterday, the door opened and the convalescent Charlotte announced:

"Miss Challoner. Mr. Penlip Challoner."

I transformed my glare into a smile and rose to kiss Sybil. I should have welcomed an ostrich at that moment, and I was so glad that I had on my blue voile frock, for I know it is becoming, and blue is Penlip Challoner's favorite color, and it just served Mr. Featherstone-Hope right.

Sybil laughed ruefully when she saw my visitor.

"There, Pen!" she said, turning to her brother, "didn't I say so? My every instinct told me that we were coming at the very wrongest moment. Now here we are, and we're not only de trop, but we know it. We really won't stay long."

"You came at the very rightest moment," I declared, which was quite true as well as polite for once. "Mr. Featherstone-Hope is now going; aren't you, Mr. Featherstone-Hope?"

Mr. Featherstone-Hope muttered something unintelligible and proceeded to shake hands with them.

"And we interrupted your adieus!" groaned Sybil. "I do think you are magnificently forgiving."

Mr. Featherstone-Hope snapped avowals of his pleasure at the interruption with the air of a dog over a disputed bone. Penlip Challoner began to look amused. Sybil began to look puzzled.

"If you really must go, Mr. Hope," she said, a little uncertainly, "we will stay to tea. I ought to go on to the Fords'; but Patricia's tea is always stronger than theirs, and as it's Letitia Ford I'm dying to talk about it'll be more circumspect to choose somebody else's room to do it in."

"Oh, he must go, I'm afraid," I assured her pleasantly. "An engagement, I think, and I know he's horribly afraid even at the bare idea of a broken engagement, so we must not try to keep him." I drew Sybil to the other corner of my couch, then I turned to take my leave of Mr. Featherstone-Hope. "Good-by," I said sweetly, holding out my hand to him with just the faintest hint in the action that I was eager to turn my undivided attention to the others.

He had dozens of words to say, angry and otherwise. I could see that quite easily, but I didn't intend to allow him to say them; he didn't deserve an outlet for his feelings. He had been very rude to me, or at any rate, careless, which was just as bad.

He took my hand—he couldn't very well do anything else when I poked it almost under his nose—then he let it go again as if it were breakable and turned to the door. I faced toward Sybil and looked as annoyingly expectant as I could.

"Oh, by the by, Mr. Hope," I said over my shoulder, as a sort of afterthought, as I thumped my long-suffering cushion before settling my shoulders into it. "That last letter we were talking about"—I stopped to break an unsightly thread from my cushion frill. Mr. Featherstone-Hope halted with a jerk, the doorknob in his hand—"had no address on it. Such a sharp idea," I concluded, turning to Sybil.

"Ho, that dodge is played out," broke in Penlip Challoner with an innocently brutal laugh. "It's about as old as the 'previous engagement' wheeze."

"'Wheeze'!" I echoed.

"No address!" echoed Mr. Featherstone-Hope.

"No," I laughed pertinently; "the—the man evidently wished to weed out his correspondents."

A pause.

"Good-by," I remarked again. It did occur to me to wonder vaguely at what number of good-bys it was correct to cease from speeding the parting guest.

"I shall not go," said Mr. Featherstone-Hope obstinately, relaxing his grip of the doorknob and squaring his shoulders.

"Oh, I say, old man," remonstrated Penlip Challoner, "how about that broken engagement, you know?"

"Exactly," said Mr. Featherstone-Hope with the light of a fixed determination in his eyes. "It's the broken engagement that settles the matter."

Silence again. Then the other two suddenly fell to laughing.

"Why, I do believe——" began Sybil.

"Never mind what you believe," I snapped severely; "I am going to ring for tea—by proxy."

Penlip Challoner went to the bell.

"I understood," I continued, "that Mr. Featherstone-Hope wished to escape. Perhaps he, too, was going to the Fords' until you abused Letitia's tea. But, even so, I should have thought that he would have found weak tea less embarrassing than a broken engagement."

"I shall not go," repeated Mr. Featherstone-Hope, "so it's no use your talking like that. And you can't turn me out, because I'm stronger than Challoner, and you'd merely have his corpse as a tea-table decoration if you set him on."

"Pooh," said Penlip Challoner cheerfully. "It's all right, old chap. Don't you worry yourself. I don't hit a man when he's down."

"No, nor up, either," I remarked scathingly. "Of course, if Mr. Featherstone-Hope enjoys breaking engagements he's quite welcome to please himself. Nobody else cares." Then I gave my full attention to Sybil.

Of course, when tea came, Mr. Featherstone-Hope dropped muffins into our cups with the sugar tongs, and did odd little things of that sort; but it was really a very cheerful tea.

"Come along, Sybil; they are dying for us to be gone," said Penlip Challoner, when he had quite finished his sixth cup.

"How vulgar Penlip is becoming," I murmured absently.

"I shall go on now and tease Letitia," said Sybil, rising and arranging her veil. "Good-by, dear."

* * * *

Again Mr. Featherstone-Hope and I were left alone, glaring at one another; but this time we both found so much to say that we even overlapped at times and became a chorus, and Charlotte's tooth never once entered my head, and—but there—I don't suppose our affairs are so very interesting, after all, and I need only add that that was the second time I became engaged to Mr. Featherstone-Hope.

DRAWN BY JOHN WILLCOTT ROWE

"COME ALONG, SYBIL; THEY ARE DYING FOR US TO BE GONE"

Cheating a Biographer

MISS E. B. SIMPSON, of Edinburgh, the daughter of Sir James Young Simpson, who discovered the anæsthetic qualities of chloroform, visited this country last fall. She is the author of her father's biography for the Famous Scots series, and of Robert Louis Stevenson's Edinburgh Days.

Miss Simpson is a clever writer and a woman of most engaging personality, whose Scotch accent gave a pleasant flavor to the entertaining stories she told of her gifted countryman, Louis, as she called him. Speaking of the recently published Stevenson letters, Miss Simpson said:

"Louis' letters were so unusual, so polished, we used to accuse him of writing them with an idea they would some time be published, and on one occasion when he was visiting our house my brother merrily made the charge, saying: 'See, Louis', taking at the same time a bundle of letters from his pocket, 'these were written for your biographer, I am sure of it. They are much too fine for ordinary correspondence; but he shall be cheated; he shall not have them,' and he threw the package into the fire, much to Louis' amusement."

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

GEN. JOS. R. HAWLEY

Our New Army Methods

The War Department and Congress are acting together in striving to provide new machinery for the army organization which has outgrown its former proportions. There are any number of new ideas. Out West a new war college will be established in order to train the men more thoroughly for their work. There is a suggestion that apprentice battalions be started, such as those which are now training boys for the navy, and this proposition includes the enlistment of lads not younger than sixteen nor older than eighteen years, to whom shall be given military instruction. There is now in Congress a bill to provide a dentist for every regiment in the army. The surgeons are to be increased, and so far as extra attendants go the American soldier is to be kept in first-class health. But the most important thing is the movement in Congress, backed by the War Department, especially by Secretary Root, to increase the efficiency of the whole military establishment. The same bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Hull, the Chairman of the Military Committee, and in the Senate by General Hawley, the Chairman of the Military Committee of that body. Among the members of the Senate Committee who have considered the bill are General Hawley, General Sewell, Colonel Proctor, all Union veterans, and General Bate, who served through the Mexican war and became a Major-General in the Confederate army. The Military Committees of both branches of Congress have on them old soldiers who know what war is and who have obtained their experience from years of work and fighting. They are zealous for the reputation of the army and consequently any bill they may favor unanimously is apt to be about the best thing that could be agreed upon. It is a real reform by practical soldiers.

Every Third Promotion for Merit

The first great reform that the new law would effect would be the breaking of the present iron rule of promotion only by seniority. For years this law has prevailed, so that when exceptional merit or gallantry or peculiar fitness was to be rewarded it always stood in the way. Not even the President could do anything, and in the words of Mr. Root, "the thoughtful, devoted and ambitious young man is precluded from advancing himself by his own exertion a hair's breadth beyond the indolent, the dull and the inefficient man who is just able to perform duty enough to keep him from being turned out of the service. The effect of the present law is injurious to the service because it fails to bring the best men into command; it is injurious to the officers because it withdraws all stimulus to activity and zeal. It is thoroughly un-American because it stifles individual opportunity and affords no reward for individual achievement." Such a rule is opposed to the spirit of our institutions and it undoubtedly operates against the good of the service, for it kills that stimulus which is often the prerequisite to excellence. It is hard to break down a precedent established in such an institution as the army, and thus the first change is probably not as radical as it should be. It is the beginning of the law; the language reads as follows: "That hereafter every third promotion to the grade of Colonel, Lieutenant-Colonel and Major, respectively, in the line of the army shall be by selection from the next lowest grade in the same army. The selection in each case shall be made by the President from a list of three names to be prepared by a board composed of officers of the same branch of service and senior to the grade from which the promotion is to be made."

The criticism of this plan is that partiality may be shown in the selections, but against that is placed the honor of the men who will prepare the list of three names. As the reputation of the army will be largely at stake by the work of such boards, it is felt by the friends of the bill that no injustice will be shown to junior officers.

New Blood for the Army Staff

Under the present system when an officer is appointed on the staff his position is permanent. There is no way of changing him except by dismissing him from the army. A fine illustration of this is the fact that while General Eagan, at the head of the Commissary Department of the Government, has been suspended for six years from the army for reprehensible conduct, his name is still carried on the War Department rolls as Commissary-General of Subsistence, and the officer who does the work not only has to use the title of Acting Commissary-General, but is obliged to receive only the salary of the inferior position.

This new bill will remove this permanent feature and will substitute details from the line to the staff for periods of four years unless sooner terminated by the President. No officer can remain longer than four years, but by going back to the line for a year's service he may be detailed again to the same department. A year's service, however, as an interval between staff duty is mandatory. These provisions apply to the departments of the Adjutant-General, Inspector-General, the Quartermaster, Subsistence and Ordnance Department and the Signal Corps. The Engineering Corps, of which General John M. Wilson is Chief, seems to be a department which is beyond criticism simply through its personnel and splendid work, so in that case an exception is made. The appointments there remain permanent, except that the officers are required to serve one year of five with such branch of the line—which means the active army—as may be designated by the Secretary of War.

The argument for all these is that it will prevent all possible dry rot, infuse new life and interest into the service, and bring to the various departments the freshest and best ability.

GEN. W. J. SEWELL

A Bill of $330,000 a Day

According to the last report of the Secretary of War the army of the United States consisted of 7,540 officers and 171,646 enlisted men. The last Congress in what it supposed to be a moment of generosity allowed a little over $70,000,000 for war expenses, but those who knew the facts understood perfectly that much more money would be required, so we have not been very much surprised to find in the Urgency Deficiency Bill of the present Congress the somewhat respectable sum of $45,951,949 for the support of the army. This, mind you, is an addition to $75,747,811 already allowed for the current year. In other words, we are paying about $330,000 a day, or $1,375 an hour, or $220 a minute for our present army organization and its expenses in the various parts of the world. The curious feature in the whole case is that the politicians are trying to hide the fact that we are maintaining a large army, and if we are to pursue our present plans the size of it may have to be increased. Thus in the legislation that is proposed there is the most painstaking care to keep from any one the idea that we are drifting toward the enormous war expenses of a modern power. At the same time, when we add to these figures the one hundred and forty-odd millions which we are paying out for pensions, we exceed the army expenses of any nation on earth, with the possible exception of Great Britain whose expenditures in South Africa may form the greatest total in the history of warfare. It is a striking contradiction of ideals that just after the Peace Conference at The Hague, where disarmament was discussed, every nation that took part in the feast of concord has since increased its expenses either for war itself or for appropriations for war. It all goes to show that we are still far from general brotherhood.

COL. REDFIELD PROCTOR

The Reform of the Artillery

The third important change the bill makes is to organize and modernize the artillery corps. The artillery in its arrangement is even more curious than the other parts of the army. In its present form it is supposed to be a regimental organization where each officer of the same grade has exactly the same authority, so that with the seven Colonels in command not one of them has any more right than another to speak for the corps. The bill will increase the artillery over a period of five years until it reaches 17,448 men, nearly all of whom will be at the seacoast fortifications, and it provides for a Chief of Artillery, so that it will be under one direct, responsible head. He will be in command of both branches, both the coast artillery and the field artillery. The difference between these is given by the law as follows: "The coast artillery is defined as that portion charged with the care and use of the fixed and movable elements of land and coast fortifications, including the submarine mine and torpedo defenses; and the field artillery is that portion accompanying an army in the field and including field and light artillery proper, horse artillery, siege artillery, mountain artillery, and also machine gun batteries."

The Chief of Artillery will have the rank, pay and allowances of a Brigadier-General.

GEN. W. A. BATE

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN

MADAME PETSCHNIKOFF

A Royal Confidante's Aid

Mrs. Alexander Petschnikoff, wife of the Russian violinist, is an American girl who went abroad to complete her musical education and while studying met her future husband. She was a Miss Lillie Shober, of Chicago. Her courtship, though unruffled, was marked by several romantic incidents. On one occasion her fiancé was filling an engagement in Copenhagen, and by careful study and negotiation had arranged his dates so that he could leave the Danish capital at a late hour one evening, reach Berlin and call upon his sweetheart and return by the next express train. On the afternoon of the day he was to leave he received a command from the Queen of Denmark to play at the royal palace that evening. To one of the court ladies he chanced to speak of his dilemma. To his surprise, he was called upon to play a very short piece at the beginning of the entertainment, and before the applause died away the lord-in-waiting bowed and said: "Her Majesty thanks you for the pleasure you have given her and directs me to tell you that her carriage is at the door, and that if you will hurry you will be able to catch the night train for Berlin and so keep your engagement with your fiancée after all." Not until he returned to Copenhagen did he find out that the pretty girl to whom he had told his troubles was a member of the royal family.

Stanley's Most Memorable Experience

Henry M. Stanley, the distinguished explorer, has not lost the pleasant gift of humor. On his last visit to the United States he had many calls from reporters. One of these, fresh from college, asked some amazing questions.

"Mr. Stanley, what in your opinion, sir, was your most memorable experience in the Dark Continent?"

"Getting out of it," said Mr. Stanley.

ROBERT E. A. DORR

A Good Use for Private John Allen

Congressman John M. Allen, of Mississippi, once went all the way to New York from the South to attend a banquet. When he took his place at the board he found himself set down for the last speech. His friends also saw the program and, like himself, were annoyed by what they thought was thoughtlessness on the part of the committee.

The Congressman listened to the long addresses, and when his turn came prefaced his remarks thus:

"Gentlemen, I was somewhat at a loss, at the opening of this feast, to understand why you had asked me to come all the way from Mississippi to speak to you and then made my address the last number of your program. Now it is all plain to me. You had to put a bright man at the last to hold the audience."

Faith in the Double-Deck Turrets

Admiral Charles O'Neil, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, was born in England. He is one of the men who has risen to high rank by gallantry and fidelity.

He served through the Civil War from July, 1861, and was in the engagement with the Confederate ironclad Merrimac, being then on the Cumberland.

His action in that engagement led to his promotion. His heroism in rescuing Lieutenant Morris from drowning led to further honors. He was in both the attacks on Fort Fisher and won two more promotions by his bravery.

He was only twenty-three when the war closed.

Since then he has steadily advanced in his profession and now he is one of the experts on guns and ammunition, being not only Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, but also a member of the Board of Construction. He is a man of deliberate judgment, but of great confidence when his judgment is formed.

An instance of it was the recent trial of the double-deck turrets of the battleship Kearsarge. There were doubts as to whether it would be possible to use these double turrets in a running sea, but Rear-Admiral O'Neil said that it would be found that they would be all right.

The Kearsarge went out for the trial and when she returned the report was entirely favorable. The test was carried so far that all the guns were fired at once with satisfactory results, and with no damage to the greatest of our battleships. The success was highly satisfactory to the Navy Department.

Robert Dorr's Misguided Enterprise

Robert E. A. Dorr, the owner, publisher and editor of the New York Mail and Express, began newspaper work in Baltimore, on the American, in 1877, and has worked his way up to his present position through almost every step of the business. One of his early assignments was to relieve the distress of the lighthouse-keeper on Seven-Foot Knoll, out in Chesapeake Bay. News had come to the city editor that food in the lighthouse was exhausted and that the keeper and his family were starving. Young Dorr secured a Custom House tug and loaded it with provisions. The weather was exceptionally cold and the tug was stuck in the ice half a mile from the Knoll. Dorr left the boat and started over the ice. When he reached the lighthouse he was warmly greeted.

"Come in the dining-room," said the keeper's wife after the rescuer had warmed himself. "Come in and have dinner with us."

Mr. Dorr thought that hunger had made her mad.

"I heard that you needed food," stammered Mr. Dorr as soon as he could speak.

"Well, come to think of it," replied the housewife, "we do. We have plenty of meat and vegetables, flour and that sort, but the next time you are coming out this way we'd appreciate it if you'd bring over a few jars of quince jam," she added cheerfully.

Mr. Dorr took his provisions back to Baltimore but no account of his trip was written.

In 1881 Mr. Dorr went to Philadelphia and became news editor of the Press. He was connected with the administrative bureau of the World's Fair in Chicago from 1890 until 1892, when he became managing editor of the New York Mail and Express, which property he bought a few years later from the estate of the late Colonel Eliot F. Shepard. Upon the death of his partner, Mr. Alexander, last year, Mr. Dorr became owner and editor as well as publisher.

Miss Howland's Latest Rôle

Miss Jobyna Howland, the actress, is one of the tallest women on the stage. The other day in the South her train was detained half an hour by accident. A crowd of darkies came along and Miss Howland gave one of them a nickel. He looked at the tall girl with the golden hair in open-mouthed wonder and one of the men asked him:

"Do you know who that is?"

The little darky nodded his head affirmatively.

"She 'un's the lady wut rides the lellerfunts at the circus."

There had just been a circus in the town.

MRS. ANNE M. BRISBINE

The New Tenor's Request

Mrs. Anne M'Iver Brisbine, who is now well known as an author and musical critic in New York, achieved her first reputation in Chicago. She was editor of a Chicago musical paper and was among the most popular of the writers on musical topics in Chicago. Her verdict was considered of importance to any aspirant for musical honors. On one occasion she was invited to a reception to pass upon a new tenor fresh from Berlin. Mrs. Brisbine is diminutive in stature, demure in face and retiring in disposition. The consequence was that after the concert, when the tenor was presented, he asked the usual questions of the modest lady, and in a few sentences she told him that his songs, which he supposed were new, were sung in Chicago by every tenor who came there and by most of the local singers. At last he said: "Mrs. Brisbine was to be here to hear me to-night. Will you tell her about me?" "Yes." "And if she thinks well of me will you ask her to send an indorsement to me? It might be useful."

Mrs. Brisbine promised to give the message, but somehow the indorsement never reached the tenor.

A Revised Reading

General Benjamin F. Tracy, ex-Secretary of the Navy, was once trying a case in the City Court which involved the liability of a provision dealer for unwholesome pork. The point of issue turned upon trichinosis, and the word was bandied about by counsel and scientific experts. The most interested auditor was an old court officer who listened to all the arguments, especially to those of the General.

"Oh, but that was an instructive spache, Gineral. Oi knew that pigs were unbilthy animals, but I never knew they had tricky noses before."

ADMIRAL O'NEIL

Digitized by Google

He offered to get me a set of the sheets then on his presses

Famous Feats of Journalism

The Premature Publication of the Revised Version

By C. E. Harrington

NO BOOK was ever so perfectly guarded against premature publication by unauthorized persons as was the Revised Version of the New Testament. And yet through the persistent enterprise of an American newspaper the volume was printed verbatim in advance of its general distribution, while the pledges of the International Revision Committee were sacredly observed and their methods so carefully carried out that there was no official betrayal of trust during the period of preparation of the book or of its placing on the market.

Among the examples of American newspaper enterprise, that of the Chicago Tribune, in its zealous, hurried quest for the Revised Version, may be cited as conspicuous. It was undertaken in the face of almost insuperable obstacles; the object aimed at was well won, and the credit, to the newspaper, well deserved. The story of this undertaking has been but imperfectly told by reviewers of the noteworthy accomplishments of newspaper managers. The credit of the idea belongs to the late S. J. Medill, who in 1881 was managing editor of the Chicago Tribune; to me—then beginning my many years' service as New York correspondent of that journal—was assigned the duty of executing it.

The Tribune, a few weeks before this undertaking, had scored a noteworthy "beat" from New York by prematurely publishing an article of great moment on the Nicaragua Canal prepared by General Grant for the North American Review. This forestalling of the Review's particular and widely heralded piece of enterprise entailed a series of complications calculated to deter a newspaper from venturing farther along the same line, but the success seemed to whet the appetite of the Tribune's editorial conductor for like excursions in other fields. Early in April of 1881 investigation had shown the futility of attempting to secure a copy of the Revised New Testament in New York, and there the matter was dropped. There was an extraordinarily keen interest among laymen as well as in strictly religious circles concerning the book upon which the greatest commentators of the world had long been engaged, and discussion of its probable departure from the readings of the old version was keen and continuous.

Boarding an Ocean Liner at a Moment's Notice

It was not in Mr. Medill's nature to preaccept defeat; therefore it was in one sense no surprise when, late in April, at a most unexpected moment, the following telegram came at midnight to the Tribune's New York representative:

> "Sail on City of Berlin to-morrow. Secure copy of the Revised edition. Return at once. If you succeed a fortune is yours. S. J. MEDILL."

To go to London and return within twenty days was at that time in itself no easy undertaking. That was all the time margin I had, as the day of publication had been set for April 17 by the International Revision Committee. Steamer transit then was comparatively slow. Besides, the book could not be had for the asking, delays were inevitable, and one return steamer missed would upset all calculations. Cabling the work was not entertained; if the book was secured in London its transmission by wire from British territory would likely develop some unpleasant situations.

Without ticket or steamer accommodations, and not a berth purchasable, turned brusquely back as I attempted to board the City of Berlin only five minutes before she sailed, and while the supplemental mail was going aboard, I finally succeeded in reaching her deck as the gangplank was being swung to the pier, too late to be put over the side, as the screw was turning and the ship making for the stream.

Good fortune seemed to smile on the venture from the outset. I made two acquaintances during the voyage that were of value to me during the ten days following, but neither of the gentlemen ever realized that he was abetting a prospective journalistic beat. One was a publisher of international repute, and very directly connected with the procurement of the American rights to the ninth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica; the other was a Chicagoan of prominence and with a large appreciation of the Tribune's qualities. To these gentlemen I was, of course, a journalist on a sight-seeing tour, and incidentally investigating British publishing and educational methods.

London at that date, with every channel open, was, on broad principles, at best a forbidding place in which to make progress. Its conservatism, not to say suspicion of all American ways, was chilling. The vogue of international fraternity had not set in. On the whole, however, I fared exceptionally well. A letter from the American publisher set me down at once in the heart of Paternoster Row, in a publishing house of great repute and that had New York connections, where I found something like American appreciation of enterprise and more than customary British assent to abetting a stranger in audacious ventures within their very doors. They were upset by the proposition at first, but finally signified willingness to cooperate, under the rose, "just to show these people here at home," they said, "that the United States leads the world in enterprise, and that Chicago leads the United States."

This interview marked out the line of campaign: The New Testament could not be procured in London, at bindery or warehouse, for reasons to be given; Oxford or Cambridge, perhaps both towns, must be visited; or the unexpected must turn up through one of the almost inaccessible revisers; and, if the latter, luck must work its way out. Paternoster Row led me straight to the university cities, for I left that publishing house with personal and very persuasive letters to the persons of the greatest utility in the printing establishments of both places—the chief pressmen. All was in confidence—perhaps quite unprofessional—but my new friends, to name whom now might shock London publishers, were not averse to watching the hazard to its end.

A Tantalizing Sight of the Coveted Volume

Two obstacles, at the outset, nearly upset all my plans. Only by the merest accident of a passage being canceled at the last moment on the Britannic, the first steamer to New York two days later, was I enabled to secure a ticket for home on time; and I found myself in need of money. Through oversight the Tribune had neglected to cable me two hundred pounds sterling, the amount asked for before leaving New York. It was imperative that the trips to Oxford and Cambridge should at least be fortified with funds. I went straight to the American Exchange and asked to be supplied, meantime cabling the Tribune to remit by wire. Within an hour, without a credential, I had the equivalent of one thousand dollars in my pocket, the only collateral being my sight draft on my home office. I never knew what impelled Mr. Gillig, the manager of the Exchange, to honor this appeal of one whom he had never seen before that day, but I have since thought that regular buncoing is not so difficult after all. Determination wins.

My Chicago acquaintance was to make a call that night on the Rev. Dr. Strong, who had formerly occupied a Chicago pulpit and was then located in London. They were very close friends. In one way and another I impressed upon the former that he might find out a good deal there as to the Revised Version—a little loaf of suggestion that returned to me much sooner than I then anticipated.

He came to a closed carriage, alighted, handed me a parcel, and without a word departed

The following morning I went to Oxford, my purse plethoric with Banker Gillig's confident contribution of the previous day. Sight drafts or promissory notes were not likely to be honored in even that classic town in a transaction of this kind. My interview with the pressman of the University Press was interesting and conclusive. It was held in a "public," and was the most extraordinary of its kind. This man gave me a clear insight into the situation from a mechanical point of view. He was agreeable to any proposition, but could not deliver the goods. The conditions were these: There was a perfect system of policing the presses where the types were set and the impressions taken. Oxford and Cambridge did the work. Sections were set at each office, and alternate sections of the plates interchanged, so that neither press possessed consecutive "signatures." This work had gone forward by piecemeal, the sheets being turned into the bindery at London by a sworn employee, each package being under seal. No laborer, save stitcher and binder, saw the complete sets of sheets—that is, consecutive "signatures"; no one was permitted to leave the bindery or warehouse without being searched. "Of course," said the Oxford pressman, "I'd help you in a minute, not alone for what's in it, but because you have come so far, for they tell me Chicago's a braw big town." He offered to get me a set of the sheets then on his presses, but they would have availed me nothing; it was the complete book I was after.

In London that evening my Chicago friend casually told me that he had seen a copy of the Revised Version that day while I was, without his knowledge, of course, in Oxford. The announcement was received with incredulity—it was impossible! Whereupon he informed me that he had talked the matter over the night before with Mrs. Strong—the preacher being absent in Glasgow—and she had told him that a warm friend of theirs—the Rev. Dr. Newth, one of the revisers and the head of a boys' college in Finchley Road, St. John's Wood—had let her look at his copy a few evenings before. Thereupon the Chicagoan, to convince me that I was wrong as to inaccessibility to the volume, had taken it upon himself to visit Doctor Newth, with a letter from Mrs. Strong, and have a look at the book.

So it was a woman again. I convinced the Chicagoan that it was quite fortunate he had met Doctor Newth, as I had intended to call upon that gentleman, but, having no letter, was undecided what to do. I desired to talk with him on educational matters, and secure some introductions to educators elsewhere. This was easy, said the Chicagoan; he himself would take me up.

The next forenoon—my last day in London—we went to see Doctor Newth, in Finchley Road. The Doctor was in his library. We talked school, college and higher education until I fairly wished them in the revised place of torment, and finally branched into the topic of the Revised Version. This work, just then, was the Doctor's hobby. He was quite willing to follow the subject indefinitely. As my time was swiftly narrowing I preferred action to talk. During the conversation he took his reviser's copy from his library desk and placed it in my hands for examination. I glanced over it in a perfunctory manner, complimented the revisers on their work, and suggested that he let me take it to my hotel for more careful inspection. Doctor Newth was sorry, but he had an engagement for that evening in which the Testament was to figure; otherwise he would be happy to oblige—a little piece of politeness that rendered it unnecessary for him to enter into explanation as to the pledges that he had taken not to let it pass from his possession.

But I had finally got into touch with the book, and knew where it was kept. How could I get possession of it?

Shadowed by a Rival's Detective

My Chicago friend stuck close to me after our return to the city. For some reason he seemed to prefer my company more than at any other time during our stay in London. He probably had no idea that there was any feeling of covetousness as to the book in my heart, but he stayed by me until late that afternoon. I was due to leave on the eight o'clock train. The steamer having already left Liverpool. I had purposely remained over for the "Wild Irishman," to catch the steamer at Queenstown, thus giving me eight hours' extra time in London.

The waning hours of my stay were filled with hampering details and nervous apprehensions. Not only did my Chicago benefactor persist in making my departure pleasant, but the one man of all London whom I desired to avoid was thrown in my path—Mr. F. B. Wilkie, the resident correspondent of the Chicago Times. He had been advised of my mission through the treachery of a telegraph operator in New York, and had been on the watch for me ever since my arrival. More than this, Mr. Wilkie, as I subsequently learned, under directions of his home office, had had my movements observed by a world-famed establishment in Whitehall. Finesse had to be met with in kind, and my final escape from this obstructing friend was a matter of self-congratulation.

There were less than two hours left me, and it was a long way to Finchley Road from the city. I purchased an octavo

---

Editor's Note—This is the second of a series of articles on Famous Feats of Journalism. The first article in the series appeared in The Saturday Evening Post of February 19.

Digitized by Google

copy of the King James Version of the New Testament. It was bound very like the Revised edition in Doctor Newth's library. It was about six o'clock when I reached the college. The Doctor was at dinner. I was shown into the library by an obliging, unsuspecting maid, and was left there alone.

The Final Intervention of Pure Luck

The library was a deep room, broad and lofty. It was a place to linger in, so splendidly was it equipped with the tools of literature. But there was no time to waste there, no matter how much one might naturally like such surroundings, with a steamer train leaving in a few minutes and a pressing engagement on the other side of the Atlantic.

Good old Doctor Newth always kept his copy of the unpublished book in a row of reference volumes that lined the top of his desk.

It was unusual to usher strangers into the library, the great entrance hall being provided with comfortable settles for casual callers. But my previous visit had been so recent, and I was with the Doctor so long in his study, that the servant no doubt felt I was privileged to go there pending my announcement. Besides, she was not advised as to the deep interest felt in the United States regarding advance information of the labors of the Revision Committee. I question whether she had ever heard of that dignified and reverend body.

I was wondering what part of the college building held the dining-hall, when the next moment the door opened and Doctor Newth's wife entered—a white-haired, gentle-voiced, sweet-faced woman. She had come to apologize for the Doctor, to say he would step over from the dining-room in a moment, and she kept me company until he appeared. It was a demonstration of hospitality and good breeding that might have been dispensed with and naught laid up against English breeding for its breach of observance.

It was necessary to talk more education again to Doctor Newth when he came in, and after he had given me a letter to Mr. Bonamy Price, of Oxford, whither I told him I might go, I left in no pleasant frame of mind, and barely caught the train that landed me the next afternoon in Queenstown, where the steamer was waiting.

On May 16 New York was reached. In less than two hours after landing the Rev. Dr. Philip Schaff, under an excusably mistaken idea that he was dealing with Mr. Frowde, the publishing manager of the London Committee, had intrusted his precious copy of the Revised Version to a messenger boy to convey to the Fifth Avenue hotel where said "publisher," on an alleged trip to some remote part of the world, was supposed to be staying. Doctor Schaff was a member of the American Committee of Revision. The pretext for the request was ample enough to cause the good Doctor to comply with pleasure, but it occurred to him that he would like to see the person himself and give him a lecture on the unbusinesslike manner in which the London Committee had treated the Americans in failing to send over the number of copies that had been ordered and which the latter had faithfully promised to send out on the day of publication. Therefore Doctor Schaff sent a note instead, inviting the "publisher" to come and take tea with him, talk matters over and get the book himself. Disappointed in not receiving the expected visit, Doctor Schaff even went to the hotel that evening, and it required repeated assurances from the clerk before he could be convinced that absolutely nothing was known there of the person who had come so perilously near to securing his copy of the Revised Version.

During the voyage across, the International Committee had postponed the date of publication to May 21 on account of the failure to transmit the requisite number of copies for the publishers who handled the work in the United States—the Nelsons, of New York, and the Lippincotts, of Philadelphia, representing the Oxford and the Cambridge presses respectively. With this knowledge, in London, another trip to Doctor Newth would have been more satisfactory, as it would have been possible to have reached New York within time limitations.

Two days after reaching New York, one of the most prominent representatives of one of the greatest publishing houses in the United States, aware of the Schaff incident, sent me a note to meet him late that night in front of the Sinclair House in Broadway. He knew the receivers of the Testament in New York, and he knew every employee of their house. Furthermore, he had a thorough journalistic instinct, and he would not let a friend fail in any undertaking if he could prevent it.

He came in a closed carriage, alighted, handed me a parcel, and without a word departed.

The New Testament Sent by Wire

That night several of the books of the Revised Version of the New Testament were sent by wire to the Chicago Tribune. Thirty hours later I was in the home office in Chicago, arriving on Saturday noon, May 21. At ten o'clock two copies of the Testament were placed in the hands of the paper's compositors, and on Sunday morning the book was published verbatim, from title-page to finis, with the long list of readings preferred by the American Committee, and recorded as an Appendix—a feat, as the Tribune itself characterized it, that "has never been excelled among the many triumphs of modern journalism." It filled sixteen pages of the paper. In two days a quarter of a million copies of the publication were sold by the Tribune, an attest of the popular interest that was felt in the work. Not a copy of the Testament was received by Western booksellers until two days later.

How the midnight copies were secured that reached my hand in New York I never inquired. There are some things that one does not care to be too inquisitive about. My friend has frequently smiled since that night when he has read of the absurd explanations which have from time to time appeared concerning this quest, but he has never taken it upon himself to correct any of the wild stories.

The copies of the Testament came to the United States in sealed boxes, were placed in the Custom-House and held until the hour for delivery to the American dealers. Then they were opened in guarded cellars. It is enough to say that with one exception no one was allowed to take a copy from the premises until four o'clock in the morning of the twentieth, when deliveries to book dealers began under the severest pledge of holding until released the next day.

I might state that the direct work of publishing the Revised Version in England was in the hands of a committee of five appointed by the revisers. Of this committee Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Oxford press, was the controlling spirit. This committee signed a contract to permit no one outside the publishing establishment to see a copy of the book. The principal reason for this was, of course, that copyright interests were at stake in England. There being then no international copyright law the American Revision Committee had pledged themselves in writing to carry out the British agreement. It required, in England, over 3,000,000 copies to meet the first orders for the Testament, and in the United States 400,000.

A Night's Experience in the Times Office

After the Tribune's initiative in this scheme, the Chicago Times undertook to cover the ground, having, as stated, been notified of the dispatch of a Tribune man to London. A reporter in London secured a few of the readings from local revisers—matter that was common property, there being no objection to the publication of the same. These were cabled to the Times, but were valueless as illustrative of the work accomplished or as showing any possible doctrinal changes which it was thought might have been made in the book. In New York the Chicago Times secured a copy from a bookseller after the distribution began. It was the hope of the Times management that the whole book could be sent by telegraph in time to appear on Saturday morning. Against the protestations of Mr. H. W. Seymour, then a Times sub-editor and now general manager of the Chicago Chronicle, only three of the Gospels were taken entire, and then the attempt was made to whip the remainder of the books into shape by setting up the complete King James Version and inserting the changes made by the Revision Committee. Mr. Seymour, relating the night's experience in the Times office, says it was simply indescribable, and productive of more hard feeling in the office force than could ever be atoned for in a lifetime of pious observance of the precepts of the Holy Book. It became a hopeless task to make the revised alterations in the matter set, and the paper was published with the text in this inchoate condition, only a fractional part being really the book as prepared by the Revision Committee.

The enterprise was bold, but its fulfillment was weak and of no effect.

A quaint incident of my London visit developed just before the time for my hurried departure for home. During the afternoon of the last day I accidentally came across a letter of introduction to Mr. Gillig, of the American Exchange, given me by a New York friend on the morning of sailing. This note I had entirely forgotten, and I did not recall it even when approaching Mr. Gillig so earnestly for funds. I opened it, and read a very warm commendation and request to make my short stay in London pleasant for old acquaintance' sake.

This was very nice, but a postscript that my friend had added in full knowledge of my customary habit and as a turn of pleasantry, no doubt, on account of Mr. Gillig's perpetual and vexatious relations to stranded American tourists, capped the climax. It was briefly this:

"P. S.—He doesn't want any money."

I fancy that this little note, which I sent to Mr. Gillig, gave him a fuller sense of assurance as to the safety of his two hundred pounds sterling before he had received return on my sight draft.

The Salvage of the Santa Maria

By W. A. Fraser

A FEW thousand years ago the Atlantic battered a pocket into the rock coast of New Brunswick, and long after, when men found this arm of the sea, they called it the Bay of Fundy. Then they started a city, and named it St. John.

St. John was founded for the glorification of Nathan Weller, and to the end that he might become rich. He firmly believed this, and shaped his life accordingly. That was the only thing he did believe in; that and Old Man Weller. Ships and tugs and loading gear and the souls of men of the sea were all his.

He was as hard as a dry salt cod. When his sailors were drowned, that was their lookout; and the underwriters paid for the boats. When they came back into port with cargoes of much profit, it was all his, and to the glory of his extreme cleverness.

Much of this sort of thing makes a man like—like—Old Man Weller.

If Weller could have hired Satan, he would have had him, and kept him in his place, too; but Satan was not in the labor market, at least not his entire services, so Old Man Weller had to be content with Jim Lester.

When Weller sent Lester to Liverpool, Captain Bell, who was given to psychological research, said: "What the devil's up now? There's some quare work to be did over there." But wondering and finding out were two quite different things; and nobody knew except Weller and Lester, until as it is written at the end of this tale.

Lester bought the Santa Maria, a sailing ship of 600 tons register. She was an old hulk, but Lester had not gone to Liverpool to make mistakes. She was overhauled, and her name altered to Dumfries Castle. When she cleared from Liverpool the underwriters had been touched for every shilling they would risk on hulk and cargo.

Now Lester's correspondence to Old Man Weller anent the ship was circumspect to a degree. No suspicion of obliquity could be read in or between the lines; simply the new ship, Dumfries Castle, had cleared with a full cargo all duly insured. He even omitted to mention her original name.

It was Christmas morning in St. John when Old Weller said to Captain Bell:

"The tug Lion, that went down the bay after a wreck, has blowed a hole in her boiler. She's a crazy thing anyway—worse than a rickety old woman. She's lyin' down there rollin' about like a jellyfish, an' eatin' into the profits at the rate of twenty dollars a day."

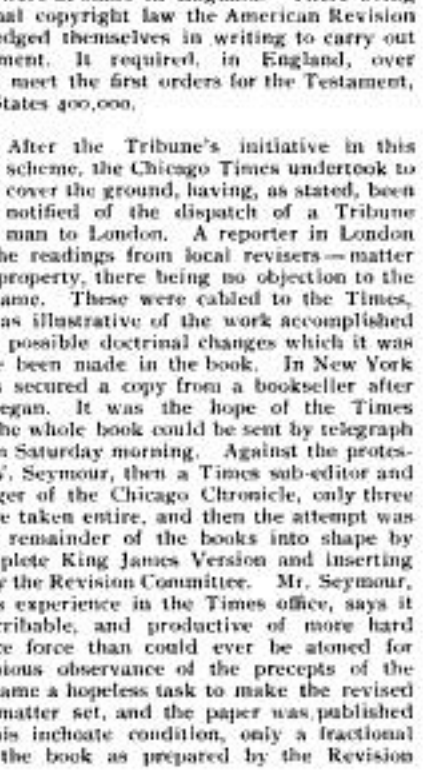
"That's bad, sir," said Captain Bell, thinking of the soft job the boys aboard had, but wishing to mollify the rapacious owner. "She ought to have a new boiler in her."

"Boiler be hanged!" cursed the old man; "you're all happy schemin' to pile up expenses on your owners. Get you the Jane Ann out, an' away down an' bring the rotten tub in. I'll discharge every mother's son of the lazy crew."

Captain Bell cast a net for his men and, getting up steam on the tug, started down the bay. Just as he was clearing from the wharf Pilot Carey asked for a free passage down in hope that he might pick up a ship needing his services. "Of coorse," assented Bell. "Get aboard."

About fifteen miles out he met the Lion coming along under full steam with her ship in tow. By some means they had patched up her boiler, and were making for port. The Jane Ann stopped her engines, reversed, and slowly drifted as the Lion passed close.

"Where are you bound?" sang out Bailey from the Lion.



"Came down after you," answered Bell. "The ould man heard you'd broke down, an' he's pinin' away over the loss. D'ye want help?"

"No."

"Well, I'll away down the bay then to the south'ard, an' look for a bite," answered Bell. "Tell the ould man."

The bell tinkled full steam ahead, and the Jane Ann swung her nose seaward on a prospecting tour for ships needing a tow up. Being under steam and that far out, the Captain reasoned that it would be good management to try to pick up something to pay expenses.

Two hours steady steaming, when suddenly the Captain descried something on his starboard bow looking very much like a ship on the rocks. "I believe that's a wreck," he said to the pilot, who was at his elbow.

The latter took the glass from the Captain's hand, looked long and earnestly, and answered: "Right you are. It's a ship high and dry."

The wheel was put over a bit; the engine chucked and thumped in its worn bearings, and the Jane Ann steadily crawled close to the thing they had seen.

"She's not on the rocks at all," remarked the Captain, eyeing her critically; "she's just ridin' to the two anchors as quiet as a duck."

"There's not a soul on her decks," exclaimed the pilot, much wonder in his voice.

"Blow the whistle, Billy," cried the Captain to one of the tug hands; "perhaps they're eatin' their Christmas dinner."

The shrill whistle of the tug called to the great ship; but there was no answer—no sign of life.

"Gad! it's like a ghost ship," said Bell with a touch of awe in his voice. "Give her another toot, Billy."

Digitized by Google

Again the steam screamed and struggled through the brass dome of the whistle, but still there was no response.

"She's abandoned," remarked the Captain.

"She's like a graveyard," echoed the pilot.

"I believe it's a ha'nted ship, sir," hazarded Billy.

"Work the Jane Ann alongside," commanded Bell, "an' we'll soon see."

When they were close enough Billy threw a line across the bow of the ship. Bell watched this performance critically.

"She's solid," he ejaculated with a sigh of relief. "I half expected to see the line go clean through her an' down into the water. She's like a spirit ship, she's that quiet. Up you go, Billy, an' make fast," he ordered.

As the man clambered over the rail and snubbed the line, Pilot Carey followed eagerly, and before the Captain well realized what his mission was, this wide-awake mariner was screeching, "I claim salvage on this ship!"

This galvanized Bell into action and, ranging himself alongside of the man who had sought to forestall him, he called out: "I'm with you, my smart buck; I claim salvage for myself, an' the men, an' the tug."

It was an extraordinary spectacle: the great ship riding quietly at anchor, with six inches of snow all over her deck, and her stern almost brushing against the rocks that arose out of the sea not half a cable-length away.

They were all wrangling as to who was entitled to salvage—who was first and who was last—when the engineer, Jack O'Brien, made a discovery. "None of youse'll get salvage, I'm thinkin'," he said; "here's a cat track in the snow; an' while there's life on the ship there's no salvage, for she's not abandoned, accordin' to the coorts."

"That's right," echoed the pilot; "Billy's right. If there's a parrot, or a cat, or even a pig on the ship, we're done for. But in the name o' Heaven, where's all the crew gone—there's nothing wrong with the ship?"

"Perhaps they're in the cabin," ventured Billy; "anyway, the cat'll be there."

"Let's go down an' see," said Bell to the pilot. The latter didn't relish the invitation overmuch; the cabin might be full of dead men, or ghosts, or almost anything. All the weird sea tales he had ever heard about murdered ship's crews came thronging in upon his excited imagination; but still he couldn't well remain behind. The Captain might steal a march on him over the salvage question.

"Lead on," he said valiantly to Bell; "we must investigate this."

His legs felt hopelessly inadequate as he followed the Captain cautiously down the companion-way. Billy and Jack O'Brien were at his elbow. The cabin, dimly lighted, was as silent as a tomb; nothing moved, no one spoke; no challenging voice demanded what they wanted; if a voice had suddenly broken the eerie stillness it is certain they would have fled up the stairs. The Captain surreptitiously pinched his leg to make sure it was not all a dream.

"Look, man! what's that?" exclaimed the pilot in a voice of intense fright.

"What's what?" asked the Captain.

"There!" and Carey pointed with outstretched finger to the farther end of the table. A pair of great yellow, baleful eyes was glaring at them from the Captain's chair. They stood for an instant, constrictive little gripings clutching at the skin over their backbones, when suddenly the thing "meowed."

"It's the blasted cat!" ejaculated Billy in a tone of disgust.

"Heave him overboord," said Bell to the pilot, "if you hope to get salvage."

"I can't," answered Carey; "do it yourself."

Just then Jack O'Brien made a rush for the cat. There was a demoniac scramble; the table went over with a crash; chairs were banged about; the pilot was upset by something or somebody; unearthly screams rang through the cabin, and the Captain swore afterward that he smelt brimstone. At any rate, in eight seconds Bell found himself standing in the snow on the deck, and the pilot half over the rail on his way to the tug.

"Come back—where are you going?" the Captain called.

"It's a devil-ship," gasped Carey, turning a face the color of soapstoned canvas toward his friend.

O'Brien was standing on the deck laughing.

"Where's the cat?" asked the commander.

"The divil flew away wid her, I think," answered O'Brien, "for she's not on the ship now."

"That settles it then," asserted his officer; "I claim salvage for all hands."

Haunted or not haunted, he reasoned that the ship was solid enough; and visions of great prize money passed through his mind.

Again they ventured down into the cabin and searched diligently, but there was not a soul on the ship.

"What's the name of her?" asked the Captain, a thought striking him suddenly.

"The Santa Maria," answered the pilot, who had been rummaging in a cabin. "Here it is marked on a lifebuoy."

"Well," said Bell cheerfully, "it's a big haul, b'ys; an' now we've got to get her out of here before anybody appears or a blow comes up."

But this latter proposition presented an unexpectedly serious problem. They were too short-handed to man the ship and get her anchors up. But the commander was equal to the new emergency. "Billy," he said, "you an' the pilot stay here an' hold the ship, an' we'll away down to Irishtown with the tug for a dozen big, lusty Irishmen to help us out."

It was ten miles to Irishtown, and when the tug returned with twelve rough fishermen aboard, ready for anything, her Captain got a surprise. As the Jane Ann rolled clumsily around the rock headland, beyond which was the little cove wherein rested the prize-ship, he saw something which brought him to the rail with a proper mariner's adjective on his lips.

On board the ship a battle was being waged. Five men were industriously striving to deposit Billy and the pilot in the sea. The two were fighting valiantly, but the tug pulled alongside just in the nick of time.

As she rubbed saucily against the wooden sides of the Santa Maria, a big, red-faced man stepped to the rail and said: "Sheer off! What the devil do you want here?"

"Who the thunder are you?" roared back the commander of the tug.

"I'm the Captain," snorted the red-faced man; "and I forbid ye to come aboard."

"Captain nothing!" retorted Bell. "The Captain an' crew of this ship is all drowned."

Drawn by H. C. Edmiston

"IF THEY DON'T AGREE, I'LL FIGHT ON THE OTHER SIDE, AN' WE'LL SEE WHO COMES OUT ON TOP"

"Not much! I'm the Captain, an' this is the crew," asserted the other.

"A Captain an' his crew don't desert their ship," declared Bell logically. "I tell you they are all dead; an' if they're not they soon will be. Up, boys!" he exclaimed to his recruits, "an' if anybody opens his mouth, throw him overboard."

His men swarmed over the rail and joined Billy and the pilot. The others massed back on the poop of the ship, standing sullenly, waiting for commands from their leader.

"Where did these tramps come from, Robinson?" asked Captain Bell.

"From the shore, sir," Billy answered.

"Yes," broke in the red-faced man; "we dragged our anchors in a blow last night, an' thought the ship was goin' to pieces. We couldn't save her by sticking to her, so we got ashore in a boat."

"That's all in me eye, Biddy Martin," answered Captain Bell derisively; "we salvaged this ship when she was abandoned, an' the Captain an' crew all drowned. If you're to stand up an' argue the matter there, we'll just have to make it sure, that's all."

"What do you propose doin' with the ship?" asked the red-faced man, beginning to weaken in the face of superior numbers.

"We'll tow her in to St. John, an' if you behave yourselves we'll give you a lift that far, but we're in charge, mind you—in possession—an' we'll just turn the key on your riff-raff in the fo'c's'le to keep you quiet like, an' to show that the ship's ours!"

A hawser was run out, the wheezing Jane Ann put her shoulders lazily to the trace, and, as the big ship strained away from the rocks, the anchors were weighed, and the procession started for St. John.

Just where that particular degree of latitude bisected its angle of longitude was the happiest group of mortals on the face of the waters. All except the red-faced man and his companions. The pilot was in charge of the Santa Maria. Pompously he strode up and down the quarter-deck, turning over in his mind the value of the ship and cargo, and how much of it would come to him because of the salvage.

Captain Bell eyed the great wooden prize proudly as she surged along in the wake of the black, grimy Jane Ann. "Lord knows what it will lead to," he mused. "Ould Man Weller'll be that pleased he'll put me in one of his big ships, I do believe. It was the luckiest thing I ever did in me life, goin' down the bay this mornin'. This is a Christmas box with a rush."

Then he scowled ferociously. The big moon-face of the man who claimed to be Captain leered at him over the rail of the ship. "I'll lock that gossoon in a cabin when we get into port," he said. "I don't like the look of him."

It was black night when they got into St. John.

The big anchor of the Santa Maria was dropped, the heavy link cable scuttled noisily through her bow, and she swung majestically, head on, to the rising tide; the tug stole sleepily into her berth beside the dripping, evil-smelling wharf, and her petulant, worn engine sighed wearily as the last wet puff of steam was let off through the pet-cocks.

The pilot and the men remained aboard of the salvaged ship. Captain Bell went home to the wife to tell her the good news. Neither of them slept a wink. Over and over the excited Captain told the tale of how something had whispered to him to go on down the bay after meeting the old Lion.

"It was Santa Claus," ventured the wife; "or, perhaps, Providence."

"It must have been Santa Claus then," retorted the husband, "for Providence doesn't bother much with sea-dogs. Look at the hungry orphans all over the town, an' the fathers that should be feedin' them linin' the stomach of some shark. We'll buy a little craft of our own out of our share," he assured the wife, "an' make money be the barrel, just like the ould man does."

In the morning Bell was down at the office, waiting for his employer. "I'll be the first to tell him the good news," he thought.

"Old jelly-fish'll soon be down," said a red-headed, roustabout clerk, whose business it was to attend to everything, from codfish to insurance. "He'll be down early this morning, for fear Christmas has upset some of us a bit."

"Tut, tut!" said the Captain, "you shouldn't call the ould man 'jelly-fish'; that's mutiny; he's not a bad sort."

The red-headed man was pouring a scuttle of coal in the stove. He looked in blank, utter amazement at his companion, and the coal, diverted from the hole, pattered over the floor. That anybody should defend old Weller's character—that one of his employees should speak well of him—was a revelation.

"What's come over you?" he gasped. "Has the old man given you a ship?"

"Never mind, never mind," answered Bell soothingly.

At that moment a heavy step sounded, the latch lifted with a vicious rasp, and burly Old Man Weller stepped into the office. His cold, fishy eyes searched the room for signs of something leading up to business.

"Good mornin', sir," cheerily called out the Captain; "compliments of the season."

"Huh!" grunted Weller. "What did you do yesterday after you passed the Lion?—burnt up coal, I suppose."

"We had great luck, sir," exclaimed the Captain blithely.

"Got back without being towed, eh?" sneered the other.

"We salvaged a big ship."

"You what?"

"Salvaged a ship," repeated the Captain, "and towed her into port last night. The b'ys are aboord of her now."

The big man's face brightened until it became almost congenial. It was little things of this sort that touched his heart.

Nothing softened him so much as the making of a few thousand dollars; and it had been gained in a single day.

He became almost human.

"I'm proud of you, Captain," he said, holding out his hand.

"Faith, I'm proud of meself!" ejaculated Bell ingenuously.

"What's her name?" asked Weller.

"The Santa Maria."

"She's a Spaniard, with that name. There may be Spanish gold in her."

"God knows!" replied the Captain; "she's full of something. I'm sure it's a valuable cargo."

"How is the salvage fixed?" queried Weller. "Were you first aboard, and did you claim it in the name of the tug an' her owner? Is she salvaged in my name?"

The Captain explained the thing fully.

"And who's this pilot you're crackin' about?" the owner asked.

Bell explained.

"Curse his meddlin' hide!" exclaimed Weller. "Will he be claimin' a bit of the salvage, too?"

"That he will," answered the Captain. "I felt like throwin' him overboord."

"It would have been a good riddance," snapped the great man, pacing impatiently up and down the office. "Where's the ship now?"

"Ridin' at anchor as sweet as a babe, off Nelson's dock."

Digitized by Google

"Come along, an' let's have a look at her. We can have a tot of something to warm us up on the way down," said Weller.

"My Aunt!" muttered the clerk, as the two disappeared through the door; "the old jelly-fish is getting generous."

From Nelson's dock they got a good view of the Santa Maria. It gladdened the avaricious heart of the rich man; it also set him thinking. If the cargo were as good as the hulk, the salvage would be something terrific. It would be cruel to pay out so much good prize money to a worthless lot of fellows who would drink it up and be unfit for work in the meantime.

His big brain hammered away at this point until it developed a plan.

"Huh!" he said thoughtfully; "we'll never get a dollar of salvage on yon ship. The owners will fight it in court till we're all in our graves. I know what that's like."

Bell's face fell. Courts are the terror of all mariners. There was some dependence to be placed in a raging storm, one could tell pretty near what it was going to do; but a law court, with solemn judges and fierce, questioning lawyers—that was terrible in its uncertainty!

Twice the Captain had been in the courts, each time for battering mutinous sailors over the head with a belaying-pin; and each time he had been roasted and toasted by a shrill-voiced attorney until he had wished to Heaven that he had been at the other end of the belaying-pin himself. He fairly envied the men with the mashed heads; their punishment had been light compared with the tortures of the court inquisition. In the end he had been fined; also assured by the Judge that he had just missed going to jail.

"The courts are the very devil," continued the owner.

"They're that, sir!" fervently echoed the Captain. "I'd rather be in a cyclone in the Jane Ann, an' that's had enough."

"The Jane Ann's a good sea-boat," exclaimed Weller angrily.

Bell said nothing, and the big man continued in a softer voice: "Come up to the office till we talk this thing over."

On the way he invited the Captain into the Mariner's Rest again, and treated him to two diplomatic toddies. At the office he unburdened his mind.

"It'll be a big fight over that salvage. I don't think it'll be good enough to risk. Have you an' the boys money to pay for the litigation?"

"Money fer law!" exclaimed the Captain. "Money with the b'ys fer law! Sure they're all overdrawn in the slop-chest."

"An' you'll expect me to pay the big court fees, eh? I'll not do it—not a blasted penny!"

The Captain's heart was in his boots. He knew the old man would lose a hundred dollars rather than see one of them make fifty, he was that selfish.

"But, sir," said Bell despondently, "I think the coorts would give it to us."

"When you are in your graves," snapped the big man; "an' then if the owners said they'd had enough. They'll never say that, though. I know them. I'll tell you what I'll do, Bell"—the red-headed clerk pricked up his ears as he stood beside his desk, listening to the inquisition. "You've always been a faithful servant to me—a good man—an' I never go back on a faithful servant."

The clerk smiled sardonically as he bent his head close down over the men's time sheets, where he had been busy cutting from their pay the slop-chest account.

"I'll help you out in this matter if you'll deal fair. If you'll sign off your own claim, an' get the men to sign off, I'll give every one of them twenty pounds, an' you fifty for your trouble."

"You'll never get them to agree to that, sir," said Bell decisively; "they're that built up over it."

"Then they'll not get the price of a red herring out of it," exclaimed Weller angrily. "I'll discharge every mother's son of you for disobeyin' orders in goin' down the bay."

He filled a black-bottomed clay pipe and sat sullenly sucking the rank smoke through its strong stem. Bell knew that mood; it meant unreasoning obstinacy. Right or wrong didn't matter; it was the power of money and influence behind a selfish, grasping nature.

Men said that Weller was entirely bloodless—that he considered his fellows simply as tools to be used in building up his edifice of wealth. They were absolutely right.

"I couldn't go to them with that offer, sir," said the Captain, breaking the ominous silence. "They'd never take it."

"I should think not," muttered the clerk to himself, dabbing his pen viciously in the ink. "The old shark!"

Weller didn't answer at once, but sat with his eyes fixed on the ceiling, as though the whole matter were one of complete indifference to him.

"Where are the men you said boarded the ship an' claimed to be the crew? I ought to hear their story before I pay out even twenty pounds apiece. I might lose it all."

This was a veiled threat; Bell knew that.

"I don't know," he said. "I suppose they're somewhere about." He knew right enough, but he had no intention of playing the old man's game if he could help it.

"Never mind," exclaimed Weller magnanimously; "I don't want to be hard."

"Of course not, of course not!" muttered the clerk; "you're soft as granite."

"I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll make it fifty pounds apiece, an' give you a hundred for yourself. Go an' see the boys, an' if they'll sign off all claims for that I'll pay them cash out of hand an' take my chances, win or lose, in the courts with the owners. If they don't agree, I'll fight on the other side, an' we'll see who comes out on top."

He rose, knocked the ashes out of his pipe with sharp, vicious taps on the top of the stove, buttoned up his pea-jacket, and, with his square jaw set like a capstan, put his hand on the latch and, as he opened the door, said: "I'm going home to dinner; I'll be back in an hour. If the boys are willing to take the good offer I've made, have them here, an' we'll settle the thing in five minutes. If they're not willing, tell them to clear out of the ship, or I'll send the police aboard to remove them."

His burly figure rolled out of the door and, as it slammed to, the clerk put his pen behind his ear, came around the rough pine desk and, standing opposite the Captain, said mockingly, "The old man's not a bad sort."

"He's as hard as a second-hand clothes-dealer," muttered Bell, staring moodily into the fire. "The b'ys'll not take it."

"Then they'll take nothing," exclaimed Red Head. "It's fair robbery, but they can't fight against that sort of thing. It's your choice between the devil and the deep sea. He'll hunt up that scab crew and break every one of you. I know him. He's a beastly bad sort, that's what he is."

"You think I'd better advise the boys to take the fifty pounds?"

"I think nothing—but it's all they'll ever get; and they'll have to look sharp that he doesn't skin them out of that."

"I believe you're right, Bankes," said the Captain. "I'll go off an' tell them to take it."

"Wait a bit—try for more. Agree to that, with another fifty all around and a hundred for yourself if the old man secures the salvage. Have it hard and fast in writing. Get a lawyer to draw it up."

"I'll have to hurry," exclaimed Bell, "to be back on time."

In an hour the Captain and the crew of the Jane Ann were back in the office, and, sharp on time, the owner brusqued in.

"Good day to you, boys," he said, friendly enough.

"Good day, sir!" they responded, cap in hand. "You had rare fishin' yesterday," he continued with forced geniality.

"Yes, sir."

"Well?" he asked, looking interrogatively at Captain Bell.

The Captain coughed to clear his throat, pulled the lining in and out of his cap nervously, and stammered: "We've been talkin' it over, sir."

"That's right," snapped Weller encouragingly.

"We've been talking it over, an' the boys think it's not enough, sir."

"What are they doing here, then?"

"Well, we thought, sir, that we'd like to make an offer that appeared fair, not wantin' to be hard like on our side."

The clerk nodded encouragingly at the speaker, who was watching him out of the corner of his eye.

"Didn't I tell you—never mind; spit it out! Let's have it! You have queer ideas of what's fair, I've no doubt."

"Well, sir, the boys'll take fifty pounds apiece, as you offered, an' I'll take a hundred; an' if you get the salvage, they're to have another fifty, an' I'm to have another hundred."

There was silence for a minute, like the lull before a storm.

Weller scowled viciously at the men, who shifted uneasily. All at once he made a discovery.

"Where's the pilot—I don't see him?"

"He wouldn't agree to it, sir. He says he'll have the salvage or nothing, so we left him behind."

"Where is he?"

"On the ship."

"I'll fix him!" said the big man fiercely; "an' I'll just show him what he's missed. Come here, Bankes!" he commanded the clerk. "Draw up an agreement with these men an' the Captain in accordance with the bargain you've just heard. I'll show Mr. Pilot—he'll not get a blasted penny."

"Thank you, sir," said the Captain. "Thank you, sir," chimed the others, individually and in chorus.

"An' make out checks to pay the amounts," Weller added.

In an hour it was all settled.

"I've done a great stroke of business this day," muttered the ship king to himself when the men had gone. "I've only one to fight; I'll break him."

"Get me a boat," he ordered the clerk; "an' come away aboard ship till I see what she's like, an' settle this pilot."

DRAWN BY H. C. EDWARDS

—"HERE'S A CAT TRACK IN THE SNOW"

As Weller clambered like a great bear over the rail of the ship, he saw a big red-faced man walking impatiently up and down the deck.

"Who are you, my good fellow?" he asked.

"I'm the Captain of the ship, Dumfries Castle," the man answered, touching his cap.

"The Dumfries Castle? That's my ship. Where is she—gone to the bottom?"

"No, sir, this is the Dumfries Castle."

Weller looked at the red-faced man furiously. He wasn't drunk; he must be mad.

"This is the Santa Maria," he exclaimed angrily.

"Yes, sir, she was the Santa Maria before we went to Liverpool; but she changed owners there, and they named her the Dumfries Castle."

A sense of desolation came over the hard, grasping ship owner—and no wonder—for he realized that the Santa Maria was his own ship, salvaged by his own men. And not two hours since he had paid them heavily for thwarting the very scheme he had tried to carry through with the help of his hired villain in Liverpool.

He understood it all now. The Santa Maria was to have been battered on those rocks by the first storm. His meddling crew had spoiled that.

Also the red-faced Captain knew. He had had his instructions from the agent in Liverpool, and this was the owner who was to have paid him much good money for something.

He looked in the eyes of the ship king and Weller looked back into his—and they both knew.

The money Weller had just paid out was gone hopelessly; the insurance would not come his way; and there was the pilot to settle with. He was mad clean through. He would fight the pilot anyway; and he did.

The pilot carried the case into court. The crew of the tug were called as witnesses.

It was going against Old Weller. There was no doubt that they had salvaged the ship, whoever owned it.

Billy Robinson was in the witness-box.

Suddenly the old man's lawyer, a vicious, ferret-faced little man, turning fiercely on the witness, said: "Now, Mr. Robinson, you're not telling the truth; there was a live cat on the ship and you threw her overboard?"

Thrown off his guard by this sudden accusation, Billy answered angrily: "That's a lie! Jack O'Brien threw her over the side."

A roar of laughter followed this break, but the admission destroyed the pilot's claim.

There was no salvage on the Santa Maria.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA
421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
Five Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

Taking Back Our Presents

IT IS a curious and suggestive fact that the people and papers that most lightly brushed aside Dewey's pretensions to the Presidency were among those most anxious to hand it to him in a suitably inscribed loving-cup during the ecstatic week which followed his return from Manila. Just why his cause, to which his bare "Yes," then, would have rallied an overwhelming host, should go unchampioned six months later does not appear at first glance. Perhaps the Admiral has changed—certainly he has changed his mind—and to this may be attributed the apathy of the country when it learned in April that he had yielded to the insistence of September. Perhaps, the Cleveland precedent to the contrary, matrimony is not always a help to the Presidency. Perhaps, after all, it is the people who have changed most, and not Dewey. For, though Republics are not ungrateful, their citizens, and especially their newspapers, are inclined at times to "slop over." They are too grateful all at once and altogether. They crowd into a week of gush, of fulsome praise and adulation the tribute that, properly diluted and spread out, should last their hero's lifetime. They jump to the conclusion that the highest office in the land is the only suitable reward for splendid service on the sea, without having decided to their final satisfaction that the qualities which scattered Spaniards and made their possessor preeminently the executive for a fleet are supplemented by that special equipment necessary for the executive of a nation.

We take a man, modest, straightforward and simple in manner and speech, and parade him beneath arches erected to his honor while a thousand bands din his glory in his ears; we toast him at civic breakfasts, glorify him at municipal luncheons and deify him at state dinners. We hang medals on his chest and jeweled swords by his side, and there are more sonorous speeches and engrossed resolutions. We set him up among the clouds, then go about our business, and wonder six months later, when he hits the ground, that he, too, has not forgotten our protestations.

Nor are heroes the only folk whom Americans rush to death. We are up and away after the latest author, the newest artist, the coming orator. We have our "rages" in books—our Chimmie Faddens, our Trilbys, our this, that and the other—and the wave that lifts them to the crest of popular favor slumps back so suddenly that the fiftieth or sixtieth edition is left stranded on the highest shelf of the publisher. Only a few days ago a once popular illustrator sailed for Europe, remarking to a reporter, who had been sent to the steamer to interview some one else, that the editors who had pleaded with him for a picture a few years before, politely showed him the door when he asked them for work now; he was going back to a country where a reputation once made was capital and art did not fluctuate like stocks.

With the best intentions in the world, we lack some sense of proportion in these things which, as we make history and literature, we shall gain. In our wish to honor courage and genius, we take a week off from business and have a national debauch of hero-worship. And the reaction is not always pleasant for the hero. As for Dewey, nothing can, in the long run, affect his place in the heart and history of the country. We have had a touch of Dewey indigestion. When we recover from that we may even change our minds again and proffer him the Presidency once more.

Some men are born politicians, some achieve politics, and some have politics thrust upon them after marriage.

The Inconsistencies of Genius

"WITH consistency," says Emerson, "a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall."

A great many little souls seem to hold the same view of their relation to what O'Connell called "that rascally virtue." Both great and little feel like Portia when she says: "I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow mine own teaching."

The world has known few better moral or political teachers than Edmund Burke. When the painter Barry was wasting his time and energy at Rome in furious quarrels with artists and dilettanti about pictures and picture-dealing, Burke wrote wisely and kindly to him that "the arms by which the ill-dispositions of mankind are to be combated . . . are moderation, gentleness, a little indulgence of others and a great deal of distrust of ourselves. . . Nothing can be so unworthy of a well-composed soul as to pass away life in bickerings—in snarling and scuffling with every one about us."

So much for Burke as a preacher; now for his practice. When the Revolution raged in France, he was so embittered against it that he lost, at times, all his kindly feeling and self-control. Riding one day in the carriage of a gentleman who had kindly offered to take him to his lodgings in London, he insisted on leaving it instantly when the owner had dropped a few words implying sympathy with the Revolutionists. Quarreling with Fox for the same reason, Burke would not grant him an interview, but positively refused to see him, when, nobly forgetting their differences, Fox went down to see his old friend as he lay ill at Beaconsfield.

Doctor Johnson was one of the sagest of moralists and wrote admirable essays on politeness and courtesy, yet in a heated controversy he never hesitated to interrupt his opponent with, "You lie, sir!" "You are a vile Whig, sir!" and other such insults. Defining "pension" in his dictionary as "pay given to a State hireling for treason to his country," he did not hesitate to accept from George the Third a pension for himself.

Burns knew and sang that "prudent, cautious self-control is Wisdom's root;" but he could not resist the temptation to drink to excess, or to let fly a harsh and witty sarcasm at another's expense, although every joke made him half a score of enemies.

Some years ago a lady of our acquaintance was asked during a conversation with a celebrated New York preacher why she had withdrawn from a certain church and united with another. When she replied that some of its members had manifested such a factious spirit that she could no longer associate with them in church relationship, he said: "But, madam, what will you do with them in the next world?"

—WILLIAM MATHEWS.

It is better to think all you say than to say all you think.

The Common-Sense Making of History

IT IS hard for us to realize that we are making history. History-making seems such a stately, dignified process, conducted by men in powdered wigs, men who never lost their heads or their tempers, who called each other "Honored Sir," and who, instead of shouting, "That's false!" calmly but firmly remarked, "I have the honor to disagree with my learned brother." And then, history-making has always been so utterly lacking in uncertainty. The men who opposed progress—for, of course, there have been a few, such as Pontius Pilate and George the Third—have been so plainly in the wrong and so certainly in the way of Destiny that they could not have caused much worry.

True, of course, Washington had his defeat on Long Island and his winter at Valley Forge; but what were a few lost battles to a man whom Destiny had marked? Later, there was some little dispute when it came to framing a system of government for the new-born nation. Some men thought the States should have greater power, while others were sure they should give up more to the general government. Then there were conflicts between the large and small States over representation in Congress and the Electoral College, but, in the light of experience, we feel sure the debate could have been little more than mere form.

How different seem the conditions that confront us now! We see ourselves with new empires on our hands. With no experience to guide us, we must provide for the government of these empires. Part of our statesmen are sure they have laid out the right course. Another part is convinced of the opposite. The rest are sure we must discard those empires altogether or suffer some terrible national calamity. All this time the factions are hurling at each other such terms as "demagogue" and "jingo," "rascal" and "knave." It all looks like confusion—so different from our idea of the stately processes of our ancestors! We feel that the art of making history and adjusting the affairs of empire has been lost; we feel that some fearful blunder impends.

When we reach this frame of mind it is time for us to look at the acts of our older history-makers more carefully. Perhaps we can best do this by putting ourselves in their places. By doing so we shall be brought to realize that opposition meant to the promoters of the Declaration of Independence just what it means to us; that uncertainty to Washington meant the same, in a magnified degree, as uncertainty to an American General in the Philippines, and that the makers of our Constitution, sure that the failure of their plans meant ruin, laid aside their powdered wigs and fought with canes and dueling pistols. We shall find them assembling in angry mass-meetings to protest against principles that have since become fundamental in our government; we shall find some of them dying unhappy in the belief that all hope of a successful government had been destroyed in the defeat of their particular measures.

Destiny does not tell men when she places her mark on them. Perhaps she has marked us. Who can tell?

—LEONIDAS HUBBARD, JR.

Woman may be a coquette, but she is seldom a politician.

Boycotting the Trust-Makers

IT WAS freely predicted by every one that the startling disclosures of the suit between Mr. Henry Clay Frick and Mr. Andrew Carnegie regarding the vast profits and increase of wealth in their steel works at Pittsburg would have a powerful bearing upon the movement against trusts. The idea of one man having an income of $24,867,000 in one year, as Mr. Carnegie had last year, is almost paralyzing, and even the most conservative people declare that such an inequitable distribution of profits cannot long go on without disturbances to the social and political system. We call these men the money kings of the country and ascribe to them all the royalty of cash.

Naturally, the poor resent the conditions that make such profits possible, but the trouble is that if we who are not rich vent ourselves against these men we are apt to encounter some very interesting facts. Andrew Carnegie was a son of a weaver, and he got his work in Pittsburg as a bobbin boy in a linen factory at $1.20 a week. Mr. Frick, his rival, who has now become again his ally through the compromise arranged by the lawyers, was the son of a Pennsylvania farmer, and he got his education in the little red schoolhouse, and began his business career as a clerk in a dry-goods store. Mr. Charles M. Schwab, the President of the Carnegie Steel Company, which pays such enormous profits to Messrs. Carnegie, Frick and others, was the driver of a mail wagon and a grocery clerk. His salary is now $50,000 a year and he has an important interest in the company. The next largest stockholder is Mr. Phipps, whose father was a shoemaker. So it seems to be with a great many of the other trusts and corporations. It is the poor boys who have done big things, and, like ordinary people, the more they get the more they want, and, with some exceptions, the more they try to hold on to it.

In one of his speeches out West, President Hadley, of Yale, suggested that the social pressure might be brought against the people who got their incomes from trusts. Some of the reporters said that he suggested ostracism, but this word did not appear in his remarks. The idea is there, however, and it might seem to be a good one, for there is nothing more powerful than the boycott of society; but the inevitable difficulty is that even were such a thing tried it would be found that most of the alleged boycotters would be entertaining secret envies for the very persons whom they were trying to condemn.

These, of course, are mere side lights upon a great question, but they enter powerfully into the final solution.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

The corporation that pays big dividends and small salaries generally has to increase the salaries to keep up the dividends.

The American Sweetheart

THE artists in types—the story writers, the illustrators and the painters—have applied themselves with commendable perseverance and ingenuity to the task of delineating "The American Girl." It is passing strange, however, that they have failed to hit upon a type equally and as finely representative of an element of individuality distinctly American as the "little red schoolhouse," and as universal. This personage is the mistress of the district school. She is the American sweetheart.

How many thousands of American boys have had the first stirrings of sentiment awakened by the charms of "the new teacher," and paid her their earliest adorations? So universal has been her court, so broad her sway, that it is scarcely too sweeping an assertion to say that her subjects have included almost every country-reared man since the old-time "master," with his bundle of birchen rods, betook himself to more masculine pursuits and left the rostrum of the district school to the feminine invader. That the recipient of these bashful devotions has generally been many years the senior of her small lovers has never been known to check their ardor.

Years are but trifles unconsciously brushed aside by the boy whose first ideal of womanly loveliness is embodied in the girlish creature from the neighboring town or village who has come to establish her throne on the platform of the country school. Not even the taunt of "teacher's pet" is sufficient to deter him from heaping her desk with the first wild violets of the season, the odorous plumes of lilacs, and the rosy first fruits of the old home orchard. With awkward ardor he waits upon her, smiles, and receives with bashful joy words of approval and sympathetic caresses. Each change of her apparel is noted with jealous eyes. When, with the coming of spring, she appears in the modest splendor of a starched percale, he sees her clothed in new charms.

She makes subtle appeal to all his finer instincts and touches into quick response the secret springs of sentiment that have been shut away from the hands of mother, sister and playmate, and masked by the calloused countenance of boyhood. There is not a grace or a virtue for which the mistress of the district school does not stand in the thought of the boy whose heart she has conquered. To him, and to the rural community, she is the torch-bearer of civilization, the prophetess of learning.

—FORREST CRISSEY.

Digitized by Google

At the English Capital

FEW Americans, in all probability, have ever heard of Mr. Joseph Cowen, at one time a member of Parliament for that Newcastle to which they do not carry coals, and who has just died. Yet Mr. Cowen once "did" America as a tourist, and what is more, he wrote a series of articles about his experiences in the United States, and still more wonderful, the series ultimately blossomed into a book. But in the book there was one omission, which omission is the subject of this paragraph.

The Perils of a Lack of Humor

MR. COWEN edited, owned, and otherwise possessed a newspaper which enjoyed an immense circulation in the North of England; in fact, it was, and to-day is, one of the most generally read papers in populous Durham and Northumberland, and every miner in that district of underground industry swears by the Newcastle Chronicle. Nevertheless, it is gravely to be doubted whether all the miners' picks driven home by the united power of Lord Armstrong's steam hammers could have driven a joke into the head of Mr. Cowen. To be sure, one of the articles in the series was devoted to American newspapers. On the whole, Mr. Cowen thought them dangerous to the country's well-being, and, as a rule, scandalous productions. Unfortunately the Member of Parliament gave an illustration of the sort of writings he considered objectionable.

He said that in passing through Arizona he had purchased a copy of a paper peculiarly named the Arizona Kicker, and this was the kind of paragraphs that appeared therein. Then followed long extracts from M. Quad's famous series of humorous articles. At the time Mr. Cowen's experiences were appearing in the Newcastle Chronicle the Detroit Free Press published its weekly edition in London simultaneously with its appearance in Detroit. M. Quad's articles were running in the Free Press. So the London editor wrote to Mr. Cowen saying that he was rather interested in American newspapers and would be under many obligations to Mr. Cowen if he would kindly let him glance at the copy of the Arizona Kicker, or, if the copy had not been preserved, would Mr. Cowen let him know the size and get-up of the Arizona Kicker. But no answer came, for no sooner had the Member of Parliament's article appeared than the Newcastle Chronicle offices were inundated by a flood of letters laughing at the absurd density of the editor. Mr. Cowen had to get out of the mess somehow, so he, in the next week's issue of his paper, published an article in which he said his attention had been called to the fact that there was no such paper as the Arizona Kicker, but that it only proved the unreliability of the American press that one of the most popular papers in America should palm off such a series of untruths as truths on the public.

This was going a bit too far. The editor of the Detroit Free Press instructed his solicitor to enter suit for libel against Mr. Cowen. Now, in England a libel is a most grave affair, and Mr. Cowen had no alternative. He at once climbed down, admitted publicly that he had been dense, and apologized. So ended the tragedy of the Arizona Kicker. Mr. Cowen was a hard-working and capable man, but he could not see a joke.

The Rt. Hon. John Morley's Misdemeanor

THE Right Honorable John Morley, who is busily engaged in writing the life of W. E. Gladstone, is not given to joking, neither is he supposed to take a keen interest in poetry. But he looks with considerable suspicion on any rapid extension of the territory of the Empire, believing that Great Britain has her hands full to govern the 400,000,000 subjects she to-day controls. He is, in fact, what the rabid Imperialists have named a "Little Englander." But Mr. Morley is not a local Little Englander; he believes it to the disadvantage of any great country to take on her shoulders the administration of territories far removed from her shores, and peopled by men of a different race and religion from those who are to rule.

I have just heard of a letter written by Mr. Morley to an American friend of his who resides in London. The letter was penned shortly after the taking of Manila by the American fleet. The bulk of the letter consisted of two lines from the Ettrick Shepherd's famous poem to the Skylark. No one gave Mr. Morley credit for knowing Hogg's poems, nor would many believe that the staid and studious statesman would unbend enough to make a pun. But he did. His note runs: "Ask your great Republic:

"'Where on the "Dewey" wing,
Where art thou journeying?'

"YOUR FRIEND, JOHN MORLEY."

John Bull, John Peel and the Slim Boer

WITHOUT a doubt, every American newspaper has ere this printed the old Duke of Cambridge's comment on Dr. Conan Doyle, when His Royal Highness hobbled forth to inspect the volunteer medical corps—of which the famous novelist is a member—on the eve of its departure for South Africa. The Duke's astonished "What's that!" when he clapped eyes on the burly form of the volunteer is likely to stick to the jovial Doctor all the days of his life.

The Duke is the same age as his cousin, Queen Victoria, and is as crabbed as a gouty Anglo-Saxon can be, and he does not like novelists and journalists and such-like trash. In this English Capital some weeks ago, I related how the Duke was largely responsible for that brilliant disaster, Balaklava, owing to his tardiness in obeying orders—he was then in command of a brigade—but in his old age he looks for complete, unquestioning obedience in others, and felt himself deeply wronged when the command of the British Army was taken out of his hesitating hands and placed in those of Lord Wolseley.

Last week the Duke's own yeomanry sailed from Southampton for Cape Town, and the old fellow bravely faced a heavy, chilling rain to see the boys off. They were a terribly "swagger" lot, these yeomanry, each man having paid £150 for the privilege of being allowed to fight, and having furthermore donated all pay allowed them as soldiers to the Lord Mayor's "Widow and Orphan Fund." They are all hunting men; that is, habitual riders to hounds, and splendid shots.

Just before the Dunvegan Castle sailed with this corps, and when the boys in khaki were clambering up the shrouds and decorating the most inaccessible positions with their presence, a man with a cornet stood out on the wharf and launched forth into the famous hunting song, John Peel. The great ship trembled to the sound of the yeomanry lungs. When the din subsided, a regular soldier, an out-and-out Tommy Atkins, who stood looking, with a comrade, at the scene, raised his voice and shouted: "It's John Peel all right in front of the Dook, but in front of the Boers it'll be John Skin-out with you swells." And his comrade, not to be outdone, supplemented this insult with, "They says the Boers is 'slim,' but I'll lay you fellows will be bloomin' limp w'en ye sees 'em."

The Earl of Cadogan's Lesson in Manners

WHEN the Queen's daughter married the Duke of Argyle's eldest son, the Highland retainer of the Duke nodded his head and said, "Her Majesty will be a proud woman the day." Well, the Earl of Cadogan, the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is a London landlord, and London tenants have no loyal feelings toward the landowner, so that the Queen's visit to Ireland and her stay at the Lord Lieutenant's house will not be looked upon as one causing the old lady to blush from the unwonted honor. The Earl of Cadogan is a superfine young aristocrat and a Tory of the old school; he is as rich as Crœsus, and reactionary in everything. No one questions his ability, and considerable experience of public life has made him much less exclusive and haughty than he used to be.

Some years ago, when he was young and inconsiderate, he spent a few days fishing on the Tweed. He had as his boatman and ambassador to the court of King Salmon the famous fisherman known as Robert of Treus. You must understand that even a Tammany boss is nothing like such an autocrat as a Tweed fisherman-gillie. In the gillie's eyes dukes and lords and notabilities are dirt compared with a good fisherman. Robert of Treus was a famous character, and as gruffly independent as oatmeal porridge can make 'em. He had rowed the Earl of Cadogan to a choice pool in the river, and Cadogan began to fish. Presently the noble Earl drew from his pocket an exquisite flask of silver and gold, took a pull at it, replaced the stopper and slipped the flask back into his pocket without offering the great Robert a sip. Robert's brows fell, but he said nothing.

In the course of half an hour Cadogan repeated the operation. When the flask a second time disappeared, the fisherman grasped the oars and began lustily to pull for shore. The Earl, who had been flung down by the suddenness of the start, turned to his gillie and asked, "What in thunder are you doing?"

"Rowing asbore," gruffly answered the Scotsman.

"Ashore! Why?" inquired the nobleman.

"Well, My Lord," said Robert, "a mann that can drink whuskey by himsel' can fush for fush by himsel'."

Robert got his drink. —E. W. Sabt.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Mr. Thompson's editorial on The Curse of Wings is a little too pessimistic. Why do you leave it to the poet to use all the crimson and gold, while you use only forbidding colors? Wouldn't it be better for all concerned to mix optimism and pessimism just a little, and make one good picture instead of hanging two bad ones side by side? For instance, when your burglar is winging his way to parts unknown, think how exciting it would be for the bluecoat to follow in hot chase, to catch him at last and bring him back on a palatial overland air ship. Then the police would have another advantage; they could sit on the chimney and wait for the burglar to come out either back or front way, and pounce on him like a hawk on a sparrow.

Then, too, Congress would have a chance to forget expansion and free silver while passing innumerable acts regulating the flights of vultures and time. The Filipino war would soon be brought to a close, for, with the help of wings, it would be possible to capture Aguinaldo, provided he didn't have wings, too. A winged army would be a possibility, but they could not swoop. Concentration of forces would be too easy. If an army were getting ready to start, of course there would be a scout near with wings of a swallow to speed away to give notice. And think of the battle royal in the air.

But turn from war, burglars and murder and look at the brighter side of winged humanity! There would be no more young couples moping along wishing for the moon to go behind a cloud. If the moon would not move they would, as soon as a cloud showed itself. So let us say yes at once and wish for the wings of a bird. I did last night anyway, when the old couple walked on my heels all the way from the party.

Belhaven, North Carolina. J. T. JOHNSTON.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Mr. H. C. Kegley's strictures upon "Machine-Made Charity" in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST suggest the importance of distinguishing between those societies whose aim is merely the alleviation of distress and those whose purpose includes results more radical and permanent.

In a sense, all societies which help the poor are "charitable organizations," for they are organizations with charitable ends in view. To some of these Mr. Kegley's criticism may justly apply, but certainly not to that system which is especially and in a restricted sense denominated Organized Charity; a system which came into vogue in the city of London in 1869 and in this country about ten years later. A main purpose with the originators and advocates of that system has always been to make available for the unfortunates just those "spiritual tonics that refresh and strengthen the heartsick." They have recognized from the start the great value of friendly, neighborly ministration, and much of their so-called machinery has been invented for the sole purpose of making such ministration possible.

In rural or village communities, where the people are well acquainted with each other, benevolence may be brought into contact with the misfortune, material or spiritual, which it seeks to relieve, simply and easily, but amid the complex conditions of city life this is not so. The wide separation of classes socially, even geographically, and a multitude of coördinate influences make the apparently simple matter of judiciously assisting the poor a problem of real difficulty; difficulty which is at once realized by those who earnestly endeavor to do this work. Not only sympathy, but reflection, discrimination and experience are found to be essential for the attainment of success.

A simple illustration shows what place in organized charity is occupied by its much criticised machinery. In a cottage upon a by-road there is a poor family in dire need of food, fuel, sympathy and friendship; half a mile distant there is a benevolent woman who has heard of their needs and resolves to go to their assistance. She starts, but finds the roads blockaded by heavy drifts of recently fallen snow; until the way is opened she cannot reach them. Fortunately, while she is considering the difficulty, a party of workmen with shovels, horses and carts appear upon the scene and soon the drifts are removed or beaten down, and a road is cleared through which the first passenger is the lady intent upon a benevolent errand.

Just so much of the machinery of organized charity performs the function of the snow-shovelers and road openers. It exists for the purpose of clearing the way through the complex obstacles incident to modern urban conditions and thus giving an opportunity to personal ministration—that wondrous force for the upbuilding of character and the regeneration of life, the force of a noble personality acting, as it must act to be most efficient, face to face, hand to hand, heart to heart.

It is not perfect work; it partakes of the imperfection inherent in all human effort, but it is good, faithful work of great potentiality for the future, not only of the poor, but of the entire community. It goes on unceasingly. As the years pass, every day some saddened homes are brightened by the coming of those who, aside from material relief and beyond it, bring with them sympathy, aspiration and hope.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. JAMES WILSON WALK.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Some important points in economics have developed in Chicago.

The Mayor has made the public statement that in 1898 the receipts from the water department were $3,489,390, and that the expenditures of that department for that year were $296,982; also, he said that the expenditures were not more than eight and a half per cent. of the receipts for the same period.

Taken in connection with the fact that Chicago furnishes water at a little over half the usual private-ownership prices, a valuable point in favor of public ownership is clearly made.

It is estimated by experts—so says the Mayor—that the present water charge will, in less than four years, pay the many millions of dollars which are now being put into extensive water improvements—mains, etc. This brings us to the consideration of the justice of a proposition now being made: that the immense surplus of this fund be then turned to the other funds—boulevards, etc.

Some of the points which suggest themselves to me are: That people should have water at cost of carriage; that they should not be made to pay water tax to increase values and rentals on boulevards; that the cost of water should be as low as possible in order that the quantity might be as great as possible, from considerations of both comfort and sanitation; that, at the present cost of very many times more than the expense, all the tenement districts could be kept fresh and pure by the use of no more water than they themselves paid for; that the little patches of green could be kept in luxurious growth with no need of police surveillance to keep the water off the grass.

Chicago, Illinois. ALLEN HENRY SMITH.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

The common people are not so well off as two years ago. Prices have advanced and productions are reduced. On some lines of goods the high prices have killed the demand. The writer spent one day, recently, riding on the trolley cars in the eight square miles at the south end of Chicago where 200,000 people live, and not one dwelling-house was in course of construction. In Hyde Park, Chicago, where the rich folk live, could be seen many new houses.

The farmer must compete with the world. The wheat harvesting machines are humming in some part of the world every week in the year. After the wheat has been loaded in the ships, distance from market makes but a cent or two difference in the price. The farmer's year's work does not buy for him one-half of the comforts of life the same endeavor would have bought two years ago. Fence wire was sold two years ago, and is sold here to-day, without profit to the retailer. Two years ago the farmer could buy here one hundred pounds of fence wire for two bushels of wheat. To-day it will take six bushels of wheat to buy one hundred pounds of fence wire. At this rate the trusts are getting the wealth and the common people are getting poorer.

Pentwater, Michigan. S. E. RUSSELL.

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, April, 1900.

I AM wondering if any one who has sat through these lowering, darkening days and watched the Senate in its final throes with the Puerto Rican Bill has been reminded of the incantation scene in Macbeth? To me not a stage property has been missing. The dark Senate chamber, only half-lighted, has been the cave. The stage thunder and lightning have been the jeers, taunts, innuendoes and threats that have flashed and played around the desks. The cauldron has been the bill, into which has been thrown every ingredient of the political broth from "sweltered venom sleeping got" down to "scale of dragon," "tooth of wolf," "adder's fork" and "blind-worm's sting." Even Hecate has not been missing from the scene, nor even Hecate's short, stiff lock of gray hair that stood straight up from a bald place on the back of the head. So deep was the whole fantastic impression upon me during the last hours before the vote was taken, that I half expected to see Senators join hands around the cauldron and to hear the incantation rise up to the gallery:

"Double, double, toil and trouble;
Fire burn and cauldron bubble."

I sat all during the final struggle in the Senate gallery. I wanted, of course, to see the last, in this deliberative body, of a bill that seemed to be demonstrating one thing and one thing only, that party madness is the "madness of many for the gain of a few," and as I watched the tactics of the leaders of this measure I could not help thinking of certain young politicians who had come here to the Capital only a few short months ago, high with hope and courage and purpose, purpose to be useful to their party and to their States, courage to be true to their principles, and hope—to live up to their ideals. Where were some of them now? Out fighting for their political lives with the likelihood of having to give them up. One of these is Robert. True, Robert, thanks to the pluck and resources of Senator P——, is likely to come up to the surface again, for he wired us the very next day after Senator P—— had suggested a plan to him, that the plan was working capitally and that he was likely soon to return home, not much the worse for his political ducking. Still, the proof of the pudding is in the eating, so the proof of Robert's escape will be his election by the Legislature to the United States Senate, and the acknowledgment of his credentials by the latter when he shall have walked the seven hundred and thirty-one feet which lie between the doors of the House of Representatives and the doors of the Superior House of Congress. Pending Robert's return home, which may be almost at any hour, I have assuaged my unrest over his political muddle by continually watching the proceedings in the Senate, where I have changed my seat in the galleries in order to keep up with the procession.

The day that Senator Proctor made his great speech I sat on the Republican side of the chamber, where I could watch every expression and gesture, not only of the speaker himself, but of his opponents who sat all about him in attentive quiet. I also wanted to face Mr. Foraker to note any possible effect the speech might have upon him; and that the apparently unanswerable argument of the gentleman from Vermont did have an effect was evidenced by the continual tapping of his foot and by the impatient movement of his head. When Senator Proctor rose to speak, Senator P—— glanced up into the gallery at me with a slight inclination of the head as much as to say, "Note every word he utters, it will be worth while," and I did note every word.

So did the entire chamber. I was somewhat taken up at first with the old-fashioned dress and style of the man, for, from the wide, loose skirts of his frock coat and the careless adjustment of his cravat down to the tip of his boots, he was as plain and simple and strong as the rugged hills of his native State, and the words which fell from his lips were as simple and unadorned as his dress. But as I began to notice the effect of his strong words and phrases and saw the senior Senator from Ohio wince under them, saw the approval of nods and smiles on the other side of the chamber, saw such men as Mr. Allison and Mr. Cullom move about restlessly, saw the fixed stare on the face of the Vice-President pro tem. at the likening of the situation to that in the time of George the Third, I knew that though the speech would not stay the Senate one instant in its purpose to pass the bill, it might, perhaps, in the months to come, stay the voter; for, on the ground that the whole question from the start has been an untimely storm, this particular speech might be likened to the storm which "makes wise men expect a dearth."

Mr. Hanna never opens his lips save to answer to the roll-call

Mr. Culberson was moving the Constitution in a vain effort to stay the battle

Scarcely had the Senate begun to recover from this speech when Senator P—— came up to speak a word to me and to learn the latest news of Robert's progress out in Spruce City. Ever since the day that Senator P—— tried to get consent from party headquarters that Robert should be permitted to state the real reason of his vote, Senator P—— has had a harassed look on his face. I have been tempted more than once to ask him the cause of this evident anxiety, but, on looking around upon the other Republican Senators who are opposing this bill, I find the same look of tension and strain. I was noticing this expression of his face as he joined me.

"I see that certain Republicans are throwing out hints that there is some motive in Proctor's speech, but no one presumes to say what."

"You don't believe that, do you?" I asked.

"No," he replied quietly.

"I've noticed one thing," I said, "that Mr. Hanna never opens his lips save to answer to the roll-call. Where is his power?"

The Senator shrugged his shoulders and said:

"Not in his tongue, Mrs. Slocum, but luckily for him he knows it."

"Well, I always thought Congress was the happy hunting ground of the orator," I said.

"So it is, over in the House, but the Senate in these latter days will only take oratory in small, broken doses."

A day or two after this, when the closing hours of the last day of the debate were on, I changed my seat in the gallery and went over to the Democratic side of the chamber, and Page went with me on this occasion. I wanted to be close to the spot around which the fight would rage, for it is on that side that Senator Foraker sits, and Senator Foraker was the standard-bearer of the bill and of the party. There was thunder in the air, and it did not seem to me that so foul a sky could clear without a storm.

I sat where I could look directly down upon the senior Senator from Ohio. Before him was every print that had been made of the bill, together with all its amendments. I could see every nervous beat of his foot, every impatient drumming of his fingers on his desk, and note his face every time some shaft pierced his armor; and the shafts and bolts that were hurled at him were many and telling. Through some of them he sat as though putting a force upon himself to remain silent, but at some of them he sprang to his feet in response, even swinging out into the open space in front of his desk under the lash of some opponent's words, while the dark red blood would mount to his head in such a wave that it would show plainly through his whitening hair. His voice, penetrating and harsh, rose and fell either in explanation, retort, denial or defiance. From the zest and passion with which the Senator from Ohio fought his battle it almost seemed that he was cut upon the same pattern as King Richard, and that he might at any moment exclaim, "My dancing soul doth celebrate this feast of battle with mine adversary."

To make the picture of this warrior more complete, and as though to emphasize the source of the battle cry, there flocked to his standard three of Ohio's most favored sons. First there came across the yellow carpet of the Senate arena the fast-aging Mr. Hanna, who stepped carefully, leaning at times heavily upon his cane. He took up his position to the right of the standard-bearer. Just a bit later came the genial Mr. Grosvenor, with a red carnation in his buttonhole. He had come all the way from the House to see that no blood should be spilled. After Mr. Grosvenor came Colonel Dick, also from the House, also from Ohio, and these mighty men made a formidable group of four.

Behind them, from the background of desks, bobbed up, now and then, the smiling face of Mr. Depew. Sometimes there would be a slight change in the personnel of the men who formed the centre of the fight. Sometimes Mr. Chandler would cross between bolts and lean upon the chieftain's desk. Sometimes it was Mr. Lodge, who, hands in pockets, would slip across the yellow carpet

---

Editor's Note—The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 3. Each paper is complete in itself.

DO YOU have the satisfaction of enjoying the Ferris Brand?

Best grocers and markets will furnish them

"SUPPOSE I LIVE"

Our endowment plan returns a man's accumulated earnings to him just at a time in his life when he most needs money—when his energies are waning. It is a good, wholesome, practical plan, and easy on the policy-holder. Read "The How and The Why"—free booklet.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

Bill and Coin Book

Size when opened 10 in. long. 3½ in.

No. 26—Two-Leaved Seal, $ .60, postpaid
No. 66—Genuine Seal, $1.00, postpaid

Keeps bills straight and coin secure. Leather lined, secret pocket inside of coin pocket. Double button locks. Send for illustrated list of useful articles for men and women.

R. A. HUEBSCH & CO., 22 Knox St., New York City

Learn to Draw

By mail or in our personal classes. School open all summer. Practical, successful instruction by well-known illustrators. Great advantages in studying in New York. Call or write for Catalogue.

N.Y. School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

WM. J. WILLIS & CO., 186 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

Life Size Doll

"Babies' Clothes will now fit Dollie"

This Doll is one of the novelties produced by the Art Fabric Pt'g Co.'s wonderful process. It is a correct copy of a hand-painted French doll. The doll is intended to be stuffed with cotton, as directions will show. The material used is a very heavy sateen, that will not tear. Oil colors only are used; they will not crock. By means of the patent gusset the feet protrude in front, enabling the doll to stand alone. Every child loves a big doll, but what will they say to a life-size one? For the little tots, we make this doll in a smaller size, "20 in." Dollie has golden hair, rosy cheeks, brown eyes, kid-colored body, red stockings and black shoes. If you are unable to procure this doll at your retailer's, the manufacturers will, on receipt of price (50 cents for large size or 35 cents for small size), send postpaid to any address in the United States and Canada.

BABY'S BALL

Here's for the little fellow. A big, soft ball (15 inches diameter), to be stuffed with cotton, as directions will show. Printed with pretty pictures and words and music, for mamma, "to catch the air." It rolls itself right into his affections. (Price 35 cents.) In response to many calls, we now have "Topsy" (20 inches high), woolly hair, bare feet, dressed in her undershirt. Can't get dirty, because she's too black. (Price 35 cents.) In sending for any of these articles it is advisable to use stamps, money orders or registered post.

ART FABRIC PRINTING CO.
320 Broadway, New York

Time Tells The Story

There is a big difference between the cost of making a first-class sewing-machine, embodying the best of materials and workmanship, and one which is made in the cheapest manner. The buyer of the cheap machine soon pays the difference of price in the constant cost for repairs, to say nothing of its annoying inefficiency.

Singer Sewing-Machines do good work during a lifetime.

Sold on instalments
Old machines taken in exchange

The Singer Manufacturing Co.
"Sewing-Machine Makers for the World."

B. Eldredge AUTOMATIC

The Best All-Around Family Sewing Machine Made.

Easy Running, High Speed, Simple and Silent.

SOLD AT A REASONABLE PRICE AND FULLY GUARANTEED.

Send for Circular.

NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO.
BELVIDERE, ILL.

Chicago House, 49 JACKSON BOULEVARD. New York House, 93 READE STREET.

TEACH YOURSELF MUSIC

DURING LEISURE MOMENTS AT HOME
Piano, Organ, Guitar and Voice

Any one can learn all TUNES, NOTES, CHORDS, ACCOMPANIMENTS and the LAWS OF HARMONY in a short time. It is the CHEAPEST, EASIEST, most rapid and correct way on earth to learn music. Over 40,000 strongest kind of testimonials received. Goes to the bottom of music, makes it clear to the beginner; creates a fondness for music because you succeed from the start. A few days' practice and you play perfect ACCOMPANIMENTS IN ALL KEYS. CIRCULARS FREE. Write for them. Worth hundreds of dollars to any one interested in MUSIC. SAMPLE LESSONS, 10 CENTS.

U. S. RICE MUSIC CO., S-541 Wabash Avenue, CHICAGO

and speak an encouraging word. Oftener it was shaggy little Mr. Spooner, who talked so incessantly and so loudly across the chieftain's desk that, while the Texan, Mr. Culberson, was waving the Constitution in a vain effort to stay the battle, the Chair had to wield the gavel in order to hear the Constitution expounded, as it was being done most ably and brilliantly.

While the fight was at its height one little side issue attracted my attention. I noticed a tall man going about, stepping very gingerly around and in between the desks. He was distributing slips of engraved paper. When he came around to the group of fighters just under our eyes and handed one of these slips to each man, I touched Page to attract her attention to it. She looked for a moment, then whispered:

"Uncle Sam's payin' 'em for their jobs, I reckon."

I smiled at her blunt way of putting it, and then I watched each man accept this slip of paper; even the senior Senator from Ohio took his attention long enough from the fight around him to tuck his away in his vest pocket. Mr. Hanna was the only man who turned his slip of paper over on its back, wrote something thereon and gave it back whence he had received it. I whispered:

"I wonder why Mr. Hanna does not put his in his pocket, too?"

"'Cause they say he pays his all to his Sec'etary," Page whispered back.

Meantime, while our attention had been engaged with Uncle Sam's very public performance, the Honorable Billy Mason had risen up on the other side of the chamber and was pounding vigorously upon a pile of books on the desk in front of him, and I must say, in all justice to him, that while he pounded he gave vent to some decidedly bright and pointed remarks. True, the Chair all during these remarks sat with eyes rolled up to the squares of lighted glass which are let into the ceiling of the Senate chamber, but I noticed that, though the Chair was bored into oblivion, most of the noted men of the Senate gave him their closest attention. To be sure, he made about as much headway against the final issue as a squirrel would have done in a revolving cage, but we could not expect him to succeed when such men as Mr. Proctor and Mr. Davis had failed. His intentions were good, and, after all, Goethe tells us that "in the works of man as in those of Nature it is the intention which is chiefly worth studying."

Colonel Dick—one of a formidable group of four from Ohio

I was not sorry when the hour of all that weary day came around for the vote to be taken, and I must confess that I became rather bewildered by the amendments which were sprung in this final hour, for Mr. Davis did not abandon, even in this last moment, his struggle for a free-trade amendment; but I was not the only one who was muddled. The genial Mr. Depew kept me distinguished company, for he had voted "no" so many times to the amendments that when the bill itself was before the Senate he did not recognize it and voted a loud and vigorous "No." There was an instant of surprised hush all over the chamber, during which, no doubt, his colleagues thought that one of the fold was lost to them, but suddenly the junior Senator from New York realized the situation and, springing to his feet, he called out lustily, "Yes! Yes! Yes!" And his vote was changed and recorded properly, while a mighty laugh went up from the chamber.

When everything was over and we were half way out of the gallery, and were feeling glad that the excitements of the day were at an end, we were suddenly made aware that something was going on in the chamber below that had not been down on the program. I did not wish to lose anything, so I went back to look down and see what the loud, threatening voices meant. There stood Senator Wolcott and Senator Lodge, facing each other like a couple of game-cocks, while Senator Chandler stood sardonically by, throwing in occasional fire-brands. The Chair was pounding loudly for order, while Senators came flocking down to the scene of action. Everybody talked at once, and I could only hear two or three phrases, such as "unanimous consent," "unfinished business," "Senator Quay."

It was difficult to tell what it was all about, or to tell who was the angriest man on the floor, but I decided that Senator Wolcott was the maddest of them all. Though Mr. Lodge pushed him pretty closely in the matter of loud talk, it was evident that Mr. Wolcott's remarks were something in the nature of a sensation. Yet as suddenly as this tempest had arisen, so it subsided, and the call of the roll was demanded. If there is anything that is calculated to cool Senatorial temper it is the roll-call, and by the time this was over the Senate was ready to adjourn.

I did not learn until we met Senator P—— in the corridor outside the Senate chamber, after adjournment, that the funny fracas which we had just witnessed was the first blood drawn in the contested case of Mr. Quay, and that there are likely to be stormy scenes in the Senate before it is settled. We felt pretty sure, Page and I, that now the sensations were really over for the day, but alas for human calculation! We had scarcely set foot upon the steps outside the Capitol when we found the air was ringing with the cries of the newsboys who were shouting out something from the evening papers.

"Something has happened," I said with foreboding.

We both stopped to try to catch the jumble of words that came from the distance. We even asked one or two persons who were hurrying out of the Capitol. No one knew what it was.

"It's somethin' about Dewey," said Page at last, whose ears were keener than mine.

"Some calamity, I fear," I said.

"Some acciden', mos' likely," suggested Page.

"Dead, perhaps," I said with mournful accent.

"Dear me, how sad that would be!"

We listened with strained ears. Yes, it was clearly something about Admiral Dewey. Just then a newsboy came near enough to be hailed and Page was soon grasping a sheet which she threw open to the breeze. It was adorned with a frontispiece of the Admiral, and the picture was surrounded by a wreath which might have been a victor's wreath or a funeral wreath for all that I could distinguish.

My forebodings redoubled.

"Accident, Page?"

"He wants to be President of the United States!"

A Mushroom Mystery Explained

DR. THOMAS J. KEENAN, of the National Mycological Society, recently made a flying trip to Havana. While strolling in the suburbs of that city one day his eye fell upon a lot of mushrooms growing not far from the road, in the shadow of some trees. The instincts of the collector caused him to invade the field and pick some sample growths. To his surprise, they looked very much like specimens which grew in the neighborhood of New York City.

He fancied that he detected minute differences, however, and flattered himself that he had discovered a new species of the fungus. While gazing upon his new-found treasures he heard a slight sound, and looking up saw near him the proprietor of the place.

"These are interesting mushrooms," said the mycologist; "I never saw any like these before in Cuba, and I did not know that there were any here."

"No, there are none," answered the planter. "I imported these from New York to see if they would grow in this climate."

The Forsythe Waist

Do you know that New York is the centre of Fashions for the United States, and that we are the only house in America manufacturing Waists exclusively for our customers, with agents seeking novelties in every part of the world? This is why the

Forsythe Waist

Is the correct thing. Our Mail Order Department brings our waists directly to ladies in the remotest parts of the country.

This illustrates Style No. 5, made from genuine Scotch Madras in over 2000 patterns. Price $3.50. All sizes in stock from 32 to 42.

The assortment of other materials is almost unlimited.

Applications for samples, inquiries regarding styles, and orders will receive most prompt and considerate attention. Address Dept. D.

JOHN FORSYTHE, Shirt-Waist Maker
865 Broadway, New York

FOSTER'S

The spring that gives rest to your slumbers, because it lets you lie in a natural position—feet level with your body.

Order one from any local dealer. Sleep on it. If you don't like it better than the other kind

YOUR MONEY BACK

That's proof. If one dealer will not supply you, write us—we'll tell you of another who will.

BOOKLET FREE

FOSTER BROS. MANUFACTURING CO.
4 Broad Street, Utica, N. Y.

Trim Waists

A shirt-waist may be as trim and stylish as a tailored gown if it is worn properly; but it cannot sit trim behind, nor can the skirt sag.

The Priscilla

Skirt and Waist Holder keeps them securely together, does not make irregular fastenings, nor tear, like pins. The equalized strain assures perfect hang and contour. Insist on having the PRISCILLA—no other is as good. If your dealer hasn't it, send 10 cents to

The Safety Skirt Placket Co., 716 Main St., Ann Arbor, Mich.

Ladies' Watches

OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.

The Blue Book sent free.

New England Watch Company

25 and 29 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Spreckels Building, San Francisco

"BOSTON APRON BIB"

It is cut to fit the body, allowing apron to fall evenly into the lap.
It is made of enameled cloth.
It is therefore waterproof.
It protects the child's clothes.
It saves its cost in laundry bills.

Made plain white or colored with patterns. White, red or blue bindings.

If your dealer cannot supply, send prepaid, following prices:

Age	up to 2 years.		25 cents
"	2 to 4	"	30 "
"	5 to 7	"	35 "

Patented April 5, 1898.

Elite Manufacturing Company, 91 Bedford St., Boston

DEAF OR HARD-OF-HEARING ADULTS CAN ACQUIRE
LIP-READING AT HOME

In six weeks. Easy, practical, interesting lessons by MAIL. One hour a day for study and practice. Results and-fifty satisfactory. Thirty-sixth Year. Terms moderate. Send for circular.

DAVID GREENE, 1122 Broadway, New York, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

The Making of a Railroad Man From the Viewpoint of the Engineering Department

By Jno. F. Wallace

President American Society of Civil Engineers; President American Railway Engineering and Maintenance-of-Way Association; Assistant Second Vice-President Illinois Central Railway

IT IS my conviction that the engineering department is the branch of the railroad service which is to furnish in the future more men than any other for the higher executive positions. Many causes conspire to make this a logical, if not an inevitable, outcome. If a young man has in him the "making of a railroad man" he may, I believe, count with greater surety upon success in that field by going in through the engineering door than by entering from any other avenue. And why?

Because the first step across the threshold of this doorway imposes a higher educational test than is demanded of those who come into the service by any other way; because there is a marked tendency to enlarge the powers of those officials who hold the higher engineering positions; because there is a half-way point in the course of promotion where the lines of the engineering and the operating branches of the service naturally meet and the young civil engineer who has strong executive capacity comes into a position where he is in the direct line of succession, leading to the highest executive offices in the gift of the railroad company.

The Qualities that Determine Final Success

Railroading is preeminently a field for the practical man. Here the man who has a genius for affairs succeeds by sheer force of this native endowment and in spite of educational deficiencies which would prove serious, if not fatal, handicaps in many other business undertakings. It is a consideration of which every loyal railroad man is justifiably proud; he likes his calling the better for the fact that it offers a fair field for ability in the rough, and does not shut out from its arena those who have failed to achieve a college degree. Let it be granted, then, and with all due emphasis, that the practical man is the one who will succeed in the railroad field, and that ability, level-headed business judgment and sound "horse sense" are the qualities which determine the success of the railroad man.

If he possesses these endowments he may start as a track hand, a telegraph operator, a brakeman or a shop hand and rise to the Presidency of the road—and all with a foundation of meagre dimensions, so far as academic education is concerned. He cannot, however, make a respectable beginning in the engineering line without a fair schooling and a good mathematical training. If the man who has succeeded without the self-reliance, the independence which comes of scientific knowledge, could have added this artificial resource to his natural gifts, how much easier would have been his battle! With how much greater confidence could he have pushed ahead, and with what a saving of time and energy!

The successful man of affairs, we are repeatedly told, is he who knows how to get others to do things for him. True! but what a ready implement of service is a first-hand knowledge of the scientific principles and technical rules of a calling! More valuable still is such a knowledge as a fortification against deception and mistake. It is a means of detecting errors and defects in the very premises upon which sound business judgment and shrewd foresight take action. To make the application more concrete, the Division Superintendent, the General Manager, the Vice-President or the President, who has had the general and the technical education of a civil engineer, has a distinct and substantial advantage over the official of his rank who is untrained in the science of engineering. He is able more quickly to get at the bottom of problems which have to do with the very basis of railroading: construction and maintenance.

The Objective Point in the Eye of the Engineer

The building of a new railroad in this country to-day generally means that the company behind it believes it can be so soundly and scientifically constructed that it will either divert traffic in profitable volume from the established channels, or that the judgment and skill displayed in selecting the route, in adjusting grades and in solving other problems of construction will result in an economy in operating expenses sufficient to give it a strong competitive advantage, yielding a profit where competing lines must haul at bare cost or at positive loss. Alterations and extensions of existing lines are intended to serve the same purpose. The objective point always in the eye of the engineer is to do his work in such a manner that the operating expenses will be reduced, that the hauling of freight and the running of passenger trains may be accomplished at a less cost than before. The margin of gain thus achieved may seem to be very small and quite inconsequential when compared with its original cost; but it must be remembered that it is a progressive economy, one which is perpetually in force.

As a result, the reduction of a grade costing high into the hundred thousands—thus accomplishing a daily saving in the reduced number of trains necessary to handle any given tonnage—may in a few years repay its entire cost and thereafter bring in a steady and cumulative profit.

This will serve to show how vitally interrelated are the engineering and the operative branches of railroading. It does not, however, adequately present the case, for the engineer, as he reaches an advanced position in the service, must have a scientific knowledge of the problems of railway operation. Without this he cannot hope for success. By virtue, therefore, of the fundamental necessities of his calling, he is compelled to have a broader outlook over the whole railroading field than is demanded of any other employee.

The scope of the engineering work in the railroad world of to-day may be suggested by the statement that the annual expenditures of the 2200 railroads in America for "maintenance and structures" have been conservatively estimated at two hundred million dollars, while fully one hundred and eighty million dollars not charged to the maintenance account is paid out for improvements and extensions provided for by increased capitalization. This latter item is made up mainly of the cost of grade reductions and increased trackage on lines already in operation, together with extensions and improvements in terminal facilities. The latest official reports covering the roads of the United States place the number of employees in the engineering department at 288,000, and their compensation is estimated at one hundred million dollars a year.

The Kindergarten of Railroad Engineering

Nominally the two extremes of the railroad engineering profession may be said to be represented on one hand by the axman of the surveyor's gang and on the other by the Chief Engineer. To this classification there are, however, many exceptions and qualifications. The only doorway, for instance, into the engineering department of the Illinois Central Railroad is through the position of "track apprentice." Although the candidate for a place on the engineering corps may be a graduate of the best university in the land, and may have taken a post-graduate course in a celebrated technical school, he must go out with the men of the section gang and take his turn at tamping ties, spiking rails and bolting fishplates.

This may be termed the kindergarten of active railroad engineering, and although the system is not in general use, it has, in the instance to which I refer, demonstrated its soundness and practicability. Of the one hundred and twenty young men who have applied for the position of track apprentice in the service of this road and have been accepted during the past three years, only thirteen "flunked" when first they faced the stern and humble nature of their initial work. Thirty-nine stuck by through thick and thin and have been promoted to fairly profitable positions on the regular engineering corps. An analysis of the definite results attained by the successful thirty-nine is of practical value and interest. Two have become assistant engineers at a salary of $100 a month; one draws $83.33 a month as office engineer; eight are paid $75 a month as transit men; ten are rodmen at $60 a month; thirteen are chainmen at $50 a month, and one has reached the dignified position of foreman in the road department.

Still more interesting, as indicating the maintenance of a high educational standard among beginners in this field, is an analysis of this group from the viewpoint of their academic training. Of the young men now in the engineering service of the Illinois Central Railroad who have entered by this doorway, thirty-six have received from universities, colleges or technical schools of substantial standing the full degree of civil engineer; twenty-seven have devoted from one to three and a half years to the study of engineering; twenty-three did not go beyond the high school or the manual training school, and the remainder laid the basis of their education in the common schools, and "picked up" their technical training by hard knocks during active service. Those of the last-named class are ever ready to confess themselves at a disheartening disadvantage compared with the men who are soundly grounded in the technique of their profession.

Every year witnesses a material elevation of the educational average of this calling, and it seems merely a question of time when a civil engineer in the railroad service who has not had the advantage of a college education or of a thorough course in a technical school will be practically unknown.

Let me place especial emphasis upon one qualification which will accomplish wonders for the young engineer and win him promotion above men of more brilliant talents. This priceless quality is absolute and unswerving loyalty to his immediate superior. Like charity, this will cover a multitude of shortcomings and stand him in the severest emergencies.

Where Titles Mean Little

Regarding the higher positions in the railway engineering service, it should be said that the present official titles are often blind and misleading and lack the exactness and descriptive accuracy of those applied to positions in other departments. The title of Chief Engineer may mean much or little, and is applied almost indiscriminately to the man who is little more than a chief draughtsman and to the official who ranks close to the General Manager in authority, having practical control of the physical condition of the property, its construction, maintenance and improvement.

Recently it has become quite a common practice to bestow upon the actual chief of the engineering interests of the road one of the Vice-Presidencies. Not infrequently, too, the powers of an official of this kind not only cover all problems of extension and maintenance, but also extend to those phases of the road's operation which are most vitally related thereto. Concerning the rewards of success in this field it is impossible to speak save in broad and general terms. It may be sufficient to say that the chief official of the engineering department of a road seldom receives less than $2500 a year, while few, if any, get more than $25,000. All depends upon the size of the road and the system upon which official responsibility is distributed. Certain it is, however, that the prizes which are to be had in this field compare favorably with those in other lines, and are sufficient to appeal with energizing force to any young man whose inclinations lead him into the engineering profession.

The Test of Qualifications

A taste for mathematics is too often mistaken for a genius for civil engineering. The former may imply simply a talent for abstract calculation and may be unaccompanied by the slightest gift for the practical application of mathematical principles. Civil engineering, however, demands in its every step the exercise of a sound and level-headed judgment of affairs. More than this, no considerable progress can be made in the higher walks of this profession without that capacity to manage men which is generally termed executive ability.

AMERICA'S MOST POPULAR RAILROAD
CHICAGO & ALTON RAILROAD PERFECT PASSENGER SERVICE BETWEEN
CHICAGO AND KANSAS CITY.
CHICAGO AND ST. LOUIS.
CHICAGO AND PEORIA.
ST. LOUIS AND KANSAS CITY.
Through Pullman service between Chicago and
HOT SPRINGS, Ark., DENVER, Colo.
TEXAS, FLORIDA, UTAH,
CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.
If you are contemplating a trip, any portion of which can be made over the Chicago & Alton, it will pay you to write to the undersigned for maps, pamphlets, rates, time-tables, etc.
GEO. J. CHARLTON,
Gen. Passenger and Ticket Agent,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

FIRST-CLASS LINE
CHICAGO-OMAHA
ILLINOIS CENTRAL MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL VALLEY ROUTE
RAILROAD
Via Rockford, Freeport, Dubuque, Independence, Waterloo, Webster City, Fort Dodge, Rockwell City, Denison and Council Bluffs.
DOUBLE DAILY SERVICE
Buffet-library-smoking cars, sleeping cars, free reclining chair cars, dining cars.
Tickets of agents of I. C. R. R. and connecting lines.
A. H. HANSON, G. P. A., Chicago

OLD GOLD
Jewelry and Silverware, worn or passé, accumulates in every household. We will purchase power for its intrinsic or melting value (we remit monthly), or will credit your account in exchange for more serviceable articles. Send by registered mail or express. Our splendid Catalogue of Diamonds, Watches, Jewelry and Silverware sent on request. Duplicate Wedding Presents bought, sold or exchanged.
J. B. JOHNSTON & SON, 18 John Street, NEW YORK
Established 1844.

A Revival of the Dainty Portraiture of the 17th Century
Exquisitely Hand-Colored Miniatures, fitted in Handsome Gold Rolled-Gold Brooch, 1 or 1½ in. in diameter. These Miniatures sell regularly at $2.00. To introduce, we will send a sample of picture sent on receipt of price and mail free an enlargement of same, currency or P. O. Order. Commissioned. Address
ANGLO-AMERICAN ART CO., New York

READ MUSIC AT SIGHT
Leaders and members of Choirs, Public School Teachers, and any one interested in Music, may learn how to Read Music at Sight by the best method in existence. Taught by Mail easily and without interference. For prospectus and information address
D. M. MAHAFFEY, Springdale, Pa., Box J

LEARN PROOFREADING
If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it as a quick and well-rewarded profession, paying $15 to $25 weekly? Situations always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.
HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Philadelphia
LEARN TELEGRAPHY

Digitized by Google

You will not get left

If you own one of the Reliable

"Accurate-to-the-Second"

DUEBER-HAMPDEN WATCHES

LOOK FOR THE NAME "DUEBER" IN CASE

"John Hancock," 21 Jewels. For Gentlemen.
"Special Railway," 25 Jewels. For Railway Men.
"The 496." For Ladies.

Our "Guide to Watch Buyers" sent free.

The Dueber-Hampden Watch Works, Canton, O.

$5000

(Exact size of perforations)

Express Prepaid

$5.00

Protect Your Checks

WITH THE

Indelible Automatic Check Perforator

The only machine that perforates and fakes the holes through the fiber of the paper with indelible acid-proof ink, which absolutely protects and prevents changes of figures. Automatic and positive feed. An ornament to your desk. It is the smallest, simplest and best machine ever devised, and the equal of the most expensive machines. Full nickeled, $5, express prepaid; guaranteed 5 years. 10 days' trial to get your money back if not satisfied.

SCHOOL AND OFFICE SUPPLY CO.
Ottawa St., Grand Rapids, Mich.
Illustrated office supply bargain catalogue free.

"Business System"

is the title of our 64-page book, illustrating and explaining model business methods used by our largest and most successful business houses—it is free upon request.

$1.25

And upward buys a complete

"Macey" Card System

Shipped "On Approval," freight prepaid, to be returned at our expense if not found in every way positively the best obtainable. Your Choice of three distinct card-locking devices.

It Gathers—Arranges—Classifies—Indexes every character of office and factory records and lists—it is the perfect system—it encourages system.

The Fred Macey Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.
Makers of Office and Library Furniture

$8.00 and UP

Roll-Top DESK

10,000 must be sold. Greatest output in U.S. All styles and sizes. Quality sure to please. Prices so low agents can sell at good profit.

House Furniture
Refrigerators
Baby Carriages, etc.
all at Factory Prices.
Cat. No. 93, Office Furniture. Cat. No. 94, House Furniture.

E. H. Stafford & Bros., Steinway Hall, Chicago

All Arithmetical Problems

Solved rapidly and accurately by the COMPTOMETER. Saves 40 per cent. of time, and entirely relieves nervous and mental strain. Adapted to all commercial and scientific computation. Every office should have one.

Write for Pamphlet

FELT & TARRANT MFG. CO., Chicago

Often I am asked by fathers of boys who are about to choose a profession or shape their education to that end:

"How may I determine if my boy is right in thinking he is cut out for a civil engineer?"

My answer has invariably been:

"If he shows sound judgment in his estimation of physical phenomena; if he has a quick eye for proportion and perspective, especially as relating to things 'in the large'; if he is inclined to see things constructively; if he uses his mathematics as tools instead of playthings and applies his calculations along utilitarian rather than philosophic or purely theoretical lines; if he has an imagination which gives him visions of structures and buildings; and if he would rather endure all manner of physical hardships and perils than to give up the prospect of becoming an engineer—then it is safe to let him follow this bent, for it will doubtless be impossible to prevent him from so doing."

Any less radical predisposition to this kind of a career is scarcely to be accepted as proof of special fitness for it. To a preeminent degree civil engineering, particularly as applied to railroad work, is a profession which demands the most absolute and wholehearted devotion. This loyalty will be constantly put to the test, particularly in the earlier years of active work. The young engineer may be sure of sufficient hardships to try his grit and his devotion. If he does not have an absorbing love for his work and care more for it than for physical comfort and the joys of home and the pleasures of life in a refined and established community, he has decidedly missed his calling, and may be put down as among the most wretched of men.

Provided he has in him the real stuff of which the true engineer is made he will scorn to get through the years of his apprenticeship without feeling the pangs of prolonged hunger, being drenched to the skin, bitten by frost, buffeted by storms, scorched by torrid heats, lowered from rocky shelves over yawning precipices—and all with the unfaltering feeling that he would not exchange such trials for the ease and the comforts of the most sheltered business or professional life in the heart of civilization.

One's own experience is the best field from which to illustrate a point, and this suggestion of some of the hardships which are typical of a young engineer's life brings up the memory of a certain episode in which my devotion to the career of my choice was put to the test. Perhaps the most disheartening of all was that which came to me at the very outset, when fresh from college and rejoicing in the confidence which is the lot of all who leave their Alma Mater with a reasonable share of honors and an unbounded determination to conquer the world.

A Tenacity that Won Promotion

By rare good fortune I managed to secure the position of rodman with the surveying gang of the Carthage & Quincy Railroad. Before many days in the field our levelman looked up from his instrument and motioned me to come where he was standing. As I approached it was clear from his appearance that something was wrong.

"Here, give me that rod!" he exclaimed. I handed it over to him. "Now report to the chief of the party and tell him to send me a rodman, and perhaps he can give you work as an axman to cut brush."

Although I submitted with apparent meekness to this reduction in rank I was determined to stick it out and show that I had in me the making of an engineer. A little later my superior flunked squarely, and declared he could not stand the rough life. That was my opportunity and I made the most of it, being put in charge of the squad.

It is an undeniable fact that many are attracted to engineering by reason of the freedom, the picturesqueness and the adventure which it offers. This charm, however, is generally more to be appreciated in prospect or in retrospect than at the moment. While the sensation of being lowered by rope from a cliff or shelving rock soon becomes commonplace enough it is highly exciting at the outset. One experience, while running a line in the West, is very vivid in my recollection and may well serve to illustrate what the average young engineer in the same line of work may expect to encounter, for it is typical of railroad surveying.

A Lively Adventure with Falling Rock

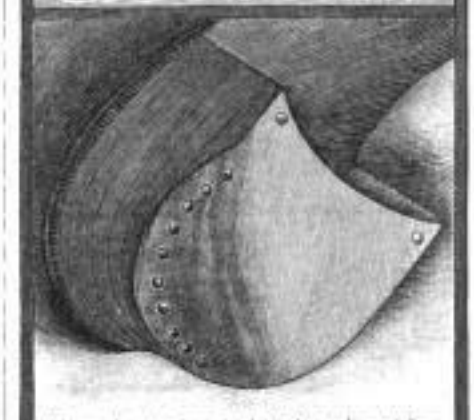
One day I found it necessary to cross section a portion of our line along a mountain side. By taking desperate chances I contrived, at last, to get down to a narrow shelf where I could plant my instrument and take my measurements. In fact, I was obliged to cut a notch into the slanting side of the mountain in order to place the level properly and to secure a safe foothold. Almost at the top of the slope, fully a thousand feet above me, was the trail. I had begun to sight through my instrument when, hearing a slight sound, I glanced up. There, coming directly toward me, with increasing velocity, was a rock which had been accidentally loosened by the men on the upper trail. It seemed to have been aimed at my instrument. Instantly I dropped upon all fours and did the liveliest creeping along that ledge that I had done since infancy. No sooner was I out of the way than the rock whizzed past me, just missing the instrument. It was as large as a washtub and would have swept me into eternity in a second had I not escaped its path.

Another kind of experience which has brought terror to scores of railway engineers engaged in reconnaissance, survey and construction work in the West is that of being overtaken by a severe storm. An episode of this nature was one of the severest adventures through which I was called to pass.

A Catastrophe Calling for Quick Work

Not infrequently it happens that very exciting work comes to the engineer who has served his time in the field and has been promoted to a position of large executive ability. This is in instances where the roadway has suffered some catastrophe and the damage must be repaired at once, at least to the extent of admitting the immediate resumption of traffic. Generally this emergency work demands originality and resourcefulness as well as great rapidity. There is no time to go deep into theory and professional traditions. Traffic is at a standstill and must be resumed at any cost.

When holding the position of Chief Engineer and Superintendent of a certain road I received notice that a bridge at a certain point had burned and was a complete wreck. Its spans were 150 feet long each—300 feet in all—and crossed the stream 165 feet above the water.



I was about eight hundred miles away from the bridge when the news of its destruction reached me on Friday noon. There was no force within one hundred miles except a small gang of bridge repair men, and no materials within two hundred and fifty miles. The task which confronted me was to cover the eight hundred miles that separated me from the bridge as soon as possible and while en route to arrange by wire for the accumulation of men and material at the bridge site. To know just what was needed in the way of men and material, the nearest point at which they could be secured and the quickest way by which they could be hurried forward was the problem of the moment—the same kind of a problem which hundreds of railroad engineers have faced and solved under the strongest pressure and difficulties. Saturday noon I was on the ground in person. By midnight Sunday night traffic was resumed.

This instance is cited only to give the layman an idea of the emergency problems which are suddenly thrust upon the unhappy Chief Engineer, and the swiftness with which they must be disposed of for the sake of opening the traffic blockade. The next emergency call may be caused by an overflow, a washout, a landslide, a tornado or a forest fire. While the division officers are generally the first to respond to a demand of this kind, the wide-awake chief will not stand long upon his dignity if the catastrophe is really a serious one, and, unless better able to command the situation from his office, he will appear at the scene of the disaster to give his subordinates the benefit of his judgment and counsel.

Reference has been made to the fact that there is a natural point of meeting between the engineering and operative branches of a road. This point is generally represented by the position of Division Superintendent. If the young engineer who steps into this place, and gets a taste of operative administration, sees a better prospect in that than in his previous field he is able to take advantage of the opportunity, with the knowledge that he is far better equipped for his new line of activity than he could have been without his special technical training, and may rise to the highest office.

Editor's Note—This is the fifth of a series of papers begun in The Saturday Evening Post of January 6. The series will be continued in subsequent issues.

Floors!!

Floors do not show heel marks and scratches, do not catch dirt or dust, are not slippery and are easily cared for when finished with

Johnson's Prepared Wax

No other floor finish is so handsome, durable or economical.

FREE On receipt of 10 cents, to prepay postage and packing, we will send a sample can (sufficient to polish 150 square feet) and our book, "The Proper Treatment for Floors," to any one having a floor.

Our beautiful Hardwood Floors can be laid over your present floors at about the cost of a good carpet. Ask for catalogue showing styles.

S. C. JOHNSON, Racine, Wis., U. S. A.

WE ARE SELLING

Battery Hanging Lamps,	$10.00
Telephones, complete,	5.95
Electric Door Bells,	1.00
Electric Carriage Light,	2.95
Battery Fan Motor,	4.85
Electric Hand Lanterns,	2.00
Pocket Flash Lights,	1.50
Miniature Electric Lamps,	.40
Telegraph Outfits,	2.35
Battery Motors from $1.80 to	12.00
Battery Table Lamps,	3.00
Necktie Lights, 18 cents to	3.00
$6.00 Bicycle Electric Lights,	2.35
Electric Cap Lights,	1.35
Electric Railway,	2.35
Battery Student Lamps,	4.00
Dry Batteries, per dozen,	2.25

All Electrical Books at low prices.

We undersell all on Everything Electrical

OHIO ELECTRIC WORKS
Cleveland, Ohio

Headquarters for Electric Novelties and Supplies.

Agents wanted. Send for New Catalogue just out.

A RARE COMBINATION

HARTMAN STEEL ROD PICKET FENCE

Best and handsomest for lawns, parks, cemeteries, school grounds—anything. Send for our free catalogue—know more about it.

HARTMAN MFG. CO., Box 125, ELLWOOD CITY, PA.
Or Room 101, 309 Broadway, New York City

Parquet and Hardwood

Floors

Wax Floor Polish, etc.

J. DUNFEE & CO.
Cor. Franklin and Washington Sts.
CHICAGO

Send for Book of Designs

Alabastine

This is the wall-base cement wall coating which you have seen so extensively advertised. It is pure, cleanly and durable. In 14 tints and white. Mix it with cold water and a child can brush it on. The most healthful and economical coating for walls and ceilings. Paint dealers sell it. Instructive and interesting booklet mailed free for the asking.

ALABASTINE COMPANY, Grand Rapids, Mich.

STARK TREES PAY BEST by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Free Book free. We Cash Weekly and want More SOME and traveling salesmen.

STARK BROS. Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N.Y.

BOYS' PAPER FREE. If you will send names of 5 boy friends over 12 years of age we will send you "The Star" for 3 months free. Greatest boys' paper published. Address with stamp, THE STAR, Dept. 23, Oak Park, Ill.

Digitized by Google

BASEBALL

Every baseball player who is particular about the quality of his supplies and at the same time appreciates a saving of cost will use "The Ingersoll" line this year—more better in the world—standard lower than usual in price.

UNIFORMS All our Uniforms are well made and handsomely trimmed. The materials are durable and at the following prices suits include shirt, with eight letters; padded pants; cap, hose and belt to match.

Grade 1, choice of 9, $0.75; each $5.20
" 2, " 9, 0.25; " 2.50
" 3, " 9, 1.50; " 5.00

Send for free samples and self-measurement blanks.

The Victor Official League Baseball, that sells everywhere at $1.25, only $1.00

Amateur League Baseball, as good as the average $1 ball, 50c
Postage on balls, 4c. extra.

Serviceable Catcher's Mitt, And a beauty for $1.00. 50c

Fielder's Glove, drab leather, well padded, extra heel pad, $1.00
Lighter padded gloves, 75c and 50c.

GUARANTEE Any article not found satisfactory upon receipt may be returned or exchanged if unsoiled.

Everything Athletic

Every baseball player or bicycle rider should have our catalogue of Bicycles and Sundries, Bicycle and Golf Clothing, Tennis and Golfing Goods, Baseball Supplies, and ALL SPORTING goods quoted at lowest New York prices.

ROBT. H. INGERSOLL & BRO.
Department 21, 67 Cortlandt Street, New York

Not How Much You Pay But What It Costs!

G & J TIRES may cost most in the beginning but cost nothing for repairs.

OTHER TIRES may cost less in the beginning and prove most expensive in the end.

OUR CATALOGUE EXPLAINS IT ALL.

226 G & J TIRE CO., Indianapolis

Henley Golf Balls

Samuel Buckley & Co.
100 William Street New York

Agts. for HENLEY TEL. WORKS, LTD., London

BICYCLES BELOW COST

5000 HIGH GRADE guaranteed MACHINES, with best equipment, must be closed out. 1900 Models, best makes, $11 to $20. '99 and '98 Models, high grade, $6 to $13. 500 SECOND-HAND WHEELS, all makes and models, good as new, $3 to $10. Great Factory Clearing Sale at half factory cost. We ship anywhere on trial without a cent in advance.

EARN A BICYCLE distributing catalogues for us. Many earned a wheel last year. Our 1900 proposition is even more liberal.

Write at once for our Bargain List and Special Offer.
Address Dept. 115-K. MEAD CYCLE CO., Chicago

Spanish Mauser Rifles and Carbines in complete, first-class, serviceable order, captured in late war. 10,000 sold to us by U. S. Government, with 5,000,000 full cartridges in clips. Before ordering, we offer limited number at $10 each, packed for shipment. Cartridges, $1.00 per one hundred. F. BANNERMAN, 579 Broadway, New York, Dealer in Military Goods and War Relics

BIRD MANNA

Secret of the Hartz Mts. Is the Joy of Birds. Makes Canaries Sing.

Makes Home Happy. Restores Cage Birds to health and song.

BIRD Robbed by Moulting and all other Birds. Sold by Druggists.

MANNA The Canaries' Delight. Restores the feathers. Mailed for 15 cents.

BIRD FOOD COMPANY, No. 400 S. 3d Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Outlook for American Golf

By Findlay S. Douglas

THE oftener I write upon the subject of golf the more I am impressed with this truth: that it is not easy to teach the game to "duffers," or to those who do not play at all, by anything which can be put into print, however simple and lucid. Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson and Mr. H. J. Whigham, in their well-known treatises on the royal and ancient game, have both essayed to do this; with what success only those who owe their proficiency to the hints given in these volumes can say. This avowal, then, relieves me from having to tell a beginner when he will want his driver, or mashie, or other club, and of course also obviates the necessity of my informing him how to use either of these particular clubs.

The Worth of the Text-Book Game

As a matter of fact, golf cannot be learned from books. At the most, all that written instructions can teach a player is what he is not to do. What he should do he will discover when he makes the round of the course, and, if he has with him a professional of some intelligence, he will find out more about the game whilst playing eighteen holes than in cogitating over and studying the best treatise ever written. Though this contention should be apparent, yet there are numbers of people who are oblivious to it, feeling convinced, in this age of text-books, that everything may be learnt from them.

One instance will explain what I mean. A select few meet and decide to form a golf club; this having been done, they proceed to select the ground on which to have their course; and then arises the question of the manner in which the holes are to be laid out. Not one of the number has the faintest notion, but a happy idea occurs to one of the neophytes. "Let us write to A" (the editor of a golf paper) "or B" (the manager of a sporting goods house). "He'll tell us." It need hardly be said that both A and B declare their inability to lay out nine holes on land they have never seen, and then it is discovered for the first time that there is a limit to the instruction that writing can convey.

It will be gathered from the foregoing that I shall treat of golf and golfers in a very general way and that, above all, I shall not dogmatize. A golfer, whoever he may be, "falls down" too often to make such a mistake, for, Vardon perhaps excepted, he is not the machine that golf journalists apparently expect him to be, and cannot be found always playing at the top of his game.

The Wonderful Growth of Golf

The game has extended sufficiently in this country now for anybody to know that I am only stating what is a matter of general knowledge. And talking about this extension, is there in the history of sport any fact more wonderful? As a Scot, the only thing which appears to me more marvelous is that such a grand game as golf should have been played in Scotland four hundred years before people outside of the "Land o' Burns" began to comprehend its merits. But when they did, lost time was made up for with a vengeance, both in England and America, for, strange to say, even in the former country golf was by no means popular until eight or ten years ago. It was introduced into America shortly after, and now, according to one of the first authorities in the country, there are not less than 1500 properly organized clubs, the members of which devote their attention entirely to the game.

The increase is still going on, so I am told by one whose business it is to collect returns from the various clubs. He gave me figures showing that in such States as New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut, to name no others, an increase of fully thirty per cent. has taken place, and there are many States, last year without any clubs at all, that will be well to the fore in the coming season.

A Game Suited to All Ages

I do not think I can be accused of being unduly prejudiced in favor of golf, seeing the vast numbers who are playing it, when I say it is the greatest game ever invented. It is the nearest approach to a universal game, or game for all, of any game I know. We soon get too old for baseball or cricket; rowing is only for the non-business man, and football the same; and tennis requires the activity and endurance that only youth can give. How different it is with golf. The career of Mr. John Ball, Jr., the present British amateur champion, will well illustrate what I mean.

About twenty years ago, when a mere boy, he was sixth in the open championship contest, and in 1890 earned the proud distinction of being the first amateur to wrest the title from the professionals. In 1888 he won his first amateur championship and has since held it four times, including last year. Again, Mr. A. W. Smith, the Toronto player, is no longer a young man, and yet he represented Canada, playing first man on the team, in the last international match at Morris County. Whoever heard of a man over forty—Mr. W. G. Grace, the famous English cricketer, excepted—who could in any game vanquish all comers when he had entered the fifth decade of life?

It is clear that excellence in the game is open to young and old alike. This is one strong factor in driving me to the conclusion that golf is not a mere fad, taken up for social reasons, to be relegated shortly to the comparative obscurity which has come upon lawn tennis, but that it is here to stay. It is, besides, a game that appeals very strongly to all true sportsmen on account of the purely amateur spirit which, to a large extent, prevails amongst golfers.

Even amongst professional golfers the stakes played for in matches are quite insignificant compared to the large amounts to be won in most other classes of professional sport. Harry Vardon, the English open champion, met Willie Park, the great Scotch player, last summer, on the well-known links at North Berwick and Ganton, in what was without doubt the most famous match of recent years; and though the spectators were present in thousands, the stakes contended for by these remarkable exponents of the game only amounted to one thousand dollars. There are "pot-hunters" in golf as in other games, but after all, the "pots" are really too small in value to foster, to any great extent, the growth of a mercenary spirit. Fame and the love of winning are the two things, each perfectly legitimate, which animate the players. Sordid interests have little weight, and so long as this is so the game will flourish.

$20,000,000 Worth of Golf Every Year

A glance at the financial aspect of the game is calculated to strengthen one's belief in its permanency. A very competent authority says that there are in the neighborhood of 250,000 golf players in the United States and that they spend over $20,000,000 annually in pursuit of their sport. The value of land and clubhouses is simply enormous and employment is provided for nearly 35,000 men and boys. To give some idea of the takings, the Chicago Golf Club last year earned $38,577, and the caddies carried off $3319—a nice round sum to go into the pockets of these "enfants terribles!"

The demoralizing effect of golf on a caddie only exists in the imagination of certain reverend gentlemen, as does the lurid language ascribed to golfers. The majority of players are too much accustomed to "rubs on the green" to give vent to their feelings in an offensive manner, though they may indulge in what has been aptly termed "silent profanity"—but then, that hurts no one. The profession of caddie is a good and beneficial career for a boy, and in after years when a man achieves eminence in any calling it is likely we shall read, "he began life as a caddie," instead of as now, "his beginning was to shout 'extras' and black boots in the streets."

It is perhaps rather daring to differ with such a man as Sir Charles Dilke, but I am bound to dissent from the views expressed by him in a recent magazine article. Sir Charles says: "Its (golf's) enormous advantage appears to me to be that it is a sport in which it is possible to handicap fairly all except the very worst class of players." Clearly the English statesman has never heard of a "kicker's" handicap when he wrote this criticism or he would have modified his opinions. Sir Charles is too optimistic! There is no sport under heaven in which it is possible to please everybody.

However, I am ready to admit that there is some force in Sir Charles Dilke's remarks, for it is possible for a player, however bad, to take part in a handicap with the best talent and thoroughly enjoy the game. In most other sports a bad player is completely out of it.

"Uncle Sam" Is Looking for bright young and middle-aged men to work for him in every State. Nearly 10,000 appointments were made last year by Civil Service Examinations. Postal service examinations in all large post offices in the fall. Custom House examinations in June. Special examinations may be held any time. Be prepared now. Full particulars of government positions, where they are, how to get them, salaries paid, etc.—free.

NATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTE
19-27 National Bank Building, Washington, D. C.

LEARN TO WRITE "ADS."

The Advertising business is one of the few callings in the world that is not and will not be overcrowded. It requires brains, but you can either hold a responsible position or build up a lucrative practice of your own.

Taught Thoroughly by Mail

By the oldest and greatest correspondence school in this specialty. A thorough training by lectures that is invaluable to you. Send for terms and particulars.

Page-Davis Correspondence School of Advertising
548 MEDINA TEMPLE, CHICAGO, ILL.

EARN $30 TO $100 A WEEK

Are You a Machine?

If you do mechanical work in a mechanical way your hope of success depends on your turning squarely around and putting brains and originality into your work. Whether you work at a lathe or a ledger you can take a technical course by mail and change your occupation without loss of time or salary. Courses in Engineering, Drafting, Surveying, Book-keeping, Shorthand, etc. Capital, $1,500,000. Fees, cash or instalments.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1171 Scranton Pa.

STUDY AT HOME

A few hours' evening study now will increase your earning power for life.

Technical Education by Mail

(Steam, Electrical or Mechanical Engineering)

Write for Handbook "I" and special terms.

American School of Correspondence, Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

IF NOT! WHY NOT?

If you do not hold a responsible, high-salaried position, it is because those above you have made a study of their business. We have sent thousands of young men and women to prosperity who have studied between times through our thorough course of

Education by Mail

In Electrical, Mechanical, Steam, Mining and Civil Engineering; Metallurgy, Art, Architecture, Practical Newspaper Work, English Branches, Stenography, Machine Design and Mechanical Drawing. Low prices, easy terms. Mention subjects interested in when writing to

The United Correspondence Schools,
150 5th Ave., New York, for Catalogue 28.

Dixon's AMERICAN GRAPHITE PENCILS

Are the Standard!

Their Leads Don't Break. Their Grades Never Vary
Pencils for All Uses

Each one bearing our trade-mark, the best of its kind. To be sold by your dealer, mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, and send us 16c. for samples worth double.

JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE COMPANY
Jersey City, N. J.

STUDY LAW AT HOME

Instruction by mail, adapted to every one. Take spare time only. Three courses: Preparatory and College Law Course, also Business Law Course. Improve your condition and prospects. Graduates everywhere. Liberal terms offered. Ten years of success. Full particulars free.

SPRAGUE CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL OF LAW, 119 Majestic Building, DETROIT, MICH.

Digitized by Google

DAWN

(Child Study from Life)

A platinum print of the above cut, 6½ x 8½ on 11 x 14 mount, sent to any address, together with our complete illustrated catalogue of

BEACON HILL PRINTS

For Fifty Cents

CATALOGUE ONLY, 10 CENTS

Celebrity Photo and Art Company
256 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

You Pay But a SINGLE PROFIT

When you buy of us. We manufacture the latest style carriages, phaetons, surreys, buggies and harness, and sell direct from the factory to the buyer, with but a single profit added to the cost of making. No other factory can manufacture first-class vehicles at lower cost, nor sell to the dealer cheaper than we sell to you.

Our catalogue shows more styles than you will see at the dealer's. It accurately pictures and describes vehicles, harness, robes, blankets and all horse accessories. You absolutely run no risk when you order from it; if anything you buy should fail to satisfy you, return it and get your money back. Write for catalogue now.

No. 1968 Phaeton Price, $42.95

• • •

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO.
Columbus, Ohio

The Dayton Grass Catcher

(PATENTED)

Galvanized Iron. Weight 6 lbs. Will last a lifetime.

Saves more than half the labor on lawn mowers. Everybody with lawn should have one. If your dealer does not keep it, send width of mower, and we will express one out of Dayton for $1.50. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

Attached or detached to any lawn mower in half a minute. Receives and holds all grass as fast as cut.

Live Dealers Wanted as Agents

DAYTON GRASS CATCHER CO., Dayton, Ohio

COLFAX PONY "RIGS"

CATALOGUE FREE. 32 STYLES AND SIZES
Address COLFAX, South Bend, Indiana

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES producing buggies by automatic machinery, from materials bought for cash. We sell direct and

Save Dealers' Profits

Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS SACRIFICES on overstocked lines. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 36-48 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

Shorthand

Intensely practical instruction by experts. We teach shorthand only, and we teach that thoroughly. No lightning system fabulous claims. Money refunded if dissatisfied. Send stamp for booklet or 25 cents for beginner's book.

Correspondence Shorthand School, 420 Bourse, Philadelphia

Proficiency Within Easy Reach of All

Another encouraging fact in connection with golf is that it is not necessary to begin the game as a boy in order to arrive at excellence. Some would be inclined to dispute this statement, alleging that, like a poet, a golfer is born, not made. It is not necessary to indulge in lengthened argument to prove my case. Numberless instances occur to me of players in the first rank who learned to handle their clubs comparatively late in life. I have only to mention Mr. Herbert M. Harriman, the present amateur champion, and Mr. Walter J. Travis, two of the finest players in America, to satisfy all aspirants to fame that proficiency is within the reach of every one. No doubt it is difficult when we are out of our teens to take up a new game and master it, but it is a long way from being impossible so far as golf is concerned. The relative merits of the players in Great Britain and America is always a fruitful subject for discussion, and, though I am acquainted with the play of most of the prominent golfers in the two countries, I am not sure that it is possible for me to contribute much that will tend to settle this vexed question. So much has to be taken into consideration.

How can we compare the 310 with which Vardon won the British open championship at Sandwich last year with the 315 strokes that gave victory to Willie Smith at Baltimore in the American open championship? It is absolutely necessary first to know the two courses thoroughly to be able to make allowances for the various difficulties and distances to be encountered. One requires to know very little of golf to realize that 80 for 18 holes on one course may be no worse than 75 on another.

Atmospheric conditions have no small part in increasing or lessening the score. To show that mere figures prove nothing, it is only necessary to point to the fact that H. H. Hilton, the English amateur, won the open championship at Muirfield in 1892 with 305, whilst Harry Vardon, on the same course in 1896, required 316; yet who will say Mr. Hilton is the better player? Laurence Auchterlonie, lately professional to the Glen View Golf and Polo Club, of Chicago, has still further complicated matters by asserting that he could drive a ball much farther there than when at home in Scotland, attributing this to the dryness of the air. It is not for me to discuss this theory; let scientists settle it; and as to Vardon and Smith and other leading professionals, no doubt they will meet on good Eastern courses this spring—for matches in Florida tell us nothing—and we shall get results through actual play, which is an infinitely better thing than theorizing.

An International Golf Standard

Speaking generally about amateurs, I would say that the contests for the open championship in the two countries go to prove that we are not so good as our British brethren. Over there an amateur has been successful in winning the open championship several times, whilst here no amateur has come near doing so. At the same time it is but fair to add that in this country, in the open championship, the entry list of amateurs in point of numbers has been far from representative. In last year's competition there were not more than three first-class amateurs.

But how the standard of golf in America is improving! We have only to look at the great events of last season to realize this. And why should it not be so? Year by year the courses are improved and numbers of young Americans are learning the game under the competent tuition of first-class Scotch and English professionals, thorough masters of their business. To show what the younger element can do, let us look at the Inter-Collegiate Championship meeting, which took place at the Garden City Club last October. There we find that J. G. Averill, of Harvard, did the 18 holes in 79, and several others in 80, which is par play.

The Folly of Extravagant Club Houses

I said the courses here are better than they used to be, and I cannot speak too strongly of the impolicy of starving the links for the purpose of beautifying and enlarging the club house. Good golf can be played without any club house, but not without a fine course. Some of the courses in Great Britain, famous the world over amongst golfers, have very modest club houses, and golf will be indulged in as a social pastime, not as a game, if golfers attach more importance to the club house than to the ground, without which the sport could not be enjoyed at all.

The coming season promises to be the most active yet in this great and growing game, and, unless all signs are wrong, everything indicates that this year will be the most successful in the annals of the sport in America, bidding fair to justify the assertion of an enthusiast: that society can be divided into two classes—those who golf and those who don't!

Spring Fever

By Paul Laurence Dunbar

GRASS commence a-comin'
Thoo de thawin' groun',
Ever' bird dat whistles
Keepin' noise eround;
Cain't sleep in de mo'nin',
'Case befo' its light
Bluebird an' de robin
Done begun to fight.

Bluebird sass de robin,
Robin sass him back,
Den de bluebird scol' him
'Twell his face is black.
Wouldn' min' dey quoilin'
All de mo'nin' long,
'Cept it wakes me early,
'Case hits done in song.

Anybody wo'kin'
Wants to sleep ez late
Ez de folks 'll 'low him,
An' I wish to state
(Co'se dis ain't to scattah,
But 'twix' me an' you),
I could stan' de bedclothes,
Kin' o' latah, too.

'Tain't my natchul feelin',
Dis hyeah mopin' spell.
I stan's early risin'
Mos'ly moughty well;
But de ve'y minute,
I feel Ap'il's heat,
Bless yo' soul, de bedclothes
Nevah seemed so sweet.

Mastah, he's a scol'in',
'Case de han's is slow,
All de hosses balkin',
Jes' cain't mek 'em go.
Don' know what's de mattah,
Hit's a funny thing,
Lessin hit's de fevah
Dat you gits in spring.

A Borrowed Nimbus

RALPH CAINE, younger brother of Hall Caine, is the editor and owner of several exceedingly prosperous magazines in London. His colaborer is Robert Leighton, the author of boys' books, and the pair make one of the most extraordinary sights in literary London. Both men are slender and have long, red hair. Mr. Caine's hair is so long that when he runs his fingers through it, as he frequently does, he has to extend his arm almost to its full length. They sit opposite each other at the same desk in their editorial office, and there they were met, not long ago, by an American syndicate manager. The visitor had called to see Mr. Caine about some manuscript said to be in the hands of his brother.

"If he has any unpublished stories I want them," said the manager. "I will pay his own price. I don't care what it is."

"There you are," replied Mr. Caine musingly, "there you are. When a man's famous the publishers give him what he asks no matter how poor the stuff."

"I'll give you fifty guineas for a story," said the manager with typical American shrewdness.

Mr. Caine fell back in his chair, as also did Mr. Leighton, and, for a moment, there was silence. Then Mr. Caine came to and shook his pictorial head.

"I don't want to spoil your compliment," he said, "but I am afraid," he added with humorous doubt, "that there must be a commercial rather than a literary side to your offer. If I were not Hall Caine's brother I doubt if you would want my story. I'm sorry, but I shall have to decline the first big offer of my life."

The CHASE

TWO STYLES THREE SIZES

THE FOLDING BOX MAGAZINE CAMERA

Made in Two Sizes, 4 x 5 and 5 x 7

Send for a FREE Catalogue fully illustrated and describing this novel line of

MAGAZINE CAMERAS

KOZY CAMERA COMPANY
Manufacturers
24 Warren Street, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

If it isn't on Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and lead in daylight. $10.00 to $17.50.

Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

Magni-Photo

PROCESS Enlarges the smallest negative or photograph to any size, with detail-depth and naturalness never before obtained, so that it excels in beauty the finest engraving. Send pictures you have taken on your vacation or around home to us and we will make them as large as you wish, making loved scenes a thing of beauty forever, and at very little cost.

SAMPLE OFFER Send negative and 50c, or photograph and 75c which we will remail promptly with finished enlargement 8 x 10. Money refunded if not satisfied. FREE circular price-list for sizes up to 40 x 72.

Amet Magni-Photo Company, Waukegan, Ill.

Live Agents Make Big Money.
There is no equal to

The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.

THOUSANDS IN USE

Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.

Postpaid for 65c Stamps

With your order for one dozen before the fair, as we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE. QUICKLY sold for this illustrated circulars.

QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Galien, Mich.

BRADLEY Platinum Paper

For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Sample 5¢ your for stamp.

The Paper on which Photographic Masterpieces are made.

JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 13th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ELECTRICITY TAUGHT BY MAIL

INSTRUCTION AT HOME; ADAPTED TO EVERY ONE. Electrical or Mechanical Engineering, Mechanical Drawing, Electric Lighting, Popular Electrical Course, Elementary Mathematics. Takes spare time only. Thomas A. Edison endorses Institute. Catalogue free.

Electrical Engineer Institute, Dept. 35, 240 West 23d St., New York

Digitized by Google

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

The Heroes' Sewing Circle*

For a sudden and spontaneous exchange of heart secrets the men in Anthony Hope's latest story put to blush the easy confidence of the traditional sewing circle. If Captain Dieppe is a true stroke of character-drawing, all reproach to feminine nature on the score of inability to retain secrets must be put by, for the cheerful eagerness with which the men in this merry and whimsical tale unbosom themselves to each other on short acquaintance is enough to convict the typical feminine gossip of sphinxlike reticence and incredulity. But this tendency only adds to the speed with which the ingenious plot of this dramatic sketch gallops forward to its surprising dénouement. Life must have been an amazingly busy game to these men if the remainder of their lives were as full of events as the period of the few short days covered by the story. The rapidity with which things happen in this narrative keeps the reader's eye fixed upon the page until the volume is finished.

Underneath this swiftly moving stream of dramatic episodes is a current of drollery, as if the master of the show were winking at his audience and saying: "Did ever you see the puppets put through their tricks at a livelier pace than this?"

But this does not detract from the interest of the tale, which has intrigues, secret love-makings, fights, floods and rescues enough to mark it for the work of its author. He is a rarely discriminating reader who is able to see the end of this story from its beginning. Not until the last chapter is reached is the outcome apparent to the average reader. The doughty Captain Dieppe, the political fugitive and bearer of state secrets, falls in love with the wife of the Count into whose hospitality he has stumbled in his flight. The Count and Countess are living in a state of armed neutrality and complete separation in the same establishment. How the Captain vanquishes the government spy who is on his trail, frees the Countess from the clutches of a mysterious pursuer, reunites her with her husband and still contrives to marry his "own true love" is too good a development to be spoiled for the reader by any less adequate an explanation than that given by the author.

Discerning writers may take a helpful hint from the way in which the author manages to give the spice of dialogue where the Countess is enjoying the seclusion of solitary exile. There is a frank artificiality not altogether agreeable in making a character think aloud in order to inform the reader of the movement of events. On the other hand, what is more natural to a charming woman, thus environed, than to hold spirited conversations with her mirror? And this is precisely what the Countess does. Although this story will not add materially to the author's reputation, it is pleasant reading, good for an hour's lively entertainment.

Exotics of the East†

Iroka is a bouquet of exquisite fancies exhaling a sad, funereal fragrance—rare orchids of imagination, heavy-scented with tragedy and gloom!

This unfortunate effect is all the more conspicuous by reason of the fact that throughout these pages are plentiful evidences that the author knows how to use the gladdest colors with consummate skill. In proof, take this first paragraph of the opening tale:

"Really it was a bit of gauze torn off from the skirt of that vain coquette called Spring, in her all-too-hasty and careless way of passing over this earth, and which was caught by the bare branches of trees which had stood lonely, looking very black and ugly upon the snow, all winter long. There were some, not many, who said that it was a cloud made up of tenjo's faces blushing over their first experience in love. An error. But, of course, we can see how they made a mistake like this, seeing that they were poets. And as for those people who insisted that it was nothing but cherry blossoms on the banks of Sumida, they knew no more about what they were talking than a mathematician knows of love.

"But, not to be too dogmatic in this age of assertions, we will be generous enough to make a compromise and say that under the cherry cloud of Sumida there stood a tea-house."

The clever conceits of fancy which grace the pages of these tales may be suggested by this dainty picture:

"She was not a daisy with the conceit of a magnolia, but a daisy who, for some reason or other of which she herself was not aware, laughed at a magnolia."

Or perhaps this is still better:

"A cup of tea of that classic warmth of color and of the traditional flavor, with a cherry petal boating upon it, is always good. Far better, however, it is when it's served as the mirror of a charming smile on a pretty face which bends over it."

Not even in the rich Oriental imagery of Lafcadio Hearn is there to be found anything which presents more vividly the subtle qualities of the Japanese landscape. Here is a touch which Mr. Hearn might well covet:

"One who is thinking seriously of departing to eternity ought, by way of preparation, to spend a few spring seasons at Kioto. No, time does not seem to exist there, and indeed, one who wants to be intoxicated by the saké of vernal sunbeams has no time to spend in thinking of any such thing as time."

In depicting a temple, overhanging a chasm, from which the hero leaps to his death, the author gives this dainty water-color:

"And if you were there with me on that evening, watching the twilight come home flying on her purple wings to perch upon the cherry trees, and could hear the far-away melody of the unseen belfries as it tumbled into the valley over the heads of pines, as if it were the lullaby to put the twilight to sleep, then you would not hesitate to agree with me. Upon my word, it deserves an ode, a hymn. But in that divinely enticing languor, such a task as composition is hardly thought of—at least by such an idle hand as mine, and I sighed my compliments and appreciation of that lyric of a view."

Many of the tales have to do with the ambitions and despairs of Japanese artists, of the type whose sensitive nature was galled by "traffic in the first fruits of the garden of art dreams." Other sketches play upon caste distinctions, and bristle with suits of armor wherein some bloodthirsty ancestor "persuaded history to print his name."

Despite the quaint beauty of its imagery, the brilliancy of its coloring, the subtlety of its analysis, the strength of its grasp on character and life and the tenderness of its sympathy, few readers will put aside this volume without a sigh of regret that the author should feel compelled to close nearly every incident with the flourish of a shroud.

—Forrest Crissey.

Glimpses of New Books

In these days when the eyes of the world are cast skyward at the impending mass of war clouds, international law must be a subject of peculiar interest. Mr. George P. Davis has just completely revised and enlarged his earlier edition of the Elements of International Law. Harper & Brothers.

Spellbound by the compelling personality of the elder Dumas, fiction seems, hitherto, never to have thought of siding with the great Cardinal, but always with the King's Musketeers. Miss M. Imlay Taylor at last comes out frankly for The Cardinal's Musketeers. Her hero Perron is one of Richelieu's beneficiaries. Throughout the stormy days of a most unsettled period he truly serves his master, and in the end wins title, estates and lady-love at his hands. A. C. McClurg Company.

The entrance of the American Republic into the snarl of international cross-purposes has been the signal for much criticism both at home and abroad, adverse and favorable, of our fitness for diplomacy. A New Race Diplomat, by Jennie Bullard Waterbury, sets forth the proud American idea of a people to whom "obstacles serve but to point the way to progress." Interwoven with the intricacies of the diplomatic situation are the loves and misunderstandings, ended in better mutual appreciation, of Stephen Markoe and his wife. The book has both feeling and thought, and is significant, in more ways than one, of the American spirit. J. B. Lippincott Company.

*Captain Dieppe. By Anthony Hope. Doubleday & McClure Company.

†Iroka: Tales of Japan. By Adachi Kinnosuké. Doubleday & McClure Company.

The "Odorless" Refrigerator

SOLID OAK, GOLDEN OAK FINISH

Freight Prepaid to any point east of the Mississippi where we have no agent. $24.38

The "Odorless" is the only refrigerator that will keep food free from contamination. Fresh Food will not taint nor spoil by absorbing the smell of odorous fruits and provisions, as invariably occurs with other so-called odorless Refrigerators.

The "Odorless" is built strictly upon scientific principles, and consequently is a Scientific Preserver of Food. The circulation of air is so perfectly arranged that odors are carried off and out, and do not come in contact with the ice as in other Refrigerators.

If you are in need of a Refrigerator, or if yours is cold and unsatisfactory, write for our handsome Catalogue S and our Special Offer; even if you do not care to buy now it will interest you.

THE KEYSER MANUFACTURING CO., Chattanooga, Tenn.

Other Styles of this Refrigerator:

With White Enameled Provision Chamber. With Water Tank.
With White Enameled Provision Chamber and Tank. With Nickeloid Provision Chamber.
With Nickeloid Provision Chamber and Tank.

Genuine Georgia Brunswick Stew

For more than 100 years the delicacy at every old-fashioned Georgia barbecue, is in fact the most famous of all Southern dishes. Made of selected chicken, beef, corn and tomatoes (not made in a packing house). You have no idea how delicious it is until you try it, because you have never eaten anything that is like it.

A Full-Size 12-oz. Can Free

If you send 12 cents in stamps to pay postage. Retails everywhere at 15 cents. With it a coupon for another can free, if you like it, and can get your grocer to put it in stock to accommodate yourself and friends.

It is a complete meal in itself. One can enough lunch for three. Makes a perfect lunch for clubs, picnics, camping or hunting. Never out of season. Ready for use in three minutes.

Booklet, "New Recipes for Good Livers," FREE

COLD SPRING PACKING COMPANY, Atlanta, Georgia

Niagara Falls

Strong bridge-work runs right up under the Falls—electric cars now run down the Gorge, past rapids and whirlpool at water's edge—other engineering feats make best view points accessible. No more exorbitant charges—the governments stopped them. At less cost, you can now view Niagara to better advantage than ever before. Round trips from Detroit $12.00, Chicago $21.00, St. Louis $31.50, Kansas City $39.75. Let us quote right rate from your home city. Our booklet suggests

Summer Tours $20 to $100

Illustrates them with beautiful engravings and gives valuable information to the contemplating summer vacationist. Bound in cloth—you will want to preserve it. It is free.

Give us some idea of how long you can take for your summer outing, how much you want it to cost you, etc. Ask for any information you may desire about any trip you have in mind. We will cheerfully answer any and all questions, and can make suggestions from the experience of others which will save you money and enhance the pleasure of your summer outing. We may be able to suggest just the trip you have been looking for. It will cost you but two cents postage. Address,

Summer Tour Department, Wabash Railroad
1320 Lincoln Trust Building, St. Louis

THIRTY DAYS' TRIAL

We know that the best way to show a business man the immense importance and convenience of a calendar clock is to let him use it. Hence we make it easy for you to try a without possibility of risk. We will send any style to any reputable business house or man on Thirty Days' Trial. If it is not absolutely satisfactory, you may return it and we will pay express charges both ways.

Prentiss Calendar Clock

It is the most durable clock made; perfectly accurate; handsome. Would cost in ten or three months. If you knew it as well as we do you would not be without it. Write for Catalogue 45B.

PRENTISS CLOCK IMPROVEMENT CO., Dept. 41, 49 Dey Street, New York

Digitized by Google

Literary Folk as they Come and Go

Mr. E. W. Hornung, the writer of Australian stories and the author of A Gentleman Cracksman, began his literary work while he was a boy. He was brought up in a Midland village in England, where he and his brother, a lad of nearly his own age, went to school. It was while he was in school that his first story was published. A local newspaper printed it. A few days after it appeared the young author was walking down the village square when he heard his name called. The town loafer, a hopeless drunkard, had hailed him.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, "but that was a mighty fine story that was in the paper this week. Did you or your brother write it?"

"I wrote it," replied the author modestly.

"Oh! but it was the very best story I ever read in all me life, and I'm fair farce for a drink, sir."

He got the drink.

An American friend spent a day with Mr. Hornung in London last March. As they were walking down the Strand in the evening the American saw one of those new-fashioned electric lamps—portable things shaped like a policeman's club, made of glass with an electric bull's eye in the end that glows and disappears at the pressure of a finger.

"Come in and look at one of these new dark lanterns," he said. "You might send one to your brother-in-law, Doctor Doyle, to use down in South Africa. He could find a plot with it the darkest kind of a night."

"I'll do it," said Mr. Hornung, "and I'll do more. If I write any more cracksman stories I've got to bring Raffles up to date. He must discard his dark lanterns and use one of these. It's just the thing."

Mr. Wells' New Wonder House

H. G. Wells, the writer of wonder-tales, is building a house for himself in Sandgate. He had an architect in the first place, but now the author himself is looking after that part of the business. Mr. Wells planned to erect a new Cartnay house along the advanced lines pursued in his stories. The architect drew on his imagination for the plans as far as he could, then Mr. Wells took a hand. He altered this and changed that detail. He added to and subtracted from. The roof was a dream, the front a vision and the interior a maze. At last when he ordered bay windows put in the cellar, the architect withdrew in despair. The structure is still going up, however, architect or no architect, and when it is completed it will be comfortable and habitable. And that is all that even a wonder-story writer needs in a house.

Anthony Hope's Dramatic Luncheon

A story about Anthony Hope, George Alexander, the theatrical manager, and Mrs. Alexander is current in London and will bear repeating over here. Not long ago Mr. Alexander, desiring to bring out in his London theatre a dramatization of Anthony Hope's Rupert of Hentzau, arranged with the author, whose whole name is Anthony Hope Hawkins, to dramatize the book. It was agreed that the novelist should have a capable assistant and the work was soon under way.

About this time Mr. Alexander invited the author and his assistant to his house to luncheon. Naturally the forthcoming play was the chief topic of conversation. Mrs. Alexander, to whom the novelist was presented as Mr. Hawkins, took a lively interest in the project and did most of the talking.

The hostess, however, did not connect Mr. Hawkins with Anthony Hope and mistook her guests for two hired playwrights. She devoted most of her attention to the assistant, and sought his opinion on various topics in a solicitous manner that made him blush to his eyebrows and nearly choked Mr. Hope and the manager with laughter.

"Mr. Alexander and I," she said pleasantly, "have great hopes of this new play. I do trust that it will be better than the book. I think the novel was a distinct disappointment to most of Mr. Hope's admirers; don't you think so, Mr. Hawkins?"

There was an instant's awkward pause that made the assistant's heartbeats audible, then the novelist smiled and replied:

"Indeed I do, Mrs. Alexander. I hope for a successful play even from so poor material as we have to work with. We shall do the best we can with it."

"I'm sure of that," returned the hostess graciously, and then Mr. Alexander switched the conversation on to the Boer War.

An Easy Style to Catch

A good story is told of how a few years ago a reckless, careless, but brilliant Scotch journalist got a position on the London Daily Telegraph. For some escapade in Edinburgh he had lost his place on a paper there. He announced to his friends that he was going to London to seek his fortune. They celebrated his departure for several nights running, so when the young man turned up in London one morning he felt rather limp and discouraged. He had scarcely a penny in his pocket, so, although he felt himself not at his best mentally, he went off at once to Fleet Street and asked the editor of the Telegraph for work. "What can you do?" asked the editor. And the applicant, feeling he must make a tremendous bid, replied, "Anything."

"Anything?"

"Yes. Anything."

"Very well, I think probably you're the man we want. I will leave you quite alone for a half hour; then I will come back and you must have an article ready."

"On what?" asked the Scotchman.

"On 'anything,'" answered the editor.

For five minutes the young man sat despairing. He didn't seem to have even the ghost of an idea in his head. Finally an impudent inspiration came. Around the room were files of the Telegraph. He pulled one out, about eight years old, and hurriedly turning the leaves came to an article by George Augustus Sala on London Streets. Seizing copy paper and a pen he raced the clock and jammed the file back into its place only a minute before the grave editor returned. This gentleman looked over the article which the Edinburgh man had "just dashed off" and said: "I think I can find a place for you, sir. You seem to catch our style."

Mr. Justin McCarthy's Four Guardians

Mr. Justin McCarthy, M. P., is at the present time entirely devoted to historical work. He is finishing his History of the Four Georges, rounding off the work with several chapters devoted to William the Fourth. This joins the History of the Georges to the History of Our Own Times, and the completed work presents a record of England since the accession of the house of Hanover. Mr. McCarthy's next book will be a history of the reign of Queen Anne.

Mr. Justin McCarthy lives with his daughter at Westgate-on-Sea, a quiet, charming, little seaside town, in a house remarkable for the number and nomenclature of its black cats. Mr. McCarthy is extremely fond of his four cats and is always delighted to introduce visitors to Bulwheedle, Zernabork, Innisboffin and Roxana. And the big black cats with the strange green eyes smile on the visitor with sinister humor.

YOUR VACATION IN COLORADO

Burlington Route

DO YOU quite realize that in all the world there is no scenery more gorgeous, more majestic and awe-inspiring than that of Colorado?

Couple this with these facts—
That the climate of Colorado is simply delightful.
That the dry, pure air is wonderfully healthful and invigorating; and that the hotels are of unusual excellence.
Then consider the question of spending your vacation there this summer.

Colorado is not far away. The Burlington Route runs "one night on the road" trains from both Chicago and St. Louis to Denver, and they are luxuriously furnished. Sumptuous library smoking cars and dining cars à la carte make the trip seem very short. Then during the summer months tourist tickets are sold at greatly reduced rates, so the expense is not great.

Let me send you maps, time-tables, ticket rates; and if you want to know more about the country enclose six cents in postage for our book on Colorado. It is a beautiful work, of literary excellence and profusely illustrated.

P. S. EUSTIS, GENERAL PASSENGER AGENT, C. B. & Q. R. R., CHICAGO, ILL.

NORTH COAST LIMITED

Electric Lighted

LEAVES ST. PAUL DAILY.

On and after April 29th

THROUGH THE OLD PICTURESQUE INDIANLAND OF THE GREAT LOUISIANA PURCHASE

Read about LEWIS and CLARK IN WONDERLAND 1900

SENT FOR 6 CENTS

BY CHAS. S. FEE, G.P.A., ST. PAUL, MINN.

The Velvet Grip

NEVER SLIPS or TEARS

NO STITCHING IN THE ELASTIC

This Yellow Coupon is on every pair.

GUARANTY COUPON

THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON HOSE SUPPORTER

is Guaranteed to the dealer and user against imperfections. Look for the Name on every loop.

HOSE CUSHION BUTTON SUPPORTER

Sample pair, by mail, 25c. Catalogue free.

LOOK FOR THE NAME ON EVERY LOOP.

GEORGE FROST CO., Makers, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.

Digitized by Google

MISSOURI'S FAMOUS SENATOR GEORGE G. VEST

IN MISSOURI there is uncommon interest in the announcement made recently by Senator George Graham Vest that he will retire from public life at the end of his present Senatorial term. The Senator is almost the last of the famous group that was for years the chief part of American official life. There were Conkling, Blaine, Bayard, Thurman, Voorhees, Beck, Cockrell, Vance, Hamlin, Morrill, Ingalls and David Davis—all giants representing a variety of ideas, many sections, and millions of people. Senator Vest has long been rated as one of the famous Senatorial debaters of all American history. His sharp and ready tongue, brilliant in repartee, terrible in invective, and classic in certain phases of its humor, has been a delight to his friends and a plague to his enemies.

A story told about Senator Vest and a boy is somewhat illustrative of the Senator's methods in getting close to people. The time was not more than ten years ago, when his Senatorial seat was not in danger. The boy was an eighteen-year-old reporter on the Kansas City Times. The youngster had neither vote nor influence. One day when Senator Vest was in the office somebody introduced the two. The youngster, unused to greatness, was so much awed by Mr. Vest that he could not find words. The Senator took the young man by the arm.

"Come," he said, starting for the elevator, "are you going out?"

The young man was not, so far as he knew, but the Senator's persuasion and gentleness changed his mind. "Let me see," the big, little man went on, "don't I know your father? I think I met him last year when I was making a speech up the country."

As the elevator went down the youth regained some of his composure. He managed to answer the Senator's question. At the bottom the two stopped. There the Senator, tilting his hat over his eyes and putting his hands in his pockets, leaned his roly-poly form against the wall and began to ask questions:

"Have you been in this town long? Do you like the newspaper business? Where did you go to school? Do you know about your country's history? Do you expect to become a great man?"

SENATOR GEORGE G. VEST

In the course of ten minutes the young man felt that he amounted to something.

Senator Vest has never been closely allied to a church. In Missouri the Senator's great following has not regarded him in a religious relation; yet, with all of his apparent indifference, the Senator has long been a student of the Bible and a most tolerant observer of religious faith and form in others. Two years ago, Colonel John Carroll, solicitor for the Burlington Railroad system, while in Washington on business, called on the Senator at his home. Mr. Vest sent word to have Colonel Carroll come up to his room. When the caller entered he found the Senator lying in an easy chair with a Bible on his knees. He had been reading the Twenty-third Psalm.

"That's a beautiful thing, John," he said; "and let me tell you—that's a mighty fine book."

"I'd like to get a picture of you just now," said Colonel Carroll, "to show to the folks in Missouri."

The Senator smiled. "It might surprise 'em," he said; "but I have never cared to talk much about my religious ideas."

Not long ago Senator Vest was seriously ill. At times he was petulant, even with his friends, but seldom was he in a state of mind that a good story was not forthcoming. One afternoon, in talking with Major Dickinson, of the recent Volunteer Army, he fell to discussing the vanities of life.

"I once met a good old lady out West," said he, "who evinced great surprise of a not very complimentary sort when she met me.

"'And so you're Senator Vest, the great Senator?' she asked.

"'I'm Senator Vest,' I replied, bowing.

"'Well, well!' she exclaimed contemptuously. 'After all I've heard about you, I never'd a thought it!'

"At another time I met a farmer from New Madrid County.

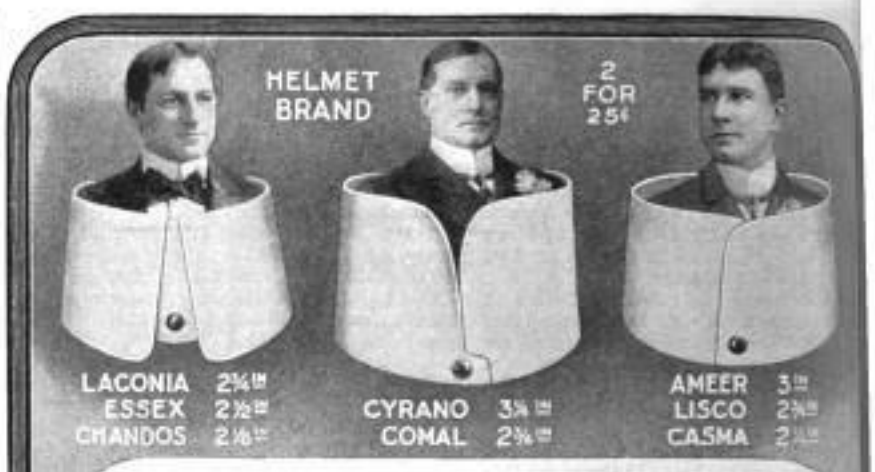
"'I'm glad to see you, Senator,' he said. 'You see, we like you out our way. In fact, you're gettin' mighty notorious in New Madrid County.'"

Mr. Vest was educated at Centre College, Danville, Kentucky, an institution that has graduated forty-four college professors, twenty-six Congressmen, four United States Senators, seven Governors, two Vice-Presidents of the United States, one Justice of the Supreme Court, forty-nine editors and thirty-nine Circuit Judges.

In the early fifties Mr. Vest married Miss Sallie Sneed, of Kentucky. The two set out for California, with never a thought of becoming residents of the Mississippi Valley. The lumbering vehicle was not in good trim. A break-down occurred at a small village—one of the quaint, ugly, irregular ante-bellum settlements of the new Southwest. The place was Georgetown, and there it was that young Mr. and Mrs. Vest found themselves at the mercy of a broken wheel.

While the stage passengers were thus awkwardly waiting, an old negro approached the young lawyer and asked his assistance. The black man explained that he had a son who was accused of murder. Feeling against the boy was very strong and the father pleaded with the traveling attorney to stop and lend his assistance. Mr. Vest concluded to allow the stage to proceed while he undertook the task of helping the negro and his boy. When the trial was over the boy was acquitted. A mob was speedily formed, the young man was taken from the jail, and in a little while he was dead.

Because of his connection with this case Vest was not particularly popular; and for this reason, as much as for any other, he concluded to become a Missourian and stand his ground. He at once began to secure a following, and in a remarkably short time he was rated as one of the important lawyers of the section in which he lived.



In sunshine and storm his sense of humor has always been one of his excelling qualities. As a candidate before the people his speeches brimmed with quaint story and allusion. In Wayne County, Missouri, in the early seventies, when Vest was a candidate in opposition to a wealthy citizen, he summed up his claims in a few words in one of his brilliant speeches.

"The gentleman who opposes me," he said, "is a man of wealth and position. I am only a poor, ragged, ex-Confederate soldier. I ask for your support."

One afternoon, driving along a Was ington street, he compared his state of health to that of a certain ancient negro.

"See here, Sam," asked the negro's friend, "what's the matter with you?"

"Don't know, boss," said the old darky, "but I think dat I am a-sufferin' wif anno domino."

Collar Satisfaction

Carefully guarding the most minute details is a part of the art of good Collar making. We make Collars that are correct in every detail, and our sixty years' experience enables us to guarantee you the supreme satisfaction of a perfect-fitting Collar, made to stand the modern laundry, and give you Collar value for your money. Our up-to-date styles can be obtained direct from your dealer, who will supply you upon request. If not, write us, stating size.

Postal us for our handsome catalogue, "Correct Dress," SENT FREE

2 for 25 cents

DEPT. S, TROY, NEW YORK

CORLISS, COON & CO.
NEW YORK CHICAGO BOSTON SAN FRANCISCO

Refern Corsets

FRENCH GORED SOLID WHALEBONE SOLD BY FIRST-CLASS DEALERS

LEADAM'S SHOE TREES

Keep the shoes in perfect shape. Easy to put in and take out. Prevent wrinkling, losing up and curling of shoe and sole when not in use. Make shoes more comfortable and longer wearing.

Wet shoes do not shrivel up in drying when LEADAM'S SHOE TREES are used.

Made in all styles, widths and shapes; for men and women, and sold everywhere by first-class dealers.

If your dealer does not keep them, send us the size and style of your shoe and we will mail you a pair on receipt of $1.25.

LIONEL H. LEADAM, Sole Manufacturer
52 Wall Street, New York

Descriptive pamphlets on the care of shoes free.

WHY PAY $60.00 MORE

For a surrey than is actually necessary? If you buy a job as good from a dealer or agent he will charge you about that amount in commission. Buy direct from our factory and save it.

We are the largest manufacturers of Vehicles and Harness in the world selling to the consumer exclusively.

No. 77—Single Surrey Harness. Price $37 to $50 complete, according to grade of leather. Other harness in proportion.

WE HAVE NO AGENTS

We make 178 styles of vehicles and 65 styles of harness and ship anywhere for examination, guaranteeing safe delivery. You take no risk, as all our work is guaranteed as to quality, style and finish. You have the advantage of the largest stock in the country to select from. Don't buy a vehicle or harness of any kind until you get a free copy of our large illustrated catalogue.

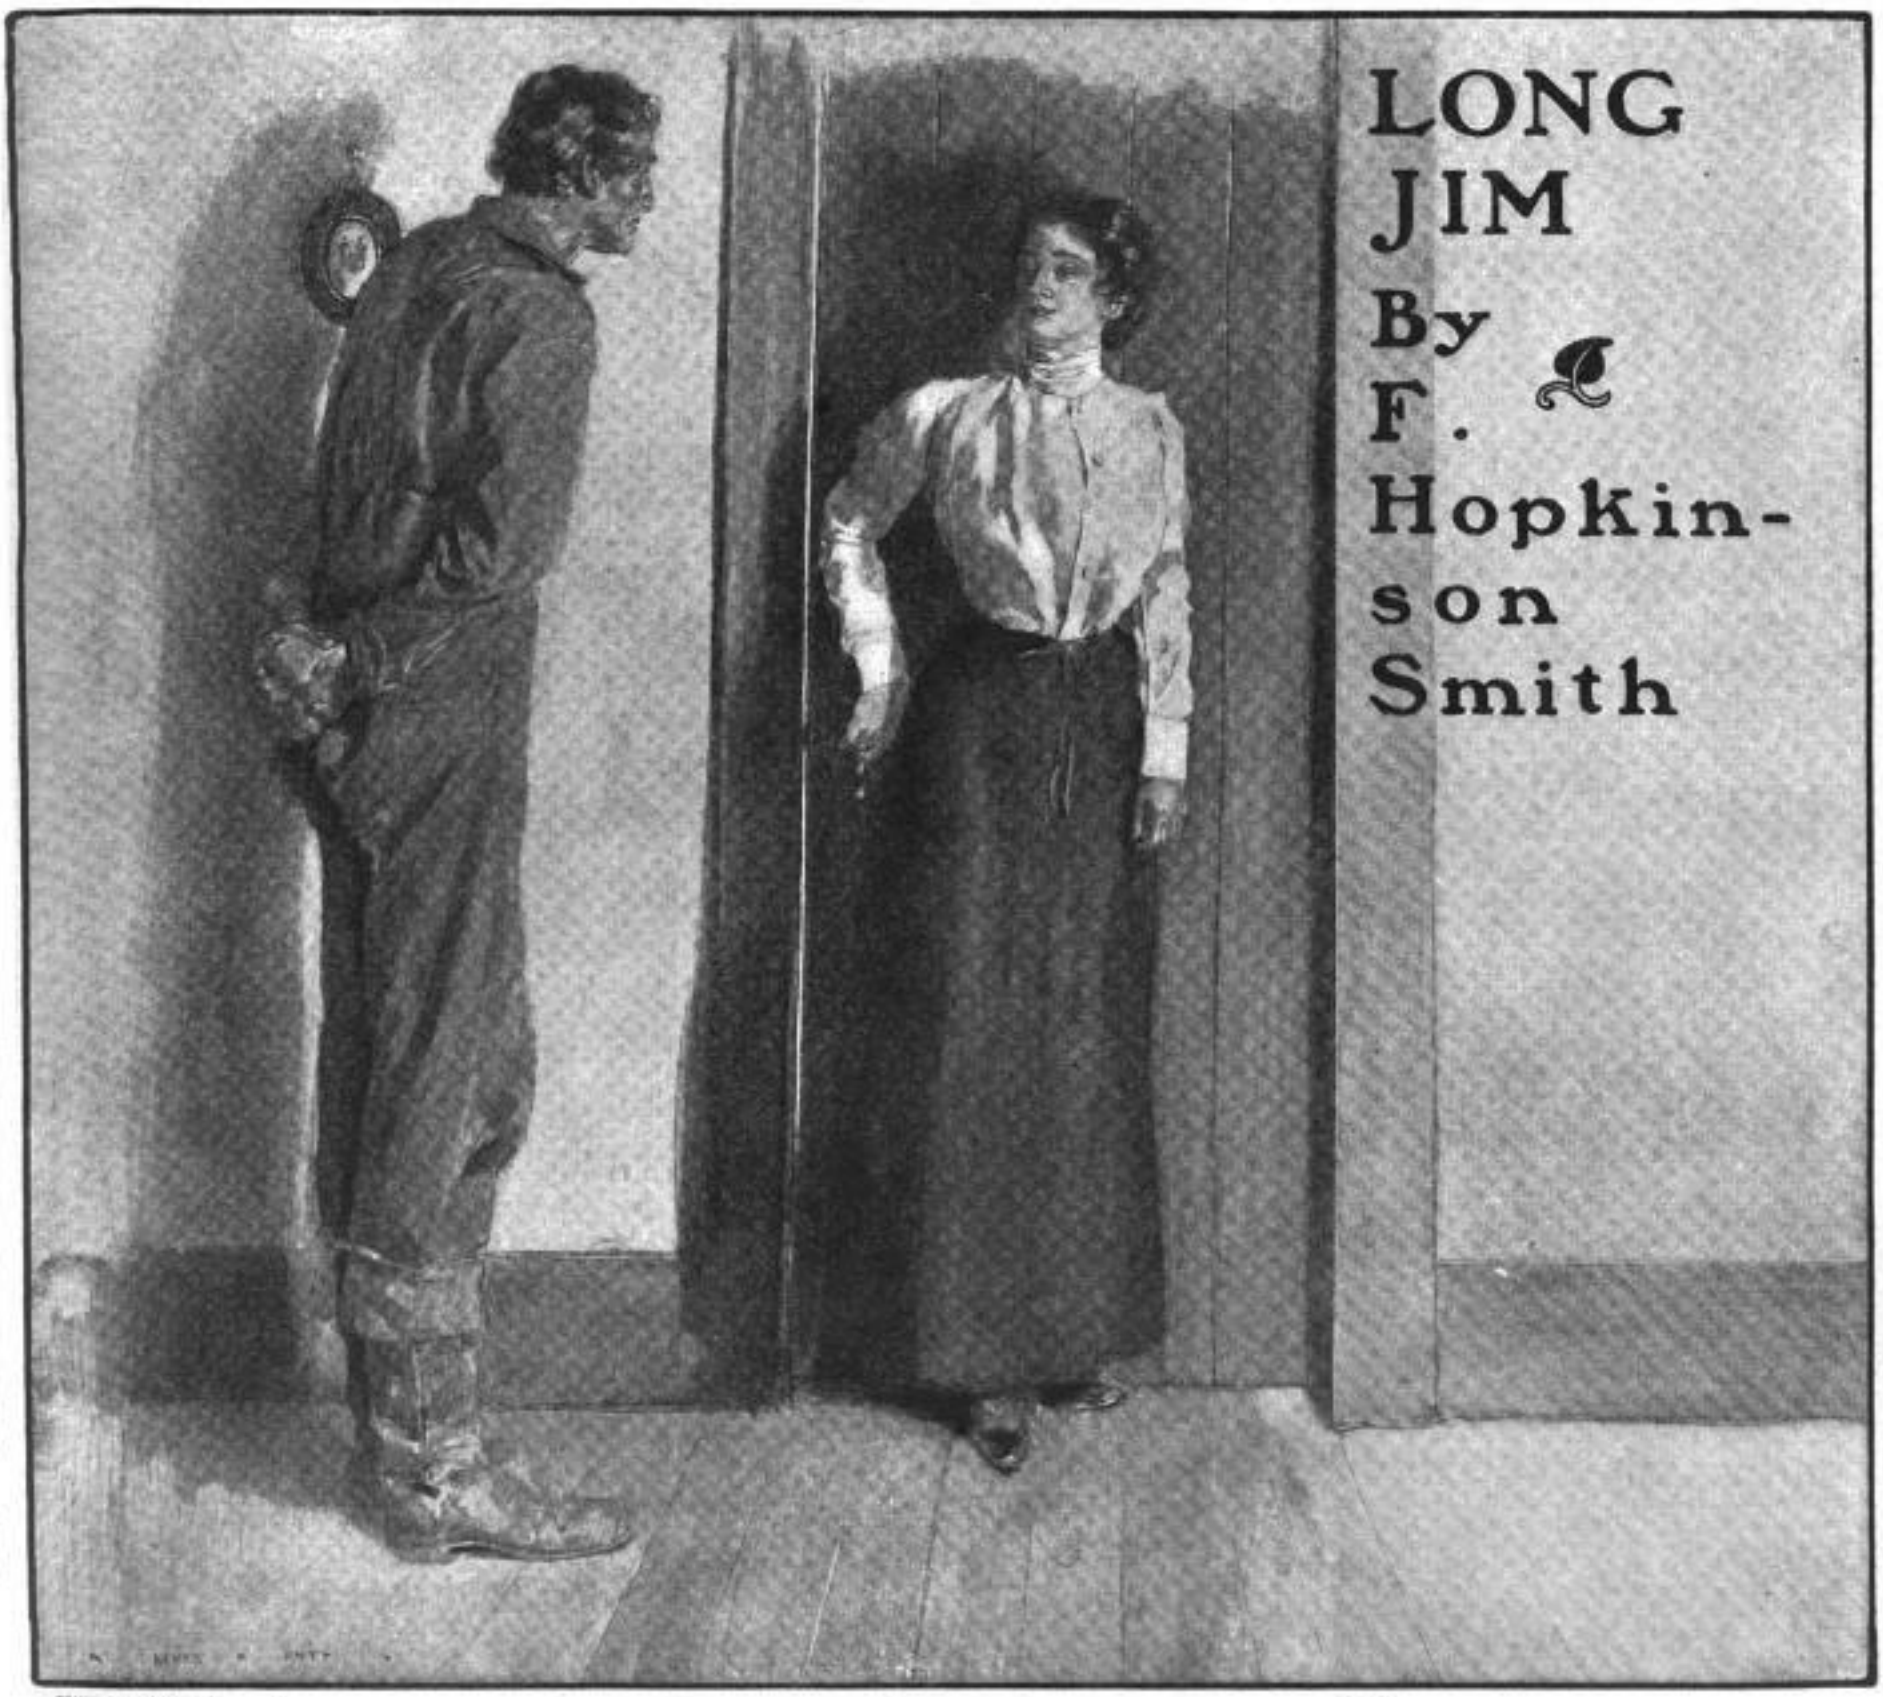
No. 911—Canopy-top Surrey, has long distance axles, open rubber band springs, Bradley quick couplers. Price, complete with curtains, storm aprons, sun shade and lamps, $105. As good as others sell for $125 more than our price.

Elkhart Carriage and Harness Manufacturing Co., Elkhart, Indiana

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST



An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dⁱ 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 46 | Philadelphia, May 12, 1900 | 5 Cents the Copy: $2.50 the Year

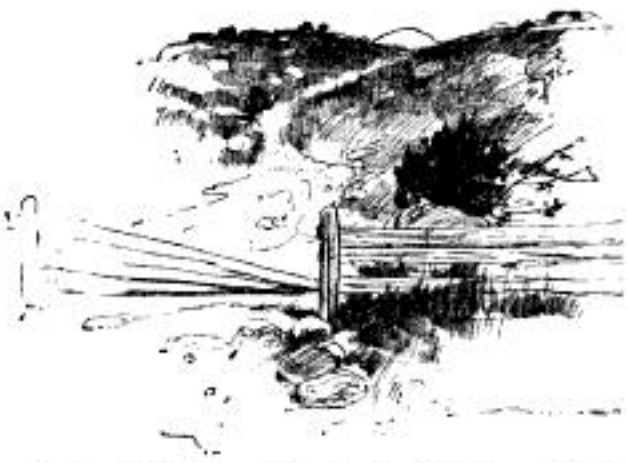
Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

LONG JIM

By F. Hopkinson Smith



DRAWN BY HENRY HUTT

1041

Digitized by Google

LONG JIM

By F. Hopkinson Smith

JIM met me at the station. I knew it was Jim when I caught sight of him loping along the platform, craning his neck, his head on one side as if in search of some one. He had the same stoop in his shoulders; the same long, disjointed, shambling body—six feet and more of it—that had earned him his sobriquet.

"Guess you be him," he said, recognizing me as easily, his face breaking suddenly into a broad smile as I stepped on to the platform. "Old man 'lowed I'd know ye right away, but I kind o' mistrusted till I see ye stop and look 'round same's if ye'd lost the trail. I'll take them traps and that bag if ye don't mind," and he relieved me of my sketch kit and bag. "Buckboard's right out here behind the freight shed," and he pointed across the track. "Old mare's kinder skeery o' the engine, so I tied her a piece off."

He was precisely the man I had expected to find—even to his shaggy gray hair matted close about his ears, wrinkled, leathery face and long, scrawny neck. He wore the same rough, cowhide boots and the very hat I had seen so often reproduced—such a picturesque slouch of a hat with that certain cant to the rim which betokens long usage and not a little comfort, especially on balsam boughs with the sky for a covering, and only the stars to light one to bed.

I had heard all these several details and appointments described ever so minutely by an enthusiastic brother brush who had spent the preceding summer with old man Marvin—Jim's employer—but he had forgotten to mention, or had failed to notice, the peculiar softness of his voice and his timid, shrinking eyes—the eyes of a dog rather than those of a man—not cowardly eyes, nor sneaking eyes—more those of one who had suffered constantly from sudden, unexpected blows, and who shrank from your gaze and dodged it as does a hound that misunderstands a gesture.

"Old man's been 'spectin' ye for a week," Jim rambled on as he led the way to the shed, hitching up his one leather suspender that kept the brown overalls snug up under his armpits. "P'raps ye expected him to meet ye," he continued, "but ye don't know him. He ain't that kind. He won't go even for Ruby."

"Who's Ruby?" The brother brush had not mentioned him. "Mr. Marvin's son?"

"No, she's Mother Marvin's girl. She's away to Plymouth to school. Stand here a minute till I back up the buckboard."

The buckboard is the only vehicle possible over these mountain roads. It is the volante of the Franconia range, and rides over everything from a boulder to a wind-slash. This particular example differed only in being a trifle more rickety and mud-bespattered than any I had seen; and the mare had evidently been foaled to draw it—a fur-coated, moth-eaten, wisp-tailed beast, tied to the shafts with clothes-lines and scraps of deerhide—a quadruped that only an earthquake could have shaken into nervousness. And yet Jim backed her into position as carefully as if she had felt her harness for the first time, handing me the reins until he strapped my belongings to the hind axle, calling "Whoa, Bess!" every time she rested a tired muscle. Then he lifted one long leg over the dashboard and took the seat beside me.

As we rattled along over the ruts and boulders of the rough wood road that lay between the railway and the wilderness, and the familiar smell of birch and pine greeted my nostrils, that old tingling thrill that shivers up and down my spine whenever I am beginning to be supremely happy took possession of me.

It was my first draught of a long holiday; my breathing spell; my time for loose neckties and flannel shirts and a kit slung over my shoulder crammed with brushes and color tubes; my time for loafing and inviting my soul. It felt inexpressibly delightful to be once more out in the open—out under the wide sweep of the sky; rid of the choke of narrow streets; exempt of bells, mails and telegrams, and free of him who knocks, enters and sits—and sits—and sits. And it was the season I loved best—the Indian summer of the year; when the air is spicy with the smoke of burning leaves and the mountains are lost in the haze; when the unshaven cornfields are dotted with yellow pumpkins and under low-branched trees the apples lie in heaps; when the leaves are aflame and the round sun shines pink through opalescent clouds.

"Ain't it a hummer o' a day?" Jim exclaimed suddenly, looking toward the valley swimming in a silver mist below us. "By Jiminy! it makes a man feel like livin', don't it?"

I turned to look at him. He, too, seemed to have caught the infection. His shoulders had straightened, his nostrils were dilated like a deer's that sniffs some distant scent; his face was aglow. I began to wonder if, with my usual luck, I had not found the companion I always looked for in my outings—that rare other fellow of the right kind, who responds to your slightest wish with all the enthusiasm and gusto of a boy, and so vagabondish in his tendencies that he is delighted to have you think for him and to follow your lead. I have had the good fortune to find these lovable tramps in many quarters of the globe—one I stumbled over asleep on the Riva—a ragged, lazy, devil-may-care sort of a lazzagnone, whose very laugh from between his snow-white teeth is among my dearest memories of Venice. Another sat beside me in the shade of one wall of the Alhambra, while his donkeys dozed in the sun. I still remember the curl of his mustachios, the red sash about his waist and the brown of his throat and chest, and can see him bowing in the sunlight with all the grace of a hidalgo.

These companions of mine have seldom worn knickerbockers from Bond Street or shooting togs from Piccadilly. They have oftener been barefooted, and one or two of them, if I remember aright, have lacked their coats. None of these poverties, however, made them any the less lovable and helpful. If this awkward son of the soil, with his gentle voice and soft, shrinking eyes, should turn out to be one of the right kind, and wanted to fraternize, I would be ready for him.

I had not long to wait. Before we had gone a mile into the forest Jim jerked the mare back upon her haunches and, pointing to a great hemlock standing sentinel over us, cried out with boyish enthusiasm:

"Take a look at him once. Ain't he a ring-tailed roarer? Seems to me a tree big as him must be awful proud just o' bein' a tree. Ain't nothin' 'round here kin see's far as he kin, anyways." "My luck again," I thought to myself. I knew I could not be mistaken in the outward signs.

"You like trees, then?" I asked, watching the glow on his face.

"Like 'em! Well, wouldn't you if ye'd lived 'mong 'em long's I have? Trees don't never go back on ye, and that's what ye can't say o' everything." The analogy was obscure, but I attributed it to Jim's slender stock of phrases. "I've knowed that hemlock ever since I come here, and he's just the same to me as the fust day I see him. Ain't never no change in trees; once they're good to ye they're allus good to ye. Birds is different—so is cattle—but trees and dogs ye kin tie to. Don't the woods smell nice? Do ye catch on to them spruces dead ahead of us? Maybe ye can't smell 'em till ye git yer nose cleared out o' them city nosegays," he continued, with a kindly interest in his voice. "But ye will when ye've been here a spell. Folks that live in cities think there ain't nothin' smells sweet but flowers and cologne.

"They ain't never slep' on balsam boughs nor got a whiff o' a birchbark fire, nor tramped a bed o' ferns at night. There's a cool, fresh smell for ye! I tell ye there's a heap o' perfumes 'round ye can't buy at a flower store and cork up in a bottle. Well, I guess—Git up, Bess!" and he flopped the reins once more along the ridges and hollows of the mare's back while he encouraged her to renewed efforts with that peculiar clucking sound heeded only by certain beasts of burden.

At the end of the tenth mile he stopped the mare suddenly.

"Hold on," he cried excitedly, "there's that scraggy-tail. I missed him when I come down. See! there he is on that green log. I was feared he'd passed in his chips." I looked and saw a huge gray squirrel with a tail like a rabbit. "That's him. Durn mean on his tail, warn't it? And one paw gone, too. The dog catched him one day last year and left him tore up that way. I found him limping along when I was a-sugaring here in the spring and kinder fixed him up, and he's sorter on the lookout for me when I come along. He's got a hole 'round here somewheres."

Jim sprang out of the buckboard. Fumbling under the seat he brought out a bag of nuts. The squirrel took them from his hand, stuffing his mouth full, five at a time, limping away to hide them, and back again for more until the bag was empty; Jim, contented and unhurried, squatting on the ground, his long knees bent under him. The way in which he did this gave me infinite delight. No vagabond I had ever known ignored time and duty more complacently.

We drove on in silence, Jim taking in everything we passed. This shambling, slenderly educated and clay-soiled man was fast looming up as a find of incalculable value—the most valuable of my experience. I began to like him more and more. The most important thing, however, was still to be settled if a perfect harmony of interests was to be established between us—would he like me?

Marvin's cabin, in which I was to spend my holiday, lay on a clearing half a mile or more outside the woods and at the foot of a hill that helped prop up the Knob. The stage road ran to the left. The house was a small two-story affair built of logs and clapboards, and was joined to the outlying stable by a covered passage which was lined with winter firewood. Marvin, who met us at the pasture gate, carried a lantern, the glow of the twilight having faded from the mountain tops. He was a small, thick-set man, smooth-shaven as far as the underside of his chin and jaws, with a whisk-broom beard spread over his shirt front and half of his waistcoat. His forehead was low, and his eyes set close together—sure sign of a close-fisted nature.

To my great surprise his first words, after a limp handshake and a perfunctory "pleased to see you," were devoted to an outbreak on Jim for having been so long on the road. "Been waitin' here an hour," he said. "What in tarnation kep' ye, anyway? Them cows ain't milked yit!"

"Don't worry. I won't go back on them cows," replied Jim quietly, as he drove through the gateway, following Marvin, who walked ahead swinging the lantern to show the mare the road.

Mrs. Marvin's manner was as abrupt as that of her husband's.

"Well, well!" she said as I stepped upon the porch, "guess you must be beat out comin' so fur. Come in and set by the stove," and she resumed her work in the pantry without another word.

I was not offended at her curtness. These denizens of the forest pass too many hours alone and spunk too seldom to understand the value of politeness for politeness' sake. The wife, moreover, redeemed herself the next morning when I found her on the back porch feeding the birds.

"Snow ain't fur off," she remarked, in explanation, as she scattered the crumbs about, "and I want 'em to larn early where they kin find something to eat. Ruby'd never forgive me if I didn't feed the birds. She loves 'em 'bout as much as Jim does."

Neither she nor her husband became any more cordial as they knew me better. To them I was only the boarder whose weekly stipend helped to decrease the farm debt, and who had to be fed three times a day and given a bed at night. It was Jim who made me feel at home. He was the fellow I had longed for; the round peg of a chance acquaintance that exactly fitted into the round hole of my holiday life, and he fulfilled my every expectation. He would fish or hunt or carry a sketch trap or wash brushes, or loaf, or go to sleep beside me—or get up at daylight—whatever the one half of me wanted to do, Jim, the other half, agreed to with instant cheerfulness.

And yet, in spite of this constant companionship, I never crossed a certain line of reserve which he had set up between us. He would ramble on by the hour about the things around us; about the trees, the birds and squirrels; of the way the muskrats lived by the sawmill dam, and their cleverness in avoiding his traps; about the deer that "yarded" back to Taft's Knob last winter, and their leanness in the spring. Sometimes he would speak of Mother Marvin, saying she "thought a heap of Ruby, and ought to," and now and then he would speak of Ruby with a certain tender tone in his voice, telling me of the prizes she had won at school, and how nobody could touch her in "'rithmetic and readin'." But, to my surprise, he never discussed any of his private affairs with me. I say "surprise," for until I met Jim I had found that men of his class talked of little else, especially when over campfires smouldering far into the night.

This reticence also extended to Marvin's affairs. The relations between them, I saw, were greatly strained, although Jim always discharged his duties conscientiously, never failing to render a strict account of the time he spent with me, which Marvin always itemized in the weekly bill. I used often to wonder if he were not under some obligation to his employer which he could not requite; it might be for food and shelter in his earlier days, or perhaps that he was weighted by a money debt he was unable to pay.

One morning, after a particularly ugly outbreak in which Jim had been denounced for some supposed neglect of his duties, I asked him, then lying beside me, his head cupped upon his saucer of a slouch hat, why he stayed on with a man like Marvin, so different from himself in every way. I had often wondered why Jim stood it, and wished that he had the spirit to try his fortunes elsewhere. In my sympathy for him I had even gone so far as to hint once or twice at my finding him other employment. Indeed, I must confess that the only cloud between us dimming my confidence in him was this very lack of independence.

"Well, I got to git along with him for a spell yit," Jim answered slowly, his eyes turned up to the sky. "He is ornery, and no mistake, and I git mad at him sometimes, but then ag'in I feel kinder sorry for him somehow. He's a queer kind, ain't he, to be livin' up here all his life with trees and mountains all 'round him, all doin' their best to please him—and I don't know nothin' friendlier nor honester—and yet him bein' what he is? I'd 'a' thought they'd thawed him out 'fore this. And he's so dog-goned close, too, if I must say it. Why, if it warn't for Mother Marvin some o' us 'round here"—and he stopped and lowered his voice—"would be out in the cold; some ye wouldn't suspect, too."

This apparently studied reticence only incited my curiosity to learn something more of the man for whom I had begun to have a real affection. I wanted particularly to know something of his life before he came to Marvins'—twelve years now. I could not, of course, ask Marvin or his wife for any details—my intimacy with Jim forbade such an invasion of his privacy—and I met no one else in the forest. I saw plainly that he was not a mountaineer by birth. Not only did his dialect differ from those about him, but his habits were not those of a woodsman. For instance, he would always carry his matches loose in his pocket, instead of in a dry box; then, again, he would wear his trousers rolled up like a fireman's, as if to keep out the wet, instead of tucking them into his boots to tramp the woods the better. Now and then, too, he would let fall some word or expression which would betray greater familiarity with the ins and outs of the city than with the intricacies of the forest.

"It was fixed up in a glass case like one Abe Condit used to have in his place in the Bowery," he said once in describing a prize trout some city fisherman had stuffed and framed. But when I asked him, with some surprise, if he knew the Bowery, he looked at me quickly, with the slightest trace of offended dignity in his eyes, as if I had meant to overstep the line between us, and answered quickly:

"I knowed Abe Condit," and immediately changed the conversation.

And yet I must admit that there was nothing in the way he answered this and all my other questions that weakened my confidence in his sincerity. If there were any blackened pages in his past record that he did not want to lay bare even to me, they were discolored, I felt sure, more by privations and suffering than by any stains he was ashamed of.

Digitized by Google

II

ONE morning at daybreak I was awakened by Jim swinging back my door. He had on his heavy overcoat and carried a lantern. His slouch hat was flattened on the back of his head; the rim flared out, framing his face, which was wreathed in smiles. He seemed to be under some peculiar excitement, for his breath came thick and fast.

"Sorry to wake ye, but I'm goin' to Plymouth," and he lowered his head and stepped inside my room. "Ruby's comin'. Feller brought me a letter she'd sent on by the stage. The driver left it at the sawmill. I'd 'a' told ye las' night, but ye'd turned in."

"When will you be back?" I called out from between the bedclothes. We had planned a trip to the Knob the next day, and were to camp out for the night. He evidently saw my disappointment in my face, for he answered quickly as he bent over me:

"Oh, to-night, sure; and maybe Ruby'll go along. There ain't nothin' ye kin teach her 'bout campin', and she'll go anywheres I'll take her—leastways, she allus has." This last was said with some hesitation, as if he had suddenly thought that my presence might make some difference to her. "Leave yer brushes where I kin git 'em," he continued, anxious to make up for my disappointment. "I'll wash 'em when I git back," and he clattered down the steep stairs and slammed the door behind him.

I jumped from my bed, threw up the narrow, unpainted sash and watched his tall, awkward figure swinging the lantern as he hurried away toward the shed where the gray mare lived in solitude. Then I crept back to bed again to plan my day anew.

When I joined Marvin at breakfast I found him in one of his ugliest moods, with all his bristles out; not turned toward me, nor even toward his wife, but toward the world in general. Strange to say, he made no allusion to his daughter's return nor to Jim's absence.

Suddenly his wife blurted out, as if she could restrain her joy no longer:

"You ain't never seen Ruby. She's comin' to-night. Jim's gone for her. The head teacher's sick and some o' the girls has got a holiday."

"Yes," I answered quietly; "Jim told me."

"Oh, he did!" And she put down her cup and leaned across the table. "Well, I'm awful glad she's comin', just so ye kin see her. Ye won't never forgit her when ye do. She's got six months more, then she's comin' home for a spell until she goes teachin'," and a look of exultant pride and joy of which I had never believed her capable came into her eyes.

Marvin turned his head and in a half angry way said:

"It's 'bout time. Little good ye've had o' her for the last four years with yer fool notions 'bout eddication." And he put on his hat and went out.

"How old is your daughter?" I asked, more to soften the effect of Marvin's brutal remark than anything else.

"She's seventeen, I guess, but she's big for her age."

The announcement came as a surprise. I had supposed from the way Jim had always spoken of her that she was a child of twelve. The possibilities of her camping out became all the more remote.

"And has she been away from you long this time?"

"'Bout four months. I didn't 'spect her to come till Christmas, till she wrote Jim to come for her. He allus fetches her. They'll be 'long 'bout dark."

I instantly determined to extend the heartiest of welcomes to this little daughter, not alone because of the mother and Jim, but because the home-coming of a young girl had always appealed to me as one of the most satisfying of all family events. My memory instinctively went back to the return of my own little bird, and of the many marvelous preparations begun weeks before in honor of the event. I saw again in my mind the wondrous curtains, stiff and starched, hung at the windows and about the high posts of the quaint bedstead that had sheltered her from childhood; I remembered the special bakings and brewings and the innumerable bundles, big and little, that were tucked away under secretive sofas and the thousand other surprises that hung upon her coming. This little wood pigeon should have my best attention, however simple and plain might be her plumage.

Moreover, I was more than curious to see what particular kind of a fledgling could be born to these two parent birds—one so hard and unsympathetic and the other so kind and simple. Jim, I remembered, had always spoken enthusiastically of Ruby, but then Jim always spilled over the edges whenever he spoke of the things he loved, whether they were dogs, trees, flowers or brilliant young maidens.

At nine o'clock that night my ear caught the sound of wheels; then came Jim's "Whoa! Bess," and the mother threw wide the door and caught her daughter in her arms.

"Oh, mother!" the girl cried, "wasn't it good I could come?" and she kissed her again. Then she turned to me—I had followed out in the starlight—"Uncle Jim sent me word you were here, and I was so glad. I've always wanted to see somebody paint, and Uncle Jim says he's sure you will let me go sketching with you. I wasn't coming home with the other girls until I got his letter and knew that you were here."

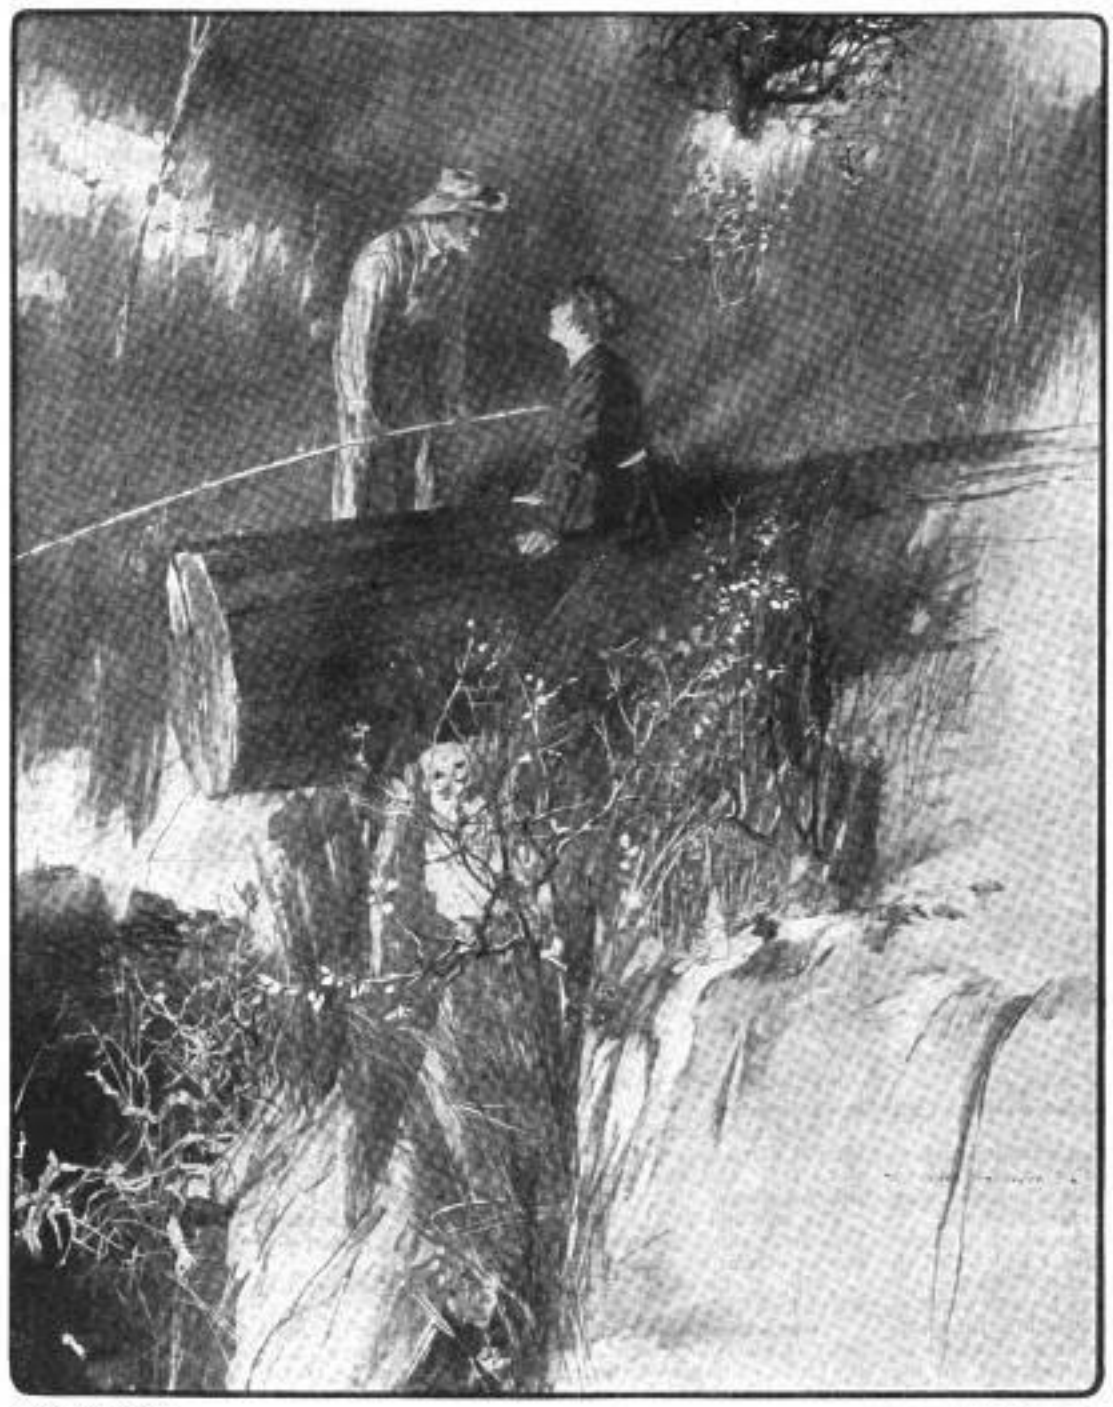
She said this frankly and simply, without the slightest embarrassment, and without a trace of any dialect in her speech. Jim evidently had not exaggerated her attainments. She had, too, unconsciously to herself, solved one of the mysteries that surrounded me. If Jim was her uncle it must be on her mother's side; it certainly could not be on Marvin's.

"And I'm glad, too," I replied. "Of course you shall go, and Jim tells me also that you are as good a woodsman as he is. And so Jim's your uncle, is he? He never told me that."

"Oh, no," she answered quickly, with a little deprecatory air. "He isn't my real uncle. He's just Jim, but I've always called him Uncle Jim ever since I was a little girl. And I love him dearly; don't I, Uncle Jim?" and she turned toward him as he entered the door carrying her bundle, followed by her father with the kerosene lamp, Marvin having brought it out to help Jim unload the buckboard.

"That's what ye allus says, baby-girl," answered Jim, "so I got to believe it. And if I didn't, there wouldn't be no use o' livin'—not a mite." There was a vibrating tenderness in the man's voice, and an indescribable pathos in its tone, as he spoke, that caused me instinctively to turn my head and look into his face.

The light shone full upon it—so full and direct that there were no shadows anywhere. Whether it was because of the lamp's direct rays or because of his long ride in the crisp November air, I could not decide, but certain it was that Jim's face was without a wrinkle, and that he looked twenty years younger. Even the hard, drawn lines about his mouth and nose had disappeared.



With the light of the lamp came another revelation. While the girl's cheap woolen dress and jacket, of a pattern sold in the country stores, showed her to be the product of Marvin's home and the recipient of his scanty bounty, her trim, well-rounded figure, soft, glossy hair—now that her hat was off—and small hands and feet, classed her as one of far gentler birth. There was, too, as she passed in and out of the room helping her mother with the supper-table, a certain grace and dignity, especially in the way in which she bent her head on one side to listen, a gesture often seen in a drawing-room, but never, in my experience, in a cabin. What astonished me most, however, were her hands—her exquisitely modeled hands, still ruddy from the fresh night air, but so wonderfully curved and dimpled. And then, too, the perfect graciousness and simplicity of her manner and its absolute freedom from coquetry or self-consciousness. Her mother was right—I would not soon forget her. And yet, by what freak of Nature, I found myself continually repeating, had this flower been made to bloom on this soil? Through what ancestor's veins had this blood trickled, and through what channels had it reached these humble occupants of a forest home?

But if her mother was the happier for her coming, Jim, radiant with joy, seemed to walk on air. His head was up, his arms were swinging free, and there was a lightness and spring in his movements that made me forget the grotesqueness of his gait. Nor, as the days went by, did this buoyant happiness ever fail him. He and Ruby were inseparable from the time she opened the rude door of her bedroom in the morning until she bade us all good-night and carried with her all the light and charm and joyousness of the day. The camping-out, I may as well state, had been given up as soon as I had mentioned it, she saying to me with a little start, as if frightened at the proposition, that she thought she'd better stay home and help her mother. Then, seeing Jim's face fall, she added, "But we can be off all day, can't we?"

And Jim answered that it was all right, just as Ruby said—that we would go fishing instead, and that he had spotted an old trout that lived in a hole down the East Branch that he'd been saving for her, and that he had tied the day before the "very fly that will fix him"—all of which was true, for Ruby landed him the next day with all the skill of a professional, besides a dozen smaller ones whose haunts Jim knew.

And so the weeks flew by, Ruby tramping the forest daily between us or sitting beside me as I painted, noting every stroke of my brush and asking me innumerable questions as to the choice of colors and the mixing of the tints. At other times she would ply me with questions, making me tell her of the things I had seen abroad and of the cities and peoples she had read of; or she would talk of the books she had studied, and of others she wanted to read. Jim would listen eagerly, with a certain pride in his eyes that she knew so much and could talk so well, and when we were alone he would comment on it:

"Nearly catched ye, didn't she? I see once or twice ye were stumped clean out o' yer boots on them questions she fired. How her little head holds it all is what bothers me.

DRAWN BY HENRY HUTT

"I AIN'T GOT NOBODY BUT YOU, RUBY—DON'T GO 'WAY FROM ME, CHILD"

Digitized by Google

But I allus knowed how it would be; I told the old man so ten year ago. Ain't one o' 'em 'round here kin touch her."

At night, under the kerosene lamp in the cabin, she would ask me to read aloud, she looking up into my face and drinking in every word, the others listening, Jim watching every expression that crossed her face.

Dear old Jim! I can still see your tender, shrinking eyes peering at her from under your bushy eyebrows and still hear the low ripple of your merry laugh over her volleys of questions. You were so proud of her and so happy in those days! So tender in touch, so gentle of voice, so constant in care! My heart still aches for you when my memory goes back to the bitter hours which followed.

One morning I had some letters to write, and Ruby and Jim took the rods and went up the brook without me. They both begged me to go, Ruby being particularly urgent, I thought, but I had already delayed the mail too long and so refused point-blank—too abruptly, perhaps, as I thought afterward, when I remembered the keen look of disappointment in her face. When she reëntered the cabin alone an hour later she passed me hurriedly, and calling out to her father that Jim was wanted at the sawmill to fix the wheel and would not be back until morning, shut herself into her room before I could offer myself in Jim's place—which I would gladly have done, now that her morning's pleasure had been spoiled.

When she joined us at supper—she had kept her room all day—I saw that her eyes were red, as if she had been crying. I knew then that I had offended her.

"Ruby, I really couldn't go," I said. "You don't feel cross about it, do you?"

"Oh, no," she answered with some earnestness. "And I knew you were busy."

"And about Jim—what's the matter with the wheel?" I asked, greatly relieved at the discovery that whatever troubled her, my staying at home had not caused it.

"One of the buckets is broken—Uncle Jim always fixes it," and she turned her head away to hide her tears.

"Is Jim a carpenter, too?" I asked with a smile.

"Why, yes," she replied. "Didn't you know that? They often send for him to fix the mill. There's no one else about here who can." And she changed the conversation and began talking of the beauty of that part of the brook where they had been to fish, and of the rich brown tint of the water in the pools, and how the lovely red sumacs reflected in their depths enriched their color.

The next morning, and without any previous warning, Ruby appeared in her cloth dress and jacket and announced her intention of taking the stage back to Plymouth, adding that as Jim had not returned, Marvin must drive her over to the cross-roads. I offered my services, but she declined them graciously but firmly, bidding me good-by and saying with one of her earnest looks, as she held my hand in hers, that she should never forget my kindness to Jim, and that she would always remember me for what I had done for him, and then she added with peculiar tenderness:

"And dear Uncle Jim won't forget you, either."

And so she had gone, and with her had faded all the light and joyousness of the place.

When Jim returned the next day I was at work in the pasture painting a group of white birches. I hallooed to him as he shambled along within a hundred yards of me, swinging his arms, but he did not answer except to turn his head.

That night at table he replied to my questions in monosyllables, explaining his not stopping when I had called in the morning by saying that he didn't want to "'sturb me," and when I laughed and told him—using his own words—that Ruby "wouldn't pass a fellow and give him the dead, cold shake," he pushed back his chair with a sudden impatient gesture, said he had forgotten something, and left the table without a word or look in reply.

I knew then that I had hurt him in some way.

"What's the matter with Jim, Mr. Marvin? He seems put out about something. Did he say anything to you?" I asked, astonished at Jim's behavior, and anxious for some clue by which to solve its mystery.

"Got one o' his spells on. Gits that way sometimes, and when he does ye can't git no good out o' him. I want them turnips dug, and he's got to do it or git out. I ain't hired him to loaf 'round all day with Ruby and to sulk when she's gone. I'm a-payin' him wages right along, ain't I?" he added with some fierceness as he stopped at the door. "What he gits for fixin' the mill ain't nothin' to me—I don't git a cent on it." I did not reply. I knew that these days, too, I should find itemized on my weekly bill.

III

WHEN the morning came and Jim had not returned I started for the mill. I found him alone, sitting idly on a bench near the water-wheel. I had heard the hum of the saw before I reached the dam and knew that he had finished his work.

"Jim," I said, walking up to him and extending my hand, "if I have done anything to hurt your feelings I'm awfully sorry. If I had known you would have been put out by my not going with Ruby I would have let the mail wait."

He took my hand mechanically, but he did not raise his eyes. The old look had returned to his face, as if he were afraid of some sudden blow. "I did all I could to make Ruby's visit a happy one—don't you know I did?" I continued.

He leaned forward, his elbows resting on his knees, his eyes still on the ground. There was something infinitely pathetic in the attitude.

"Ye ain't done nothin' to me," he answered slowly, "and ye ain't done nothin' to Ruby. I cottoned to ye fust time I see ye, and so did Ruby, and we still do. It ain't that."

"Well, what is it, then? Why have you kept away from me?"

He arose wearily until his whole length was erect, hooked his long arms behind his back and began walking up and down the platform. He was no longer my comrade of the woods. The spring and buoyancy of his step had gone out of him. He seemed shriveled and bent, as if some sudden weakness had overcome him. His face was white and drawn, and the eyelids drooped, as if he had not slept.

At the second turn he stopped, gazed abstractedly at the boards under his feet, as a man sometimes does when his mind is on other things. Mechanically he stooped to pick up a small iron nut that had slipped from one of the bolts used in repairing the wheel, and in the same abstracted way, still ignoring me, raised it to his eye, looked through the hole for a moment and then tossed it into the dam. The splash of the iron striking the water frightened a bird, which arose in the air, sang a clear, sweet note, and disappeared in the bushes on the opposite bank. Jim started, turned his head quickly, following the flight of the bird, and sank slowly back upon the bench, his face in his hands.

"There it is again," he cried out. "Every way I turn it's the same thing. I can't even chuck nothin' overboard but I hear it."

DRAWN BY HENRY HUTT

—I found him in one of his upland woods

"Hear what?" The keen anguish expressed in his voice had alarmed me.

"That song-sparrow—did ye hear it? I tell ye this thing'll drive me crazy. I tell ye I can't stand it—I can't stand it." And he turned his head and covered his face with his sleeve.

The outburst and gesture only intensified my anxiety. Was Jim's mind giving away? I arose from my seat and bent over him, my hand on his arm.

"Why, that's only a bird, Jim—I saw it—it's gone into the bushes."

"Yes, I know it; I seen it; that's what hurts me; that's what's allus goin' to hurt me. And 'tain't only goin' to be the birds. It's goin' to be the trees and the gray-backs and the trout we catched, and everywhere I look and every place I go to it's goin' to be the same thing. And it ain't never goin' to be no better—never—never—long as I live. She said so. Them was her very words. I ain't never goin' to forgit 'em." And he leaned his head in a baffled, tired way against the planking of the mill.

"Who said so, Jim?" I asked.

Jim raised his head, looked me straight in the face and, with the tears starting in his eyes, answered in a low voice:

"Ruby. She loves 'em—loves every one o' 'em. Oh, what's goin' to become o' me now, anyhow?"

"Well, but I don't——" The revelation came to me before I could complete the sentence. Jim's face had told the story of his heart!

"Jim," I said, laying my hand on his shoulder, "do you love Ruby?"

"Sit down here," he said in a hopeless, despondent voice, "and mebbe I'll git grit enough to tell ye. I ain't never told none o' the folks that comes up here o' how things was, but I'm goin' to tell you. And I'm goin' to tell it to ye plumb from the beginnin', too." And a sigh like the moan of one in pain escaped him.

"Twelve years ago I come here from New York. I'd been cleaned out o' everything I had by a man I trusted, and I was flat broke. I didn't care where I went, so's I got away from the city and from people. I wanted to git somewheres out into the country, and so I got aboard the train and kep' on till I'd struck Plymouth. There my money gin out and I started up the road into the mountains. I thought I'd hire out to some choppers for the winter. When night come I see a light and knocked at the door and Jed opened it. He warn't goin' to keep me, but he was a-buildin' the shed where the old mare is now, and he found out I was handy with the tools and didn't want no wages, only my board, so he let me stay. The next spring he hired me regular and give me wages every month. I kep' along, choppin' in the winter and helpin' 'round the place, and in summer goin' out with the parties that come up from the city, helpin' 'em fish and hunt. I liked that, for I loved the woods ever since I was a boy, when I used to go off by myself and stay days and nights with nothin' but a tin can o' grub and a blanket. That's why I come here when I went broke.

"One summer there come a feller from Boston to fish. He brought his wife along, and I used to go out with both o' 'em. The man's wife was puttin' up for some o' them children's homes, and she used to talk to Marm Marvin about takin' one o' the children and what a comfort it would be to the child to git out into the fresh air, and one mornin' 'fore she left she took Jed down in the woods and talked to him, and the week after she left for home Marm Marvin sent me over to the station—same place I fetched ye—and out she got with a tag sewed on her jacket and her name on it, and a bundle o' clothes no bigger'n yer head. She was 'bout seven or eight years old, and the cunnin'est young un ye ever see. Jus' the same eyes she's got now, only they looked bigger, 'cause her cheeks was caved in."

"Not Ruby, Jim!" I cried in astonishment.

"Yes, Ruby. That's what was on the tag."

"And she isn't Marvin's child?"

"No more'n she's yourn, nor mine. She ain't nobody's child that anybody knows about. She's jus' Ruby, and that's all there is to her.

"Well, by the time I'd got her out to the farm and had heared her talk and seen her clap her hands at the chippies, and laugh at the birds, and go half wild over every little thing she'd see, I knowed I'd got hold o' something that filled up every crack o' my heart. And she didn't come a day too soon, for Jed had got so ugly there warn't no livin' with him, and I'd made up my mind to quit, and I would if he hadn't took a streak ag'in Ruby at the start. Then I knowed where my trail led. And arter that I never let her out o' my sight. Marm Marvin was different. She never had no child o' her own, and she warmed up to Ruby more'n more every day, and she loves her now much as she kin love anything.

"That fust winter we had a good deal o' snow and I made a pair o' leggins for her out o' a deer's skin I'd killed, and rigged up a sled, and I'd haul her after me wherever I went, and when school opened down to the cross-roads I'd haul her down and bring her back if the snow warn't too deep, and when summer come she'd go 'long jus' the same. I taught her to fish and shoot, and often she'd stay out in camp with me all night when I was tendin' the sugar maples—she sleepin' on the balsams with my coat throwed over her.

"Things went on this way till 'bout three years ago, when I see she warn't gittin' ahead fast as she could, and I went for the old man to send her to school down to Plymouth. Marm Marvin was willin', but Jed held out, and at last he give in after my talkin' to him. So I hooked up the buckboard and drove her down to Plymouth and left her, with her arms 'round my neck and the tears streamin' down her face. But she was game all the same, only she hated to have me leave her.

"Every July and Christmas I'd go for her, and she'd allus be waitin' for me at the head o' the stairs or would come runnin' down with her arms wide open, and she'd kiss me and hug me and call me dear Uncle Jim, and tell me how she loved me, and how there warn't nothin' in the world she loved so much; and then when she'd git home we'd tramp the woods together every chance we got."

Jim stopped and bent forward, his face in his hands, his elbows on his knees. For a time he was silent; then he went on:

"This last time when I went for her she pretty nigh took my breath away. She seemed just as glad to see me, but she didn't git into my arms as she useter, and she looked different, too. She had growed every way bigger, and wider, and older. I kep' a-lookin' at her, tryin' to find the little girl I'd left some months afore, but she warn't there. She acted different, too—more quiet like and still, so that I was feared to touch her like I useter, and took it out in talkin' to her and listenin' to all she told me o' what she was larnin', and how this winter she was goin' to git through and git her certificate, and then she was goin' to teach and help her mother—she allus called Marm Marvin mother. Then she told me o' how one o' the teachers—a young fellow from a college—was goin' to set up a school o' his own and goin' to git some o' the graduates to help teach when he got started, and how he had asked her to be one o' 'em, and how she was goin' with him.

"Since you been here and us three been together and I begun to see how happy she was a-talkin' to you and askin' you questions, I got worse'n ever over her. I begun to see that I warn't what I had been to her. When we was trampin' and fishin' it was all right and she'd talk to me 'bout the ways o' the birds and what flowers come up fust and all that, but when it got to geography and history I warn't in it with her, and you was. That sickened me more'n ever. Pretty soon I began to feel as if everything I had in life was slippin' away from me. I didn't want her to shut me out from anything she had. I wanted to have half, same's we allus had—half for me and half for her. Why, lately, when I lay awake nights a-thinkin' it over, I've wished sometimes that she hadn't growed up at all, and that she'd allus be my baby-girl and I her Uncle Jim.

Digitized by Google

"Yesterday mornin'——" Jim's voice broke, and he cleared his throat. "Yesterday mornin' we went down the branch, as ye know, and she was a-settin' on a log throwin' her fly into the pool, when one o' them song sparrows lit on a bush and looked at her, and begin to sing like he'd bust his little chest, and she sung back at him with her eyes a-laughin' and her hair a-flyin', and I stood lookin' at her and my heart choked up in my throat, and I leaned over and took the rod out o' her hand.

"'Baby-girl,' I says, 'there ain't a bird 'round here that ain't got a mate, and that's what makes 'em so happy. I ain't got nobody but you, Ruby—don't go 'way from me, child—stay with me.' And I told her. She looked at me startled like, same as a deer does when he hears a dog bark; then she jumped up and begin to cry.

"'Oh, Jim—Jim—dear Jim!' she says. 'I love you so, and you've been so good to me all my life, but don't—don't never say that to me again. That can never be—not so long as we live.' And she dropped down on the ground and cried till she couldn't git her breath. Then she got up and kissed my hands and went home, leavin' me there alone feelin' like I'd fell off a scaffoldin' and struck the sidewalk."

Jim arose from his seat and began pacing the platform again. I had not spoken a word through his long story.

"Jim," I began, "how old are you?"

"Forty-two," he said in a patient, listless way.

"More than twice as old as Ruby, aren't you? Old enough, really, to be her father. You love her, don't you—love her for herself—not yourself? You wouldn't let anything hurt her if you could help it. You were right when you said every bird has its mate. That's true, Jim, and the way it ought to be—but they mate with this year's birds, not last year's. When men get as old as you and I we forget these things sometimes, but they are true all the same."

"I know it," he broke out, "I know it; you can't tell me nothin' about it. I thought it all over more'n a hundred times lately. I could bite my tongue off for sayin' what I did to her, and spilin' her visit, but it's done now and I can't help it, and I've got to stay here and bear it."

"No, Jim, don't stay here. So long as she sees you around here she'll be unhappy, and you will be equally miserable. Go away from here; find work somewhere else."

"When?" he said quietly.

"Now; right away; before she comes back at Christmas."

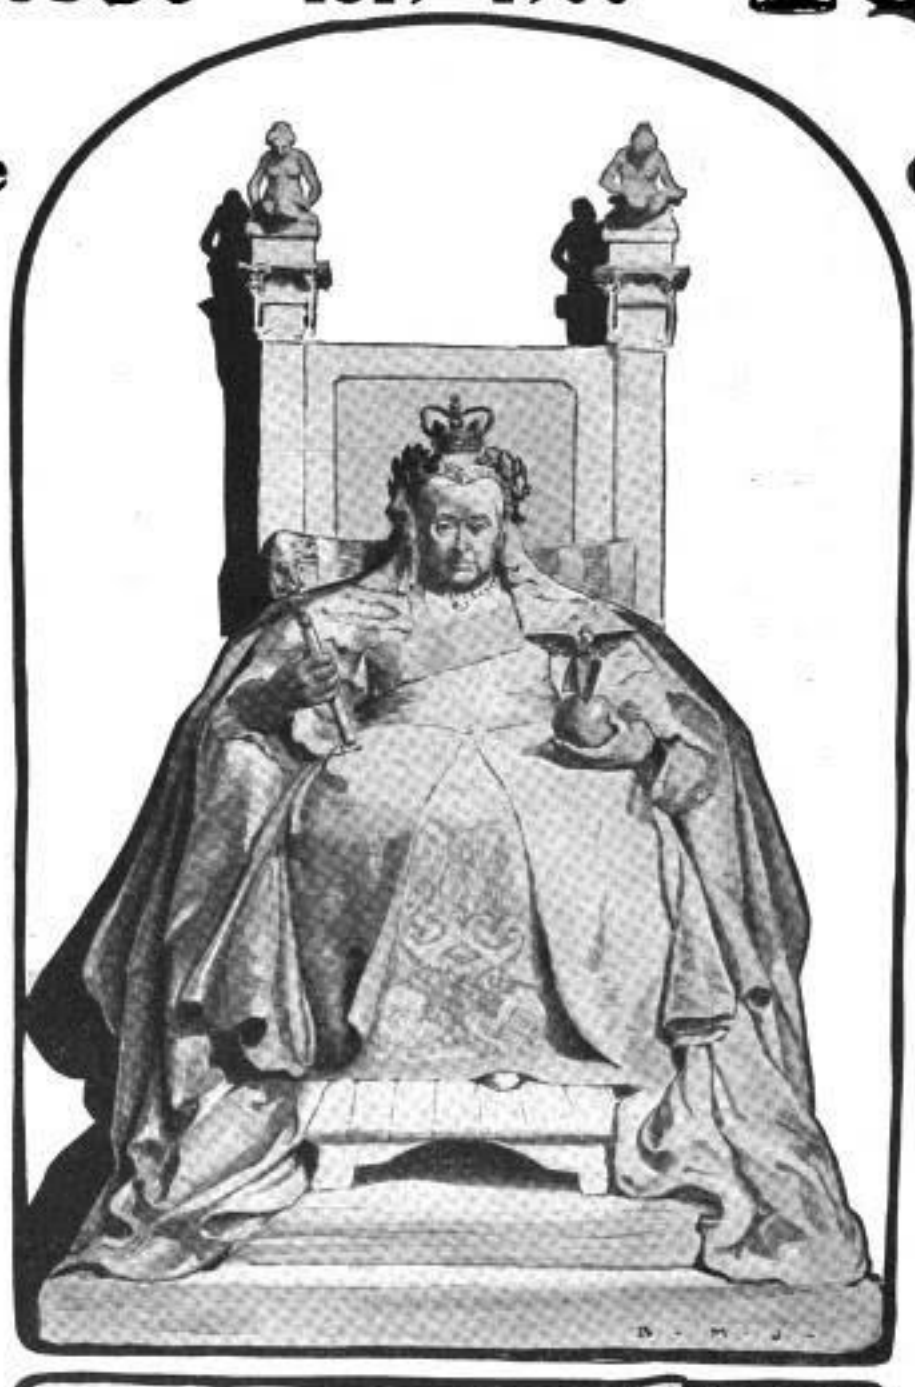
"No, I can't do it, and I won't. Not till she graduates and gits her certificate. That'll be next June."

"What's that got to do with it?"

"Got a good deal to do with it. If I should leave now jes's winter's comin' on I mightn't git another job, and she'd have to come home and her eddication be sp'ilt."

"What would bring her home?" I asked in surprise.

"What would bring her home?" he repeated with some irritation. "Why they'd send her if the bills warn't paid—that's what. Marm Marvin couldn't help her, and Jed wouldn't give her a cent. Them school bills, you know, I've always paid out o' my wages—that's why Jed let her go. No; I'll stick it out here till she finishes, if it kills me. Baby-girl shan't miss nothin' through me."



One beautiful spring day I swung back the gate of a garden on the outskirts of the village of Plymouth and walked up a flower-bordered path to a cottage porch smothered in vines.

Ruby was standing in the door, her hands held out to me. I had not seen her for years. Her husband had not returned yet from their school, but she expected him every minute.

"And dear old Jim?" I asked. "What has become of him?" "Look," she said, pointing to a shambling, awkward figure stooping under the apple trees, which were in full bloom. "There he is, picking blossoms with little Ruby. He never leaves her for a minute."

The Greatest — 1819–1900 — Queen in the World

By Marie Corelli

AFTER THE STATUE BY GEORGE EXHAUSTION, R. A.

SHOW me, then, whether there be more to come than is past, or more past than is to come!"

Such was the prayer of the prophet Esdras, in Babylon, to the Angel who was sent from Heaven to instruct him. We, in our generation, may ask the same question to-day of the Recording Angel of the world's history, who stands forever among us, mute but observant: "Show us whether there be more to come than is past, or more past than is to come!"

For it is difficult to grasp the idea of any more perfect monarch's reign than that of our beloved Queen and Empress; it is well-nigh impossible to imagine a more magnificent Empire than the one over which she holds her dominion. All the great kingdoms of ancient days fade into insignificance beside the grandeur, the progress, the steadfast making for Truth, Justice and Freedom which preëminently distinguish the British rule; and the power, the brute force, the barbaric ostentation of conquest and egotism of the Roman Cæsars vanish like a mist of the marshes when confronted and compared with the one clear light of unsullied goodness in the heart of the "Mother of Nations"—the simple woman who, by pure love and faith, has done more than countless legions of fighting men could ever do for the glory of the country, and has fulfilled a far higher destiny and won a far greater fame than any conqueror who ever ruled by fear. Victories are hers by sea and land; victories not only over territories and peoples, but over barbarous systems of slavery, superstition and prejudice; victories of enlightenment and civilization; victories in science, in discovery, in learning, in education and national advancement—these cluster around her throne and adorn it more brilliantly than priceless jewels can adorn her imperial crown.

But her influence is of that deep and gentle and convincing nature which is felt more than seen, and it extends, not only through her own "Happy Isles," but away out to the younger children of her love, those far-off and faithful Colonies, springing up in their youthful and splendid vigor to take active part in the grand work of supporting and maintaining at their highest culmination the dignity and honor of Great Britain. It is an influence which appeals to the best instincts of all men and all women, the home-influence, the mother-love. In all history we can find no king or queen of England who has been so much and so truly the head of the national home as Queen Victoria. She is truly the Greatest Queen in the World.

It is a curious fact that there are very few civilized countries where woman's work is made such a butt for men's contemptuous ridicule as in England. The Englishman is ever quick to sneer at woman's advancement in art, in literature, in scholarship and general intellectual ability, yet all the while 'tis a woman who rules him, and to a woman alone he is compelled to bend the knee! Off goes his hat at sight of the Queen! cheers break from his throat at the proclaimed words, "the Queen!" "knights and earls, and knaves and churls" bow their heads to "the Queen!" And with all peoples and in all countries there seems to be only one Queen to whom the article "the" can be applied without further modification. Other Queens are qualified in their estate by the land over which they rule—as, for example, Queen of Italy, Queen of Greece, Empress of Germany, Empress of Russia; but when "the Queen" is said every one means England's Victoria. Of all queens the greatest, she is of all women the simplest, and herein gives matchless example to her sex. Above the splendors of her position and enthronement, she is preëminently woman in the sweetest and most womanly sense of the word—one who is gifted with quick, fine sympathies, and who has the supreme and exquisite tact which is, or should be, inherent in every true and unselfish feminine nature, combined with perfect self-command, flawless purity and a strong, personal potency for good. Throned and crowned and sceptred in the fierce light of the whole world's constant observation, she yet remains as unaffected and sincere of soul as the most unsophisticated of her subjects and is in very truth one with them in the ordinary round of their daily existence.

Are we bereaved of our best-beloved? So is the Queen. Have we suffered from evil-speaking and misjudgment? So has the Queen. And in our joys is she not equally one with us there? Do we find rest and pleasure in the natural beauty of the world, the perfume and color of flowers, the songs of birds? So does the Queen. Do we understand the winsome ways of little children and take delight in making them happy? So does the Queen.

In all quiet, natural and innocent pleasures the Queen is one with her subjects; it is only in social vice and folly that she takes no part.

Perhaps there was never a time more convincingly marked by the Queen's mother-love for her people than now, while the war in South Africa is still claiming the lives of many whom England can ill afford to lose. Her grief for the brave fellows who have fallen, her sympathy and care for the bereaved ones left to face their desolate lives alone, her interest in every detail of the campaign,

Digitized by Google

her anxiety for every scrap of news from the front, her simple, womanly regret for the whole deadly quarrel, all this shows what a true and tender friend Englishmen have in their beloved Monarch. And when one remembers her great age, which she bears so cheerily and courageously, giving herself up without hesitation to whatever duties of state call her forth into public evidence, one's reverence is mingled with wonder and admiration that she can and will do so much to still more endear herself to all hearts. The soldiers might all be the sons of her blood from the tenderness she expresses concerning them. They are "My poor soldiers!" with her; they are not mere food for powder and shot as they have often been considered by former Sovereigns of England. "My poor soldiers!" Their wounds, their losses, their pains, their troubles are hers, too; she feels them with an acute sympathy, and her kind heart aches for Tommy's weariness, fevers, excitements and general irritation when he is "sent home invalided" and craves to go out again. There is in her gentle, noble nature none of the indifference to his fate suggested in the verse:

"What did you get to eat and drink,
Johnnie, Johnnie?"
"Standing water as thick as ink,
Johnnie, my Johnnie, aha!
A bit o' beef that were three year stored,
A bit o' mutton as tough as a board,
And a fowl we killed with a sergeant's sword,
When the widow give the party."

This is scarcely the right spirit to foster between the sovereign and her fighting men. When the warriors of old time shaped England's greatness and laid down the lines of glory and honor for future generations to follow, they did not count up personal troubles or hardships, they never complained of long marches or scant fare, nor, let it be well remembered, have they ever complained at all of any of their sufferings—not now, or at any time. They have never "begged" the nation's charity—not now, or at any time. Two or three newspapers in want of "copy" may complain and beg for them, but they themselves have nothing to say but one thing—Duty! They have never called themselves "beggars." If they once began to take this low estimate of their profession, the prestige of the army would soon be at an end. If they started grumbling at "barbarious wars," or at their rations "when the widow give the party," there would soon be seething rebellion, where there is now loyalty, devotion and heroic indifference to merely physical inconvenience. But they know themselves and their calling too well to do this. They know, each and every man of them, that there is no one who feels greater sympathy for them than the Queen they serve; and that when she thanks her brave men for brave deeds bravely done, her gratitude comes from the heart and not from the lips alone. Her recent visits to the hospitals where her wounded soldiers lie have borne ample evidence to this. Her instincts are all those of sympathy, gentleness and love.

Whenever the Queen acts upon her own initiative, something good, something generous, something graceful is the result. How much the country may have to regret from interference with her inward wishes we shall perhaps never know, but this is very certain, that if Her Gracious Majesty had been able to do as her own fine feeling dictated she would have gone to Ireland long ago. She would, without doubt, have visited it as often as she visited the French Riviera, and we may be quite sure that the Irish people would never have returned her kindness by insult as the French have done. For though we do not consider the low boulevard press as representing the voice of France, one would like to see a more general rising of warm protest among the French at the offense perpetrated by one, or a few, of their countrymen against the Queen, whose noble reputation, as well as whose reverend age, should insure her safety from this kind of coarse indignity.

The Queen's Aloofness from Smart Society

One wonders, glancing back through the history of the triumphant reign of this great and good Sovereign, how things might have been if the Prince Consort had lived! If the Queen, instead of being driven by deep grief and heartbreak to retire into more or less privacy, had continually appeared at the head and front of society and taken enthusiastic part in all its doings! Certainly there would have been a very different state of things to that which exists at present. We venture to think divorces would not be so common. And it is just possible that some of the aristocracy would be leading very different lives, and that so many of them would not be seen at Monte Carlo season after season, gambling away their reputations and virtues together. The Queen's steadfast, beautiful example of life would have been more faithfully followed by the majority than it is, and the entrée into the Upper Ten would not have been given to the newest South African millionaire. To be presented at Court would have been really a distinctive sign of honor and high standing, not a mere form of social custom and usage in which flaunting Vice rubs shoulders with modest Virtue. The atrocious vulgarity, slang and open licentiousness of the so-called "smart set" would never have disgraced our English breeding; in fact, it is extremely doubtful whether this same "smart set" would have existed at all—or if it had existed, it would not have been termed "smart," but rather the contrary. The personal friends of the Queen are men and women of upright and honorable life, and there is a very strong, visible line of demarcation between Her Majesty's guests and what is called "society." In London this line of demarcation is not so quickly and generally observable as it is in the provinces. London is a seething whirlpool of incessant excitement, incessant "rush," incessant competition; and perhaps one of the fiercest struggles going on in it to-day is the fight between Honor and Disgrace—whether to live well or live ill—whether to sell the soul to Mammon or keep it clean for God; and between the great houses that "receive" the Phrynes and Aspasias of the stage and those who pay servile worship to the speculator there is very little to choose. And to many of the more thoughtful among Her Majesty's subjects the untimely death of the Prince Consort is the only cloud upon the brightness of her glorious reign—not only because of the irremediable grief it caused to the Queen, but also because it has deprived the social world of that closer influence and more constant guidance which from her would have been of such inestimable advantage not only to us but to all nations. However, despite the sorrows which have separated her in certain ways from the world of fashion and amusement, she remains the guiding light of everything good in our society.

Queen Victoria's Visit to Ireland

How warmly and heartily the Irish people appreciate the firm courage and womanly grace of Her Majesty's visit need not here be emphasized. Those who are inclined to indulge in rankling thoughts of the past and to dwell on old injuries and bitterness should try to feel and to realize that it is not their gentle and gracious Queen who has of her own will and wish appeared to neglect them. It should be remembered that she is a constitutional Sovereign and must generally do as her Ministers bid. Never has such an opportunity occurred for her boldly to take her own initiative as now, when the dauntless, high-spirited sons of Erin have fought and died for her cause. With that fine perception and instinctive tact inherent in her nature, the Queen has recognized that now or never must her children of the Emerald Isle learn that the mother love of her heart is as warm for them as it is for all her glorious Household of Nations, and that the loss of her Irish sons who have been stricken down in battle for her honor has caused her as much grief and as many tears as even they, in their passionate exigency of need and clamor for love, could demand. Great was the joy and pride of England on this last St. Patrick's Day, when the bright green flag emblazoned with the Harp of Erin floated beside the Royal Standard from many a window in many a city and town, and willingly and with light hearts did the people, one and all, obey their Queen-Mother's command and wear the bright little shamrock on their breasts as a sign of affection not only for their Sovereign but for their sister island. Lovely Ireland, with its purple hills, deep green valleys, lakes and streams, has been for a long time like the "ugly duckling" of the fairy fable; but we must not forget how that much-tormented bird, whom none of its brothers and sisters could understand on account of its "strange ways," turned out to be the fairest of the brood, after all, and developed into the graceful beauty of the swan. With tenderness, with care, with affection where there has been mistrust, with fraternity where there has been dispute, Erin will realize this transfiguration in herself and mark the days on which her great Queen-Mother came to rest under her protection as a golden time in her calendar. No brighter daughter of the home does Victoria possess than Erin; her face is one of the sweetest, her heart one of the staunchest. Poetry, romance, beauty distinguish her; and when she sends her warriors out to fight there are few that can match them or resist them. Little need be said for the Irish women, whose standard for upright living and chastity is the highest in the world, or for the sweet, wild Irish girls with their bright eyes and dark tangles of hair and lovely, laughing, animated faces. The Queen, in her good heart, cannot but rejoice to know of such fresh youth and beauty and unspoilt innocence, flourishing as the flowers flourish in this mossy dell-like corner of her Empire. The gallant Irish heroes who have fallen in the fight have not perished in vain, if their memory brings the Queen closer to Irish hearts and makes her one of them.

What the Queen Has Done for Her Own Sex

With the summer that is now breaking in upon us we may hope that peace will come like the dove of the ark, flying across the troubled waters and bringing good news of rest. For the Queen's sake we pray that this may be; and that the clouds which have darkened the skies so threateningly may disperse in clear sunshine. England wants all nations to understand that she desires brotherhood rather than enmity, love instead of hatred. The country has been blessed abundantly with good things, and it will be impossible for future history to chronicle a more glorious era of advancement in good works and good feeling than that of Victoria, Queen and Empress.

A universal charity has prevailed throughout the realm; never have the poor had so much done for them, never have the sick been so carefully housed and tended, never has any one with skill and determination had better chances of fortune than now. And, despite the fact previously alluded to, that there is no civilized country where woman's work meets with so much flippant ridicule from the casual man as in England, the intellectual progress of woman under a woman's government has been steady and triumphant. This fact alone is a distinctive mark of the Queen's great epoch. This may or may not be due to the Queen's influence, or the consciousness that all have, that the Sovereign, though the ruler of the most magnificent Empire in existence, is still—only a woman! Whatever may be the cause, the fact is there; and the intellectual capacity of women workers in Great Britain is bound to reach a very high level.

Everything has advanced and made for the better in Victoria's reign, and only one section of society persistently harks back to the worser morals and manners of Charles the Second's period. That, however, is a small section, and by the natural course of events is gradually beginning to destroy itself. And when history writes the record of Victoria's long and brilliant reign the small blots on society's scutcheon will vanish as though they had never been, and the persons who have made those blots will be "passed over" as unimportant items of ill-assorted fare in a full feast of plenty. And the glorious name and fame of the one Queen in England's history who is truly the mother of her people will shine like the sun in a cloudless sky. There is no one so good as she is, so simple, so kind, so thoughtful of her subjects. Her little hand holds a great Empire in the gentle grasp of loving-kindness. She is the bond of union between the Old World and the New. Her spirit is with her brave soldiers on the field of battle, and, whenever she can, she takes her welcome presence to them when they are brought home wounded and disabled. She evinces a constant, active interest in the work of foreign peoples despite foreign insult; she sends her greeting to the sons and daughters of her loyal Colonies with all the tenderness she truly feels; and wherever her name is spoken it is received with veneration and homage. Unique in goodness, unique in power, unique in history, she is, in her great age and continued vigor, the crowning splendor of her splendid reign.

"God save the Queen" is no mere formula; it is the prayer of a mighty people, a people of various climes and colors and creeds, all differing in opinion but all banded together in one great family of union and defense under the one mother whose love has never failed them and never will fail them, Victoria, the greatest Queen in the world!

Digitized by Google

What the Isthmian Canal Will Do For The Pacific Coast — By James D. Phelan, Mayor of San Francisco

BEFORE the day of railroads the sea was the great highway of commerce, and cities were built by navigable streams for the sake of water communication. But the United States, bent upon internal development, seems during these latter years to have neglected the ocean for the plain and the river for the rail. The trade of inland cities was stimulated and it vied with that of the great maritime ports; but now there is an impending change. The advantages possessed by cities having navigable waterways at their doors, everything else being equal, must ultimately confer commercial supremacy.

Railroad combinations and monopolies by exacting high rates, based very often upon inflated indebtedness or inordinate greed, render the iron horse a capricious and extravagant servant. Therefore we find the canals of New York State generously patronized, and in this so-called railroad age so important an enterprise as the Manchester ship canal is inaugurated. It was found there that it was necessary to unite the city directly with the sea and depend no longer upon the unstable union of the rail and the sail.

The triumphant poet of the great ocean sings to the sea:

"Man marks the earth with ruin, his control stops with thy shore."

The sea is a free highway for the use of the people of the world. No man can call it his own. Rights of way are neither asked nor given and by it transportation is cheapest. The sea-cities of this country and this coast will, however, cope with each other on a basis of the facilities for distribution which they offer and the port charges they exact. Railroads shall thus be made supplementary to, and not a substitute for, the ocean highway which they try to usurp.

Taking Advantage of the Pacific Opportunity

San Francisco, to which the Pacific Ocean has been unrolled as a scroll, and to which this vast expanse of water has been unveiled by the achievements of Dewey, must look to the sea. The "Pacific opportunity" shall be heeded. The coming of the Santa Fé Railroad to San Francisco this year may discipline the Southern Pacific and the distribution of cargoes coming and going may thus be facilitated. The Interstate Commerce Commission is now sitting in San Francisco to save to the city its natural advantages from unfair competition. With the canal we shall be better able to compete with Chicago and St. Louis as a distributing centre for the country west of the Rocky Mountains.

The Pacific trade is coming in leaps and bounds. Alaska, Hawaii, the Philippines, the possible dismemberment of China and the establishment of the policy of the "open door," the awakening of Japan, the construction of the Siberian Railroad and the Nicaragua Canal, show why San Francisco and the Pacific Coast are advancing. Sir Charles Beresford said that there were two cities which would be enormously benefited by the coming Chinese trade following the "open door," and they were San Francisco and Hankow. This is what he said in an authorized interview on his return last year from the Orient:

"MAYOR PHELAN: What relation do you think the Pacific Coast bears to the development of the Orient?

"LORD BERESFORD: Well, in my humble opinion, in the future there are two cities that will become the largest and the richest, merely because they are in the highway of trade. The depots, the distributors of trade, must be San Francisco and Hankow. Other cities, as Honolulu, will be great. Those cities must be great whatever policies are adopted.

"MAYOR PHELAN: How would the Nicaragua Canal affect the great highways?

"LORD BERESFORD: The canal will be a highway of its own. The chances are that the canal will cause trade to come to San Francisco. It may build up a city at its mouth; it is likely to do so. But I could not give an opinion as to that without going to the locality. It is a question of cost, of soundings, of what the initial expenditure will be, or would be, to make a great place at the mouth of that canal.

"DR. DAVID STARR JORDAN: Two great difficulties are lack of good harbor and the unwholesome climate.

"LORD BERESFORD: Those would militate against spending a great amount of money there. To make a new place you must spend money to develop it. Trade will come up here because men are not going to go straight across that enormous ocean. There must be a point of departure.

"DR. JORDAN: They must come up because it is cheaper than to carry coal for the whole distance.

"LORD BERESFORD: Certainly."

The Attempts to Bottle up San Francisco

Expanding trade must find an outlet. Barriers must be broken down. The Pacific Coast is cut off from the great centres of civilization by a continent and a sea. Railroad transportation is expensive and our merchants and producers languish under its exactions. Artificial conditions are created in the interest of the transcontinental railroads, which are to-day the principal opponents of the construction of the canal.

In 1878, the Union and Central Pacific Railroads forced San Francisco merchants to enter into special contracts. Those refusing could not get the railway service at all, and the condition was that the merchants contracting should abandon the sea and use the railroad exclusively. Until 1893, the date of its dissolution, the Transcontinental Association subsidized the Panama Steamship Company and the Pacific Mail in order to "bottle up" San Francisco and exclude its merchants from the advantages of the sea and its competitive rates. The merchants organized and fought back with some success, but the fact remains that the long route by the Horn has embarrassed the Pacific Coast and retarded its commercial development. How has it been embarrassed? Three thousand miles of continent and fifteen thousand miles of ocean stretch between us and the Atlantic seaboard. By means of the canal, the sea distance can be cut down to about five thousand miles. That is the main consideration.

Now the Pacific Coast of the United States consists of producers, rather than manufacturers, and as ocean freights are so very much lower than those by rail, the saving of distance, with a consequent diminution of time, means prosperity for the producer; whereas our lumber, wheat and fruit industries have so far yielded their deserved profits to the railroads. New York in eighteen days and Europe in twenty-five will give our merchants some control of the market. Now, most shipments are speculative and go forward to an uncertain goal.

California's Manufacturing Prospects

The East and Northern Europe will demand our fruits and fruit products in increasing quantities, and, by canal, refrigerator steamers can safely serve this great industry. Raw materials, coal and iron, will make return shipments profitable. Coal and iron are scarce on the coast. With them we can help to serve the local and even export demands for manufactured articles, although we have reason to believe that our oil wells and water power, generating electricity at little expense as they are now doing in limited fields, will raise us in a very few years to higher manufacturing rank.

The Pacific Coast needs a desirable population. California, with 157,000 square miles of territory, has less than 1,500,000 people. Railroad transportation is too expensive, so the canal will give us the benefits of a better class of settlers than those with which we are being afflicted. Asiatic countries have a teeming population. The Chinese once threatened to overrun the fair valleys of California, which would far better remain untouched by industry than be settled and tilled by these non-assimilative coolies, whose presence is an economic blight and a political danger. The Japanese now give evidence of a large impending immigration. California wants men, but wants the Caucasian, whose coöperation in building up the State as citizens and men of family gives them a value which cannot be estimated in money. The Asiatic is industrious and imitative and drives the American workman, on whose shoulders rest our schools, churches and homes, to the wall. Better no increased production than by these one-sided coolies. Let us trade with them at long range. American civilization demands it. There are those of the East who dissent from these views. The canal will admit, if needed, of Asiatic immigration elsewhere than the Pacific Coast, where it is now spawned, and give us a European immigration to which, under reasonable restrictions, we do not object.

Changes in the World's Commerce

The changes in the commerce of the world affected by the canal cannot be accurately forecast. It has been said that it will sweep by the Pacific Coast, and the commerce we have will be interrupted or destroyed. We are told by observers that Asiatic merchandise, which should naturally seek Pacific ports for distribution, is diverted by the Suez Canal to Eastern centres. The Nicaragua Canal will in part neutralize this loss. The Atlantic Coast will be supplied through it and the coast ports will find the fleets of the Orient calling at their wharves, because, by "great circle" sailing, ships will find themselves about one hundred miles from San Francisco, and, going and coming, they will call, and, while coaling, they can discharge and take on partial cargoes. In fact, San Francisco's usefulness as a port will grow with the commerce of the Pacific, which the canal will greatly augment. The whole country will profit by it; the interests of peace and war will be equally served. The race of the Oregon showed the necessity of a closer union between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

The Pacific Coast, without the canal, is exposed to the enemy's fleet. The fortifications of the English at Esquimalt, by commanding the Straits of San Juan de Fuca, threaten Puget Sound. The next war of the United States will be on the Pacific, and this coast looks to the canal, controlled by Americans and fortified against the world, for its protection and for the safety of the Flag.

From New York to San Francisco, by the present water route, is a distance of 15,700 miles. Via the proposed canal, the distance will be cut down to a little less than 5000 miles, which is a saving equivalent to about two-thirds. The Isthmian Canal also will reduce the distance from New York to Manila (going west) to that via the Suez Canal.

The future arena of the world's commercial activity will be also on the Pacific, as forecast by Seward, and the Isthmian Canal will, when completed, speed the day. Our interests on this coast are wrapped up in the commerce of the great ocean at our doors, and we believe, in a broad and patriotic sense, that the canal will, by opening the Pacific to increased activity, confer benefits upon the great coast line washed by its waves from Puget Sound to San Diego.

The Song of the Woman

By Frank L. Stanton

THEY'LL never have done with the fightin' on land an' over sea;
Government—Government, what does it care—what does it care for me?
Bugles must blow an' flags must wave, an' the muffled drums must beat,
An' what to a lass is a lover when they lay him dead at her feet?

They'll never have done with the fightin'. Forward the columns sweep;
I hear the shout o' the Captains as I tend the hearth an' weep.
Far off an' faint—but I hear it; an' a white, dead face I see
Under the sod in the grave that God an' Government make for me!

His hair was like the raven's wing. (I joy that my lips have prest,
As it fell in its flowing beauty, this dark lock on my breast!)
An' his brave, bright eyes looked love to mine—the eyes I shall never see
'Till God at the great white Judgment Day shall give him back to me.

Bible they've got for battles: For men have fought an' died
Ere the Prince of Peace said strife should cease—the Prince that they crucified.
Though a woman's tears bedew the years, shall they stay the crimson tide?
What can you do with Government with Bible on its side?

Men must fight the battles; lover an' lass must part;
But what is a star of glory to a woman's broken heart?
Government's right, they tell me, an' the wrong must righted be:
Give the lass then to her lover—an' my dead love back to me!

Digitized by Google

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

The Increased Cost of Foreign Travel

Those who wish to go to Europe cheaply this year might just as well dismiss their hopes. The trip will cost more than at any time for years. Two causes explain this. The war in South Africa has drawn heavily upon the steamship lines of Great Britain for transports, and thus the carrying capacity between this country and Europe has been materially reduced. In the second place, the Paris Exposition has put up the prices all the way from twenty-five to one hundred per cent. The great prosperity of the United States has provided many of our people with money for travel. The consequence is many of them have decided to go across to see the greatest show of the century. The matter of expense never entered so little into the calculations in the whole history of the country. No one can blame the steamship companies, therefore, for getting all they can, and, possibly with one or two exceptions, every line has very largely increased its rates, but increase or no increase, those who have not engaged accommodations will find that nearly everything from now until the middle of summer is gone.

A writer for The Saturday Evening Post recently spent a day among the steamship men of New York, and they cheerfully admitted that the rates had been raised, and added that about everything they had was taken. Of course, there are always changes in plans—illness or other circumstances which keep at home persons who expected to take a trip abroad, and these afford opportunities for the late comers; but as a rule every ship, from Galveston to Halifax, that goes out of port now has every stateroom filled. It is the biggest year ever known in transatlantic travel.

Millions in Tips that Travelers Pay

Mr. Vance Thompson, in his brilliant letters from Paris, has warned Americans against any ambition of visiting the Exposition at small expense. His article has been copied all over the country and has reached millions of readers. As he is on the ground and knows Paris as well as he knows New York, his word can be relied upon. Prices of living for strangers in Paris have been increased from twenty-five to forty per cent., and that is a condition which all visitors must uncomplainingly face. But before they arrive they must also dismiss the idea that they can get across the Atlantic pleasantly without paying well for it.

It has been calculated that the American travelers this year will spend over five million dollars in tips alone. Most of them will do it grudgingly, because of all the petty blackmail of our advanced civilization these gratuities are the meanest and most provoking. At the same time, if one is traveling and wishes to get along comfortably he must deal out the tidbits on every hand. If you should want to know the depth of human misery simply decline to give any fee at all while taking a trip across the Atlantic Ocean. Then you may envy Jonah in his solitude within the whale's interior. On the other side, of course, if you do not pay the tips, you will simply be asked for them just as you would for your street-car fare or railroad ticket. It is pretty hard, but there is no escape from it, and this year the people who get tips are exacting in their demands.

Slower Ships but Greater Comfort

At the same time, people will have finer quarters than were ever before known in travel. The evolution of the modern steamship is as interesting as a novel. Take, for instance, the cattle-ship. It began as a huge freight boat. Later it was found that amidships there was room for a few passengers. The few passengers liked it wonderfully because of the smooth sailing and the moderate cost. Then gradually more staterooms were added, and the cattle soon carried goes of human beings. The ocean greyhound, burneach voyage—using strenuous effort to meanwhile churning sengers into six days did not pay the divadvertisements. Now, tremes has come the side of the ocean splenwhich exceed the greybeauties, and which ships in their speed. In ship comcome to apthe average wants comhappens that dozen millare now in this new

The other Cramps' Delaware, the largest ship ever Hemisphere was laid be nearly 600 feet long. She is built by the same St. Paul, St. Louis, unlike them, she will keels that will keep her road train. It will take passage on a boat of sengers will enjoy life will be two type, and panies are what similar

Two will England this never was a popularity of was so great, interesting steamship world is at work and

Another develop special excursions, built a magnificent on tours around the two trips a year, and comforts and convedark room for the intographers. In all our is nothing more exarchitecture. In many of our railroads, whose marvels of luxury The difficulties were, of course, many, but in everything the have been able the smoothness rooms were addthus well above the ships were ing large carThe other type was the ing fortunes in coal on men and machinery in a make records, and in the the stomachs of the pasof unhappiness. These idends, but they made fine finally, between the excompromise, for on each did ships are being built hound in the luxuries and slightly excel the cattleother words, the steampanies have preciate that passenger fort. So it at least a lion dollars being spent type of boat. day at the yard, on the the keel of constructed in the Western—a leviathan which will with a tonnage of 12,500. company that owns the Paris and New York, but, have great, broad bilge almost as steady as a rail- a day or so longer for the this kind, but the pasin the meanwhile. There of the same other combuilding some ships also. be launched in month. There time when the ocean travel and it is an fact that every company in the is making money: ment is in the line of and a company has just yacht to take parties world. She will make she combines all the nieences, including a evitable amateur phomodern building there traordinary than marine respects it is far ahead limited trains are such and real convenience. in the way great and spite of architects to achieve with speed.

The Fine Ability that Produces Ships

When we sail upon one of these great ships or go down to the wharf to give our friends a good-by we seldom appreciate the splendid talent and artisanship that have combined to produce the floating palace. We do not stop to consider that the modern steamship is as delicately put together as the finest watch, and we forget that the men who did this work are wonderful workers for the benefit and progress of mankind. Possibly you would not recognize their names if they were mentioned, but there can be no question about the credit that is due to them. Indeed, it was said the other day when the Institute of Naval Architects met in England that the men in session there had done more for the development of commerce than all of the governments—of course this includes the politicians—of the world combined. And they could point to a most remarkable fact—namely, that the ships they had made had taken 250,000 men on hurried orders to South Africa without the loss of a single life. In our own country the builders of our ships include much of the finest ability and most perfect manhood in our population. Practically all of them come from the ranks.

A New Type of American Enterprise

In another way there is still more conspicuous development in steamship character. In England they have a law forbidding the construction of competitive lines of railways, and the average railway manager there is one who seems to have lost a large part of interest in life; but on the sea there can never be any such restrictions or regulations. If competition be the life of trade it is the very essence of shipping, and thus of necessity there has come to the front a class of alert, vigorous and incessant men who are alive to every proposition and quick to use every opportunity. The portraits of three of them are on this page. The first, the General Manager of the largest American line—the International Navigation Company; second, the General Manager of the North German-Lloyd; and third, the General Manager of the Dominion Line of Canada, in Boston.

Over a million and a quarter tons of merchantmen were taken by the English Government for the purpose of transporting troops to South Africa. One result was to increase freight rates almost threefold. Some lines were badly crippled, but they are doing everything in the world to get new ships, and thus many of the shipyards of England have just been able to declare dividends of ten per cent. and over. The line which was crippled the worst has just launched a monster of 600 feet and 13,500 tons, and a sister ship will be off the ways in three weeks. Last year there were built in England 1,242,593 tons of steamships, but of these 609,589 went to foreigners. There were fifty-two ships of over 5000 tons, and 98.7 per cent. of the tonnage built was of steel. In nearly every other country the increase is going on. For instance, Germany is now building five 6000-ton and two 5300-ton ships for the South African trade, and for this the company will get a subsidy of $350,000 a year.

New Steamship Legislation

In the legislation of England it is proposed, in a measure known as the Shippers' Liability Bill, to limit the liability of shipowners to forty dollars a ton of the vessel damaged.

In this country the most important measure is that proposed by Senators Hanna and Elkins by which a subsidy will be paid to American ships. President McKinley has favored it and there is a strong political influence back of it, but as a rule the newspapers and public men of the country seem disposed to object to a policy of bounties as contrary to the spirit and history of the country.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN OF THE HOUR

Making a Hundred Dollars a Minute

The largest sum for the briefest service recently received by the most liberally paid of all professionals, the prima donna, was given Madame Nordica on the occasion of her appearance in a concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, several weeks ago. For two songs which required five minutes each to sing she received $1000, or at the rate of $100 a minute. The songs were Grieg's Swan and a Serenade by Richard Strauss. The occasion was the first American appearance of Herr von Schuch, conductor of the Royal Opera, Dresden.

Madame Nordica, among the soloists originally announced, was taken suddenly ill during a performance of Tristan und Isolde at the Metropolitan the Saturday previous to the concert. With her customary pluck she finished the performance, but was obliged to take to her bed as soon as it was ended. There she was forced to remain until next Thursday, when it was time to dress for the concert. She appeared at the Metropolitan on time, sang her two songs and was persistently recalled for an encore. Her strength not being equal to a response she bowed her appreciation and finally took Madame Patti's method of positive refusal by returning to the stage with her carriage cloak about her shoulders. Once home she found she had no alternative but to return to the bed she had left to sing. But in the short time of her absence, in addition to keeping faith with the public and adding to the brilliance of the concert, she had received $1000 for ten minutes' actual work. For her first concert engagement, Madame Nordica, then a girl of sixteen, received ten dollars. Now in the zenith of her powers the largest sum received by Madame Nordica for a single concert was $1700. This latest achievement of $1000 for ten minutes eclipses even that.

Why David B. Hill Wears a Silk Hat

There are probably no two men in Albany so nearly alike and so much unlike as ex-Governor David B. Hill and Governor Theodore Roosevelt. Both men are fighters, although their methods differ. Both are brave and eloquent, and each received his office from a political party with which he in many respects differed. The two Governors often meet, and there is usually a little quiet fun between them when they come together. Both men have the gift of saying sharp things. Not long ago the New York State newspaper men gave a banquet at Stanwix Hall, in Albany, and among the guests of honor were the two Governors. Colonel Roosevelt came first. He wore an evening suit and his famous brown sombrero made famous by the Rough Riders. It was a combination costume at once original and picturesque. Among the last of the guests to arrive was Mr. Hill, who was conventionally attired, even to his silk hat.

"Ah!" exclaimed Colonel Roosevelt in his peculiar staccato manner, as he grasped Mr. Hill's hand, "now we have with us a real Albany swell. Governor Hill is the only man here to-night with a silk hat."

"I've got a slouch hat myself," returned Mr. Hill softly, "but I left it at home. I've given up wearing it since I went out of the advertising business."

Then dinner was announced and the remainder of the evening passed pleasantly.

Doctor Angell's Little Joke

Dr. James B. Angell, President of the University of Michigan, ex-Minister to China and to Turkey, is very much of a diplomat and a very hard man from whom to get a direct statement when he does not choose to make one. He is especially hard on interviewers, but in 1897, just before be left on Turkey, gave to a

some in-did not choose to di-
take came from the
the truth in a joking think he was speaking from the inability of a ent to see a joke. And Trouble had arisen

Doctor Angell by the heard that the proposed of missionaries. He good could come from ter. These facts had public. It was known delayed his what was could not
The green
ceived a tel-
a Detroit paper to see
Angell and had changed sailing. He do so. He

"Haven't a word to
"Really, I don't know
And then laughing in you're not getting much he remarked, "Why, I
I'll go to the Turkey
The green reporter office. He had to say quote the President's
To the State editor
any smile or
To him the that Presi-
said there and that he Minister to Sultan. This Big headfirst page fact that very respondents papers hastened to see

The latter tried his sisted that if he had was in fun. But it reporter's dispatch
Washington, and the printed the President's over it the official
Porte was objecting to ground of his close Congregational mis-

Doctor Angell's name nence diplomatically
the discussion compelling pay the money
American citi-suffered from there several his mission to he accidentally Detroit paper formation be vulge. Part of the mis-

Doctor's habit of telling way, which led men to purely in fun, and part green college correspond-
the result was this story.
about the acceptance of Sultan. The latter had Minister was a great friend was suspicious that no receiving such a charac-
not, however, been made that Doctor Angell had sailing, but the cause
be learned,
reporter re-
gram from afternoon
President
ask why he his date of proceeded to asked him.
say," said the diplomat, anything new at all."
a way that said, "Guess information from me," don't even know whether or not. Good-night."
hurried to the telegraph something. He would exact words. He did so,
there was no intimation of any sarcasm.
dispatch meant dent Angell was some hitch might not go as the Court of the
was important.
lines on the announced the night, and cor-
for the morning

President Angell,
diplomatic arts and in-
made such a remark it was no use. The green stirred up officials in morning papers that explanation printed statement that the Doctor Angell on the relationship to the sionary board,
came again into promi-
the other day when arose about Turkey to promised zens who the riots
years ago,

A Hard-Working Government Officer

Assistant Secretary of War, George D. Meiklejohn, is said to do more work every day than any great merchant in the country. His virtues in this line were made known by a Congressman who told the story of his experience:

"Say, there's a man in the Department there who does something! Just think of it, a fellow who draws a big salary and earns it—more than earns it—by hard work. Perhaps you think I am joking, but I'm not. I'm in earnest, in dead earnest! I had a life and death matter on hand. I half killed myself getting the papers ready. It took me a week, and, although I never work except when I have to, I can put in just as good licks as any one else when it's necessary. The papers made a big bundle, as big nearly as a tombstone, and just as interesting. I took them to the War office on Saturday, Saturday at four o'clock, and gave them to Meiklejohn. He says, 'Come in Monday morning.' I wanted to laugh, but didn't. I knew, however, I'd have to wait two or three weeks. I was so sure I'd have bet on it, and I'm not a betting man. Monday morning I happened to be in the building on another matter. As I passed Meiklejohn's door I thought I'd go in, and I did. I almost fell dead. There were my papers ready for me, signed; I could scarcely thank him, I was so dumbfounded."

W. A. Chanler's Brilliant Career

One of the most popular members of Congress is the Honorable William Astor Chanler, who, although less than thirty-three years, has achieved prominence in several directions. He came of distinguished ancestry; his father, the late J. W. Chanler, was elected to Congress three times, and John Jacob Astor was his grandfather. Mr. Chanler graduated from Harvard in 1887, and later received the degree of A. M. from that university. As soon as he came of age he took his famous trip into Africa, and for a time grave fears were felt for his safety; but after five months of exploration he turned up all right with a lot of new information that led to his election to important geographical societies.

When the war with Spain began he was one of the first to offer his services. He proposed to equip and arm a whole regiment at his own expense, and when this was declined he went South, finally receiving a commission from the President conferring upon him the duties of Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. He was honorably discharged from the work on October 3. He served a term in the New York Legislature, and then his election to Congress followed. In Congress he has won many friends, and, despite his large wealth, he is one of the most democratic of the members.

The Pastimes of Eighty-Three

Captain John Codman, who died recently at the age of eighty-six, was a prominent member of the New York Reform and the Twilight Clubs, and was one of the best-known writers upon industrial subjects in the country. He retained his strength and vigor to a remarkable degree, and when he was seventy-six years old he was accustomed to ride on horseback between New York and Boston solely for the exercise. Innumerable stories are told of his vigor. Two or three years ago he was seen walking briskly down town in New York one of the bitterest days of the winter. The thermometer was down to zero and the wind was blowing a gale.

"Pretty cold, isn't it?" remarked a friend who met him.

"Do you think so?"

"Think so! I know it. What important business takes you outdoors in this storm?"

"Nothing very important," replied the old man as he strode on. "I've been skating on the lake at the Park."

Digitized by Google

Memories of Moody By His Son
William Revell Moody
IV. Revivals in the Early Seventies

THE evangelistic mission in America, which gave to Mr. Moody his larger usefulness and his higher reputation, began almost a quarter of a century ago and covered nearly every part of the United States. The years in which the movement gathered the force that made it such an unprecedented success in religious zeal and results covered the years 1875, 1876 and 1877. Five missions in five of the largest cities of the country showed Mr. Moody's great powers as an independent worker in evangelism. First in Brooklyn, next in Philadelphia, next in New York, next in Chicago, and then in Boston, with steadily increasing congregations and interest, the work gained a momentum that carried it throughout the nation. Not only that, but in Canada and even in Mexico Mr. Moody won in respect and confidence. In some places he spent entire winters working along evangelistic lines and in Bible readings among Christians. In Baltimore, in St. Louis, in San Francisco he stayed from five to six months, and thus from place to place he carried on the work.

But the first great success—the first complete confidence—was won in the largest centres of population. Mr. Moody appreciated the necessity of having men of force on his side, and thus he enlisted the support of laymen who were able to give him the opportunity for large enterprise. Indeed, he had learned this lesson in Great Britain and he put it into effect when he began his wider work in America. A prominent financier was once asked, "How is it that while you and other like men are all but inaccessible, fenced in by closed doors and guarded by polite but immovable private secretaries, Dwight L. Moody sees you at any time?"

"He is one of us," was the reply.

Mr. Moody's argument in persuading these men to support his work was simple and direct. "Water runs down hill," he said, "and the highest hills in America are the great cities. If we can stir them we shall stir the whole country." How prophetic his words were was shown in the record of his labors!

It was in October, 1875, and in the city of Brooklyn that Mr. Moody's first American campaign began. He had made thorough preparations for it; places of assembly had been provided; programs had been arranged and the various denominations had been united in plans for prayer and conference. The main building was a rink in which chairs for 5000 persons were placed. Soon this was filled, and then, by the help of the local clergymen and laymen, the overflow meetings and special services were accommodated in the different churches. The success was extraordinary, and those who had at first criticised the meetings expressed a profound respect in the end for the methods of Mr. Moody, and for results that attended them.

IRA D. SANKEY

Philadelphia was the next place of attack, and the building was the recently abandoned freight station of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which has since become the John Wanamaker store. Seats to accommodate 13,000 persons were provided. The fame of the Brooklyn meetings had preceded the enterprise. With more earnestness than ever the local clergymen engaged in the work. There were separate meetings for different classes of hearers, and Mr. Moody, at one of the services, said that he was going to have the meetings for young men limited to those under forty, because that would just take him in. His fortieth birthday was celebrated shortly afterward. The remarkable thing in this mission was a meeting set apart especially for intemperate men and women, and almost incredible results followed his appeal to this motley, miserable congregation.

In the Philadelphia meetings Mr. Moody was assisted by such men as John Wanamaker and George A. Stuart, and there were many incidents of unusual interest. Mr. Stuart thus spoke of the meetings: "At the morning meetings in the Depot Church and on Sundays the early hour at which people came was remarkable. The watchman told me that he saw men gathering there as early as 4:30 A. M., and at six o'clock on cold mornings in January the throng was so great that he was obliged to open the doors." During this Philadelphia mission many Princeton students attended, and after their return they began begging Mr. Moody to come and preach for the University. The work inaugurated at that time has spread throughout the world.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth and last of a series of papers which began in The Saturday Evening Post of April 7, dealing with the more important events in Mr. Moody's life.

Doctor Trumbull speaks of a famous New Year's service, when, after a conversation between Mr. Moody and the Rev. Dr. Plummer on the question of conversion, the audience was intensely concentrated upon the spiritual significance of the meeting. Doctor Trumbull wrote: "As the hour of midnight approached, the appeals of Mr. Moody, following this illustrative inquiry meeting, grew more and more earnest, and the solemnity of the service deepened. Just before twelve o'clock he asked all present to join in silent prayer.

"While all heads were still bowed, the profound stillness was broken by Mr. Sankey's singing of Almost Persuaded. Then the closing moments of the passing year were given to earnest prayer, especially for those who had arisen to ask for it, and were now urged to a final decision.

"When, at midnight, the sounding out of the bell at Independence Hall was the signal for all the bells of the city and the steam whistles on every side to greet the incoming year, Mr. Moody wished all a 'Happy New Year,' and that never-to-be-forgotten watch-night service closed. Its echoes are still resounding in many hearts on earth and in Heaven, and their gratitude is now deeper than ever to dear Mr. Moody and his fellow-worker on that sacred occasion."

The Mission at Madison Square in New York

From Philadelphia Mr. Moody went to New York. A cordial invitation had been extended to him from a temporary organization of which the late Rev. Dr. John Hall was chairman. After he concluded his work in Philadelphia he accepted this invitation, and a permanent organization was formed. William E. Dodge was president of the general committee; George H. Andrews, Bowles Colgate and Henry Oakley, vice-presidents, and more than thirty clergymen, representing nearly all the Protestant denominations, and as many laymen, were members of this committee. The executive committee consisted of Nathan Bishop, chairman; John C. Havemeyer, secretary, and William E. Dodge, Jr., the Rev. Dr. S. Irenaeus Prime, S. B. Shieffelin, Elliot F. Shepard, Morris K. Jesup and R. R. McBurney. The committee obtained a lease of the Hippodrome, on the site of the present Madison Square Garden, at Madison Avenue and Fourth Avenue, between Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Streets, as the most central and suitable building for the meetings. The auditorium was divided into two large halls, each capable of seating about 7000 persons, and a call was issued by the committee for a private guarantee fund to meet attendant expenses.

In the call it was stated that "it must be distinctly understood that Messrs. Moody and Sankey refuse to receive any payment for their own services; thus no part of the above fund will be paid to them."

While the committee were attending to the business details, Christian people were not idle in the churches. There was an increased interest in meetings for prayer and religious conference. The daily prayer-meeting uptown, at Lyric Hall, was largely attended, while the Fulton Street meeting felt the fresh impulse of revival preparations. Again the same hearty coöperation and unity of the pastors of the leading churches were experienced, and this sympathy on the part of the churches found expression in the denominational papers.

The New York Mission did much to establish the evangelists in the firmer respect and commendation of the country. The secular and religious papers gave large accounts of the services and began to commend them. The hall was always filled. For an hour or more people were at the doors. An observer writes:

"Promptly at eight o'clock two men take their places, one within the rail, the other at the melodeon. As the former rises, after a moment of silent prayer, you see a short, stout-built, square-shouldered man with bullet-shaped head set close on the shoulders, black eyes that twinkle merrily at times, and a full but not heavy beard and mustache. The face expresses fun, good humor, persistence. The coat is closely buttoned, with a bit of stand-up collar seen over it. Such is D. L. Moody, the leader of the Hippodrome work. As he stands with hand resting on the rail you are conscious that it is to see, not to be seen. Like an engineer with his hand on the throttle, like a physician with his finger on the patient's pulse, his mind is on the work before him. A quick, soldierly bearing marks every movement.

"He gives out a hymn so rapidly that we scarce catch the words, and then we look at Sankey. A man of larger build, clear-cut features and shaven chin, a voice clear, melodious, powerful. Easier and gentler in bearing than Moody, he has enough force and fire in speech and song to hold an audience in perfect quiet; and when he sings alone you hear every word and catch from the face and voice the full meaning of the song. Both men impress you as honest and good, hearty and wholesome in body and mind, and thoroughly in earnest."

In the evening the meeting was still more interesting, and this pen picture is drawn:

"Eight o'clock and Mr. Moody is at his post. It is a pleasant night, and though every seat is filled there is a large crowd outside. Announcing a hymn, he says:

"'Now, won't a thousand of you Christians go into the Fourth Avenue Hall and pray for this meeting and let those outside have your seats?' Here is a practical application of Christian self-denial not pleasant to those who have fought for good seats. However, a few go out.

"'Not half enough,' says Mr. Moody at the end of the first verse. 'I want a great many more to go out. I see many of you here every night, and if I knew your names I'd call you out.' So, after much urging, quite a number leave, the doors are opened and the empty seats are again filled. The platform does not escape.

"'Now, some of you go,' and a few retire. 'Will the ushers please open the windows?' is the next order. Mr. Moody is autocratic in his demands for fresh air.

"'Fresh air is as important as the sermon,' he says. 'We've got to keep these people awake, and they're half asleep already.' All very true, but opening the top back windows throws cruel drafts in the galleries, so it isn't long before the windows are shut, and very soon Mr. Moody is calling for fresh air again."

D. L. MOODY

A STREET IN NORTHFIELD

The Permanent Results of the N. Y. Mission

The hold of Messrs. Moody and Sankey over these audiences is attested in thousands of long descriptions. "Worshiping in the rude-walled Hippodrome, sitting on wooden chairs, led in song by a man with a melodeon, and preached to by a man without a pulpit, they have learned that costly churches, stained windows, soft cushions, great organs and quartette choirs are not necessary to the worship of God, and tend to drive away the poor, leaving the rich to enjoy the luxuries alone," said one.

The character of their work can be gathered from this comment:

"The Hippodrome work is a vast business enterprise, organized and conducted by business men who have put money into it on business principles, for the purpose of saving men. But through all the machinery vibrates the power without which it would be useless—the power of the Holy Ghost. Of course it is successful. Men are being saved day and night, and a moral influence is felt round about the building itself. Two Sundays ago the police returns of the precinct showed no arrests—a thing before unknown—and a recent statement says that in spite of increased destitution among the poor this winter there has been no increase of crime."

It was generally admitted by the clergymen and papers that the work of Moody and Sankey in New York gave an impetus to congregational singing, filled the churches, and brought religious problems closer to the people. Mr. Moody in that building gathered day by day the largest audiences ever seen in that city. Some question was raised as to the permanency of the conversions, but the returns gathered in later years, not only from the personal messages to Mr. Moody but from the ministers of churches show that the results were permanently advantageous to the churches. The question that was then asked is never asked now, because it was so fully answered by the facts.

An interesting incident occurring during the New York Mission is related by Professor George P. Fisher, of the Yale Divinity School, as illustrating Mr. Moody's courageous frankness as well as his kindness. Says Doctor Fisher:

"I once passed an evening in company with Mr. Thurlow Weed, who was long a leader in the politics of New York.

Digitized by Google

and in the Civil War was sent abroad on a kind of unofficial embassy to confer with men of power in England. In the course of a long conversation Mr. Weed asked me if I knew Mr. Moody, and added that Mr. Moody wrote him an excellent letter, which he would like me to read. It was an acknowledgment of a very generous contribution from Mr. Weed to defray the expenses of the meetings held in New York. Mr. Weed did not himself mention the occasion of the letter, but he afterward sent me a copy of it. This is the letter:

"MR. WEED.

"My Dear Friend: Yours of the twentieth of March with check came to hand yesterday, and I am at a loss to know what to do. I am afraid you may put it in with some other good deeds and they may keep you from coming to Christ as a lost sinner. I wish you knew how anxious I am for you and how I long to see you out and out on the Lord's side. I thank you for the money, but what would you say if I should treat your gift as you have the gift of God and send it back to you—would you not be offended? Now as I take your gift, will you not take God's gift and let us rejoice together? I cannot bear to leave the city and leave you out of the Ark that God has provided for you and all the rest of us. Hoping to hear soon of your conversion, I remain your friend and brother (I hope) in Christ,

"(Signed) D. L. MOODY."

A Prophecy of Failure Refuted

Mr. Moody's return to Chicago was discussed with much interest, and there were many who said that the series of meetings would be a failure. The mission began in October, 1876, but instead of any lack of enthusiasm there was the warmest response, not only from the clergy, but especially from the public. The meetings were held in the Auditorium, the largest hall in the city, having accommodations for 6000 people. Those who had said that he would not be able to fill this place found themselves greatly mistaken. The 6000 packed all the available space in the hall, and there were more than 6000 outside, so that the cable cars could not get past, and a line of policemen was unable to persuade the people to go away.

The Chicago Mission ended in a farewell service which was peculiarly dramatic. It was for those who professed to have been converted during Mr. Moody's services, and admission was by ticket only. Applications were made for 6000 of these tickets, and, before the meeting closed, local churches reported over 2000 accessions on profession of faith.

The success of the mission was extraordinary, and ever after that Mr. Moody's visits to Chicago were attended by great results, especially in 1876 and 1897.

A Search, Like Alexander's, for New Conquests

Next was a mission in Boston, an undertaking that presented peculiar difficulties. The idea of a revival in Boston was against the preconceived notions and conventions of that city. Mr. Moody received opposition from the start, but it was this very opposition that turned the tide in his favor. He made there some of the closest and best friends of his whole career—such men as Henry M. Moore, Henry Durant and Dr. A. J. Gordon, who all helped him in his subsequent labors and in his schools and conferences at Northfield. In Boston a large temporary building was erected for the mission, with a seating capacity of 6000. Prominent ministers and laymen of all denominations aided the work, and from the first great interest was shown. Week after week for two months on every good day, and often two or three times a day, the immense building was filled to overflowing. Even so conservative a man as Dr. Joseph Cook summed up the results with enthusiasm. He said that the revival surpassed that under Whitefield in Boston in 1740, and in the complete result of the work Messrs. Moody and Sankey did better than in their great meetings in Edinburgh. The success in Boston increased the hold of the evangelism upon the country at large. It had been in steadily rising ratio in all the five cities—Brooklyn first, Philadelphia next, New York third, Chicago fourth, and now Boston fifth. Then radiated those numerous services which became such important factors in the religious growth and interest of the nation during the past twenty-odd years.

The greatest obstacle that Mr. Moody encountered in reaching the unconverted was a curious one. The members of church came early to the place of meeting and took the nearest seats, and the consequence was that many thousands whom he most desired to reach were placed at a distance. For the same reason, he could not always make a success of his inquiry meetings, because people who had been converted either through him or through others would crowd into the rooms. Even in cities far away from the scenes of earlier missions these things would occur. Indeed, during his last extended tour on the Pacific Coast in the winter of 1899, he was continually meeting those who dated their Christian life through missions he had conducted years before in the Eastern States or in Great Britain. Thus it happened that he was always looking for new fields, and he accepted invitations to newly-settled towns in Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona. Little support was to be counted on in these places, but this simply made him redouble his energies.

In one town in the new country, after his sermon on Repentance, he received a hurriedly written note from a wanderer, stating that he had left the service that night convicted of his sins, and was leaving by the midnight train for his home in Philadelphia to seek his parents' pardon for his cruel treatment and desertion.

Through all this time, in spite of the crowds, he was doing all he could by man-to-man method to reach individuals. "Let every one of us try to get one soul," was his constant appeal, and the number that he won in this way cannot possibly be estimated. He never thought of such an estimate himself because he was intolerant of any such statistics. One interesting fact about his work is that his career of evangelism, in the words of Doctor Mackenzie, "reached its height in America during a period of extraordinary material prosperity."

End-of-the-Century Farming

EXPERTS of the Department of Agriculture have reckoned that seventy years ago in this country it required just a bit over three hours to produce a bushel of wheat. To-day an average bushel is turned out in ten minutes. In 1830 the cost of the labor consumed was nearly eighteen cents; at present it is only three and a third cents.

Similar figures might be cited for other products of the soil, but it will suffice to say that during the year 1899 a saving of $681,500,000 was made in the raising and harvesting of the seven principal crops in the United States by means of machines and methods invented within the last half-century. In other words, the production of exactly the same crops fifty years ago would have cost that much more money.

This gives a vivid notion of the benefits conferred upon mankind by modern agricultural invention. The wheat crop is increased at least one-eighth by the use of a single contrivance known as the mechanical seeder. Without the cotton-gin, it would be practically impossible to raise and to market the cotton crop of this country, which now amounts to 10,000,000 bales or more annually. The up-to-date corn-husker, which is a recent invention, husks the corn and at the same time cuts the husks, stalks and blades into feed. In corn-shellers the very latest is a steam-power machine which will shell a bushel a minute, carry off the cobs to a pile or into a wagon, and deliver the grain into sacks or wagons. But the most wonderful contrivance of all is the combined reaper and thresher, with which it is necessary only to drive across the wheat-field in order to obtain the wheat ready for transportation to the elevator.

The Man at the Wheel

By Morgan Robertson

WE WERE the only Americans in the forecastle; but he had been shanghaied, while I had shipped willingly. Yet though he had come aboard half drunk, he was the one man forward who had escaped friction with the mates while they were taking our measures on the first day out. This immunity was not due to his nationality, for I, sober from the start, had suffered woefully—a black eye from the first mate, a sore head from the second, and unkind words from the skipper being my share of their criticism.

Fuller was an able seaman of the first rank. Even while still reeling from the drink within him he displayed a knowledge of his work, a facility of anticipating happenings, and a readiness of judgment, speech and action that were almost instinctive. He gave the officers no excuse for faultfinding, and when he was himself he gave them reason for strong approval. Tall and straight, with broad, square shoulders and a phenomenal depth of chest—slow and deliberate in speech and manner until occasion arose, then quick as a panther—with a voice like a woman's in conversation, but vibrant and resonant as a chime whistle when calling down from aloft—with bronzed, clean-cut features and kindly eye hiding a latent sparkle—this man gave evidence of mental and physical power far above his needs as a sailor. He himself named his one great weakness—intemperance. He spoke but little in the watch below, and then, usually, as a peacemaker; for, until men become acquainted, a ship's crew is an inharmonious muster. Once, Tim, a bristly-faced Liverpool Irishman, who had persistently persecuted the ordinary seaman Hans, planted his knuckles under Hans' ear for some small breach of forecastle etiquette. Fuller reached his long right arm out of an upper bunk, seized the Irishman by the collar and shook him until he gasped, then dropped him in a heap. Tim crawled into his bunk whispering and muttering, and Fuller sat up, his legs dangling over the bunk-board.

"Now, I'll tell you fellows right here, once for all," he said, looking down on us, "you're going to let the Dutchman alone or answer to me." No one spoke. Fuller peered at us all, knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and continued:

"Do I make myself plain? This is for all of you. With one exception there's not a whole sailor-man among you." (I hoped he meant me.) "You don't know your work on deck, you get hammered by the mates, and come growling and whining around the beef-kid. Did you ever think that if the mates had less to bother them, there'd be less billingsgate and belaying-pin soup? Why don't you learn your work and get to be some use on deck?"

I ventured to suggest that the mates hammered us for the love of the sport, and that no amount of proficiency would save us.

"There's something in that, I know," he answered more mildly; "but in any case only the worst of you would catch it. Have you noticed that I haven't been struck or called out of my name yet? Well, I promise you that I won't. I know my work better than the mates know theirs."

I was silent.

"Another thing," he continued, and his voice gathered strength. "I've listened to the talk in this forecastle about the skipper's wife. Now, he's a brute, of course, a whiskey-soaked brute—but she's a lady, and my countrywoman. Hear that? If I hear her spoken of again in anything but terms of the highest respect I'll send that man aft feet first for treatment. I'm an American."

He rolled back, refilled his pipe and smoked silently. I also was an American—not long from a good home—and I own to a blush of shame that I had not protested at the forecastle discourse concerning the sweet-faced, big-eyed little woman who hovered near the after companionway and watched us as a kitten might a pack of dogs; but Fuller had anticipated me and I could only say, "I stand by that."

From this on, though he resumed his quiet manner, he dominated the forecastle so thoroughly that there was no further need of dictation. Hans enjoyed immunity from assault and the Captain's wife from gossip; we took turns at cleaning the forecastle and attending to the food, and before the trades were reached were on fairly good terms.

But, before this, another phase of Fuller's character was shown to us—he was an entertainer of exceptional ability. We were all impressed by his careful choice of words—we all knew that here was a man able to pass muster among refined people on shore; but not even I, fresh from the public schools, was prepared for the sort of talk which he gave us one watch inspired by the grog which the skipper had served out to all hands at the end of a hard reefing-match. It began with Tim's comment on the "domfoolishness of a divvle he'd read about somewhere," who, having been cast away for years, returned to look into the window of his home and see his wife happy in another man's love and another man's children.

"He wuz no man," concluded Tim, "to jist look in the windy and sneak. An' he wuz no sailor-man, ayether. If I had a wife I wudden't lose her. Begob, no. But it's all made up; the felly jist wrote what wuz in his head. It never happened. It cudden't."

"Yes, Tim, it could happen. Tennyson knew what he was talking about when he wrote Enoch Arden. It has happened. I knew such a man."

"Ye did?"

"Yes, he was shipwrecked and came home years later. There was a man in his place, and a big new house built with money his father had left him and which the wife inherited; and there was a child born. But he didn't look into the window and go. He talked with the woman, and though she loved him more than the new man, he knew that she loved the child more than either, so rather than make trouble he cleared out without seeing the new man at all."

"And where'd he go," asked Tim wonderingly.

"To sea, of course."

Then followed a lecture on ancient and modern poetry.

But this kind of talk resulted disastrously to Fuller's theory of his immunity from abuse. The steward, a well-meaning but unwise individual, was in the habit of visiting the forecastle for a smoke with the men before turning in for the night. On this evening he came in just in time to hear Fuller's discourse on poetry. So impressed was he by the wonder that he sang Fuller's praises at the cabin table next morning, to the end that the Captain, highly indignant at the discovery of such a forecastle lawyer among his men, forthwith made life a burden to Fuller, cursing and shouting at him whenever he came in sight. The Captain was a well-built, handsome young man, with a fair education and a reddening nose. Had he remained sober long enough to be guided by his natural sense, Fuller might have escaped his wrath; but he tippled continually. Once his wife protested, and there were sorrow and shame in her blue eyes.

"Please don't, George," she said to her husband. "He is doing his best." But he pushed her aside; whereupon she went below, crying.

Another happening lowered Fuller's stock still further. The two mates, "buckos" of the worst type, began shouting at one another in the darkness of a stormy night, each under the impression that the other was an angry and insolent sailor. They met soon on the slanting deck, and though they must have known their mistake by this time, still they went at it, to the intense amusement of all of us, wrestling and striking until they rolled to the lee scuppers. It was Fuller who separated them; and he may or may not have earned the gratitude of Mr. Parker, the second mate—under dog in the fight—but he certainly aroused all the hatred that Mr. Oliver, the first officer, was able to feel. It was intensified by what Hans told him (we learned of Hans' and the steward's misdoing afterward). On fine nights he would call this slow-witted young man aft to be wheedled and pumped of forecastle news; and Hans gave out Fuller's declaration in regard to his own ability in a way which made him say that he knew more than did the mates. So, though there was bad blood between the first and second mate, the former and the skipper were thoroughly in accord in their opinion of Fuller, and often joined their extensive vocabularies in expressing it. Sometimes, as I noted the sparkle in Fuller's dark eyes, I feared the ending of this; but he held his temper wonderfully and silenced our sympathizing comment.

Digitized by Google

We had now caught the northeast trade, and about this time my viewpoint was changed from the forecastle to the lazarette. The cause of the transfer has nothing to do with this story, but is touched upon as explaining the somewhat unconventional frame of mind which makes this story possible. When you are flat on your back, with a second mate, bigger and stronger than yourself, kneeling on your chest, gripping your throat and hammering a belaying-pin on your bare head until your reeling brain sees things of another world, you are apt to fall back upon your instincts, and, later, to feel an unregenerate sympathy for mutiny which you can acquire in no other way. I reached for my sheath-knife. Shortly afterward, dazed, breathing hard and unrepentant, I was ironed in the half-deck and entered in the official log for murderous assault on Mr. Parker, with good prospects of bread and water for the passage, and a long term in the penitentiary afterward. Mr. Oliver, the first mate, put the irons on my wrists, and I noticed a sympathizing leer showing in his evil face; but whatever of approval this may have indicated he carefully left out of his language.

Savage as I felt at the time, I remember philosophizing on the absurd nautical etiquette which required me to "sir" and "mister" this ignorant wretch. He was heavily built and bull-necked. Quite different was Mr. Parker; he was younger, better educated and better favored, possessing a slippery, snaky kind of good looks, and an expression about the mouth which, in repose, was a sneer, when he was excited, a malevolent grin, and when pleased or amused, a pleasant smile. My knife had barely pricked a rib, and he had smiled sweetly as I left the deck.

Having ironed me, the mate rove a long rope through the links of the shackles and, bringing the ends even, passed a clove-hitch with both parts around a stanchion; then led the two ends forward out of my reach and hitched them to another. But he had left me six feet of rope between the first hitch and my shackles, and this was enough. After one night spent in the half-deck, breathing bilge-water fumes from the scupper-holes, I loosened the hitch with my six feet of slack when night came down again, crawled through it and forward to the other stanchion, cleared away the ends, coiled up my tether and then crept aft past the cabin-trunk to the lazarette, where there were soft oakum and canvas to lie upon, and a hatch above for ventilation. It was about four feet square, and in fine weather was left open. I made this change nightly, returning at daylight to hitch myself to the stanchion.

About a week after my incarceration, while crawling along the starboard alleyway, I heard a sound through the thin bulkhead which brought me to a stop—the sound of a woman sobbing, and harsh profanity. I was abreast of the Captain's room just then, and I passed on to my nest in the lazarette, cursing the brute and wishing that the Fates had made me a policeman instead of a sailor. Thinking on the hard lot of the poor little woman, I fell asleep, to be awakened shortly by voices on deck.

The ship was close-hauled on the port tack, and out of the spanker over my head the wind hummed with a sound that would have deadened voices less forceful than those of Fuller and the mate. From where I lay I could just distinguish, faintly illumined by the binnacle light, the head of Fuller at the wheel, and the outline of Mr. Oliver's burly figure. He was stamping back and forth across the deck in front of the wheelman. It was the blackest night I had ever known in trade-wind waters, and, but for the binnacle light and their voices, I should not have known them. The mate was speaking.

"I'll take the shine out o' you, you ——— sea preacher. Know yer work, do you? I've got a few tricks you don't know."

"What I said, Mr. Oliver," answered Fuller, firmly but respectfully, "was not boastingly, or in comparison with any one aft, but to induce the men to brace up and learn something."

"You lie, you sniveling soul-saver. Don't gi' me any lip—don't you gi' me any lip, or I'll make you smell h—l right here." He halted before Fuller and raised his fist.

"Hold on, sir," said Fuller. "There's precedent established, aside from the law in the matter, against striking a man at the wheel. I'll have the best of it, sir."

"You will, hey?" Then followed an epithet and the mate struck Fuller in the face. He was bent back over the wheel-box by the force of the blow, but retained his hold on the spokes.

"There's little chance for a foremast hand in court; but I've got you foul, Mr. Oliver."

"Have, hey, you whining hound? Got any witnesses?"

Again the epithet; again the big fist launched out, and again Fuller sank back over the wheel-box.

"Take care—take care! Don't hit me again," he said hoarsely as he straightened up. "You're right. There are no witnesses if I kill you. Take care, sir!"

DRAWN BY H. C. EDWARDS

"THERE'S PRECEDENT ESTABLISHED . . . AGAINST STRIKING A MAN AT THE WHEEL"

The mate laughed contemptuously. Then—I did not see, it was too dark—but I heard the sound of expectoration, and "that's all you're worth," from Mr. Oliver.

Fuller, with a harsh, throaty growl, dropped the wheel and sprang at the mate. They clinched, and as their tightly locked forms disappeared from my sight I stepped toward the hatch for a peep over the combings. Before I could raise my head, however, a heavy figure launched over the hatch; I felt the vibration of the lazarette flooring, followed quickly by the quiver of the hatch combing and the floundering thud of a body falling on the deck. One of them had been hurled through the air, head first, at the lee quarter-bitt; but it was not Fuller, as I saw in a second. He was at the wheel, grinding it up, coughing and snarling and rubbing his cheek and chin with his wrist. The ship had come up into the wind, and I heard faintly the long-drawn hail of the lookout on forecastle-deck: "All in the wind forrard, sir."

"All right—all right," answered Fuller, and there was a raspy note in his voice—intentional, or coming of his rage—peculiarly like the unpleasant voice of the mate.

When the sails were full and the ship steady he left the wheel, stepped quickly down to leeward out of my sight, and returned in a moment to his steering. I could not see the expression of his face, but I saw him hold his hand to his forehead, as a man does with the headache, while he looked aloft at the royal, to windward and ahead.

"Dead," I heard him say. "O God, haven't I trouble enough? He deserved it; and they'd acquit him for my death, but hang me for his."

Three bells—half-past nine—struck on the cabin clock. He rang the strokes on the small bell behind him, and it was repeated forward. In half an hour he would be relieved.

He stood there inactive for five minutes, while I watched with a dry tongue and throat, every nerve strained in expectancy; then, putting the wheel up a full turn, he dropped it, sprang quickly down past the hatch, and I heard the scraping of boot heels on the deck. I heard no splash—it was blowing too hard—but knew that he had given the mate the burial he had earned, and knew, too, that if no one else had seen or heard, Fuller had saved himself; for I, a brother-slave in my country's ships, a convict elect—who had felt the clutch of authority at my throat and seen things of another world—would not have denounced him.

He waited ten minutes—until the mate's body must have been a mile astern—then, putting his hands to his mouth, sent a bellowing call forward: "Man overboard! Man overboard! Call all hands. Come aft here, some of you."

There was confusion indescribable. The Captain came up tipsy and totally unequal to the situation. The men were excited and—judging by the few comments I heard—not overzealous to save their chief officer. The second mate alone was steady. Somehow, he managed to back the main-yards and get a quarter-boat over; but it returned without Mr. Oliver.

I overheard Fuller explaining earnestly to the Captain and second mate that Mr. Oliver had climbed the taffrail to examine the chafed clew-lasning of the spanker; that he had slipped, struck his head on the rail, and fallen overboard, whereupon Fuller had immediately "sung out."

With Mr. Parker in the mate's place and the Captain—fairly sober now—standing watch, the ship ran down the northeast trade and into the doldrums, each day marked by the knocking-down or clubbing of one or more of the crew. I knew this from the sounds I heard and from Hans, who brought me my meals.

"I dink I will my knife stick in him, too," he said one day. "Den I coom down here and do no work and be waited on, aindt it? Yah." One part of Hans' gossip was gratifying; Fuller, in Mr. Parker's watch, now escaped a great deal of the Captain's ill-will and abuse, and from Mr. Parker himself received consideration, and even kindness. But the two officers were united in their tyranny over the rest of the crew and treated the men harsher than before the disappearance of Mr. Oliver. I ascribed it to the fact that, with their force reduced by a third, they dared not abate one jot of their iron rule, fearing that the crew would take advantage of it; and that in Fuller's case, Mr. Parker, more practical than the Captain, knew that this man needed no coercion or terrorizing to keep him in order. Also, I considered the fight between the mates, when Fuller had aided him; but another conversation which I listened to one evening decided me that gratitude played no part in Mr. Parker's mind.

It was a fine night. Curiously enough, for the latitude, we had a gentle, fair wind which promised to be steady. I had crawled aft cautiously, and stretched out on my resting place just as four bells (ten o'clock) struck overhead. Fuller relieved the wheel, as I knew by the voice that repeated the course. Then I heard Mr. Parker's step.

"Why didn't you take the second mate's berth the old man offered you?" he asked; and as Fuller did not reply at once, I arose to my feet and approached the hatch. This promised to be interesting.

"I didn't want it, sir," he answered at last. "I am not competent, and am satisfied in the forecastle."

"Possibly you are, Mr. Fuller—now that your friend is over the side. I say 'Mr.' Fuller because I know a good man when I see him. Don't tell me you're not competent. I know better. You've walked the poop-deck for years."

Fuller did not reply.

"Now I've been your friend—you can't deny that—and I want you aft here."

"May I ask why, sir? It's safe enough to disrate an officer, but not safe to promote a foremast hand against his will and make him responsible. He could dismast the ship, plead incompetency, and the owners would get no insurance. Why do you want me aft against my will?"

"Take the berth and I'll tell you. It's a good thing for us both."

"No, sir, I prefer staying forward."

The officer paced the deck a few turns and halted.

"I want you aft," he said, "because I like a man of your calibre. You're one man in a thousand. The other nine hundred and ninety-nine would have lost their heads the other night."

"What do you mean, sir?"

"What do I mean? Fuller, what I didn't see I heard from the forward companionway; what I didn't hear I saw from the corner of the house. I heard the mate cursing you. I saw him flung across the deck, heard him land, saw you pitch him over, and heard you sing out. I give you credit for a cool head, but—I can hang you."

Fuller made no response.

"I could have raised a row at the time, Fuller, but I approved of the thing, and, as I said, I liked you. Now, I want you with me. Take the berth."

"Why?"

There was no "sir" added to the word, and Fuller's voice was hoarse.

"Well—just this. The skipper's got clean, green bills in his room to the tune of $30,000—no right to it—what his wife got from her first husband's estate. I wormed this out of the fool. He sold out everything and they mean to settle in 'Frisco. Now—do you want part of that money?"

"Shouldn't wonder. My right to it is as good as his."

"Of course. Now we're talking. You can have half."

"What's the plan?" asked Fuller with a kind of dry laugh in his voice.

"Dead easy. Send him after the mate. We can take the ship to 'Frisco."

"How about his wife?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, that won't matter. She'll be glad to be rid of him. You leave that part to me."

Fuller waited a little before speaking, then his words came with a businesslike distinctness.

"And in case I refuse to come aft as second mate, aid you in killing the skipper—you intend to denounce me for killing the mate?"

"Well—yes—that's about the size of it. I'll explain my delay by seeming frightened—afraid of a like fate. It'll go in court."

"I'll think a little. I don't want to hang. I've work to do in this world."

"All right. Think quick. I want your answer next trick at the wheel. Here, have a drink."

He drew out a flask, but Fuller declined. "I've quit drinking forever," he said. "I've work to do."

The mate went forward and began pacing the half-deck, as I could tell by the sound of his footsteps. From my position near the quarter-bitt I could only see the upper part of Fuller's tall figure, as he stood, holding his hand to his forehead as he had done once before. In the stillness of the tropic night I could hear plainly, not only the mate's footfalls, but Fuller's heavy breathing, the guttural snoring of the Captain in his berth, and the sound of light footsteps on the forward companionway stairs—then voices in the lee alleyway. Fuller stepped to the lee side of the wheel and, holding it with one hand, bent his body nearly to a right angle as he looked forward.

"What do you mean, sir!" came in an indignant voice. "Mr. Parker, I forbid you. What are you thinking of? Do you want me to speak to my husband?"

"Why, no, little woman, of course not. What's the sense? Just one; no one can see."

There was a faint scuffle of feet on the deck, a stifled plaint that was half gasp, and a sound from Fuller's lips that I had never heard outside of a menagerie. He left the wheel, and I raised my head through the hatch; but he had disappeared in the alley. Then I heard a scream, a heavy stamping of feet, choking words of protest in the mate's voice, and the crashing of a heavy body on the deck.

"Lay aft here the watch," came a roar in Fuller's vibrant voice. "Take the wheel one hand. I'm through. One of you call the skipper."

The shuffling of feet sounded on the deck as the men ran aft, and I lowered my head, but remained where I could watch. Before the men reached the quarter Fuller appeared around the corner of the house, supporting the half-unconscious woman.

"Steady, little girl," he said, tenderly. "Steady—don't faint. It's almost over."

"Oh, John," she wailed, "don't blame—don't blame me. I couldn't help it. I came up for air—the fumes stifled me—and I didn't know—I didn't know——"

"Never mind, Alice; I don't blame you," he said, giving the wheel a spin with his free hand. "I never blamed you. You've borne it nobly; and I hoped we could hold out, but—it ends this night if I kill him, too. Take the wheel here one of you," he added sternly to the group of men, "and call the skipper."

"What's the row?" asked Irish Tim, as he grasped the spokes. "Where's the mate, Fuller?"

Now came two or three men along the lee alley, and one of them answered Tim.

"Dead," he replied. "Dead as he can be. Fuller, yer done for."

"Call the skipper."

A man descended the after companionway, and not knowing where to look, sang out loudly, waking first the steward in the forward cabin—who appeared—later, the Captain.

"What's the matter here?" asked that individual thickly, as he reached the deck. "Where's Mr. Parker?"

"Dead," answered Fuller, still supporting the Captain's wife. "D——n you," he yelled insanely, "can't you care for the wife that was given you?"

"What—why—what——" stuttered the dazed Captain, backing toward the companionway. "What—Alice!" he bawled suddenly, his emotions crystallizing to anger. "What's this? Get away from that man. Go below, you——"

"Be careful, you hound; be careful," interrupted Fuller, advancing, while the men drew back, wondering. I had not scrupled to lift my head through the hatch, and had seen the steward disappear down the stairs. He returned at this juncture and handed a bright revolver to the Captain, who raised it unsteadily, scattering the men into the alleyways.

"Lower that gun," said Fuller.

"Who are you—to talk to me like this aboard my ship? This is mutiny. Go forrard. Who are you, anyway?" Armed as he was, it was plain that he was frightened.

"Lower that gun. My neck's already in the halter."

The Captain lowered the pistol. There was terrible menace in Fuller's even voice and deliberate advance.

"My name?" he continued, as he stopped before the wavering Captain. "Ever hear it?"

He bent forward and whispered something, which I could not distinguish. Whatever it was, the effect on the Captain was astonishing. "You alive!" he shouted. "Then you die again—that's all." He leveled the pistol and fired, but the bullet went clear. Before he could cock the pistol again, Fuller had seized his wrist and twisted it out of his hand. I believe that Fuller was at that moment a maniac with a maniac's strength. He held the Captain by the collar, at arm's length, until he had lain the pistol on the house; then, with a few preliminary shakes and a sudden swing sideways, he jerked him off his feet. For a fraction of a second the Captain was nearly horizontal, face upward, in mid-air. Then Fuller's right arm slipped under his back, and his left elbow pressed into his throat. In this position, choking and spluttering, the Captain was carried, like a doll in the arms of a child, behind the wheel-box, out of my sight. But in a moment I saw his legs, wide apart and bent at the knees, rise into view as he was launched feet first over the taffrail. A shriek began on his lips, but the water cut it short; and before this shriek sounded Fuller had regained the pistol.

"Forward with you all!" he roared as he vaulted to the top of the house. "Down off the poop, the lot of you! Muster at the main hatch and wait there. Steward," he called to the frightened man in the companionway, "assist this lady down below, and then take the wheel."

But the poor creature was already stumbling down the stairs and the steward was soon at the wheel.

"Now," thundered Fuller, leveling his pistol at Jim, "go forward to the main hatch."

They had lost no time in obeying Fuller's command, and Jim followed. I also followed below the deck, weak and dizzy, but feverish with curiosity. At the head of the booby-hatch steps I heard Fuller, at the break of the poop, order all hands called, and when their shuffling footsteps indicated their appearance, I listened to the address he made them.

"Men," he said, in a steady voice, but with a ring and a snap to each word, "this ship needs a skipper and a mate—but we won't elect them. There's not a man among you fit for it. So I appoint myself skipper and the man in the half-deck mate. I'll take the ship to 'Frisco and deliver her to a tug. Now let me impress something on your minds. You heard me tell the skipper that my neck was in the halter. It was my life or his, and I won. I killed the mate for insulting a lady—my countrywoman—and announced that reason; but I had another, which I announce to you, though I do not feel called upon to explain—it was my life against his. Do you understand? I have killed no one without reason; but, give me reason and I will kill you all cheerfully. Understand? If a man of you enters the cabin, or affronts the lady who lives in it by word or look, I'll drop that man in his tracks. Such little things as disobedience of orders, or lack of respect to myself or the man I appoint mate, can be adjusted with a club, perhaps with fists. Against this you will have watch-and-watch, full and plenty of grub and water, and civil words while you do your work. Is this satisfactory, or is any one looking for trouble? Remember, my neck's in the halter."

"It's all right, Fuller," began Tim, "we——"

"Hold on there," thundered Fuller. "What did you say?"

"Cap'n Fuller, I mean, sorr. It's all right, sorr. I'm wid ye on this, an' I'll do as I'm told; an' it's a good man kin do that, sorr."

"It's all right, sir—We'll stand by you, sir—Served 'em right—We'll back you up, sir," sang out others.

"Very well. Is the carpenter on deck?"

"Yes, sir," answered Chips.

"Take a file down the half-deck and file off those shackles. No time to look for the keys. Relieve the wheel, one of you."

At this I chose to descend and hug my stanchion. The excited carpenter did not notice that I was not properly hitched, and I was soon on deck, being introduced to my shipmates as their officer. It was my first promotion, but I was not unduly elated.

There was no trouble with the men. Not once in the long passage around the Horn did Fuller need to raise his voice in anger or dictation.

Though he had pleaded incompetency for the berth of second mate, he proved himself a master navigator, sneaking the ship around the Horn from "fifty to fifty" in two weeks, and as we sailed north in the Pacific, and the woman in his care recovered health and beauty and confidence, the latent sparkle in Fuller's eyes changed to a softer light.

At the Farallone Islands, twenty-five miles west of the Golden Gate, we made fast a tug's tow-line, and while some of us unbent the canvas, the rest, under Fuller, hoisted over the biggest and best boat we carried—fitting her with spar and lug sail, ballasting her with two heavy trunks, and at least a month's supply of food and water. Then Fuller called us around him, thanked us and shook the hands of all, formally handed the ship over to me, and assisted the smiling little woman down the side ladder, following with a small hand-bag which I do not doubt contained the "clean, green bills" spoken of by Mr. Parker. We cast off the painter, the boat dropped astern, and Fuller hoisted the lug; then, as he pointed the boat's nose due west and crossed our wake, we gave him three cheers, which he answered with his hat and the woman with her handkerchief.

We anchored the ship in San Francisco harbor. Then, after some stern and scandalized questioning by the authorities, we philosophically went to jail, held as witnesses while revenue cutters and tugs searched the coast for a white ship's boat containing a man and woman. At the end of six months' detention the men were released and I was tried, on my own admission and the evidence of the official log, for murderous assault on an officer, and given three months more; for a scapegoat was needed, and they never found Fuller. He had disappeared into the vastness of the Pacific Ocean; but not to die—that I know, as I know the man.

So, good-by, John Fuller, or whoever you may be, and good luck to you wherever you may be. You were a good friend, a good shipmate and a brave seaman and navigator; and you killed your enemies with the weapons you were born with, and reclaimed your wife like a man. But, under the law of your country—which denies to a sailor the right of self-defense, and which you knew too well to brave—you are a mutineer, a pirate and a murderer. And this is the reason that I, who have gone down into the deep, dark valley and returned by the scratch of a sheath-knife, give this story to the world, fearing that they will catch you and hang you when I am not on hand to testify. Fare you well, Fuller.

DRAWN BY H. C. EDWARDS

—FOLLOWING WITH A SMALL HAND-BAG

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA
421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

"Mine Own People"

WHEN one remembers the excitement caused by the arrival in New York, not long ago, of a coffee ship with a crew which had been exposed to the bubonic plague, a peculiar interest attaches to the statements of a well-informed correspondent that there were 200 cases of the plague in Manila in January and February, and also that there were 100 lepers in the Manila hospitals, and that beri-beri, a disease due to a diet of fish and rice, might be termed epidemic among the natives, while smallpox has attacked many of our own soldiers, notably the Thirty-sixth Regulars.

It is easy to imagine the turmoil in New York if these conditions were duplicated there; and yet New York and other cities have seemed to manifest more interest in the South African campaign than in the welfare of the 60,000 American soldiers in the Philippines. The diseases which have been specifically mentioned simply illustrate the extraordinary conditions which our men have been forced to face in tropical islands. Like the English soldiers in Africa, they have been carrying on a war—against far less worthy foemen, to be sure, but in other respects under more trying circumstances. When General Lawton was killed, the shock and the universal mourning awoke the public for an hour to a realization of the fact that we are waging an actual war in the Philippines, but very few have seriously considered the fact that the Philippine warfare has cost us nearly 4000 men, including dead and wounded.

When the war with Spain was in progress the benevolence and splendid generosity of our people was shown in manifold ways. In the first flush of enthusiasm nothing was left undone that private charity could do. The long-drawn-out Philippine campaigning has become an old story, and English reports of English prowess in Africa furnish more novel and more exciting literature. The interest of the Anglo-Boer conflict has been utilized to appeal to our sympathies. There was the so-called American hospital ship, strangely called the Maine, equipped in a measure by Americans who have preferred life in England to life in their own country. There have been kermesses and concerts and the like in New York and elsewhere for the sake of the British soldier and his family; but what has been done in London for the American soldier in the Philippines and those dependent upon him, or, for that matter, what is being done at home?

It is said that there are widows of American officers in Manila who are almost penniless. At the death of an officer his pay stops, and if the widow succeeds in obtaining a pension, it is only after a long delay. There are many tales of sick and insane soldiers returning to San Francisco in destitution. Even from Cuba and Puerto Rico the transports frequently bring to New York soldiers who are in dire want. There is no organization to care for them. One woman, aided by a few others, has devoted herself to relieving their immediate necessities and securing transportation to their homes, but without her aid we might see invalid American soldiers begging in the streets of an American city where kermesses and concerts are being given for the benefit of the British soldiers in Africa.

The English officer, in the majority of cases, has private means. The American officer, as a rule, is dependent upon his salary. Between the English and American private soldiers there is probably very little difference as regards means. England is supposed to be the richest country in the world. It does not follow that our beneficence should be limited to our own country, but when 60,000 Americans are carrying on a war in the tropics, with casualties of various kinds numbering 4000, a situation is presented which may reasonably be expected to make a closer and juster appeal to our sympathies than an English war in Africa.

It is not a question of the right or wrong of our Philippine policy, or the justice or injustice of English action in Africa. The question is one of humanity. Americans are humane. More than this, they are singularly generous. But they are also forgetful. Philippine campaigning is an old story. It offers no extraordinary battles and sieges, with heroic war correspondents cabling the exploits of hardly less heroic titled officers. The American officer has no title and he can expect no Victoria Cross. He simply does his duty and leads the way like the gallant gentleman that he is, and, if he falls, the bitterness of his fate is not from death in his country's service, but from the thought that those dependent upon him are left uncared for. Beyond the regular pay, the return of sick and wounded, and the burial of the dead, the Government can do little.

The families of officers and men, and the penniless and invalid soldiers who are discharged in San Francisco and New York can no longer depend upon Government aid. The chance for organized assistance and supervision is obvious, and the need of aid imperative. Surely Americans will not expose themselves to the reproach that they have forgotten their own.

—RIPLEY HITCHCOCK.

It is always well to do for others—after you have done your duty by doing for your own.

Pessimism in the Midst of Plenty

TO THE general observer pessimism is growing in this country—a country yet too young to be afflicted with the disillusionizing sophistries of age. We are still within the period of youth and ideality and we should be hopeful and happy, not to say careless of consequences, as youth at its best fortunately is. Realism is not necessarily pessimism; the realistic may be optimistic if only we try to make it so. But we do not. Our so-called moulders of public opinion fall into the shadows although the sun still shines and the skies are blue above us. Authors write in their books of a tainted society; legislators and political speakers gravely hint at national decay; newspapers, our "million-folded multiples of thought," give us daily dishes of unsavory evidence of the dissemination of vice; the clergy preach the gospel of degeneracy; lecturers sow the seeds of doubt broadcast, and promiscuous writers rush into print with every conceivable suggestion of human retrogression. And how much of it all is imagination! Is there actual degeneracy and decay, or is it the result of our improved facilities of promulgating opinions which are not facts and are not warranted by the facts? There are thousands of means easily at hand for communicating complaints, and humankind, ever prone to complain, scatters abroad its doubts and distress of mind until they become epidemic. "A drop of ink may make a million think," and think unwisely.

There is no denying that we are a complaining people; and why? There seems to be but one cause that completely covers the effect: We have in this land of plenty been fed so long and have fared so well that we have become dyspeptic, and we see the world through our worn and jaded stomachs rather than through hearts of hope and eyes in which the true light shines. In other words, instead of being in the midst of ills we are in the midst of too much good. We are pessimists of plenty because there is more good in the world than we know what to do with.

Under such circumstances should we complain? Is it not the better part to brace up and cure our dyspepsia? We need exercise and sunshine and cheerful company. "Laugh and the world laughs with you." Man is better to-day than he ever was, and it is our duty not only to know a good thing when we see it, but to realize its excellence and to apply it to our daily thinking. If we think well, we shall speak well and act well, and between that and Heaven the step is short indeed.

—WILLIAM J. LAMPTON.

Of course there may be a limit to the good times, but then we should remember that another United States Senatorial election is soon to take place in Montana.

Poetry and Poverty

IS THERE not something very melancholy in the connection which has existed so long—almost from the creation of man—between "the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge," poetry and poverty? Is it not sad to think the practitioners of this divine art which, as Bacon so finely says, "doth raise and erect the mind by submitting the shows of things to the desires of the mind"—which does more than wine was ever said to do to brighten man's countenance and gladden his heart, which gives him wings and lifts him out of the dust and noise and fret of Earth—should be so generally steeped in penury? Is it not hard enough that, aside from this source of misery, the bards who cheer our pilgrimage by their songs are by their very natures more sensitive than other men to the pricks and stings which all mortals must encounter—that

> "The hearts that are soonest awake to the flowers
> Are always the first to be pierced by the thorns?"

It is true a few songsters—Pope, Tennyson, Whittier and others—have won an independence by their lyres, but they are exceptions to an almost universal rule. To go back to the earliest bards—Homer, the blind old man of Scio, wandered, singing for his bread, from place to place; Dante, driven from his home, had but few dainties; the author of The Faerie Queene was burnt out in winter and lost his spencer; Dryden, though he toadied to lords and burned incense to Charles II, passed his last days in little better than a dry den; Gay, involved in debt, often lacked gayety; Goldsmith was often on the watch for the means of subsistence, and his jewels were in his writings only; Burns was as impassioned and as poor, too, as the northern scalds; Scott earned piles of money, yet could not pay his scot, at last; the author of The Excursion never got his words' worth; Hunt, coveting ease and tranquillity, was often tempest-tossed if not wrecked on a lee shore; Moore, but for his pension, might have been exiled to some desolate moor. Even Tom Hood, with all his varied talents, failed to earn a comfortable livelihood, though his friends urned a lively Hood after his death. Even our own popular Longfellow was "short" in early life, or he would not have accepted the paltry sums paid him for some of his poetic gems.

The golden age of poets, in which they are to be blessed with plenty of aurum potabile—gold that makes the pot boil—is still in the far future. Yet it is well, many will think, for the world, though not for the bard, that it is so. Genius must feel intensely before it can make others feel even superficially. The great bards are > "Cradled into poetry by wrong;

> They learn in suffering what they teach in song."

The songs of those who have never suffered are apt to be works of pure imagination, or rather of pure phantasy, not the utterances of a deliciously overburdened soul speaking to our souls. The goldfinch sings the more sweetly, it is said, with the hot needle in its eye; and the hearts of most men of genius are like the maple-tree, which must be pierced before it will yield its honeyed treasures—like flowers that must be crushed before they will give forth all their sweetness. Had Burns, Byron and Shelley been happy men we should not to-day be banqueting on their "nectared sweets"; for "the fullness of content leaves no room for the sweet and bitter fancies of an imagination that finds its hippocrene in the fount of sorrow, whose source is in the heart, and which can flow only when touched by the wand of Care."

—WILLIAM MATHEWS.

Summer resorts are not to be judged by the adjectives they use.

The Ways of Candidates

ONE good thing about the Presidential situation this year is the candor of the two men who will in all human probability be nominated as the standard-bearers of the great parties. There is some doubt as to the Vice-Presidential selections, but every one feels that President McKinley and Colonel Bryan will both be renominated, and that both not only expect this honor, but that they are doing all they possibly can to bring it about. It is usually this way. When a man is reasonably close to a big thing he is ready to fight for it and to admit that he is after it, but when there is a certain distance he stands off and proclaims his own indifference until he often convinces his hearers, as Hamlet's mother convinced her son, by protesting too much.

There was a time when Major McKinley arose in a great convention hall and, with the utmost vigor and sincerity, demanded that no votes be given to him for the Presidential nomination. The same thing occurred with Garfield, except that in Garfield's case the convention which he addressed ignored his objections and made him President of the United States. We all remember the case of Horatio Seymour, who exclaimed to the Democratic convention, "Gentlemen, your candidate I cannot be," but who nevertheless became the nominee.

When it comes to the pinch there is no man big enough to turn down the chance of becoming President of the United States.

In their preliminary denials, however, we may trace their ambitions. In a speech the other day in New York City Governor Theodore Roosevelt said: "I have done my duty and need no reward. My ambition is not national and will not be." We can easily wish that Roosevelt, whom so many of us admire, had not said this, and yet we must pardon him for it, because it is a part of the great game of politics. The old philosopher said that "by denial we reach great things." In politics it is by denying that some of our best men reach the highest offices. It shows, indeed, how we have changed with civilization. The word candidate is from the Latin candidatus. Literally it means white-robed, and it was thus called because in Rome those who sought office wore a glittering white toga. Fancy, if you can, all our modern Americans dressed in accordance with their political ambitions. In some sections there would be no such thing as a dark suit of clothes; Washington would simply be one shining centre of universal whiteness.

Undoubtedly the modern plan is the better. It is much more comfortable for a man to say that he is in the hands of his friends, even though the hands of his friends may be in his own pockets, than for him to advertise himself to the community as a seeker for place.

In this land, however, almost all who can read and write are born to politics, and have the confidence that they can fill any place that may be opened to them. In fact, one of our worst habits is politics. Perhaps we shall eventually get away from the general appetite for office, and elevate our politics to where we may say with Edmund Burke, "The principles of true politics are those of morality enlarged." In the meanwhile our candidates will have their little ways. Disraeli, who was in many respects the greatest politician of the century, declared, "There is no gambling like politics." And so in the names we draw in the lottery of elections we may hope to find some prize.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Digitized by Google

Americans in Paris

ELEVEN years ago thirty-two million visitors came up to Paris to see the sights. Now, in this year which is to sum up the century, sixty million guests are expected. If the war in South Africa is not unduly prolonged, this estimate, it would seem, is not greatly exaggerated. There are certain men whose business it is to calculate the probabilities of international traffic. One and all, they are agreed upon these figures, startling as they are. At the Paris offices of the transatlantic lines I was told that arrangements have been made for transporting one million good Americans. In 1889 they carried six hundred thousand passengers. The reports from America—the unexampled prosperity of the last year—the strong attractions of the Exposition—all these have led the expert students of probabilities to expect at least one million guests. By one ticket agent I was told that his company were equipping even their freight steamers for passenger boats. Another New York company has already filled three-fourths of its steamers for the entire duration of the Exposition. The largest of all the transatlantic companies has sold out every inch of accommodation for the return voyages during September, October and November.

Need I assure you that France will warmly welcome this golden million of Americans? Were each American visitor to spend only one hundred dollars in Paris—and very few will come off so cheaply—still the good hotel-keepers, merchants and dealers of all sorts would come in for one hundred millions of American money. Even if their profits be only ten or fifteen per cent. they will have cause for sound rejoicing.

Silver Cups for Tiny Racers

Thirty-three American boats have arrived in Paris. They are not very large, for they are only models, but they represent all that the United States has yet done in the way of claiming her heritage in the deep seas. Among them are full-rigged half models of the Puritan, the Mayflower, the Volunteer, the Vigilant, the Defender and all the other fast racing yachts that showed their heels to England's best. There are models also of Yankee fishing-smacks, whaleback steamers, New York tugs, ferry-boats, railroad floats and ice yachts. The ships will be set afloat in an ocean of sea-green burlap, with all sails set and pennons flying. But the small American boy who lives in Paris—and there are hundreds of him—is looking forward to something more exciting. During July and August he and the other small boys of the world are to hold, each Thursday and Saturday afternoon, a regatta on the artificial lake of the Bois. There they will sail their toy yachts—send them out, trusting to wind and wave, to hull and canvas, for the honor of the flag. The prizes will be insignificant, but any small American boy who has a fast toy yacht, less than five feet over all, should bring her with him to battle for American prestige against the "cracks" of the French and English boys. Small as the silver cup is, it should be a matter of national pride to take it home.

New York Schoolrooms at the Exposition

When one has a good thing it is just as well not to talk too much about it. Now, however, that the Exposition has opened its gates it may not be out of the way to disclose Mr. Edison's secret.

The beginning of it all was this: Mr. Howard J. Rogers, the director of the Education and Social Economy Exhibits, wanted something new. Heretofore educational exhibits have been rather dull affairs, except, of course, to the student of pedagogy. They have consisted of charts and photographs, instruments, statistics and all that. Mr. Rogers is a man of modern ideas. He went to Mr. Edison and said: "Can't you get me up a series of cinematograph pictures of school life in New York City?"

"Of course I can," the Wizard replied.

"Well, keep it quiet," said Mr. Rogers; "I don't want to have every one else doing the same thing."

"Oh, the next century will be time enough for Germany and England to take up the idea," Mr. Edison said; and so they kept it quiet.

Mr. Rogers has selected a hall on the right bank of the Seine near the Palace of Political Economy. Here, a half-dozen times a day, the moving pictures will be exposed—small children will study and play, go through their fire-drills and flag-drills and gymnastic exercises: live, in a word, the daily life of lessons and play. The pictures have been made in various schools, some uptown and others in the poorer quarters, so that in a broad way the life of all New York will be illustrated for the curious visitor from Cochin-China or Tasmania.

The Military Exhibit of the Transvaal

Thousands of visitors to the Exposition will go first to the little pavilion of the Transvaal, which stands in the gardens of the Trocadero. The exhibits will not be so complete as they were meant to be, for reasons that need no emphasis, but they will show in a striking manner the national and industrial life of the two republics. In the pavilion itself I saw only plans, maps, books—illustrating the laws and government of the Transvaal, its railway, postal and telegraphic service—and a large number of Kaffir curiosities. But a little behind the building is the Boer house, a one-storied building with five rooms. Rough chairs and tables, homely beds, plain rugs, make up the simple furniture.

"The most of our farmers have few articles of luxury," said Mr. Pierson, the South African Commissioner-General, who was with me, "but almost every one has a harmonium—usually one of the American instruments—which they use during family worship. And always you will see on the centre-table the old Staten Bijbel, brought from Holland in the long ago."

Near the farm is the entrance to a mine-gallery, which runs out far under the Avenue de Trocadero to the Rue du Magdebourg, where there is a stamp mill of the Transvaal kind. There are eight hundred tons of gold quartz in the mine, and the entire process of digging, crushing, amalgamating and casting the gold will be shown day by day.

"Another thing," said Mr. Pierson, "is that the Transvaal is the only nation that will not send a military exhibit to the Exposition. It hardly seemed necessary," he added quietly; "we have shown the world what we can do—what we can't do."

The Curious History of The Angelus

The most famous of modern pictures, The Angelus, after touring America like a prima donna, has been bought back into France for 700,000 francs—a tidy bit of money in any language.

The history of this picture is more than interesting; it is an ironic tragedy. In the first place, The Angelus is not a Millet, or, at least, very little of it is his work. As a painting it was never more than mediocre. Millet was not above painting pot-boilers, and The Angelus was one of these hurried and scamped productions. Whether the artist, in his poverty, used cheap paints, or whether the picture was badly varnished by heedless amateurs, I do not know, but it began to crack and scale before it had a fair chance of being known. At this period, The Angelus was all Millet, and no one dreamed of calling it a masterpiece; no one ever imagined that it would be looked upon as a symbol of France and would tour the world like a prima donna. Little by little it began to peel. Flakes fell off here and there. In a word, it underwent the slow, painful process of a boy recovering from scarlet fever. The dealer who owned the picture at that time called in his expert workmen, and as fast as a flake fell off they painted in the blank space. (By the way, two of these repairers are now artists who have attained success; their names need not be mentioned.) In the meantime, Millet died. The Angelus was exhibited in Paris. Critics and poets began to see that it was the symbol of France—the symbol of the eternal peasant with the empty hands. And month by month the picture became less a Millet, and in exact proportion its fame spread in the world. Always little patches of paint kept puffing up, cracking, dropping off, and always the workmen replaced the falling pieces, until there was hardly a brush mark of Millet's left on the canvas—nothing except the signature and a little of the monotonous sky across which comes the sound of the far-off bells. Then, at last, The Angelus entered definitely upon its career of glory, touring America.

The grim irony of it is that Millet will always be famous for a picture which is not his—save the signature and a hand's breadth of sky. It's an old story on earth. We do not often praise in a man what is praiseworthy, and occasionally we praise him for another man's best. What nine people in ten admire in Shakespeare is Colley Cibber—the retouching of some actor or manager. And all of us love Doctor Johnson for the things Boswell said for him. It's the way of the world; but I wonder what Millet would have thought of this Angelus which is not his.

In Memory of the Old Alliance

As they grow more practical, sage and reasonable, there is a tendency in nations, as in men, to neglect the prettier sentimental duties. One cannot make too much of international courtesies like the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty. The other day Mr. Robert Thompson brought over to Paris the first of the Lafayette dollars, which in the name of President McKinley he presented to the President of France. The ceremony was very simple. Mr. Thompson, who was accompanied by General Horace Porter, made a short address. He spoke of the statue of Lafayette, which is the gift of the young people of America to France in memory of the old alliance. And he added: "I trust this coin, which bears the effigies of Washington and Lafayette, may be always the symbol of the friendship which unites the two greatest republics on earth."

And when President Loubet had echoed the wish the little ceremony was at an end, save for the inevitable breakfast. Perhaps by way of prompt requital for the Lafayette statue, the city authorities of Paris have granted a site to the American National Institute. As you know, this is to be an institution corresponding to the French Prix de Rome. Although the officials at Washington will have the last word in the matter, it is probable that the site chosen will be in the fashionable square named in honor of the United States, and that the building will be a duplicate of our pavilion at the Exposition.

—VANCE THOMPSON.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

A correspondent states that "the day of sympathetic employers is long past." I will not dispute the statement, generally speaking, but there are exceptions, and I do want to say that I believe that employers will in time come to see that a sympathetic interest in their employees, a regard for their physical comfort while on duty or a word of appreciation where due, will be to them a valuable business asset. The character of the service in an office or store depends not only upon the discipline, but upon the zeal and energy shown by the employees. My observation and experience has been that if you take an interest in the welfare of your employees they will take an interest in you and your business.

It will be found that the number of mere time-servers and eye-servants will be decreased very materially where such a policy is pursued, and more and better work will be the result. Nearly all the many good articles on the subject of success point out to the employee his duty and the qualities necessary to secure advancement, but they overlook the fact that, even if the employer does not owe his clerk more than his mere wage, a little friendly interest shown in some way might be a very profitable investment.

Some young men, I am willing to admit, cannot stand praise or prosperity, but I believe if more of them were placed upon their honor the majority would not prove themselves unworthy. Is it not worth a trial?

A. H. GOLDSMITH.

Floral Park, New York.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Mr. C. M. Skinner in The Growing Appreciation of American Art says: "Homer Martin, who died recently, never received more than one hundred and fifty dollars for a canvas, it is said, and had difficulty in selling his pictures at any price."

Both of these statements are very wide of the mark. From very early in the sixties, when we were married, my husband used to ask and obtain from $300 to $350 for canvases of the size he preferred to paint: 18 x 30 inches. Before that decade was over he exchanged a larger canvas, the most important he had yet painted, with Mr. William E. Dodge for an 18 x 30, for which the latter had paid that price and $100 to boot. He afterward resold the smaller landscape to the late Mr. Charles Elliott, portrait painter, for the sum originally paid for it by Mr. Dodge.

I remember his saying that Mr. John Roebling, who had ordered one at a fixed price of $450, was the only man who ever gave him more than he had asked, sending his check for $500 when the picture was delivered.

That his pictures did not bring greater prices was partly due to the fact that Mr. Martin lacked altogether the commercial sense; and also to the kindred fact that he could only paint when the painting mood came on. When it did he could paint all day long; he could forget all minor miseries when the great mainspring of his inner life, the artistic impulse, was seconded by the artistic power which was a thing not at all under his control.

"I do not know where it comes from," he once said to me; "I only know that when it comes nothing else in the world is of any importance to me. And when it goes I do not know where it goes to nor whether it will ever come back."

His pictures grew steadily greater as his life neared its end. When he was at work at the great Adirondack picture of the Clarke sale—for which that gentleman received just sixteen times what he gave for it—I said to him: "If you never paint another stroke you will go out in a blaze of glory with this set." The set included, besides this one, the Seine view now in the Metropolitan Museum, and a small one for which Mr. W. T. Evans sent my husband $350, which came on the Saturday before his death and paid his funeral expenses. I was glad to see that Mr. Evans had been generously repaid for his kindness at his late sale. But to go back to The Adirondacks, which I was looking at when I made my remark to my husband. He was then totally blind in one eye, the optic nerve of which was dead, while the other one was clouded with a cataract.

"Yes," he answered me, "I think I have learned to paint at last. If I were stone blind now, and knew just where the colors were on my palette, I think I could paint some of the things I have wanted to paint."

The pictures were as good in his lifetime as they are now, but they had not the commercial cachet; they had not passed out of his hands into those of dealers. He held, for instance, The Westchester Hills, which I sold to Mr. Evans last year for $1000, and which is now going to Paris as an admirable specimen of his later work; he held that, I say, for eight or nine years without ever getting an offer for it. So with The Sun Worshipers, which I sold lately to Mr. Louis Marshall, of New York, for $2500, that being the second offer ever made for it, though it was painted several years ago.

ELIZABETH G. MARTIN.

Wilmington, Delaware.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

The expression of H. C. Kegley, in your March 31 number, on Machine-Made Charity reiterates the "true truth" in a wise, sincere and convincing language. The rarity of such writers in this age of sightless observation is to be grievously and deeply lamented, but for the few brave pens we are soulfully grateful.

Machinery indeed complicates, artificializes and makes abortive the end-workings of Love by reason of that professional taint which estops the genuine overflow of crystal charity. The humbler methods, as exemplified by our Master, withdraw us from the bondage of institutional hypocrisy and place the one-man power in preeminence by assigning to the individual his duty in walk and conversation. It is the old story of the barbarian and missionary: "Be as good as your Book and we will follow you."

Superlative common-sense demands that we should cater to the intelligence of our fellows if we would secure those unbidden acknowledgments which mark the beginnings of a nobler and more fruitful life. Private ministries, especially when they are guided by an eliciting fellowship, are the most successful means of winning honest hearts to the centre of all loves and hopes. To this end our New England seer uttered his wisdom and left us an injunction for future teaching: "Be not simply good; be good for something."

Detroit, Michigan.

JOSEPH GREIG.

Digitized by Google

With the Big Show

From the Notes of W.C. Coup † Edited by Forrest Crissey

SHOWS thrive best on bluster and buncombe. Years of experience have taught me that the traveling show business handled by capitalists who have been trained in other lines of enterprise can never succeed. I have often been reproved by business men who were astounded at the lavish and apparently wasteful expenditures of the circus for "show and blow," and who have insisted that these expenses should be cut in half. It is true that such reckless expenditures in any ordinary commercial undertaking would be disastrous, but it is the life of a big show. When it is possible to thoroughly arouse the curiosity of the public, expense should be a secondary consideration.

The Fifty-Cent Rivals of the $10,000 Hippos

I recall an incident, however, which goes to show that the most expensive attractions do not necessarily prove the greatest drawing cards. Among the rare animals which I had one season were some Memiponias, or tiny deerlets—"hell benders," as they were commonly called. One of the opposition shows was making a great feature of a pair of hippopotami, or river horses, from the Nile. I had made arrangements to receive, at stated intervals, regular numbers of "hell benders," and I would wire my agents ahead, "Another living hell bender arrived to-day." This he would advertise with great gusto, getting out special bills and keeping up the excitement.

One day, while one of my agents, who happened to be back with the show, was sitting in my office, a bill to the amount of six dollars was presented for "One dozen hell benders." Seeing this he inquired what it meant.

"Don't you see?" said I. "'One dozen hell benders, six dollars.'"

"Do you mean to say," my agent exclaimed, "that I have been advertising fifty-cent hell benders?"

"You have," I laughingly replied.

"Well," said he, "if that doesn't beat the deuce! These fifty-cent hell benders have knocked $10,000 worth of hippos higher than a kite!" It certainly was a fact that our fifty-cent articles had been so judiciously advertised as to create more excitement than the costly "hippos" of the opposition.

In the course of the same season I made a discovery which proved to be a valuable drawing card. I owned some young elephants which I had lent to a showman on the Bowery. On going to see them one day I noticed a man holding his finger in the mouth of one of the smaller ones. I placed my finger in the mouth of another and found that the creatures seemed to derive pleasure from the action of sucking. Immediately I sent out for an ordinary infant's nursing bottle. The young elephant drained the bottle as if to the manner born. It was passed from one to another of the infant class. Finally they fought in the most indescribably comical manner for possession of the bottle.

A Skillful Appeal to Public Sympathy

Then I fitted a large glass jar, holding a gallon, with rubber tubes, so that all could use it at the same time. Invariably they would empty this bottle before loosening their hold on the nipples. They had doubtless been taken from their mother when too young, or perhaps she had been killed at the time the young were captured. So effectively did they appeal to public interest and sentiment that by dint of skillful advertising the celebrated "sucking baby elephants" made quite a fortune in a single season. They would be led into the ring, where they would take their nourishment like human babies, their overgrown size making this infantile operation very comical and absurd. The sight captivated the heart of every woman who attended the show.

The eagerness of circus proprietors to procure animal monstrosities for exhibition purposes has called forth many laughable communications from persons who have had curiosities of this kind to sell. I remember going one morning into the office and reading a telegram which came to Mr. Barnum. It was as follows:

"BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

"To P. T. BARNUM: I have a four-legged chicken. Come quick."

The circus of the present day is not complete without the side shows and the after concerts. For my own part I can honestly say that I never in my life heard a concert announcement made in my own show without feeling like getting up and leaving in disgust; but all classes of show-goers must be pleased, and there is one class which demands the concert and another class that wants the side shows.

By this observation I am reminded of an incident which probably marked the origin of giving the concert in the main tent, immediately after the big show. It seems that some ruffians in Arkansas broke into the side tent of a certain show, and, tearing it down, threw it into the river. This was quite a serious loss to the proprietor, who at first thought he would have to dispense with the concert. On further thought, however, he entered the ring and explained the situation to his audience, telling the latter he would give an extra entertainment in the big tent, where all might have comfortable seats. The audience was delighted with this new arrangement, as the side tent had no seats. The proprietor of this show has long since passed away; but if he were alive now I think many an audience would be disposed to lynch him as the originator of one of the most obnoxious features of the circus.

A Silent Parade from Albany to the State Line

I am glad to know that the circus man who speaks of his patrons as "gillies," and who endeavors to obtain his wealth by fair or foul means, is becoming more and more rare. I recall an illiterate circus man of this description who employed every "privilege" known to the circus world. For example: when traveling by wagon the whole caravan would pass through a toll-gate, stating that the "boss" was behind and would pay the toll. The last vehicle to go through would contain this dignitary and his treasurer, who, when confronted with the long list of vehicles on which he ought to pay toll, would declare that the toll-keeper had been imposed upon, and that half of those vehicles belonged to a gang of gypsies having no connection whatever with the show. He would then cut the bill down according to the easy or hard nature of the custodian of the toll-gate, and in this manner evade payment of what, in a whole season, would aggregate a large sum of money.

On one occasion, when about to exhibit in Albany, and knowing that his whole outfit would that day be attached for debt, he ordered the parade to start early, as he intended to give them a "long ride." The procession accordingly started on what has passed into circus history as the "silent parade," for, leaving the city in all the glory of spangle and tinsel, the showmen never rested until they had reached the State line, while the sheriffs, waiting at the tents in Albany for the parade to return, had the poor satisfaction of attaching the almost worn-out and quite worthless canvas.

I have often been asked what it costs to start a circus and menagerie. This is a most difficult question to answer, since it depends entirely upon the size and pretensions of the enterprise in question. Shows vary in size from cheap affairs, capable of being carried in three railroad cars, to the elaborate institutions which require two long special trains for their transportation. The expense of running a large show is enormous, although in advertising this expense is usually exaggerated. There are a great many traveling tented exhibitions which "bill," or advertise, like a circus, and in the eyes of the general public pass for circuses, but which, in reality, are variety exhibitions given under canvas.

The Fluctuating Level of Circus Values

In the eye of the law a circus must have feats of horsemanship in its program, and such shows have to pay a "circus" license, which in some States and cities is very high. If, however, the shows do not give any riding, their performance simply consisting of leaping, tumbling and athletic feats, then a license may be taken out at a greatly reduced price; and this accounts for the almost numberless small shows which annually tour the country. Of the circus and menagerie show proper I do not think there are more than twenty in America; but of tented exhibitions, billed as "railroad shows," there are several hundred. The tented exhibitions employ from fifty to six hundred men each, and the capital invested in them runs from $5000 to $250,000.

Many of the smaller shows are fitted out economically by purchasing from the larger ones paraphernalia that has been used a season or two. For example: the canvases used an entire season by a large show may be purchased cheaply, because it is essential to the attractiveness of a really great amusement institution to have each season a new, white "spread." The old canvas, if not sold to the smaller showmen, is disposed of to the paper manufacturers at about one and one-half cents the pound.

The same rule of enforced replenishment applies to wardrobe and general paraphernalia. In this way a beginner in the circus business may, by judicious investment in second-hand bargains, start out with a very fair outfit secured at a much smaller cost than if he were compelled to purchase everything new. And, in this connection, let me say that I know of no other business enterprise in which new material costs so much, and when sold at second-hand realizes so little. One of the largest shows ever organized in this country, and which was reputed to be worth more than half a million dollars, was inventoried on the death of one of the proprietors, with a view to selling the estate of the deceased, and, to the great surprise of the executors, was found to reach in value only about $200,000.

Twenty years ago a show with a daily expenditure of $250 was thought extravagant, while fifty years ago a circus whose receipts averaged sixty dollars a day was considered to be doing a good business. To-day there is one show the expenses of which are undoubtedly more than $3500 a day, although it is surprising what wonderful displays are made by others at a cost of less than $1000 a day. The reason for this is that, above a certain amount, the expenses depend largely upon the amount of advertising done. It is amusing, however, to note the manner in which all of them, big and little, claim to be the largest and most expensive attractions in the country. Many smaller showmen use the same billing matter as the largest ones, and scores of lines can be read in the circus advertisements of to-day that have done duty for many years.

What it Costs to Ride with the Band Wagon

It is almost impossible to give an intelligent idea of the cost of wild animals, since this depends entirely upon the operation of the law of supply and demand. The cost of cages varies, of course, according to size and decorations, and the same observation applies to the railroad cars. The most expensive of the latter are the highly ornamental cars used for advance advertising. These are comfortably, and even elaborately, fitted, and are provided with a huge paste boiler and other conveniences. They cost anywhere from $3000 to $7000. The flat and stock cars used by circuses are much more substantially constructed than the ordinary ones used in the railroad freight business, and are considerably larger, most of them being sixty feet in length and fitted with springs similar to those of passenger coaches. Cars of this description cost from $500 to $800 each; passenger coaches from $1500 upward, according to the quality of interior, fittings and decorations.

Some circus proprietors also have their own private cars, fitted with every imaginable convenience and luxury, and such a car costs high in the thousands. The expense of the wardrobe depends, of course, on the amount used and its quality, and whether the costumes are intended for a spectacular show or for an ordinary circus. The wardrobe and papier mâché chariots used in the production of our "Congress of Nations" cost Mr. Barnum and myself more than $40,000, and I am told that Mr. Bailey expended a like amount on his "Columbian" display.

The price of the canvas has been wonderfully reduced within the last few years. We paid $10,000 for our first hippodrome tent alone, and this did not include dressing-room tents, horse tents and camp tents. Afterward, however, we had a larger one made for very much less money. The small circuses that hover around Chicago and the larger cities of the West in summer usually use a tent about eighty feet across, with two thirty-foot middle pieces. This, equipped with poles, seats and lights, costs about $800.

Ladies' Watches

OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.

The Blue Book sent free.

New England Watch Company

37 and 39 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Spreckels Building, San Francisco

Sozodont FOR THE TEETH and BREATH

Every one needs a dentifrice. Which is the best? Your dentist will say "Sozodont." Antiseptic; non-acid; fragrant. 25c. and 75c.

Sozodont FOR THE TEETH and BREATH

IF YOU ARE PRUDENT

Why not be insured, and save money at the same time? Our new policy on the endowment plan is the best insurance contract issued, and is meeting with great favor. Our booklet, "How and Why," sent free on request, you will find interesting and instructive.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

DAWN

(Child Study from Life)

A platinum print of the above cut, 6½ x 8½ on 11 x 14 mount, sent to any address, together with our complete illustrated catalogue of

BEACON HILL PRINTS

For Fifty Cents

CATALOGUE ONLY, 10 CENTS

Celebrity Photo and Art Company
256 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

Royal Engraved Wedding Invitations and Announcements

Samples Free

Royal Stationery

Two quires of finest Writing Paper, correctly engraved with your Initial or Monogram (choice of five designs), and 50 envelopes to match, for

	Initial	Monogram
Stamped in Plain Colors,	$ .75	$1.25
Stamped in Gold, Silver or Copper Bronze,	.85	1.25
Stamped, Illuminated in Two Colors,	1.00	1.50

Handsome sample book and sheet of souvenir engraved work mailed for 10 cents

Royal Visiting Cards — Latest styles of engraving and sizes, including plate. Samples free. 50 cards, 75c.; 100 cards, $1.00.

ALL CHARGES PREPAID

ROYAL ENGRAVING COMPANY
19 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

"Do Not Stammer"

YOU CAN BE CURED

You have been advised that you would outgrow your impediment, but you still stammer. You have followed various suggestions, but they have not helped you. Why not place yourself under the skilful care of one who cured himself after stammering 40 years and who has, during the past 16 years, cured hundreds of stammerers?

Summer Session at Atlantic City, N. J., from May to September.

Send for new illustrated book to the PHILADELPHIA INSTITUTE, 1031 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Established 1894.

EDWIN S. JOHNSTON, Founder and President.

EDWIN S. JOHNSTON.

Please mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST when writing.

BARD HALL | A Military School

For Young Boys

Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Located near West Point, in the Hudson River Highlands, a region famous for its beauty and healthfulness. The building, equipment and methods of discipline are designed to meet the needs of boys under fourteen years of age, to whom the attendance is limited, and to give them the benefit of a mild military system combined with the influences of a cultured home.

For Catalogue, address

S. C. JONES, C. E., Superintendent

HOME STUDY

of BOOK-KEEPING SHORTHAND BUSINESS FORMS PENMANSHIP, etc.

with our Private Lessons BY MAIL open up to Young Men and Women good paying positions. We give just the training needed for success in business. No interference with work—only spare time required. The cheapest and best method of study. Highly indorsed, national reputation, established 45 years. We also teach English, Civil Service and other courses by mail. Trial lesson, 10c. A 62c Catalogue free.

BRYANT & STRATTON, 155 College Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.

STOP STAMMERING

Write for our new Illustrated 200-page book, "The Origin and Treatment of Stammering." Sent FREE to any person who stammers, with full particulars regarding treatment, for 6 cents in stamps, to cover postage.

The Lewis School for Stammerers, 110 Adelaide St., Detroit, Mich.

These tents are made of light material. The larger canvases have to be made of stouter stuff, and a tent suitable for hippodrome or spectacular shows, which must be about 225 feet in width and 425 or 450 feet in length, would cost about $7000.

Requirements and Cost of the Circus Horse

As an evidence of how circuses have increased in size, I will say that the seventy or eighty quarter poles which hold up the main tent of the Barnum and Bailey shows are each larger than the main pole used years ago. The present system of lighting, which, by the way, I was the first to use, is the patent of an Englishman, improved by an American named Gale. It first took the place of kerosene lights, so far as circus illumination is concerned, in 1870. In experimenting with these lights, when I first introduced them, I several times met with accidents which threatened to terminate my career. Once I purchased an electric light plant with the intention of doing away with all gasoline illumination, but was compelled to abandon the attempt after expending $8000 for a portable electric plant.

The item of tent stakes is quite a formidable one. Fitted with iron rings, they cost about fifty cents each, and hundreds of them are required by every circus. Harnesses require an outlay of from ten to twenty-five dollars each, according to decoration and material.

The draught horses used by circuses vary in price, some of them being purchased cheap from horse markets; but I have always found that the best I could get were the most economical. Those bought by me averaged $200 each; the usual circus horse, however, costs much less, and so long as it does its work all right the main purpose is answered, for, in passing through the streets, its faults do not attract the attention of the ordinary observer, but only that of the typical horseman. Ring horses, whether for a "pad" or a "bareback" act, must have a regular gait, as without it the rider is liable to be thrown. They are frequently and generally owned by the performers themselves, and I have known a crack rider to pay as high as $2000 for one whose gait exactly suited him. The performing "trakene" stallions brought from Germany by Mr. Barnum cost $10,000, and my first troupe of educated horses, ten in number, were purchased at the same figure. These, however, were unquestionably the best and most valuable ever seen in a circus.

A Page from the Invoice Book of the Big Show

Though it would be comparatively easy to start a circus and menagerie equipped almost entirely with second-hand paraphernalia, the reader will see from the following figures that the cost of starting a new first-class circus and menagerie is another proposition. Here are a few official figures on the cost of a first-class circus and menagerie which have never before been made public. They are taken from my private record, or invoice book:

20 Cages at $350	$7,000.00
2 Band wagons at $1500 each	3,000.00
3 Chariots at $3000 each	9,000.00
1 Wardrobe wagon	800.00
1 Ticket wagon	400.00
The above for the parade.
Animals to fill these cages will average about:
2 Lions	2,000.00
2 Royal Tigers	2,000.00
2 Leopards	400.00
1 Yak	250.00
1 Horned Horse	500.00
2 Camels	300.00
2 Elephants	3,000.00
As small elephants have been delivered here for $1000 each, this is probably a fair average.
1 Hippopotamus	5,000.00
1 Rhinoceros	5,000.00
2 Cages of monkeys	1,000.00
1 Kangaroo	200.00
1 Cassowary	200.00
1 Ostrich	500.00
1 Giraffe	1,500.00
Other small animals including hyenas, bears, ichneumon, birds, etc.	2,000.00
12 Baggage wagons at $200	2,400.00
4 Roman chariots	1,000.00
125 Horses at $125 each	15,625.00
This price is above the average.
125 Harnesses at $15	1,875.00
2 Advertising cars	5,000.00
Wardrobe	3,000.00
2 Sleepers	5,000.00
10 Flat cars at $400	4,000.00
6 Horse cars at $400	2,400.00
Elephant car	500.00
Tents	4,000.00
	$88,750.00

This could be reduced by eliminating the rhinoceros, hippopotamus, giraffe and other very expensive animals, but to this must be added considerable money for stakes, shovels, picks, stake pullers, extra ropes, tickets, blank contracts and all necessary printing, which would bring the cost of the usual "million dollar" circus and menagerie up to about $86,000.

On all this property there is not one dollar of insurance. Once, when on the road, a live stock insurance company came to me to insure our horses, but at the rate at which they wanted to insure them, I soon convinced them that we could not make any money.

I might add that a circus and menagerie at the figures I have given would be far better and larger than the average "million dollar show" now on the road, there being certainly not more than three aggregations that cost more than the amount I have given. No man should attempt the show business who has not a fortune, and also plenty of that other kind of capital quite as essential to his success — long experience on the road.

DRAWN BY GUSTAVE VERBEEK —ALL COULD USE IT AT THE SAME TIME

HOOKON HOSE SUPPORTER

Holds the Stockings Up

Holds the Corset Down

Does away with Safety Pins

Being hooked on the lowest corset clasp it keeps the corset down and close to the body, preventing the point of the corset from protruding, thereby greatly reducing the prominence of the abdomen.

The HOOKON cannot become unfastened; always comfortable, no matter what position the wearer may assume. Made of best materials, and will wear longer than other hose supporters. For sale at leading stores.

Send 50c for sample pair — silk
Send 25c for sample pair — cotton

I. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
721 Broadway, New York

Are You a Machine?

If you do mechanical work in a mechanical way your hope of success depends on your turning squarely around and putting brains and originality into your work. Whether you work at a lathe or a ledger you can take a technical course by mail and change your occupation without loss of time or salary. Courses in Engineering, Drafting, Surveying, Book-Keeping, Shorthand, etc. Capital, $1,500,000. Fees, cash or installments.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1171
Scranton
Pa.

Electric Lighted Trains

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

THE North-Western Limited to St. Paul and Minneapolis, 6.30 P. M. daily from Chicago, cannot be excelled. Three other first-class trains from Chicago also — 9.00 A. M. Daylight Train, 10.00 P. M. Fast Mail and 10.15 P. M. Night Express. All agents sell tickets via this popular route. W. B. Kniskern, G. P. & T. A., Chicago.

Ad Sense

Helps to remove thorns from the path of business life; published monthly, $1.00 a year. Ad Sense is the sort of reading that pleases and benefits the business man. Send 10 cents — coin or stamps — for sample copy to Ad Sense, 81 Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

LEARN PROOFREADING

If you possess a fair education, why not utilize it at a genteel and uncrowded profession paying $15 to $25 weekly? Situations always obtainable. We are the original instructors by mail.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Philadelphia

LEARN TELEGRAPHY

Shorthand

Intensely practical instruction by experts. We teach shorthand only, and we teach that thoroughly. No lightning system nor fabulous claims. Money refunded if dissatisfied. Send stamp for booklet or 25 cents for beginner's book.

Correspondence Shorthand School, 420 Bourse, Philadelphia

BRADLEY Platinum Paper

For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Sample 25 cents for stamp.

The Paper on which Photographic Masterpieces are made.

JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 13th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

KLEINERT'S
OLYMPIA
Dress Shields

The Olympia is the only perfect shield, and the shield that gives more satisfaction, wear and comfort than any other. It is the only shield that can be

WASHED and IRONED

It is Odorless
And will not rot or deteriorate with age. Our guarantee with every pair.

Send 25c
For sample pair and be convinced.

I. B. Kleinert Rubber Company
721 Broadway, New York

B. Eldredge
AUTOMATIC
The Best All-Around Family Sewing Machine Made.

Easy Running, High Speed, Simple and Silent.

SOLD AT A REASONABLE PRICE AND FULLY GUARANTEED.
Send for Circular.

NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO.
BELVIDERE, ILL.
Chicago House, 49 Jackson Boulevard. New York House, 63 Reade Street.

Huyler's
PURE! DELICIOUS!!
Bonbons and Chocolates
Sent Everywhere by Mail or Express.
863 Broadway, New York
Huyler's
COCOA and CHOCOLATES
For Eating, Drinking and Cooking, are unsurpassed for Purity of Material and Flavor
GROCERS EVERYWHERE

"BOSTON APRON BIB"

It is cut to fit the body, allowing apron to fall evenly into the lap.
It is made of enameled cloth.
It is therefore waterproof.
It protects the child's clothes.
It saves its cost in laundry bills.

Made plain white or colored with pattern. White, red or blue bindings.

If your dealer cannot supply, sent prepaid, following prices:

Age up to 2 years,		25 cents
"	2 to 4	"	30 "
"	5 to 7	"	35 "

Patented April 3, 1900.
Elite Manufacturing Company, 91 Bedford St., Boston

The IDEAL Steam Cooker

Cooks a whole meal over 1 burner, on gasoline, oil, gas or common cook stove.
Reduces Fuel Bills One-Half
MAKES TOUGH MEATS TENDER. Prevents steam and odors. WHISTLE blows when cooker needs more water. DINNER SETS, BICYCLES, WATCHES AND OTHER VALUABLE PREMIUMS GIVEN WITH ORDER FOR COOKERS. Send for illus. cat. We pay express. Agents wanted.
TOLEDO COOKER CO., Box 18, Toledo, Ohio

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, May, 1900.

I HAVE felt very much in touch lately with that jingling old ditty which grumbles along through a couplet or two and then winds up with this poetic plaint,

"Go up two steps and slip back three,
Such a getting up stairs I never did see," for no sooner had I begun to draw a long breath because the Puerto Rican wrangle was over in the Senate than I found that the bill was up to the gentlemen of the House once more. I was almost hoping that Robert would stay away and avoid voting a second time, but my hope was strangled in its birth, for upon talking it all over with Senator P—— I learned that Robert was supposed to be on his way home, that the party mandate had gone forth that all absentees must return and that no shirking would be allowed. As Senator P—— expressed it, the leaders meant to "jam" the bill through in short order, for when the Speaker and the leader on the floor unite their efforts it is no use for anybody to kick. I felt so out of patience with the whole thing that I said tartly:

"Well, all I've got to say is that the Republicans are very fatuous. They may pass this old bill forty times over but it is not going to stay passed. The House will find that the public wish may prove to be like the humble camomile plant."

"How so?" asked the Senator.

"Why, the more the gardener tramples on the camomile the faster and more furious it grows; this is a well-known fact in horticulture."

The Senator laughed, and then said:

"Well, Mrs. Slocum, the leaders do not mean to trample on the public wish any more than they can help; not because they have any regard for the public wish, but because they have regard for the public vote, so an early adjournment will be forced if possible. The President has signified his wish for an adjournment, and to that end we are keeping all driftwood out of legislation and reducing every measure down to the bare necessities of government. The appropriations are many of them out of the way. Some few things are looming up which the steering committee would be glad to put aside; one of them, and the most troublesome, is the ship subsidy scheme, which is a party and a strictly political measure. We had hoped to lay this over, but certain Senators seem determined to force it to the front." He added: "Some of these bills have been so tortuous and devious in their paths that the truth has been rather hazy, for we've been taught that 'truth, like light, travels only in straight lines.'"

"And, speaking of straight lines, I see that your committee has finally taken a unanimously straight line on the Clark case and that you report against him."

"Yes, we could do nothing else, of course. But there were certain aspects of the case upon which we all thought differently, and several had a personally friendly feeling for Clark, so there has been left to him, so far as the committee is concerned, the loophole of resigning."

"I cannot see that it is much of a loophole that only secures a choice of the mode of political decapitation, but I suppose he will be thankful for that.

"You are working down to Mr. Quay, at last, too. I suppose there will be a pitched battle over him?"

I was remembering the encounter I had seen between Mr. Wolcott and Mr. Lodge on this case, but the Senator would not discuss it, so I said by way of turning the subject and apropos of nothing:

"I see that we are threatened with a new 'Commission.' This time it is to be one to Japan and China to study trade conditions, and each man, I suppose, will draw five thousand dollars salary and compensate the country with fifty cents' worth of information."

"You don't approve, then, of Commissions?" laughed the Senator.

I knew he wanted to draw me out, and I was so pessimistic over everything that I did not mind.

"Well, how about the War Commission? Did not their conclusion remain in obscurity, or stay locked in their own breasts? And the Philippine Commission? Was not its report so delightfully unenlightening that another Commission had to be formed immediately to go find out what the first one had been driving at? Perhaps we may send a third one to look after the second, and so on. And then we had a Commission to Puerto Rico, and they were so explicit with information that we went to work tooth and nail and extended to the island the blessings of the tariff, minus the Constitution. Then we have had Commissions to Cuba, which in the long run, mark my words, will report that nothing will suit the Cuban health, complexion and pocket save annexation. We have had a Commission to Hawaii, and, for aught I know, one to Guam; and I should like to know what they've all accomplished and how much information they really have brought back."

"About as much as Macrum and Webster Davis have brought back from the Transvaal," answered the Senator.

"Oh, well, poor Mr. Macrum was only scared out of his boots, and I'm glad that Mr. Hitt's committee decided not to do anything further in the Macrum inquiry, but Mr. Webster Davis——" I stopped. I could not fathom him.

"I suspect," said the Senator, "that the truth of Webster Davis is that he has mistaken himself. You see, he is possessed of what you might call a 'pretty wit.' He is undeniably clever of speech, and during the last Congressional campaign he took the stump and proved a strong card. Afterward he was in great demand as a public speaker and he went hither and yon, and I fancy that he became enamored of public speaking, and the step from the public speaker to the public agitator is but a short one, especially when the notion of becoming a prophet to others is added. When this fever was working in his blood he cast about for a cause to work it out on, and lo! the South African struggle was right to his hand."

"Well, they say that he spells 'prophet' with an 'f,' in spite of his professed inspiration," I interrupted.

"N–o," said the Senator, shaking his head doubtfully, "I'm inclined to think that, although there is little or no inspiration about him, he starts out honest. I could not see, however, in his initial speech any new thing, or any evidence or hint of a revelation that would work any change of heart in the Government's attitude. I think perhaps that the worst that can be said of Webster Davis' motive is that he wants to make personal political capital as an independent leader of the West, and that he has picked out the South African cause as likely to be the most popular to exploit and in which to exploit himself. He is posing as a prophet to tell us that 'this day is ominous.'"

"And that calls to mind that I heard three prophets the other day 'exploiting,' as you call it, Mr. Gorman. I heard them say that the reason Mr. Gorman has faced around for Mr. Bryan is that he thinks the only way effectually to shelve Mr. Bryan and pave the way for himself in another four years is to support Mr. Bryan now and get him out of the way. This seemed to me the queerest way of getting rid of a man—to help him to become President by going to a convention and supporting him."

"There's nothing queer about that. In the first place, Mr. Gorman may announce himself for Bryan and even go to the convention for him, but it does not follow that he will work for him."

"You knew Mr. Gorman then?" queried I, trying to get the Senator to launch out upon this son of Maryland, for I had heard that if there was one man whom Senator P—— hated it was the ex-Senator from Maryland.

"Oh, yes, I knew Gorman. Everybody in Washington knows Gorman. I knew Dave Hill, too, very well. He and I were good, strong friends. I have great respect for Hill. He always fought straight and in the open. He was of the battle-ax type in politics and you knew where to find him, while Gorman was——"

"Was what?"

The Senator made a queer little burrowing movement near the floor.

"Oh, I know," I laughed in triumph,

Editor's Note—The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife was begun in the Post of February 3, and will be continued weekly until the adjournment of Congress. Each paper is complete in itself.

KNOX'S GELATINE

THE TRANSPARENCY IS PROOF OF ITS PURITY.

Each packet makes at least a pint more jelly than any other packet of equal size.

It is a pure calves'-stock gelatine—that's the whole secret. Any one in America can make it, but I am the only one who does. It is time for the truth to be known about gelatine.

I WILL MAIL FREE

My 32-p. book of 70 recipes, "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People," to every applicant. Send to-day.

For 5 cents in stamps (to cover postage and packing), the book and full pint sample.

For 15 cents and the name of your grocer, the book and a full 2-quart package (two for 25 cents).

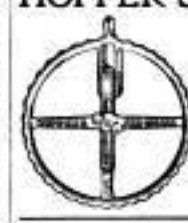
Pink gelatine for fancy desserts in every package.

CHAS. B. KNOX, 53 Knox Avenue
Johnstown, N. Y.

Yerba Maté

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup."

Travelers returning from the Argentine Republic and other parts of South America where Yerba Maté is the national drink, invariably speak of the liveliness, healthy freshness and superb physical condition of the people. They abstain entirely from alcoholic drinks, feeling no need of them, and use tea or coffee but rarely.



Yerba Maté combines all the good qualities of tea and coffee, and is more delicious. It is prepared the same and is drank at meal time.

Ask your dealer, and if he hasn't it, we will send sample and booklet for 10 cents; or enough for 500 cups on receipt of $1.00. Agents wanted.

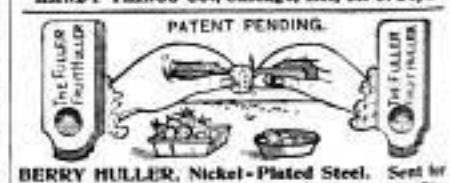
Yerba Maté Tea Co., Sole Importers
257 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia



HOPPER'S CAN OPENER
Is the Best

Does Perfect Work
Easy to Operate
No Jagged Edges
Sample 25c, postpaid
Correspondence solicited by the trade. Money refunded if not satisfactory.
CHAS. G. HOPPER, Mfr.
Germantown, Pa.

The Handy Fruit and Vegetable Slicer
For slicing all kinds of fruits and vegetables. Product is uniform and artistic. Cooks or dries evenly and quickly. Invaluable for daisy salads and delicious garnishings. The kitchen sensation of the day. Thousands sold daily. Above cut of product is from a photograph. Sent prepaid to any address on receipt of 35 cents.
HANDY THINGS CO., Chicago, Ill., M. O. Dept.

BERRY HULLER, Nickel-Plated Steel. Sent for 10 cents (silver). Agents make large profits. Begin now. STACKPOLE CO., Warren, Mass.

STARK TREES PAY
BEST by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Fruit Book free. We Cash Weekly and want Men HOME and traveling salesmen.
STARK BROS., Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N. Y.

Digitized by Google

EVERY ONE MAY NOW DRINK TEA

Tannin Conquered at Last

TEA-ETTE is Pure Tea of the best grades, treated by a process which modifies the Tannin without destroying the good qualities of the Tea. TEA-ETTE is the result of careful scientific research. Instead of tanning the stomach and exciting the nerves it aids Digestion, Builds Up and Strengthens the Nervous System, and is rapidly finding favor with those who are fond of tea and know the bad effects of Tannin. TEA-ETTE is the Purest Tea in the Market. If your grocer has not yet included it in his stock, ask him to get it, or, on receipt of 40 cents, we will mail one half-pound package. State kind of tea you drink—Oolong, English Breakfast or Mixed.

ROYAL TEA-ETTE COMPANY
43 Wallabout Market, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Easy to Play

Most musical instruments are hard to master and require years of practice—therefore limited to the few.

THE

Columbia Zither

Can be played well by almost anybody in a few hours. The chart fitting under the strings does it. Not only a perfect instrument, but "The Easy to Play" as well. Instructive, entertaining and inexpensive.

No. 3 (shown in cut), $6. Others from $4.00 to $8.00

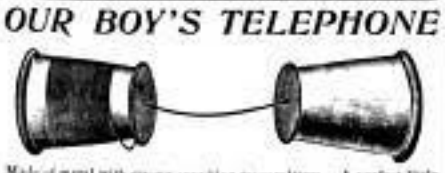
Inquire of your music dealer. If he hasn't the Columbia Zither, send price to us, and we will ship, express prepaid.

Catalogue free



The Phonoharp Co., Dept. F, 152 Liverpool St., E. Boston, Mass.

The work treats of the present social conditions in the churches, showing the lack of force and power in spiritual life by the encroachment upon it of social pleasures; its reasons for failing to reach the masses; the abuses of power and influences on the part of some of its rich members, who frequently use the church as a cloak for the advancement of their selfish ambitions and designs. While the book has a religious flavor, at the same time it advances some very strong themes of morality and philosophy. You should read it.

THE HERSHON CO., Publishers, 156 Fifth Ave., New York

OUR BOY'S TELEPHONE

Made of metal with strong sensitive transmitters. A perfect little telephone, consisting of two tubes, a talking and hearing tube or cup. With this instrument persons in different parts of the house or at quite long distances from each other can hear the softest whisper or lowest conversation. We send sufficient cord for ordinary use, but more can be added at any time. Send for one to carry on a private conversation with your girl in the house across the street. Price 10c, 3 for 25c, mailed prepaid.

AGENTS NOVELTY SUPPLY CO., 78 Dearborn St., Chicago

9 for 10 Cents

We will send to any one 9 handsome 1 in Revolving designs, all different, stamped on colored cambric. Also our new 100-page catalogue of Fancy Work Novelties and Handkerchiefs. All for 10 cents.

C. S. DAVIDSON & CO.
391 Broadway, N. Y. Dept. 69

"but your comparison fails somewhat. He is not blind!"

"Blind? No! He can see around the corner, or in the dark, or into the future quicker than any one we ever had in the Senate. He is brilliant. He is skillful. He is the living exponent of Machiavelli. As some one summed him up only the other day, 'Gorman is a better politician than statesman. He is a plotter rather than an orator, for he plans stronger than he talks, and moves men by force of their own interest as he displays it to them privately.' The trouble with Gorman, and the reason why his ambition has not led him into the broad paths of the political highway, is that he can never quite rid himself of the tactics of a ward politician; but his ambition is boundless. He is burrowing this minute for the Presidency! He has burrowed for it ever since 1892, when he went to the convention, supposedly in the interests of Cleveland but was himself a candidate, though undeclared.

"His friends went there carrying with them twenty thousand Gorman badges, silk and gold, big and little. These were to be sprung in convention at an opportune time, but the plans did not work and the badges were sunk in Lake Michigan. When the 'count of noses' took place just before the convention was called, it was found that Gorman had no show whatever, and that Cleveland even was lacking the needed two-thirds. It was at this time, on the very eve almost of balloting, that Gorman, on learning where he stood, went into hiding, and in hiding he remained. Cleveland was nominated on the first ballot."

"How did he happen to be swept out of the Senate?"

"Oh, it was on a tidal wave of popular discontent in his State, and if the Republicans had not indulged themselves in some particularly high-handed politics in Maryland last year Mr. Gorman would not have regained control of the State; but there he is and there he means to keep control."

"He is certainly a very handsome man," I said tentatively.

The Senator glanced at me sharply and, fearing some little feminine trap into which he might stumble if he did not agree with me, said:

"In a certain way, yes. He will come back to the Senate, probably, to succeed Wellington in time. But come, Mrs. Slocum, tell me something of your world. What are you and Miss Page doing?"

"We are golfing a little, hunting a little, fencing a little, and attending the gossips' feast every day."

"Gossips' feast?"

The Senator was puzzled and I went on:

"I'm sure if Shakespeare were to come back he'd pronounce the city of Washington a veritable 'gossips' bowl,' for there is enough afloat, as he would put it, to 'make the very air cry out.'"

"What's it all about?" Then suddenly he divined and said amusingly:

"Oh, I understand. They're gossiping about Mr. Dooley's relative, 'Cousin George.' One of my colleagues raised a smile in the Senate when he heard of the new candidate by saying he supposed that the official announcement had been made at an 'afternoon tea.' What do you women have to say about it?"

"About the same that you men do. I tried to feel the pulse of the Navy people on the subject and had the temerity to ask a severe old Admiral what he thought of it, and, instead of feeling his pulse, I felt his cold shoulder. I've not dared to broach the subject since. But I have read a clipping from one of the great London dailies and was quite gratified over its indorsement of our new candidate, and also over its description of the battle he had won at 'Santiago'; though naturally I was a trifle disappointed that this great paper did not clear up the hazy point as to whether 'Cousin George' won the battle from San Juan hill or from the deck of his battleship."

I did not get any further, for I was interrupted by a telegram. I knew before I opened it that Robert was coming, and that he would be in time to cast his vote on the morrow, but I did not know that this telegram contained, besides, what was calculated to shake me out of my fancied rut completely. His telegram was dated Baltimore, and read:

"Am arriving for dinner. Am bringing Cousin Melinda with me."

I sat as though suddenly run into an iron mould. Robert was bringing Cousin Melinda with him! She was only forty miles away! I felt as fateful and as breathless as General Sheridan must have felt with Winchester only twenty miles away. What would my series of spring dinners to the fashionable world and my outdoor fête at Chevy Chase be to me, or I to them, with Cousin Melinda on my hands? How should I apologize for or explain away the presence of Jules in my house? Or my French maid?

"No bad news, Mrs. Slocum, I hope? You look troubled."

"I am. Robert is coming."

Then, realizing how this sounded, I hastened to amend it.

"Robert is bringing an old cousin of ours with him, and——"

I suddenly bethought me that it was already the dinner hour, that the Senator was dining with us, and that at any instant the travelers might walk in. I had no time to explain; I must give orders looking to the comfort of Cousin Melinda. Already my rack and thumbscrew were being felt. Page comforted me wonderfully by looking on the bright side of it as we sat waiting for their arrival.

"Ah'll help you out. Don' you bother. What sort of ol' lady is she?"

"Why, Page," I said anxiously, "she is the most uncompromising, up-and-down, honest, inquisitive little old busybody you can conceive of. She has made her home with us out in Spruce City, and she dotes on Robert and me, and I wouldn't do anything for the world to hurt her; but think of all I have on hand, those dinners and that fête, to say nothing of the arrival of Mr. de Courcelles."

When Speaker Henderson and the leader on the floor unite their efforts it is no use for anybody to kick

I was positively tragic in tone and gesture, and neither Page nor the Senator could suppress a smile at my evident distress. I went on:

"She will want to see everything in Washington. She will never rest till she has met the President and Mrs. McKinley. She may, perhaps, ask Mrs. McKinley if she knits the President's socks, or what time in the fall she sets her pickles, or what her receipt for mincemeat is, or where they hang out the White House wash, or——"

I broke down over the dismal picture. Page asked sympathetically:

"Is she sharp with her tongue an' malicious, or only jus' ol'-fashion' an' curious?"

"Oh, she's not a bit malicious. She's really most lovable, but she is unworldly and simple and inquisitive."

"That's all right, then. Ah'll take care of her. Ah'll go sight-seein' with her. Ah'll even show her where the 'wash' is hung in the White House. Ah'll tell her Dolly Madison always use' to hang it up in the Eas' room."

"Oh, Page, you have lifted a tremendous load off my shoulders."

"And, Mrs. Slocum, you bring her up to the Senate, and she shall hold a reception, even in the Vice-President's room, and shake hands with everybody of any importance in both Houses. She shall have luncheon served in state, and even have 'tea' if you say so. I'll even try to explain the methods of legislation to her, and I know that no man's devotion to a cause can go beyond that."

I was somewhat reassured. I even smiled, but I vowed to myself to have a reckoning with the member from Spruce City when he should arrive.

Uneeda Jinjer Wayfer

The new dainty that has captivated the young folks, delighted the old folks, charmed all sorts of folks.

The sweet sister of

Uneeda Biscuit.

At Grocers.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY.

DON'T tie the top of your jelly and preserve jars in the old-fashioned way. Seal them by the new, quick, absolutely sure way—by a thin coating of pure, refined Paraffine Wax. Has no taste or odor. Is air-tight and acid-proof. Easily applied. Useful in a dozen other ways about the house.

Full directions with each pound cake.

Sold everywhere.

Made by Standard Oil Co.

Chicago to Omaha

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD — MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL VALLEY ROUTE

Double Daily Service

New line via Rockford, Dubuque, Waterloo, Fort Dodge and Council Bluffs. Buffet-library-smoking cars, sleeping cars, free reclining chair cars, dining cars. Send to the undersigned for a free copy of PICTURES AND NOTES EN-ROUTE, illustrating this new line as seen from the car window. Tickets of agents of I. C. R. R. and connecting lines.

A. H. HANSON, G. P. A., Chicago

"Mizpah" Valve Nipples

WILL NOT COLLAPSE

And therefore prevent much colic. The valve prevents a vacuum being formed to collapse them. The ribs inside prevent collapsing when the child bites them. The rim is such that they cannot be pulled off the bottle. Sample Free by Mail.

WALTER F. WARE, 502 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Digitized by Google

The improved Shingle Stain and preservative. Imparts an artistic finish to shingles and prolongs their life by penetrating the pores of the wood and retarding decay.

Shingletint is made in all desirable shades, is easily applied, the colors are permanent, and money is saved by its use.

Full information and finished samples of wood mailed free for the asking.

BERRY BROTHERS, Limited
Varnish Manufacturers, DETROIT, MICH.

NEW YORK, 232 Pearl St. CHICAGO, 15 and 17 Lake St.
BOSTON, 520 Atlantic Ave. CINCINNATI, 304 Main St.
PHILADELPHIA, 36 and 38 N. Fourth St.
ST. LOUIS, 107 S. Fourth St. BALTIMORE, 22 E. Lombard St.
SAN FRANCISCO, 117 and 119 Market St.

OLD HICKORY

As a name, was once applied to a famous American statesman—the leader of his day and generation. We apply the same to a line of fashionable rustic furniture—the leader of its day and generation. It is made by hand from white hickory saplings, the toughest material to be had. The bark is left on, and the work done by hand. The chair here shown, $2.25, or two for $4.00, freight paid east of the Rocky Mountains. If your dealer does not keep them, write for illustrated catalogue, free, showing 65 patterns and unique Twentieth Century styles, of Rockers, Settees, Tables, and all varieties of Rustic Furniture for Lawns, Verandas, etc., for Homes and Clubs. Pretty Settee for $7.50.

The Old Hickory Chair Co., Martinsville, Ind.

BACK RESTERS

For Stenographers, Bookkeepers and Office Men

McCloud Adjustable Spring-Back Chair

Gives delicious comfort. You can work three times as long without fatigue, because the back can be adjusted forward or backward at any angle over the seat to give support where it is most needed, between the shoulders or at the small of the back.

It is superior to all other Chairs for use of Typewriter, desk or piano. Made in wood, cane, leather seat or back, including high chair for standing desk, in endless variety, all combining grace and elegance never before attained, level for floor carriage and prices that will please you.

Antique Oak, best leather cushion and pad.

THE DAVIS CHAIR COMPANY
S. N. McCLOUD, Manager. Marysville, Ohio

Live Agents Make Big Money.
There is no equal to

The Excelsior Carpet Stretcher and Tack Hammer Combined.

THOUSANDS IN USE

Simple, effective, strong and compact. A child can operate easily.

Postpaid for 65c Stamps

With first order for one dozen deliver Outfit as we propose to furnish working AGENTS OUTFIT FREE. QUICKLY send for free illustrated circular.

QUICK MFG. COMPANY, Dept. P, Galien, Mich.

Save Your Old Carpets

We can weave them to order into handsome rugs of any size. Write for particulars. We pay the freight.

AMERICAN RUG CO., Dept. M, 30 La Salle St., Chicago

The People's Number of the Worthyville Watchman

By William J. Lampton

THE Editor of the Worthyville Evening Watchman sat in his office wondering what he could do to improve his paper and make the people who were paying him twenty-five cents a month for his services have more cause to feel that they were getting their money's worth. A number of complaints had been coming in to him of late, and they had caused him to consider ways and means of presenting a paper that was more generally satisfactory. He was wrestling with a new and novel idea when a lady came in and asked for a copy to send away to a friend.

"How much is it?" she asked when he handed it to her.

"Oh, we never charge subscribers for an extra copy that way," he told her.

"Why, I'm sure that is very kind of you," she gurgled. "Isn't the postage on a newspaper only a cent?"

"Yes, but you needn't mail it yourself. I'll put it in a wrapper for you and you can address it and we'll send it along with our regular mail at so much a pound."

"Well, isn't that lovely! But I don't want you to pay the postage."

"It doesn't amount to anything on one copy and we are always glad to accommodate. How do you like the paper?" he asked shyly.

"I like it very much, all except the politics. I think they are horrid and they oughtn't to be printed."

"But we couldn't very well leave politics out."

"I don't know about that. I think the most interesting paper I see is the Ladies' Review, and there isn't a word of politics in it. You know our Ladies' Literary Club was just talking about the Watchman the other day, and we said how perfectly lovely it would be if the politics were out of it."

They talked a while longer, and when the visitor went out the Editor called the foreman in and had a conference with him. The foreman said he was on and went back to the composing-room.

As the back door shut the front door opened and in came a well-known Worthyville sport.

"Gimme a copy of Saturday's Watchman," he said breezily. "You had more good sporting news in there than you've had for weeks. The only objection I've got to your rag is that it is too shy on sports."

"We give all the space to them we can afford to spare," responded the Editor in an apologetic tone.

"Drop out something else then," suggested the sport.

"What, for instance?"

"Well, that column about women. Lord knows we get enough of women without having them in the newspapers. And the religious column might go along with it. The preachers have their innings on Sunday in their churches and they don't want the earth, do they?"

The Editor said he didn't think they did, and as the sport went out he jotted down a note on a slip of paper and stuck it on the hook.

Presently the leading Literary Luminary came in and asked if he mightn't look over the exchanges. The Editor told him to help himself, and as he did so he ventured a few remarks.

"I wish you would write me a short local story," said the Editor with considerable trepidation. "We can't pay you in money for it, but you can have any newspapers or magazines or books that come in."

"What's the use?" protested the Literary Luminary. "If I write anything it gets sandwiched in between advertisements and local notices and is utterly lost."

"But we can't very well help having the advertisements, you know," said the Editor in mild self-defense.

"If I were running a paper there shouldn't be one in it," argued the Literary Luminary with the large knowledge of his kind. "By Jove! this thing of giving over your columns to people who have the money to buy them is no more than selling yourself. Take out the advertisements, say I," and as he rummaged into the pile of exchanges the Editor made another note to stick on the hook and went front to see his pastor.

"There's a notice of our church fair and festival for to-morrow night," said the reverend gentleman. "Give it a good place and put a nice head over it, won't you?"

The Editor marked it DN and stuck it on the copy hook.

"I was sorry to see that sensational thing in the paper last night," the pastor said rather reprovingly.

"It came along with the other news," explained the Editor.

"I suppose so; but can't you control your own matter? There is too much of that kind of news in the papers these days. I'd throw it all out. And the sporting news, too, and police and divorce court matter. It does no good and is calculated to do great harm."

"But we have to have some of it," pleaded the Editor.

"Not at all; not at all. Some of the best reading matter the world has ever known is free from it."

The Editor could not deny this, and, after promising he would see that a change was made, he bowed the pastor out and turned to meet a farmer subscriber who had just come in.

"I left a bushel of apples up to your house," said that worthy, "and if you'll make a note of it in the paper I'll call it square. Be sure and say I've got 'em for sale. And, by the way, I noticed your market reports was short last night."

"Yes," said the Editor, "we had a rush of news and had to clip the markets a little."

"Mebbe it's good policy and mebbe it ain't," commented the farmer. "In my judgment markets is more important than most of the news that's printed. You could throw out about two-thirds of what you git in and nobody be any less wiser by it. Who cares fer all the little things that's happenin'? Let it go and give us markets. They're business."

The Editor wrote the notice of the apples, made another note, stuck them both on the book and, after a few minutes' chat with the farmer who told him there wasn't any news in his neighborhood, went back to see the foreman. The foreman smiled and nodded as the Editor talked to him, and then went over and took several handfuls of type out of the forms on the stone.

It was now 10.30 A. M. and the Editor went around to the post-office. When he came back the big politician of the town, the "Boss," was waiting for him.

"By George! Haskins," he said, coming to the point directly, "that editorial you had on the situation last night was plumb rot and no mistake."

"I didn't think so," protested the Editor.

"Of course you didn't, or you wouldn't have wrote it. I give you credit for that much sense, anyhow. But what's the good of your editorializing? Nobody reads editorials in this kind of a paper. They know it's you and that knocks the pith out of them. You'd a blamed sight better not have any editorials at all."

"Do you really believe that?" inquired the Editor cheerfully.

"Bet your life I do. They don't amount to shucks."

"But it takes time and brains to write them."

"It's a waste of raw material. Quit it. Give 'em a rest and yourself and your readers, too."

Then he went out and the Editor made another note and stuck it on the book for the foreman.

By and by a pretty girl came in and the Editor bowed and smiled and scraped around just as any bachelor would.

"Oh, Mr. Haskins," she twittered, "I'm going to have a pink tea to-morrow and you must be sure to come and write it up. I'll tell you what everybody has on and you can just spread yourself."

"I'm sure I should be only too happy," he responded, "but we are going to have some extra market reports to-morrow and I'm afraid I can't give your charming entertainment as much space as it deserves."

"Oh, those horrid market reports!" she wailed. "I think they are perfectly dreadful, and I've always wondered what you had them in the paper for. I'm sure I never read a line of them in my whole life."

"That has only been a very short time, Miss Fannie," smiled the Editor.

"Oh, you flatterer!" she chirruped. "But I'll forgive you if you will promise not to

Let Us Assist You

In settling the mantel question. The greatest help will be our new catalogue, containing more than fifty entirely new designs of Artistic Wood Mantels, and all the latest things in fireplace furniture. We sell direct to the consumer at manufacturer's prices and

We Pay the Freight

Send for our little book, "How" tells all about how to select and arrange everything belonging to the fireplace. Free.

KING MANTEL COMPANY
619 Gay Street, Knoxville, Tenn.

Beautiful Homes

directly influence the lives of their inmates. Not so much the house from without as from the interior. Our business is to furnish, to decorate, to make beautiful in many ways the rooms in which you pass most of your lives. Individuality is a strong point in interior decorating. We encourage that. We get up designs for woodworking and frescoing, which are, if satisfactory, yours exclusively. Our taste in selecting wall paper, hanging portières and designing cozy corners is to be relied on. We'll send a representative anywhere east of the Mississippi, and gladly furnish estimates. We've an unequalled stock of furniture, or make specially to your order.

If interested, write for further particulars.

For economy and artistic results BUY OF THE MAKER.

HUNT, WILKINSON & CO.
1219-21 Market Street. Philadelphia, Pa.

"Business System"

Is the title of our 64-page book, illustrating and explaining model business methods used by our largest and most successful business houses—it is free upon request.

$1.25

And upward buys a complete

"Macey" Card System

Shipped "On Approval," freight prepaid, to be returned at our expense if not found in every way positively the best obtainable.

Your Choice of three distinct card-locking devices.

It Gathers — Arranges — Classifies — Indexes every character of office and factory records and lists — it is the perfect system — it encourages system.

The Fred Macey Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.
Makers of Office and Library Furniture

The Dayton Grass Catcher

(PATENTED)

Galvanized Iron. Weight 6 lbs. Will last a lifetime.

Everybody with lawn should have one. If your dealer does not keep it, send width of mower, and we will express one $1.50 east of Denver for Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

Live Dealers Wanted as Agents.

DAYTON GRASS CATCHER CO., Dayton, Ohio

Digitized by Google

DOUBLE DUTY POUCH TRADE MARK

This is the best tobacco pouch made (special non-acid cured rubber), containing new features that appeal at once to every pipe and cigarette smoker. The separate pocket, made of a single strip, holds matches or paper, keeping them always handy and dry. Athletes, bicyclists, sportsmen, yachtsmen, canoeists, and smokers generally, say they are the best and most convenient pouches they ever used. The corners are reinforced, ensuring double wear. Three standard sizes: No. 4, 60c.; No. 5, 70c.; No. 6, 80c. Ask your dealer. If he cannot supply you, one will be mailed on receipt of price in money order or stamps.

"Look for the Pocket"

COSMIC UTILITY COMPANY, Dept. A
18 Cortlandt Street, New York

TO INTRODUCE OUR
Golden-Finish, Quarter-Sawed
Oak Mantels

We will sell 200 of this design at the remarkable price of $29.70 EACH, including best quality enameled tile facing, 44×50, 3 hearth, firebrick and brass-plated Club House grate and frame. These Mantels are well made and the richest grain effects are used in every part. Sample of wood, showing finish used, and illustrated catalogue free.

We Pay the Freight to all points east of the Mississippi River and north of South Carolina.
Scott, Ross & Scully Co., 2926 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

IVERY GENUINE KREMENTZ
ONE-PIECE COLLAR BUTTON

Has the name "Krementz" stamped on the back, showing quality, whether solid or plate, as our plate outwears some solid buttons. Beware of imitations. You get a new one without charge in case a genuine KREMENTZ button is damaged from any cause. Special styles for Ladies' Shirt-Waists and Children's Dressers. Sold by all jewelers.

The Story of a Collar Button gives valuable information, free on request.
KREMENTZ & CO.
60 Chestnut Street
Newark, N. J.

Birds Love BIRD MANNA

It will keep Song Birds in constant song, even when moulting feathers. It cures almost all diseases of the Feathered Kingdom. Especially valuable during Breeding. A great delicacy. BIRDS LOVE IT. 15 cents per cake at all druggists'. Same price by mail. Bird Book Free.
BIRD FOOD CO., 400 N. 3d St., Philadelphia, Pa.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Our cut catalogue (four parts) represents the best collection of half-tone and line cuts for advertising and illustrating purposes in the world. Hundreds of Beautiful Illustrations. A picture book that will delight the whole family. Complete catalogue, 20 cents (refunded on first order).
Spatula Publishing Co., 71 India St., Boston.

DON'T "FOOZLE"

Wear THE LINKS GOLF BELT and "Drive True." Detachable, pliable leather links. Instantly adjustable. Always fit the form. Equally good for every-day wear. 100 of the season. In red, cream, olive, white and russet. For men or women. Either, 75 cents by mail, postpaid. State size wanted. Cost money back if you don't like it.
THE LINKS GOLF BELT CO., Dept. C, Cincinnati, O.

TYPEWRITERS. All Makes
Machines ½ Mfr's prices. RENTED ANYWHERE, allowing rental to apply. Write for catalogue. Typewriter Emporium, 206 La Salle St., Chicago.

PATENTS FRANKLIN H. HOUGH
Washington, D. C.
No Attorney's Fee until Patent is Allowed. Write for "Inventor's Guide."

MARRIAGE
Invitations
Announcements
At Home and Church Cards
Mail Orders Receive Prompt Attention
DEMPSEY & CARROLL
The Society Stationers
26 West 23d Street, NEW YORK

have any more market reports and have my tea take the space they occupy."

The Editor wouldn't promise, but he made a note and hung it on the hook, and five minutes after the pretty girl had gone the Profoundest Thinker of all Worthyville entered.

"You didn't get that article of mine on The Correlation of Concepts to Concretions in the paper yesterday," he said with some annoyance apparent in his manner.

"I'm very sorry," explained the Editor, "but at the very last moment a number of Personal and Society items came in and we had to hold it over."

"Personals and society!" sniffed the Thinker. "For the life of me I can't see what you print that kind of stuff for. Surely nobody wants to read it. If I were you I would see that it went headlong into the waste basket. Hold my article if you please until Saturday's paper," and the Thinker walked out severely.

The Editor made another note and stuck it on the hook just as a real estate improver and a town boomer came in.

"We've got a column about getting the new factory located in Sylvanside Addition that we would like to get in the paper," he said by way of greeting.

"Isn't that rubbing it in just a little?" inquired the Editor, who had not so much as received a deed to a town lot in the new Addition for his manifold services in promoting its publicity.

"I don't know that it is. You've got lots of space and this is helping the town."

"Lots of space?" repeated the Editor.

"Of course. I noticed just a while ago two columns on the inside given up to a lot of stuff clipped out of other papers that doesn't do the town any more good than a rain storm in Alaska. Why don't you throw out that sort of trash, anyhow?"

"We can't very well."

"Can't you? Well, if you heard what people say about it you would, whether you could or not."

"Don't they really like it?" the Editor queried diffidently.

"Like it? Great Scot, they fairly snort at it. I heard one man say to-day that he guessed you had hired Noah as your exchange editor. You'd better run an 'empty' than load up with that stuff."

Then the promoter with a pleasant good-day went out and the Editor met a few more persons with suggestions before he went to his dinner at high noon. When he came back at one o'clock he went out into the composing-room and had a conference with the foreman, who busied himself about the forms under the Editor's direction.

At two o'clock a man came in swearing mad. He was a Prominent Citizen and he had been insulted, or words to that effect.

"By gravy! Haskins," he exclaimed, "it seems to me I have been in this town long enough for that measly reporter of yours to know my name."

"Doesn't he?" asked the Editor, astonished and pained at such reportorial ignorance.

"If he does know it, he doesn't seem to be able to use his knowledge. By crackey, he's got me down as John B. Thompson, when anybody ought to know I don't spell my name with a p. But I couldn't expect much more, for of all the collections of stale, flat and unprofitable things your local news is the worst. The paper would be a darned sight better off without a line of it."

"No local news!" ejaculated the Editor, almost horrified by the thought.

"That's what I said. Do you need a map and a diagram?" and the Prominent Citizen plumped his card down on the table and flounced out.

The Editor sat down and mopped his brow for a minute or two while he listened to a few remarks from the Mayor of the city on communications appearing in the paper criticising him and his official acts, with a final handful of scattering comment on other paragraphs equally subversive of the peace and dignity of the State and the constitutional rights of people to do as they pleased without being pilloried in the public prints by the shafts and arrows of irresponsible persons too cowardly to let their names be known. The Editor smiled at the mixed metaphors of the mad Mayor and promised to see about it. Then he went into the composing-room and told the foreman to get the forms ready and send them to press. The foreman grinned at the appearance of what he was locking up, and just as he got to the first page which was the last to go down, the leading sign painter of the town came into the room, and stopped to "chin the Editor a while."

"Don't they really like it?" the Editor queried

"You've got a mighty good paper," he said—he had received a stickful of puff the day before—"but the head you've got on it is the most inartistic piece of work I know of," he added.

"We had an idea it was pretty fair," ventured the Editor.

"If I had a head like that," laughed the painter, "I'd go soak it."

"What would you really do about it?" asked the Editor seriously.

"Chop it off quicker than Cromwell cut off the head of King Charles," said the painter and went on out through the front office.

The Editor nodded to the foreman and in a few minutes the form was locked up and sent down.

Promptly at four o'clock the Worthyville Watchman appeared and at supper-time the office was filled with indignant subscribers. Every one of them had his paper with him and never a paper had a line on any of its pages. Everything was gone out of it and there was only a four-page wilderness of whiteness. The Editor was not in the office, but a big notice was posted in a conspicuous place to the effect that the Watchman would explain in its next issue.

On the following day in large letters at the top of the editorial page this notice appeared:

"TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS

"Our issue of yesterday appeared in accordance with suggestions made to us by subscribers who think they know how to run a newspaper, and comment is unnecessary upon the result.

All we have to say is that hereafter we shall run the Watchman as we d—— please. Now is the time to subscribe.

"HEZEKIAH HASKINS,
"Editor and Proprietor."

Helping the Governor Out

OF EX-GOVERNOR BLACK, of New York, a story is going the rounds. In a lawsuit he was pitted against an undersized country lawyer. In making an address the Governor took occasion to denounce some proposition of the other side.

"It is false: false in every particular. You might as well say that twice two were five, or——" Here he paused a second. The old man leaned forward and said, in a stage-whisper, "Or that black was white."

Not How Much You Pay But What It Costs!

G & J TIRES may cost most in the beginning but cost nothing for repairs.

OTHER TIRES may cost less in the beginning and prove most expensive in the end.

OUR CATALOGUE EXPLAINS IT ALL.

736 G & J TIRE CO., Indianapolis

A garter for the man who likes nobby, handsome furnishings and the man who demands absolute comfort. The handiest, best-fitting garter made.

Best silk elastic in all colors, and in the newest muscular patterns. 25c. a pair, at furnishers' or by mail.

The clasp and trimmings are perfectly flat, smooth, and almost unbreakable. Won't bind the leg nor tear the stocking. Can be adjusted to an instant to fit any leg.

PIONEER SUSPENDER CO.
718 Market St.
Philadelphia

SUMMER COMFORT

Under drawers will sag and require tucking for. They are uncomfortable, awkward, bungling.

RACINE UNION SUITS
Knit to Measure, Have None of These Defects

They do not draw down when one sits much, they do not crawl up like shirts, they are not doubled and wrinkled anywhere as are two-piece suits.

Made in all fabrics for both sexes. Send for sample fabrics and directions for measurement. Salesmen wanted.

H. S. BLAKE & CO., Racine, Wis.

Can be enlarged 1 inch and strengthened 50 per cent. in one month by using the Hercules Graduated Gymnastic Club and Strength Tester Five Minutes each day. It will develop and strengthen the arms, chest, back and waist in less than one-half the time required by any other apparatus known. The feeblest man may become strong and healthy by its use.

Write for descriptive pamphlet and price-list to HERCULES, Box 5559 Y, Boston, Mass.

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES producing buggies by automatic machinery, from materials bought for cash. We sell direct and

Save Dealers' Profits

Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS SACRIFICES on overstocked lines. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 36-48 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

DEAF OR HARD-OF-HEARING ADULTS CAN ACQUIRE
LIP-READING AT HOME

In six weeks. Easy, practical, interesting lessons by MAIL. One hour a day for study and practice. Results satisfactory. Thirty-ninth Year. Terms moderate. Send for circular.
DAVID GREENE, 1122 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

$5 BICYCLES CHEAPER THAN EVER

From the OLD RELIABLE CO. Great Special Sale. Nearly 5000 BICYCLES, every one a BARGAIN. MUST BE SOLD. All makes, 2d hand, $5 AND UP. Late Models, new, $12.50 AND UP. Shipped anywhere on approval. A few more good agents wanted. Big Money. Write today for big list and special offer never before approached.
BROWN-LEWIS COMPANY, Department A B, Chicago, U. S. A.

Digitized by Google

CRESCENT BICYCLES

101,000 Crescent Bicycles

Were sold in 1899—more than any other wheel—a tribute to Crescent popularity. Why buy any other wheel when you can get a Crescent for the same money?

The perfection in bicycle construction is demonstrated in the smooth-running qualities of the Crescent Bevel-Gear Chainless.

	EACH
Chainless Models Nos. 41 and 42	$60
Chainless Models Nos. 17 and 18	$50
Adults' Chain Models, $25, $26, $30, $35
Boys' and Girls' Models	$25

Send for Crescent Catalogue.

THE CRESCENT BICYCLE

501 Wells Street, Chicago. 36 Warren Street, New York.

STERLING

Bevel Gear

Chainless Bicycle

The difference between a $100 Elgin and a $1.00 Waterbury is more than in the position of the decimal—it's in the quality. It is just so with wheels. The Sterling Bevel Gear Chainless is the Elgin of wheels—it has the quality. That's the whole story in a sentence.

Price $75

Chain Models, $40.00, $50.00

SEND FOR CATALOGUE

THE STERLING BICYCLE

501 Wells Street, Chicago, Ill.
36 Warren Street, New York

A Revival of the Dainty Portraiture of the 17th Century

Exquisitely Hand-Colored Miniatures, framed in Handsome, Genuine Rolled Gold Bezels, 1 or 2½ inch in diameter. These Miniatures retail regularly at $2.00. To introduce, we will copy from any picture sent us one of these as given and mail free on receipt of $1.00, currency or P. O. Order. Copies returned. Address

ANGLO-AMERICAN ART CO., York, Pa.

The Temptations of Young Business Men & A Talk with Robert C. Ogden

ROBERT C. OGDEN, who, as John Wanamaker's chief aid for many long, successful years, is one of the best-known, best-liked and best-equipped men in the metropolitan business world, speaks decisively upon most matters appertaining to affairs commercial. Naturally, therefore, upon the subject of trusted employees and the ways and means of helping them to continue their positions of trust, Mr. Ogden's words carry unusual weight. With an army of employees to direct, here is a man who should know thoroughly that upon which he so earnestly descants. Judge for yourself:

"The inclination toward dishonesty is like all other human tendencies that make for good or evil; it is either bred in the blood or developed by environment. Some few men are born to thievery; the great majority who step aside from the path of rectitude are, however, the victims of an impulse, a sudden, uncontrollable desire to possess what does not, and can not, by any legitimate achievement belong to them. The average transgressor of the laws of perfect integrity is not necessarily lost to all sense of honor, of the common decency of conduct, of what is best in the making of a sterling character. Such men, be they young or old, are the unconscious dupes of their own weak wills, silly caprices or unhealthy ambitions.

The Shortsighted Conceit of Dishonesty

"In a large measure employers are responsible for the culpability of their employees. In too many instances the opportunity to steal is thrust under the noses of young men; a futile system, or no definite system at all, of oversight upon the accounts of a trusted employee gives him the suggestion that he may hide his dishonesty under false entries. Remove temptation and you erase the whole black catalogue of sin.

"Of course, in this connection I am speaking only of men who become dishonest after a career of integrity and right living. The hardened criminal, the deliberate, scheming embezzler is not taken into consideration as a part of the present discussion. The fact is apparent, to every close observer of men in the business world, that the supreme folly of stealing is invariably committed because the opportunity for the guilty act presented itself in a form more or less enticing and seemingly safe. No employee dips into the coffers of his employer except with the conviction that his crime will not be detected. Your gentleman of thieving proclivities, whether he is a common pickpocket or an influential bank cashier, is sure that he can outwit the world; he is convinced of his own abounding cleverness. The pilferer of every degree is a magnificent egotist.

The Only Sure Preventive of Fraud

"The attempt to forestall the misappropriation of money on the part of an employee by resorting to ingenious and complicated systems of checks is like trying to measure the pace of Niagara with a stop-watch. The best way to prevent peculation is to first find men recommended for honesty, men who have been weighed in the balance and not found wanting; after that there is time to introduce your mechanisms for compulsory integrity. The more involved the plan of surveillance in a large business office the greater the chance for contemplative dishonesty. Clever rascals are only piqued by elaborate plans laid for their ensnarement; the pursued thief likes nothing better than a tangling maze behind which to hide his guilty person. Simple methods are the best, in business as in most other affairs of life.

"The one effective means for preventing fraud on any scale is to know, day by day, just what the man behind the ledger and the cash-box knows; to keep in such close touch with each of his many transactions that the misplacement of a penny, the entry of one false figure will be apparent at the end of the day. Of course this is impossible in an establishment where hundreds of clerks are employed and necessarily trusted. In such cases the frequent and rigid auditing of the books of the concern is the best preventive.

"Human nature, in the main, is worthy of confidence; men as they go are not prone to fraud and dishonesty. The young man starting out on a business career is too mindful of the future to yield readily to temptation; it is the older men who have attained comparatively exalted positions, but whose ambition for quickly acquired riches has never been gratified, who are most apt to become defaulters. Women are not beyond the pale of dishonesty; it is an admission forced upon the most gallant of men who have had extended dealings with the weaker sex. It is the very fact that they are the weaker vessels that makes them more liable to transgress. Vanity has played the leading part in nearly every considerable act of depredation whether by men or women. With the latter it is the desire to have costlier attire than others; with men it is the wish to ape our millionaires which leads to large thefts.

"A strict and accurate auditing of accounts, a careful tabulation and recording of every business transaction, a periodical examination by expert accountants, the insistence upon a clean and regular mode of life on the part of those most responsible in a business organization—these are the chief and vital principles antagonizing and suppressing dishonesty. Where such methods are in vogue there is but scant opportunity for employees, to whatever extent they are trusted, to filch from the funds they handle.

The Motives That Spur on Dishonest Acts

"Great and pressing necessity has not often driven men to dishonesty. Extravagance is the most common motive behind the story of every absconding bank official; the feverish desire to live at the rate of $10,000 a year on an income one-fifth that amount makes nearly every defalcation the twin brother of overwhelming debt. One of the noblest men I ever knew was an embezzler.

"He fell from grace not because he desired an extravagant and luxurious life which his income would not permit, but because he appropriated money in his keeping to aid and support those who were dependent upon him for the necessities of life. Most of the stolen money went to the education of younger relatives and the maintenance of those whom he could not have supported with his comparatively meagre salary. It was my privilege to assist this man when the inevitable crash came. He is a man whom I shall always respect, though the motive behind his act in no way nullified the enormity of his sin. But such cases as this are rare exceptions.

"Let a young man model his career upon a basis of absolute, undeviating honesty and he will not have to seek long for a place of trust. Let him always be in a position to shake hands with himself, for self-respect is as good as the respect of others. The men who to-day control great business enterprises are looking for youths in whom they may place limitless confidence. The world stands ready to wait hand and foot upon those who have proved themselves beyond the seduction of any tempter. Diogenes looking for an honest man has not yet ceased his searching, for though there are many men who are honest in matters of money, there are many more who lack honesty in matters affecting the perfect performance of duty. There is a dishonesty which does not stoop to steal, but which pretends to a faithful service while actually shirking work waiting to be done. That is the commoner transgression of commercial ethics, and one to be avoided by the man who seeks to mould himself for higher things as he would avoid the touch of a leper."

The Pleasure of Cycling

Lies in the selection of the wheel you ride. There is an indescribable satisfaction in knowing that your wheel is as good as it looks.

Cleveland

Bevel-Gear

Chainless

bicycles are trim, compact and clean. Every part reveals integrity, and the finished wheel is an ideal in its symmetry and beauty.

The best gears and fittings only are used. They are assembled under our own supervision with the nicest care.

Bevel-Gear Chainless, 1900 Model, $75

Chain Wheels, 1900 Models $40 and $50

SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

Main Office, Cleveland, Ohio

Dunlop Pneumatic Tires

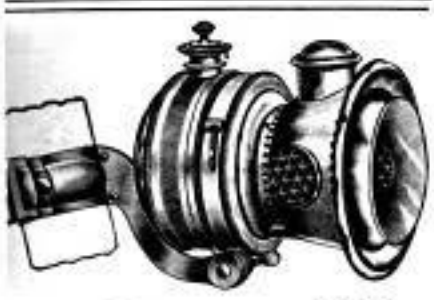
For Bicycles
For Carriages
For Automobiles

Send for Booklet.

The American Dunlop Tire Co.
Belleville, N. J. Chicago, Ill.

Digitized by Google

SOLAR CYCLE LAMPS



Solely because they are the standard

Acetylene Gas Cycle Lamps

Their great success is due to the patented system of gas generation, which secures a steady, bright, white light. Your dealer sells them for $3.00, or we will send them to you, express prepaid, for this price.

Our booklet, "Solar System," sent free.

Badger Brass Mfg. Co., Station Y, Kenosha, Wis.

That is the

O. K. 1900 Acetylene Gas Lamp

And it is "O. K." The disadvantages of heavy weight and cumbersome size overcome. Best material and workmanship, and all the latest improvements in gas lamps. Reversible bracket, allowing change in elevation of four inches. No other lamp has this. If your dealer doesn't carry it, we send, express prepaid to any point in the United States, for $3.50.

Descriptive Booklet free

SEAL LOCK CO.
160 Washington St.
Chicago, Ill.

If you will "Scorch"

Your wheel must be fitted with

THE MAJESTIC

For safety requires that you have a lamp that you can count on staying lit over any kind of going. Besides this it's the easiest Lamp

To Fill—Because the carbide pot is marked so the quantity of carbide is easily gauged.

To Light—Because the water feed is perfectly controlled by a lever.

To Clean—Because the reflector and its glass protector are removable by simply pressing a button.

Send for Catalogue and GET ONE

EDW. MILLER & CO., Meriden, Ct.

Luxurious

Swinging Seats

For

Porches, "Dens," Hallways and Cozy Nooks

Ask for free catalogue and prices.

OLIVER SWINGING SEAT CO.
South Bend, Ind.

Goldwin Smith's United Kingdom *

IT IS somewhat curious that the two best books on the United States have been written by foreigners. Bryce's American Commonwealth is entitled to first place. Dr. Goldwin Smith's United States is probably next. As a political study of the nation it is not equaled, and, though no reader may agree with its every estimate and statement, yet none can escape the interest, ripeness and scholarship of the work. Its success naturally led Doctor Smith to do for Great Britain what he had done for America, and at the end of the preface to his new work we find this sentence: "The friends who urged the writer to undertake this task know that it has been performed by the hand of extreme old age."

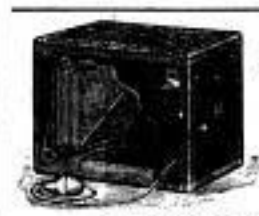
More than forty years ago Doctor Smith was Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford; it is over thirty years ago that he came to this country to fill the chair of English and Constitutional History in Cornell University, and for twenty-nine years he has been one of the most distinguished of Canadians; so it may be true that the work was performed by the hand of extreme old age, but a reading of this, his last work, shows incontestably that, though the hand may have been aged, the mind was as clear, as direct and as competent as if it had not lived through the better part of a great century, many of whose important events he has personally witnessed.

In truth, Doctor Smith has done a great good, not only for history but for people who want to read history with enjoyment. The manner in which he has handled the events, tendencies and evolutions of the dozen and more centuries and told the continuous story of the United Kingdom is beyond all praise.

Doctor Smith's text is this sentence from Pym: "The best form of government is that which doth actuate and inspire every part and member of a State to the common good." Beginning with the statement that England has taken the lead in solving the problem of constitutional government, and that she it is who more than any other has had to deal with great internal problems, he traces the rise of the Kingdom to the middle of the present century, very wisely omitting references to contemporaries and modern leaders—even to Disraeli or Gladstone—and writing strictly as a historian, but with a positiveness of opinion that makes every page alive and entertaining. He is delightfully candid in his portraiture. For instance, he calls Queen Elizabeth "a virago who spat, swore and cuffed," who was false and perfidious, heartless and selfish, and capable at times of hateful cruelty, even to inciting murder itself.

Of another figure of English history he says: "The name of George III cannot be penned without a pang—can hardly be penned without a curse, such mischief was he fated to do the country," and in this connection Doctor Smith says that "the moral improvement of the nation, which by this time had begun, was due less to the influence of the Court than to that of Methodism, with which assuredly the Court had little to do, and of the evangelical movement within the Establishment which Methodism set on foot."

His treatment of the War of the Revolution of the American Colonies is necessarily brief, but intensely interesting. He takes the view that the separation was sure to come, and in the end the loss of the Colonies was to Great Britain a gain in disguise.



This is his opinion of the War of 1812: "A fratricidal and fruitless conflict was closed at last by a treaty in which no mention was made of either of the two ostensible causes of the war. American historians fancy that this was a second war of independence. Had Napoleon, by the help of the Americans, triumphed over English and European freedom, would Louisiana now be a State of the Union? Might not his insatiable ambition have trampled on the Union itself?"

Thus we see that Doctor Smith gives us something to think over—and often to object to—as we read. He touches tender points, whether his readers be American, English, French or Spanish; but all the same he carries us along by the power of his narrative and the brilliancy of his style.

It is in all respects one of the greatest books of this decade, and as interesting as it is great, a permanent contribution to history in the best meaning of the word. —Lynn Roby Meekins.

*The United Kingdom. A Political History. By Goldwin Smith, D. C. L. The Macmillan Company.

PRODUCT OF 1900

SUNART VICI MAGAZINE CAMERAS

Size 4 x 5, $8.00

Improved Pneumatic Shutter
Achromatic Lens
Every Camera Guaranteed

At One Loading 12 Plates or 24 Films

Folding and Cycle Cameras from $5 to $50

SUNART PHOTO CO.
32 Aqueduct St., Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A.

Ask your dealer to show the latest Magazine Camera and Automatic Tripod. CATALOGUE FREE

"THE POCO TAKES"

TAKES—Beginners
Amateurs Professionals

TAKES FROM
$5 to $50

THE POCO CAMERAS combine all the features of complete view Cameras with great compactness, and have every improvement of practical utility.

Fine Illustrated Catalogue on application.

Rochester Camera & Supply Co.
59 South St.
ROCHESTER
New York

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and load in daylight. $10.00 to $17.50.

Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

BICYCLES BELOW COST

5000 HIGH GRADE guaranteed MACHINES, with best equipment, must be closed out. 1900 Models, best makes, $11 to $20. '99 and '98 Models, high grade, $8 to $13. 500 SECOND-HAND WHEELS, all makes and models, good as new, $3 to $10. Great Factory Clearing Sale at half factory cost. We ship anywhere on trial without a cent in advance.

EARN A BICYCLE distributing catalogues for us. Many earned a wheel last year. Our 1900 proposition is even more liberal.

Write at once for our Bargain List and Special Offer.

Address Dept. 117 K. MEAD CYCLE CO., Chicago

Moving Picture Machines

STEREOPTICONS. You can make BIG MONEY entertaining the public. Nothing affords better opportunities for men with small capital. We start you, furnishing complete outfits and explicit instructions at surprisingly low cost. The Field is Large, comprising the regular theatre and lecture circuit; also local fields in Churches, Public Schools, Lodges and general public gatherings. Our Entertainment Supply Catalogue and special offer fully explains everything. Sent free.

CHICAGO PROJECTING COMPANY
225 Dearborn Street, Dept. L, Chicago, Ills.

A New Departure in Photography

Fine Views of Principal Points of Interest in and around Chicago and Chicago's Beautiful Parks. Send for our SPECIAL OFFER OF FOUR VIEWS, MOUNTED AND STRUNG ON RIBBONS, for 25 cts., postage prepaid. 1 doz. 60 cts. With this offer we will send our Price-List for Views, Mounted or Unmounted, for Albums; also Albums complete, containing 25, 50 or 100 Views. Address

SNAP-SHOT VIEW CO., No. 918 S. Sawyer Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Learn Photography

Modern methods in portraiture and outside work practically taught. Great advantages of study in New York, and contact with well-known artists and illustrators.

CATALOGUE FREE.

New York School of Illustrating, 114 W. 34th St., New York

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.

WM. V. WILLIS & CO., 124 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

Digitized by Google

Literary Folk as they Come and Go

Mrs. Catherwood's Fancy for Variety

Mrs. Mary Hartwell Catherwood has just begun work upon a historical novel dealing with the romantic side of American pioneer life in the closing years of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century. This is to be the largest undertaking to which Mrs. Catherwood has yet put her hand, whether considered from the viewpoint of ambition, its geographical scope, or the richness of the historical materials upon which it is based. With the exception of one short story this is the first work the author of The Romance of Dollard and The Story of Tonty has done since she left her country home in Hoopeston, Illinois.

The greatest difficulty Mrs. Catherwood encounters in the prosecution of this new work is the temptation to take up other plots and short sketches. Never does the half-finished story that has long been pigeonholed in her desk seem so alluring to this woman as when she faces a new task of ambitious proportions, and one which must be finished within a given time.

Homeopathy Applied to Literature

William Archer, the English author and dramatic critic, is fighting in the British army in South Africa. One of Mr. Archer's early and best-known works was his translation of Ibsen's dramas into English. After the publication of this work a London literary woman asked him how he came to spend so much time upon that kind of work.

"I did it," replied Mr. Archer, "to keep myself from going to sleep in the evening."

"Ah! similia similibus, I presume?"

Mr. Archer's answer is not recorded.

Editorial Persistency Rewarded

For the last fourteen years the editor of one of the large London illustrated weekly journals has written an annual letter to W. S. Gilbert, of Pinafore and Bob Ballads fame, for a Christmas story. For fourteen years Mr. Gilbert has annually replied through his secretary that "Mr. Gilbert regretted that he would be unable to comply with the request, as Mr. Gilbert was not writing anything for serial publication." Last year the patient editor wrote his fifteenth letter, and this time the answer came in the author's own handwriting. It was to the effect that Mr. Gilbert would send him a Christmas story. Therefore, just after the holidays of last winter, work was begun, and now the manuscript has been turned in. It will appear next winter both in England and America.

When Professor Tait was an Anarchist

Professor P. G. Tait, of Edinburgh University, the author of that great work, The Unseen Universe, has a grim humor akin to that of the Norseman. When a student at the college of which he is now a distinguished professor he made himself speedily known. The first day in his lodging-house he found that his next-door neighbor, a young woman, was in the habit of practicing on a piano during his study hours. He conveyed his compliments to her with a request that she would confine her practice to the time he was attending lectures or taking his constitutional walk. The young woman sent back a curt refusal. The next day when she touched the first note of her exercise there came from his room a hideous discord from the loudest bagpipes he had been able to purchase the night before. She was plucky and stood it for a day or two, and then a treaty of peace was negotiated, in which she acceded to his desires. The following week a student of elocution moved in and began operations. The Professor says: "I didn't know whether he was rehearsing for the stage, the pulpit or the hustings, but he made enough noise for all three."

A similar request was sent to the elocutionist and a similar reply delivered in return. In addition came the information that "the student had a private tutor who was developing his voice." The following day when the house was filled with oratory a volley of explosions came from Tait's room, followed by smoke and unearthly smells. The lessons in oratory were suspended and every one in the house collected to find out what the trouble was.

Tait with unmoved countenance said to the astonished landlord: "As there seems to be no restraint upon the nature of the studies pursued in these lodgings, I have begun a series of experiments in high explosives from which I expect to draw much advantage."

A second treaty was drawn, signed and witnessed within the next five minutes.

Captain Kettle Ashore

C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne lives in a handsome place in the outskirts of Bradford, England, and does his work in a house that is literally crammed with trophies of the chase. The library looks like a corner of the Sportsman's Show. The walls, where there are no windows, doors, pictures or bookshelves, are covered with all sorts of antlers. In the centre of this room there is a large flat desk, on one side of which the novelist writes and on the other Mrs. Hyne works with the typewriter. The literary labors of the Hyne family are impartially divided between the author and his wife. Mr. Hyne is a giant in stature, spare in frame and the picture of an athlete. His wife is of rather more than ordinary height but is dwarfed by her tall husband. She enters into his life in the most helpful fashion. As he writes she takes each sheet of manuscript as he finishes it and transcribes it into legible "printers' copy" on the typewriter. When he is tired writing he dictates to her. This is wholly a labor of love on the part of Mrs. Hyne. She had a large fortune when she married, and her husband is in receipt of a handsome income from his writings.

The novelist is fond of boasting of his wife's capabilities.

"She writes all my best stories," he says; "if you don't believe it I'll show you the copy."

Though Mrs. Hyne may not be altogether responsible for her husband's success she has much to do with it. Mr. Hyne is an inveterate traveler. He has been in almost every habitable part of the globe, including Africa and the Arctics. He generally travels at least 10,000 miles a year, and in all his later journeys Mrs. Hyne has accompanied him. He is thirty-six years old and was married three years ago.

Versatile Booth Tarkington

Newton Booth Tarkington, the author of The Gentleman from Indiana, which, by the way, is a first novel, once sang before a Philadelphia audience. He was at that time a member of the Princeton Glee Club. Now you cannot trust implicitly the judgment of your friends. They are apt to exaggerate your good points. This is especially true of vocalists and amateur actors. Therefore, Mr. Tarkington does not place the utmost reliance upon the statement of his most intimate friends that on this occasion he exhibited an imbecility of attitude and a lunacy of eye never otherwise equaled. It appears that a girl, who knew Mr. Tarkington, had thrown a bouquet to him just before he began to sing and it landed on the stage about thirty feet distant from him—wholly out of reach. This may have accounted for his inability to do himself justice. But when it comes to writing Mr. Tarkington shows off to a much better advantage.

To a New York friend, the other day, who asked for a biographical note he wrote in reply:

"Princeton gave me an A. M. last fall. The rest of my career is all negatives. Never married, never been in business, never drove a street car, never conducted a bank, never even been on a paper except at Princeton, and that doesn't count. The best thing about this Princeton paper is that my predecessors were Robert Bridges, Jesse Lynch Williams, James Barnes and Professors Stone and West."

America the Best Field for Fiction

During his recent visit to New York, Robert Barr, who is one of the best business men among the successful authors of the day, was talking to a friend about his American visit.

"There never was a time," he said, "when America was more fruitful in good stories than now. There are some wonderful characters up in Canada and along the Great Lakes waiting to be put into print. I regard America as one of the best fields for fiction in the world to-day."

THE LUCKE ROLLED CIGAR

Has by its undeniable merit won an enviable position in the regard of the American smoker. Made of tender young leaves of the most delicate Porto Rican growth, they have a flavor equal to any imported cigar on the market, and at one-fourth the cost. They supply what has long been sought for: a luxurious, satisfying smoke at an economical price. It's like saving money to smoke the Lucke cigars; but it's the quality, not the price, that recommends them.

BY MAIL.. The Lucke Rolled Cigar, box of 50, prepaid to any address in the U. S. for $1.25, or 100 Lucke Rolls (the small edition) for $1.00. Satisfaction guaranteed, or your money back.

J. H. LUCKE & CO.
Lucke Block
CINCINNATI, OHIO

HAS THE FLAVOR OF A PERFECTO

Remington Typewriters

Work Well

Wear Well

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT, 327 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Alois P. Swoboda Teaches by mail, with perfect success, his original and scientific method of Physiological Exercise, without any apparatus whatever, and requiring but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring. By this condensed system more exercise can be obtained in ten minutes than by any other in two hours, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

It is the only natural, easy and speedy method for obtaining perfect health, physical development, and elasticity of mind and body.

Perfect Health means an absolute freedom from those ailments which a well-informed mind knows are directly or indirectly due to a lack of properly arranged exercise.

Pupils are of both sexes, ranging in age from fifteen to eighty-six, and all recommend the system. Since no two people are in the same physical condition individual instructions are given in each case.

Write at once for full information and Booklet, containing indorsements from many of America's leading citizens, to

ALOIS P. SWOBODA
34-36 Washington Street, Chicago, Ill.

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

The Angle Lamp

Gets better every day the weather grows warmer because its comparatively little heat makes it a welcome substitute for the almost unbearable lamps with which you are familiar. It will be found the ideal lamp for the summer and a perfect substitute for gas and electricity. Furthermore, it never smokes, smells or gets out of order; is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas, may be filled while lighted and without being moved, and burns for about eighteen cents a month. Its wonderful feature,

"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

Insures all the light falling directly downward and outward. Thousands are in use in homes, stores, offices, halls, churches, summer residences, etc., and our Catalogue K shows all styles from $1.50 up. Sent on request.

THE ANGLE LAMP CO., 76 Park Place, New York

THE LOZIER GAS ENGINE

Reliable as a Steam Engine

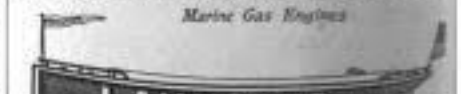
Perfect

LUBRICATION—Automatic. Oiler sprays Piston every stroke.
COMBUSTION—The same old or shine.
MIXING—Of gasoline and air.
CONSTRUCTION—Finest ever produced.

"CLUB SPECIAL" is the name of our popular launch for fishing, hunting and general club use. Length 16 ft. 6 in. Perfectly safe and seaworthy. Write us for free reference list of sale engines and good boats. Marine Department.

LOZIER MOTOR CO.
20 Gardner Block, Toledo, Ohio

MY GET THERE



Will last a lifetime. Non-sinkable and indestructible.

TWENTY DOLLARS NET
W. H. MULLINS, 354 Depot Street, SALEM, O.

DUCKING BOAT

MONITOR and MOGUL
Marine Gas Engines

LAUNCHES.

MONITOR Vapor Engine and Power Company, Grand Rapids, Mich.

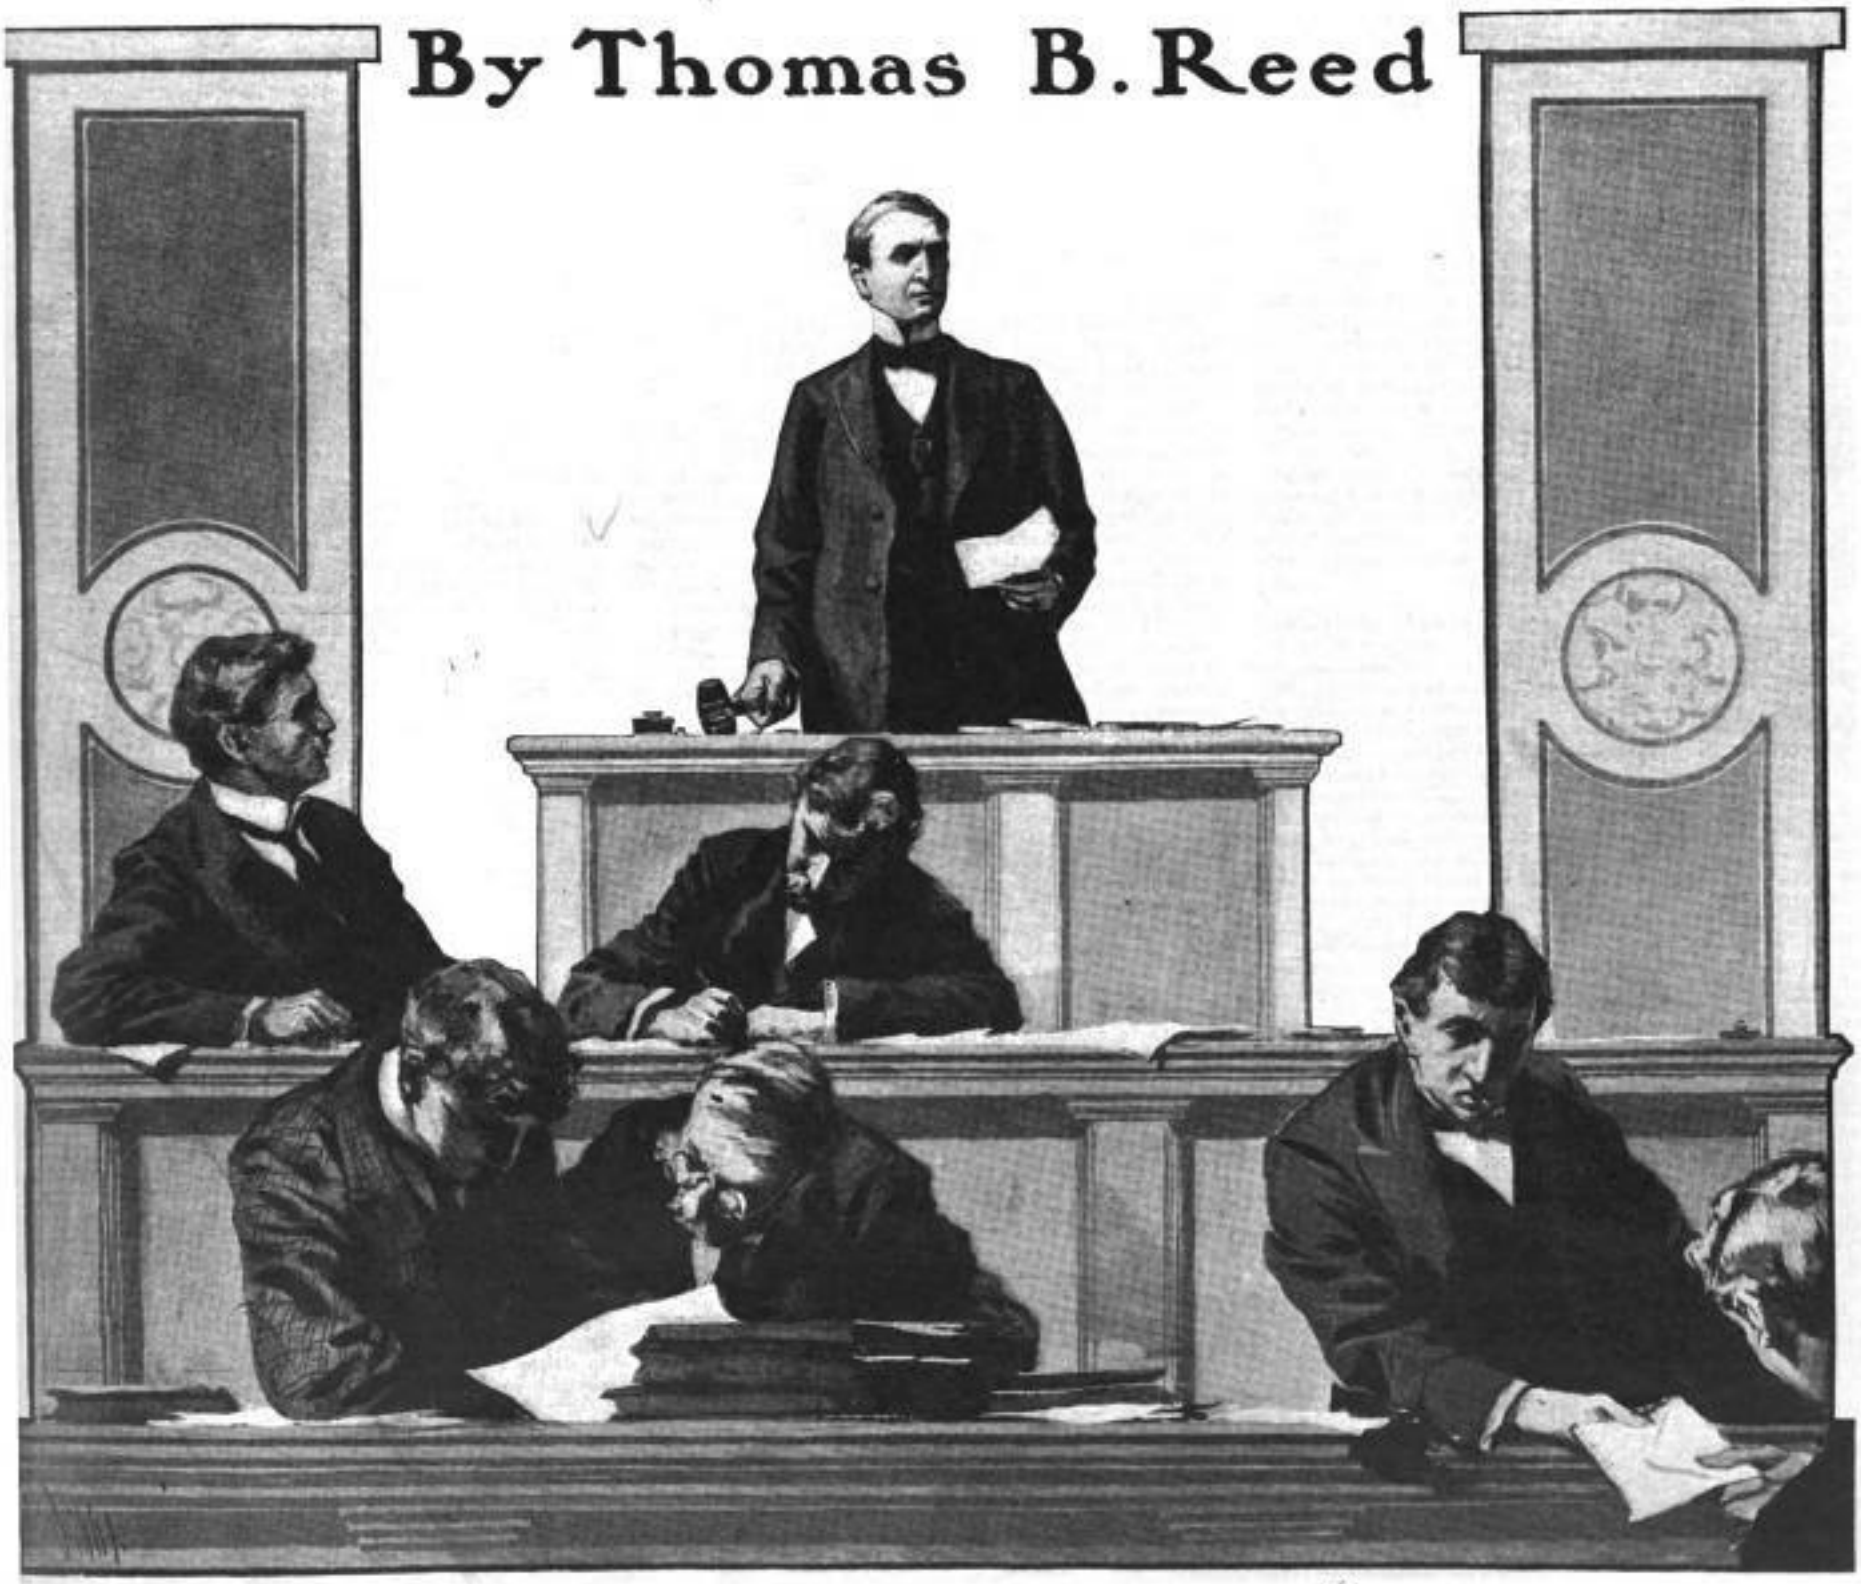
Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded Aº Dº 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 47 | Philadelphia, May 19, 1900 | 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year



Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 425 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

The House of Representatives

By Thomas B. Reed

Digitized by Google

The House of Representatives
How it Does Business
By Thomas B. Reed

Copyright, 1910, by The Curtis Publishing Company

THE transaction of business in the House of Representatives is a mystery even to some of the members. Some never learn how it is done, and all have to struggle with the subject for no small period of time. To the beginner, the whole thing seems hopeless and impossible to learn; but to the persevering there gradually opens a view of the system, and they find that there are good reasons for even the things which seem the most troublesome and unreasonable.

The first thing the House has to do is to organize itself out of chaos and take form and cease to be void. How to do this safely was a puzzle for a long time. How to dispose of disputed memberships during the very process which could alone give the House power to act was not only a standing menace each time the House met for the first session, but in the famous New Jersey case brought the process of organization to a standstill for weeks, until everybody was too tired to prolong the struggle after John Quincy Adams pointed out the way to surmount the difficulties.

In view of these difficulties and dangers, it was, however, finally determined that it was better to run the risk of usurpation than of inextricable confusion; that a danger which could be measured was better than a danger which could not. Hence it was established by law that the Clerk of the preceding House should make a list of the members-elect who had proper credentials, and that that list should be the one on which the House should be organized, under the supervision of this same Clerk as a temporary presiding officer. The Clerk standing in his place at twelve o'clock of the day appointed by law, or by the President's proclamation, if an extra session, first calls the members-elect to order, and then calls the name of each member on his list, who, if present, responds. If a quorum, which is a majority, responds, the body then proceeds to choose a Speaker, which is done viva voce, each member stating his choice when his name is called. When the Speaker is elected, the Clerk appoints two or more members, generally his competitors, to conduct him to the chair. The Speaker then delivers a short address and announces himself as ready to take the oath, which is administered to him by the member of the House oldest in consecutive service. When the Speaker has taken the oath, he then administers the same to the members, who take their places in groups in front of the Speaker as their names are called. When this ceremony has been completed, the House chooses, usually by resolutions, its other officers: a clerk, who records the doings of the House, and is in charge of all clerical proceedings; a doorkeeper, who has control of much of the service of the House; a sergeant-at-arms, who pays the members and helps the Speaker keep order; a postmaster, who takes charge of the mail matter of the members; and a chaplain, who opens the sessions with prayer.

Getting the House into Working Order

After the election of these officials, and after giving to the Senate and to the President notice of organization, the House is then ready to proceed to business. The first business is usually the adoption of rules. It was at one time thought that the rules of the preceding House could be made to bind its successor; but of late years no one contends for that idea, and each House is understood to be a law unto itself. The rules usually provide for the appointment of committees by the Speaker, and the transaction of business on the basis of their recommendations. The committee system of government is so firmly established in the House of Representatives that it seems part and parcel of its constitution and character, and not at all a mere method of doing business. Usually it takes three weeks or a month for the Speaker to complete his task of appointing his committeemen. What he really does is to arrange the whole three hundred and fifty-seven members and the delegates into committees, and organize the whole body; for in filling each committee he has to keep constantly in mind all the others. He has to take into account all parts of the Union, the varied interests of each and every State and Territory. Due weight must also be given to length of service as well as to demonstrated capacity, and each member must be placed on at least one committee. What with the claims of geography, length of service, differences of politics, personal merit, pressure of friends and push and pull of interests, most Speakers are so worn by the task as to be glad of the Christmas holidays for reasons altogether different from those connected with the sacred associations of the time. As a matter of self-preservation, the Speaker usually announces his committees just before the vacation, in order that the grieved, who are many, may go home, where they can have room and time to clear up their feelings and let atmospheric absorption of language set in.

When the House comes back at the end of the holidays it is ready for its work. The work before it is of two great general classes, which may be called public and private, though the lines of demarcation are not at all times duly kept up. Of the business called public there are two classes, one of which is absolutely essential and the other optional and dependent upon the judgment and opportunities of the House.

Providing for the Nation's Necessities

Government is at once a necessity which must cost much money and a luxury which may cost more. If we have officers to do the governing of us all, we must pay their bills and provide for their increase as we grow more prosperous and more populous. If we are to have armies and navies, these must be paid for, and the ways and means of payment provided. If we wish to administer justice throughout the land, money must be raised by law and appropriated by law. Unless all these things are done, the fundamental purpose of government fails. These, then, as a whole, though each item may be disputed, are matters of necessity, and hence the two committees of greatest importance in the House are the Committee on Ways and Means, which has control of means to raise revenue, and the Committee on Appropriations, so-called, which has control of the larger part of the details of expenditure. Laws, however, which raise revenue are not of yearly enactment, and the Committee on Ways and Means may be a dormant committee for long years; but when it does come into action, it so affects the business and property of the nation that its primacy among committees is fully established in the House. Its chairman is the titular and natural leader of the House, and its first member on the other side is the leader of the opposition.

The Committees on Appropriations (for there are more than one) exercise their power every year, for the expenditures of each year have to be provided for at each regular session of the Congress, and at the short session the Committees on Appropriations have almost complete charge of the House. There is, then, but little time or opportunity for new ventures in the way of legislation. Without attempting to enumerate the House committees, it is enough to say of the Committees on Appropriations that each one is always of great importance, and of all the rest of the committees that any one of them may become at any time of supreme importance. When the disposal of the Geneva Award, and afterward the whole question of the lapsed and unlapsed railroad land grants were thrown upon the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-seventh Congress, that committee could not complain of any lack of importance. Nor can the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce feel any sense of insignificance as long as the Nicaragua Canal with all its foreign relations and its possibilities of all sorts rests upon the shoulders of that committee. So, in its turn, any committee of the House may find itself in charge of matters of continental greatness. It is in these committees that the matters which come before Congress are primarily discussed. There evidence is taken, hearings are had, and examination is made. Whatever of careful deliberation is given at all is usually given here. These committees are too numerous to be recapitulated, and grow in numbers almost every Congress. They commence in many cases as select committees formed for a special purpose, and are then continued, even after the occasion has passed. This is largely from unwillingness to lose a chairmanship, a position of dignity which seems to the remote constituency as instinct with life as when it was first created.

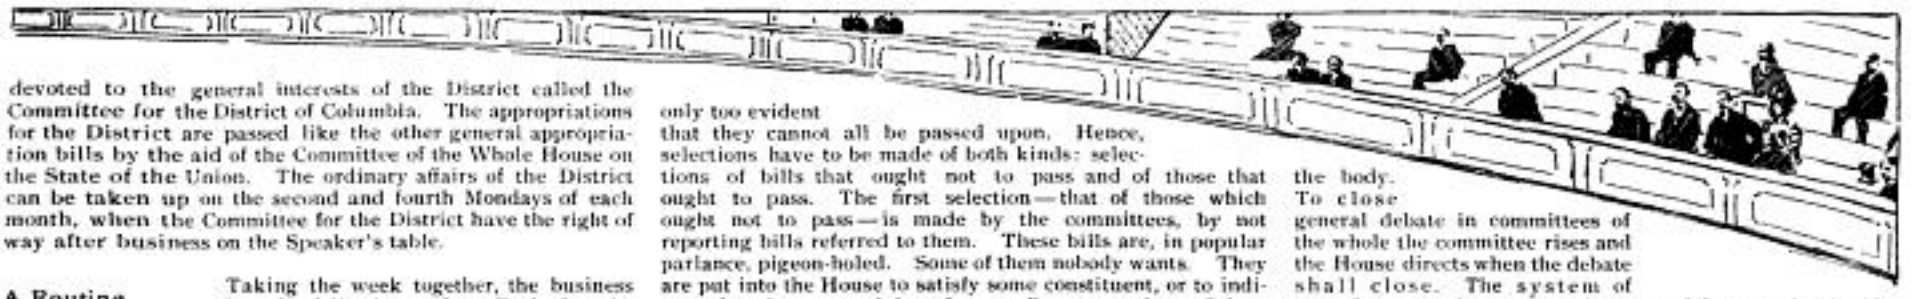
All these committees, except a few, those on pensions, claims and accounts, concern themselves with business of a public nature, being forbidden to take up bills which concern individuals alone. All the bills which relate to public affairs are called public bills, and are divided into two classes, one of which, involving appropriations of money, goes to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, and is there indexed in order of presentation on what is called the Union Calendar.

As bills on the Union Calendar comprise all the great regular appropriation bills, and as these bills have the right of way, there is very little chance in the regular course of business for the various bills on the Union Calendar to have a hearing commensurate with the proposer's idea of what ought to be their importance. This difficulty is, however, not peculiar to our House of Representatives. In most other countries, appropriating money, being one of the highest functions of government, is surrounded by safeguards which exist on purpose instead of by accident. In England, not a dollar of money is ever even proposed to be appropriated except by Her Majesty's Government. With us, bills appropriating millions are put in by any member. We are not content with placing the power of originating regular appropriations in the hands of eight different committees, but we give nearly every committee out of the whole fifty-eight the right to propose expenditure to an amount entirely unlimited. Fortunately, the right of way can only be given to the regular bills, and the other ones must plead before the Committee on Rules for a chance to be taken up. In the House, no item can go on the regular bills which has not the sanction of existing law or of unanimous consent. As the Senate has no such rule, the entrance of the items of new expenditure takes place in the Senate, to be struggled with, for the most part, in conference between the two houses, through the dreary hours which drag themselves along to the hour of final adjournment.

All bills and petitions of every description and nature, with very few exceptions, are presented not in open House, as they used to be, but are placed in boxes at the clerk's desk, if private bills, or petitions; or, if of a public nature, are handed to the Speaker's clerk. Formerly all these bills and petitions were offered in the open House, the titles read, and, if a member called for it, a full reading was had of the bill or petition. The paper was then referred in open House to the committee deemed appropriate, and whole days were, during the session, spent in these proceedings, to which no one paid attention. Now, the paper is referred without taking a moment of the time of the assembly. Of course, there are provisions in the rules which enable due correction of any error to be made. In old times, nobody had a right to bring in a bill except by a vote of the House, sometimes, indeed usually, after discussion. Such is still the procedure in England. The bill or petition having been duly presented and referred to the appropriate committee is then in charge of that body, and the House awaits its action. If the committee does not choose to act, it may be discharged by a two-thirds vote of the House on some suspension day, and suspension days occur on the first and third Mondays of each month, one being devoted to suspensions proposed on the motion of a committee, and the other to suspensions on motion of a member.

The Disposition of Different Kinds of Bills

If the committee, after receiving the bill, sees fit to report, then it has power to file its report with the clerk, and the bill is immediately put upon the appropriate calendar to be disposed of by due course of proceeding. Appropriation bills and revenue bills are reported to the open house to enable points of order to be reserved before they are committed to the Committee of the Whole, and their titles placed on the Union Calendar. All other public bills appropriating money go on the same calendar. Bills of a public nature which do not carry or require appropriations go to what is called the House Calendar, and are to be disposed of in the House. The Union Calendar, then, contains the bills which carry money and raise revenue. The House Calendar contains the public bills which do not appropriate or call for money. There remain the private bills which concern individuals, of which examples are bills for personal pensions, for payment of claims of all kinds. These bills, when reported to the House by appropriate committees, go to the Private Calendar, and are considered in Committee of the Whole, which, as you will see, is a different committee from the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, although composed of the same individuals: that is, all the members of the House. This committee sits on Friday only, and used to close its sessions by rising at five o'clock and taking a recess until eight, when the evening session used to commence, and continue until ten-thirty. This evening session was devoted entirely to personal pension bills.



In the present Congress the evening session was abolished and the second and fourth Fridays are now given to pensions, whereby the number of pension bills has been much increased. The other Fridays are used alternately to consider bills from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims.

The regular course of business for each day is not the same, and hence to give anything like a regular history of business, a week must be taken. Besides the regular work of the House as representing and disposing of the wants and needs of the people as a Union of States, the Congress is the Legislature of the District of Columbia, and must provide for its government. This is done by conferring upon the Committee on Appropriations the power to bring in a bill to expend the revenues of the District and make such appropriations as may seem suitable out of the revenues of the country to defray the extraordinary expenses of the District as the seat of government. There is also a committee specially

Editor's Note—This is the first paper of Mr. Reed's notable series on The Three Great Parliaments. Subsequent articles to appear in early numbers of the Post will deal with the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies.

Digitized by Google

devoted to the general interests of the District called the Committee for the District of Columbia. The appropriations for the District are passed like the other general appropriation bills by the aid of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union. The ordinary affairs of the District can be taken up on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, when the Committee for the District have the right of way after business on the Speaker's table.

A Routine Week in the House

Taking the week together, the business has the following order: Each day the House is called to order at 12 o'clock noon. After prayer by the chaplain, the Journal, which is the official record of the preceding day, is read and approved by the House. All through the day petitions and private bills may be placed in the petition box and public bills handed to the Clerk. These are referred to committees and there are regulations to correct mis-reference. After the prayer, the order of business requires the reading and approval of the Journal and correction of reference of public bills. Then comes business on the Speaker's table, which consists of messages from the President, which are referred to appropriate committees without debate in open House. Reports and other papers from Heads of Departments and bills, resolutions and messages from the Senate are referred privately, like public bills presented by members subject to correction. House bills amended by the Senate are then acted on, together with Senate bills, which are substantially the same as House bills which have been reported favorably to the House. These last two classes of bills do not carry money. After this come certain kinds of unfinished business, which being disposed of, the morning hour commences, during which the various committees may call up bills the titles of which are on the House Calendar, and the disposal of such bills cannot be interrupted for sixty minutes. If a motion is then made to go into Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, the House can so vote, or a motion can be made, when authorized by a committee, to take up a particular bill on the Union Calendar, and there may be one amendment naming another bill. If one of these bills is agreed upon, then the House goes into committee and disposes of that bill, or at least discusses it. If the House prefers to continue on the House Calendar, it may do so by voting down the motions to go into committee. Under these circumstances the House may take up the whole day on the House Calendar bills.

At any time, however, after the Journal is approved, the committee in charge of a general appropriation bill or a revenue bill may claim the right to go into committee to dispose of such a bill, and the House thereupon votes on the question that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House, and very seldom votes in the negative. If in the affirmative, then the Speaker announces the vote and selects the chairman who presides over the committee. This procedure on the appropriation may occupy the day. When the bill is finished the committee usually rises and reports to the House, which then, with the Speaker in the chair, may dispose of all amendments made in the committee and such others as the House may desire to add. It is rare, however, that the House amends. Instead of a consideration in the House, the previous question is usually ordered and the bill passed. If the day be Monday, the first Monday of the month, or the third Monday, the Speaker may recognize a member to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill or resolution proposed by the member. This is an extraordinary procedure, and therefore surrounded by extraordinary safeguards. In the first place, if demand of a second be made by any member, the motion to suspend the rules must be seconded by a majority of the members, a quorum being present. If a majority, to be ascertained by tellers, does not second the motion, it proceeds no further. If a second be obtained by count by tellers or by unanimous consent, the right of debate exists for twenty minutes on each side. No amendment to the proposition is allowed. It must stand or fall as presented.

Suspension of the rules used to be allowed formerly much more frequently than now, though it has been, and still is, employed to pass bills involving vast sums of money when the session is far advanced and time for prolonged discussion is impossible. Its use is confined to the first and third Mondays, and to the last six days of the session. If the Monday is the second or fourth Monday of the month, the District of Columbia Committee, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, may claim the attention of the House on bills relating to the District, and may keep possession of the House until adjournment, if necessary.

The Clash of Theory and Practice

Thus, in theory at least, it will be seen that a time is provided for each kind of business. Nevertheless, in practice, only a tenth, and sometimes only a twentieth, of the business begun is ever finished. This, however, applies to percentages by count only. All revenue bills, and all bills to pay the needed expenses of the Government, have their due opportunity. Way has to be made for important measures by selection, for, with 10,000 bills before the House, it is only too evident that they cannot all be passed upon. Hence, selections have to be made of both kinds: selections of bills that ought not to pass and of those that ought to pass. The first selection—that of those which ought not to pass—is made by the committees, by not reporting bills referred to them. These bills are, in popular parlance, pigeon-holed. Some of them nobody wants. They are put into the House to satisfy some constituent, or to indicate the virtuous activity of some Representative. Others are never pressed. Still others are not deemed worth reporting, and a great many encounter such opposition that it is not deemed worth while to bring them in. Notwithstanding all these prolific causes of death, comparable only to the methods of destruction of seed in Nature, many bills are reported each session which are as entirely without sense as they are without hope in the world. When the two years of Congress are ended these are all ended, and those which are destined to survive have to begin all over again.

The choice of bills which ought to be passed, or, at least, to have a hearing, has often to be made by the Committee on Rules, which committee has the right to report at any time a proposition for that purpose. If the House agrees to the action of the Committee on Rules, then the bill comes up for action, and usually the method of consideration and the form of action are determined by the resolution submitted by the Committee on Rules. Though this seems an arbitrary method of choice, it is not so in fact, for it applies only to bills which have much following and which obviously are desired by the House, and are the result of full consultation.

Of those bills which are reported, the revenue and general appropriation bills, except in the rare case of a severe party fight, are sure to pass. The rest have opportunities which are deemed most suitable and appropriate. Those on the House Calendar, public bills without appropriations, can all be discussed and passed upon. Public bills carrying money which are of private origin have little chance and, as a rule, deserve little. They meet much the same fate in all Legislatures which have much work to do. The private bills comprehending claims arising from war, or from civil causes, ought to have some general treatment outside the House and Senate, for there they go by favor and not by knowledge. At present a few of them are taken up Fridays when they are not shut out by the bills having the right of way, but those disposed of hardly equal the new ones.

The Fallacy of Unanimous Consent

Another method of passing bills outside of the rules is by what is called unanimous consent. As nobody knows beforehand what the bill is except the proposer, it will be seen that the Speaker must exercise great care under great pressure to prevent the presentation of unsuitable bills, and half the time all the information he can get will not keep him from mistake. When you add to this that the right of reprisal against an objector is regarded as suitable, and that there is no disposition in a large assembly to turn the unsmitten cheek, you can see that unanimous consent, which seems fair, in reality is the worst thing possible.

To the novice it would seem as if the business done by the consent of every member would be free from all possible evil, having passed the scrutiny of all without objection from any. In fact, however, the bills so presented are those nobody has any real information about, and the responsibility of objecting is not universal but individual, and while each doubtful man is hoping some other will take the responsibility, the bill slips through, and the House hopes it may be all right. If somebody objects, he has to explain to the proposer of the bill and be the subject of reprisal when his own little bill comes up. You would hardly think such anger could lie in celestial minds—but it is.

The regular course of business for any day, as will be inferred, is actually so varied that you can hardly tell what direction it will take. But in its simplest form it may be shortly restated in this way: after the disposal of routine business ordinarily of little importance, it would be in order to take up the bills on the House Calendar by order of the committee in charge. This business must go on for sixty minutes; then the House can do one of two things: either continue on the House Calendar or go into Committee of the Whole generally, or on designated public business and close the day with that. This is the simplest statement of a day's work. On the first and third Mondays this order of business may be interrupted by suspensions of the rules and the passage of bills or resolutions as has been already described. On the second and fourth Mondays the Committee for the District of Columbia may claim the day for their work.

On Friday of each week the private bills have the right of way and, unless the House otherwise determines, the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole to discuss and propose amendments to private bills which, on the rising of the committee, are passed by the House.

On all the days, after the reading of the Journal, the Committees on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means may claim the right to move that the House go into committee to consider general appropriation or revenue bills, and, if the House so decides, the regular order of business is suspended until action on the appropriation or revenue bill is finished.

Thus far we have stated the proceedings in generalities and nothing has been said as to methods. Little, indeed, remains to be said, because the process is very simple. In the House, the power to close discussion is ample. The previous question can be moved at almost any time and upon almost everything. In committees discussion can be closed by the order of the body. To close general debate in committees of the whole the committee rises and the House directs when the debate shall close. The system of amendments under the rules is very satisfactory; for, besides an amendment to an amendment, there may be an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and both the original and the substitute may be perfected before the final vote on either has to be taken.

There is not only the usual motion to recommit before the vote, but after the vote to engross and to read a third time, after all the amendments have been made, there may be a motion to recommit either with or without instructions. The vote to lay upon the table has, in the House, an unusual effect. A bill which has been laid upon the table is as much defeated as if it were indefinitely postponed.

The discussions in the House and in Committee of the Whole by which bills and proceedings are explained take place under very many different rules and customs. Originally there was no limitation to the amount of time which a member might occupy. But as the House grew large and more men were contending for opportunities, it became necessary to limit each man's time, and therefore it became the rule, often relaxed by the consent of all, that at the end of an hour the member must cease. But the pressure to speak still continued, and the practice arose of farming out the hours to which men were entitled by the custom of the assembly among many members. One is given five minutes and another twenty minutes, and so on until but little is left for the one who alone has the right. The volume of apparent talk is still further enlarged by giving, as is often done, the right to enlarge in print five minutes of what you do say by fifty-five minutes of what you do not say.

The Conditions of Ideal Legislation

In Committees of the Whole there are two kinds of debate: what is called general debate on the whole bill after it is read, in which general debate each member may speak an hour, and then the five minutes' debate, which occurs upon each paragraph as it is taken up for particular consideration and amendment. This five minutes' debate is, on the whole, the most satisfactory debate there is, and much more likely to be confined to the subject which is being considered. In the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union the general debate takes a very wide range. Whereas other subjects in particular may be before the committee temporarily, the State of the Union is before it permanently. All debate is liable to degenerate into observations which concern the larger public than the one really addressed, and questions larger than those before the House. Memory brings back speeches already delivered on the stump, and these call to mind still others, and the difference between debate and deliberation becomes rather painfully evident. However, all deliberative bodies are the same, and our members do not monopolize idle talk and are not the only legislators who step aside for purposes of vainglory.

Under two conditions the House might pass upon all the questions submitted; but those two conditions are simply impossible, as will be seen on stating them. They are: if members would present only such bills as they deem desirable, and if the debates were confined to reasons relating to their passage or defeat. But it will be noticed that whenever a subject is popular, members are prolific in remedies which do not remedy. This multiplies bills. Then, the temptation to argue for the constituency and not for the audience is as persistent as it is natural. Doing one's duty is well, but freeing the mind is delightful.

The Tin Soldier of the British Army

PREVIOUS to his going to the front, Lord Methuen was extremely popular with the masses. He is a genial man and took a very active interest in the British Volunteer. But his soldiers did not like him. They considered him too shifty and nervous; they had no confidence in him, and soldiers are clever at discovering the real ability of a leader. A story is told of Lord Methuen's interview with Lieutenant the Honorable Walter Chetwyn.

Chetwyn came to Aldershot in charge of the Staffordshire militia, ordered out for the annual month's training. Methuen, who is an officer of the Guards, the smartest of all smart regiments, journeyed down from London to inspect the militia, and, after putting the men through their paces, called up Lieutenant Chetwyn and gave him a wigging.

After the inspection Lieutenant Chetwyn, "mad clean through," ran up to London, and making his way to the Lowther Arcade, where all toys for children are sold, invested two sovereigns in trim, tin soldiers. These he tacked on a board, in perfect order, and without any wrap or cover over them, sent them by special messenger to the Guards Club, addressed to Lord Methuen. On the reverse of the tag Chetwyn wrote that, as far as he had been able to gather, this was Lord Methuen's idea of a regiment. The arrival of this at the club caused consternation among the officers, as it was taken not only as an insult to Methuen, but a serious reflection on the Guards, who are, but hate to be thought, more or less "show" soldiers. This that at first looked like developing into a very awkward incident was, on the advice of the gray heads of the service, allowed to drop.

Digitized by Google

Copyright, 1906, by
The Curtis Publishing Company

The Yellow Slipper

By Egerton Castle

IN THE middle of the last century there was born a little Franconian Princess, who, as she grew up, was always laughing. Even when other babies cried, she had laughed; had cut her teeth with crows of joy over the coral; had danced in the sunbeams before she could articulate—Glückskind, her nurse had called her.

She lived in the dull old Court of the dull little State of Ansbach-Grünberg; for those were days when the Empire was still a patchwork of Duchies and Principalities, great and small—mostly small. Her father was Margrave of Ansbach.

Both he and the Margravine were advanced in life when they married, and this was the only child. Consequently, the little Princess had no companions of her own standing, and few of any other; for neither her mother nor her governesses approved of undue familiarity with those beneath her in station. Her life was regulated like the clocks in the Residenz. A prisoner, it seemed, would have had more chance of indulging in harmless amusements than had the Princess Charlotte Ottilia Isabella. And yet, as she grew from a baby to a child, from a child to a maiden, and reached the ripe age of seventeen years, the little Princess, girded in as she was, kept her merry heart. Her governesses thought it quite indecorous; most deplorable. But the Special Envoy of His Most Christian Majesty, Louis XV, the Well-Beloved (who had stopped almost a whole week at the Residenz), had proclaimed her the real sunshine of the Court; la jolie Princesse Rit-Toujours, he had been heard to call her. At this dull little Court, French was, of course, the only tongue of "good tone," even as everywhere else on the Old Continent; and thus Rit-Toujours became the loving name of the little Princess among the many, old and young, who loved her; that is, when they were not actually stifled by courtlike formality.

The Margravine, however, long-faced and dismal, never responded but by a sigh to the frankest peal of the girl's laughter. As for the Margrave, a pompous and yet strangely fussy man, the responsibility of his army (of six hundred and seventy men and twenty-one drummer-boys), his Privy Council of eight distinguished Ansbach-Grünbergers, of his ninety-two and a half miles of frontier, his doll's house Ministry, were matters which left him but little leisure for mere family concerns. Thus the Princess' life ran its course with that daily level of dullness we mentioned before; it was indeed a merciful dispensation that she was able to take her joyousness from within.

In the winter, the solemn, dreary old palace in the solemn, dreary little old town. In the hot weather, the sleepy Sommer Schloss, seven miles out. In the autumn, the occasional visit to the hunting lodge in the mountainous district at the farthest limits of the realm, quite thirty miles away. And so the year went around again to winter and the town. Yet through it all, as I have said, the little Princess knew not a sad hour; nothing could rob her of her light heart, her bubbling sense of fun, her young joy in her young life.

Of all the months of the year, that of the visit to the shooting lodge was the most satisfying to her cheerful soul. There they went in smaller state; the rigid rules of etiquette were relaxed. The little Princess had actually been known to snatch unrebuked an hour or two of absolute liberty in the woods. And then there were the woods themselves—the wide, beautiful, free woods, with the wind always murmuring in the treetops, and the brooks chattering down the stones, and new, unexplored mysteries of green glades at every turn; with the smell of the autumn leaves, the hidden, fascinating life of myriad feathered and furred things. It seemed as if the little Princess took away with her, from this all too brief sojourn in the heart of Nature, a provision of content and sweet memories for the other eleven months.

Now, the year when Charlotte Ottilia Isabella—these were the first three of the little Princess' many names—reached the age of seventeen, was one fraught with very deep importance. First of all, after her seventeenth birthday she was pronounced emancipated from schoolroom control and her governesses were discharged with a handsome pension. A lady-in-waiting was appointed to her, who, although she seemed very ancient in the little Princess' eyes, was, nevertheless, the youngest person about the Court except herself, and who had not such iron notions of the rules of life for Princesses as the deposed authority. Next, just before the emigration from the summer residence to the woods and mountains, the little Princess had been conscious of a certain stir in the stagnant atmosphere. She was promoted to silks and satins, immense powdered erections on her head and certain elaborate family jewels. And the rumor grew and spread that, now she was of marriageable age, the Margrave and Margravine were endeavoring to secure a suitable alliance for her.

The Princess did not trouble her head very much about the matter, but it amused her, even as the new frocks amused her, the high-heeled shoes that went click-click, and the delightful feeling of being able to order about instead of being ordered about.

"Toggenburg, get me some blue silk. Toggenburg, play me that minuet of Scarlatti. Toggenburg, order coffee."

And good, lank, pale-eyed, pale-haired Mademoiselle de Toggenburg, the new lady-in-waiting, would drop her invariable curtsy and flutter to obey with an alacrity at which the little Princess laughed till she cried.

So it was in this quite unwonted twitter of excitement that she went with the Margraval family to Schloss Tannenfels that autumn. And here it was that the strange things we are about to narrate happened to her.

The very first morning, when the Princess awoke from the heavy sleep which had followed on the fatigues of the journey, she looked out from under the great billowing blue silk eiderdown to see a rosy-faced woman, with plaits of corn-colored hair wound around and around her head, on her knees before the china stove, stuffing sticks into its capacious interior. Now, this woman was strange to the Princess; so she sat up in bed, propped her head upon her hand (that little head that ought to have been a mass of sunshiny curls, and yet was so rigidly powdered and plastered day by day!) and said, smiling:

"What has become of old Gretel?"

Old Gretel was she who had been used to light the Princess' fire in the previous autumns.

The woman sprang up from her knees with a half-frightened start and looked at the Princess' little pink face, smiling out of the bed at her; but reassured by the cherubic innocence of this exalted person's appearance, she dropped a rustic curtsy, and her own comely, ruddy countenance beaming back good will, answered in broad, peasant lingo:

"Gretel, may it please the Fraulein Princesskin, Gretel has the rheumatics so bad in her poor old bones that she can come no longer to the castle. And so the most gracious gentleman, the steward, has engaged me for the work during the Highnesses' visit. My grandmother stays at home now in the little house and minds the cooking, and I rise with the dawn and come every morning from the forest hither. Before that I used to mind the cooking for her, that is, when she worked here—for Gretel is my grandmother, may it please the Princesskin."

The fire roared and crackled up the stovepipes.

"Pull back the curtains," said the little Princess, "and open the windows, that I may smell the trees."

It was a brilliant, sunshiny day, and the smell of the pine trees was glorious, so the little Princess thought, as she sat up in bed and sniffed and sniffed as if she could never sniff enough. The good-natured peasant woman, with her hands planted akimbo on her sturdy hips, burst out laughing:

"Na, Miss Princess," she said, "that is something like, is it not?"

The little Princess laughed in concert. Nobody ever spoke like that to her before. It was delightful! And what ropes of hair the woman had about her head, and what a nice hard, red cheek! It looked as fresh and as healthy as the mountain itself. In the coarse white kerchief which was folded across her bosom there was fastened a little bunch of violets. Half hidden they were, but yet the Princess saw them and thought it was just what had been wanted to complete her pleasure. She knew it was not at all etiquette for a servant to sport such an adornment.

"From where hast thou the violets?" said she.

The woman blushed and smiled a singular smile, and hid them away in her bosom.

"Ach! from der Josef," she said, and, shutting the stove door, she dropped her curtsy and pattered out of the room. As she went the little Princess noticed that she held her hand over the kerchief where the violets lay, as if she kept something precious there that she loved. And the laughter died away upon Charlotte Ottilia Isabella's lips, and she began to wonder who was der Josef? And why did the woman look like that? And what did that smile mean?

She had never seen anything so strange before, and, wondering, she forgot to laugh.

A little later, however, she had good cause for merriment. A courier came to the castle that morning. Post-haste, he had ridden from the capital all through the night. There was great agitation at his arrival; and the Margrave, who had been going out shooting, put off the chase, so that the Princess knew that most important, indeed, must be the news that was brought.

In the afternoon she was summoned, with extreme formality, to the Margravine's private room. There she found her father and mother alone; on the table between them lay a great document with red seals and several other papers. Her mother's long, solemn face was flushed. Her father was hopping from leg to leg, mopping his forehead, though the day was not over warm; his eyes looked more protruding than ever as he rolled them at her over his heavy, gold-rimmed spectacles.

"Come hither, my dear, come hither," said he. "You are growing a big girl, aye, aye. I suppose you are quite aware that it is time to be looking out for a husband, hey?" He pinched her cheek; he was in high good humor.

The little Princess began to laugh, the idea was so comical.

"Oh, dear," sighed the Margravine, "how can Your Highness speak to her like that? The child has been far too well brought up ever to think of such a thing."

And then the Princess laughed again. As if the word "husband" had not been echoing in the air for the last three months!

"Well, tell her yourself," said the Margrave. "It is the mother's business, after all."

"Oh, dear!" sighed the Margravine, "a mother's responsibilities are very great, but never so great as in a person of my position. Come and sit by me, Charlotte Ottilia Isabella. You are aware that it has ever been your father's and my desire to provide for your welfare and happiness. The time has now arrived," said the Margravine, "when it becomes our duty to think of selecting a suitable consort for you. A consort, my dear."

"The fact is," interrupted the Margrave impetuously, "we have had a most unexpected offer for your hand, most unexpected and most gratifying, aye, aye." He pinched her cheek again. "Who would have thought that this chit was destined to be a reigning Princess?" Here he drew back a step, puffed out his cheeks, blew very hard and wagged his head till his little pigtail stood on end. "A reigning Princess, hey! That is something! What do you say to that, Princesskin?"

"A most magnificent alliance," the Margravine went trickling on, "and one, child, which we, the Margrave, your father, and myself, have no doubt will insure the life's happiness of our very dear daughter. It is a great satisfaction to feel that your education has been so carefully attended to that you are fit for the highest station."

"A reigning Princess!" said the girl, jumping to her feet.

She had only seen a reigning Princess once and that was a very snuffy, fat, ugly, old lady, the Margravine's maternal aunt—the late Queen of Poland. But somehow the word conjured up thoughts of gold crowns and marble palaces and a splendid court; and also a shifty, blurred and yet glorious vision of a handsome young Prince, with a crown on his head and a red velvet cloak lined with ermine, who held her hand and looked into her eyes.

"The reigning Duke of Lusatia," said the Margrave, pompously, "has done us the honor of suing for your hand." As he spoke, he produced from amid the papers on the table a miniature case of very fine gold and enamel.

"His Serene Highness, the Duke of Lausitz," said the Margravine, rolling the words in her plaintive voice as if she liked the sound of them, "is most greatly and most justly esteemed, not only by his own devoted subjects, but by all the potentates of the world. He is reported to be one of the richest sovereigns of the Empire. We can the better trust our beloved daughter into his keeping that he has passed the first giddiness of youth. The late Duchess of Lausitz, his lamented first spouse," went on the Margravine, fixing a somewhat hard eye upon her daughter, "was well known to be deservedly happy, and widely envied in her exalted position. I am sure my daughter's merits will be no less——"

"And she has left no children," interrupted the irrepressible Margrave, "otherwise, you understand, my child, the alliance would not be so magnificent as it is."

"Is that the portrait of the Duke of Lusatia?" said the Princess.

She felt somewhat bewildered. The vision of the young Prince in the crimson mantle was quite obliterated.

"A most noble countenance," said the Margravine, taking the miniature from her husband's hand.

"A confoundedly fine man," said the Margrave, who liked to speak bluff and after the soldier fashion.

The Princess held out her hands; they trembled a little. But when she had looked at the portrait she burst out laughing—one of her childlike, uncontrolled peals—and she looked and laughed and looked and laughed again, till the precious miniature shook in her hands and the tears rolled down her plump cheeks.

Was this the reigning Duke, her future husband? This funny, fat man, with his queer nose, with his seas of cheek, his solemn, vacant eyes? Certainly the artist had given him a fine pink and white complexion, had painted his eyes very blue and his pursed-up mouth very pink; and his powdered peruke had beautiful, nice, tight, round curls! Nevertheless——

Digitized by Google

"Why, he has three chins," said the little Princess, as soon as she could speak; and then she was off again. "Three chins! Ha, ha, ha! He, he, he!"

"Is our daughter daft?" said the Margrave, growing very red in the face. "Is this your fine bringing up, madam?"

"Oh, dear! Oh, dear!" sighed the Margravine, "this is most unseemly. Oh, my beloved Charlotte Ottilia Isabella, consider your mother's feelings and the frightful responsibilities of her position."

Then, seeing that they were really shocked at her, the Princess did her best to compose herself. She curtsied when her father told her that she was the most fortunate of maidens; she kissed her mother's hand and begged her pardon for her ill-timed levity. She never dreamed for an instant of disputing her parents' decision; and so the scowls that had gathered on the Margravial brows became speedily dispersed.

"The child is very nervous," said the Margravine, and bent and kissed her on the forehead. "She has inherited my temperament."

"Na, she is young," said the Margrave, "but marriage will soon sober her! You will have to leave this schoolgirl tittering behind you, Lotte." And he tapped her on the head with two hard, dry fingers. And so she was dismissed.

She laughed at intervals in little gusts all day at the thought of her regal suitor, and had a very merry hour narrating the event and describing the portrait to Toggenburg. But Toggenburg had been well drilled, and assured Her Highness that the fate before her was more brilliant than words could describe.

The next morning she awoke at peep of day. She had not allowed her curtains to be drawn the previous night, that she might see, she said, the dear trees the first thing upon opening her eyes. And so, like a bird, she was astir with the sun. Delighted, she sprang out of bed, pattered across the polished floor with little bare feet and opened the casement. Very beautiful her forest looked, yet strange, almost uncanny in this curious new light, with wreaths of mysterious vapor hanging about the dark pines, pierced here and there by long, level rays. There was a singular stir abroad, as if the great woods, too, were just aroused and stretching themselves. Pearly drops hung on the pine needles, birds called to each other, and flew hither and thither with dew-wet wings.

The Princess leant her elbows on the window-sill and gazed out as if on an enchanted world. She drew in the morning air with long breaths. Somehow, she did not know why, her heart felt strangely soft within her, and she thought again of the vision Prince she had seen in her fancy yesterday. It was a grave little face, propped upon two white hands, that looked out and saw the morning glory gather.

Presently the sound of footsteps beneath diverted her attention, and, looking down, she saw a smart young Jäger come swaggering around the corner. She knew the man; he was one of her father's attendants at the hunts here, but she had never noticed before what a dapper fellow he was, how young and well-strung was his sinewy form, nor how close and neatly the green livery fitted it. He glanced neither to the right nor to the left, but hurried to the violet bed under her window and, stooping, began to search for flowers.

The little Princess was quite excited; she forgot all about Princes, dream or otherwise. Leaning forward she gazed down at the thief.

"He has no business," she thought, "to gather the violets!" It was delightful to see somebody doing something against rules.

But presently the scene assumed a new interest, a palpitating interest to the watcher. A straight figure emerged from the forest borders and walked with unerring step to the very spot beneath her, where the industrious picker was still working away as if for dear life; it seemed the violets were getting scarce. By the erect carriage, the superbly held yellow head, the red petticoat and the white kerchief, the little Princess easily recognized her new housemaid. The very smile of the dawn seemed to be upon her rosy countenance. At the sound of her footsteps the man looked up.

"My Liserl," he said, and opened his arms. She flew into them and they held each other close embraced. As the little Princess looked on, her heart beat very strangely and her breath came thick and fast. She saw the man kiss the woman's cheek and then her lips. And then, with arms entwined and heads together, she watched them stroll away.

She drew back from the window and gave a sharp, gasping sigh, as if a strong sea wave had just broken over her.

"That is der Josef," she said to herself decidedly, and slipped back to bed. She shivered a little as she pulled the blue silk mountains over her.

After a while the sturdy forest woman crept in to light the fire, but seeing the Princess' bright eyes fixed upon her from the bed, she dipped and wished her heartily, "Good-morning."

"Good-morning," said the Princess. "Have you got your violets?"

The woman blushed again in the same curious way as yesterday, and up went her hand to the folds of her kerchief.

"Does he gather them for you every morning?" said the little Princess curiously.

The woman sidled toward the bed.

"See you now, Miss Princesschen," she said, "it is like this: when I and the Josef are together there is no need of the few flowers between us; but since Your Highnesses have come to the castle and Josef has to be about the Lord Margrave and has to sleep in the stables, and I am about my work in the chambers all day, it seems good that I should carry these little things about me over my heart. It keeps me warm-like and drives away the loneliness. And at night, you see, Fraulein Princess, I put them under my pillow and I dream that Josef is beside me."

"Oh, so!" said the little Princess, who did not understand at all. "And what is Josef, then, to you?"

"Ei! Gott!" cried the woman, opening her blue eyes wide in amazement—she thought every one in the world must know. "Josef is ja my man."

"Oh!" said the little Princess again. She had seen a few husbands and wives in her life, beginning with her father and mother, but they had not been of this description.

"You see," went on the woman, "when Josef gives me the flowers, I give him a kiss for every one; he says that keeps his heart warm till we meet next morning. Fraulein Princesschen does not think there is any harm over the few violets?" added she deprecatingly. "I always start half an hour earlier from home that I may have these minutes with Josef. It is our only meeting in the whole day!"

The little Princess was not heeding her; her mind was grappling with new and startling problems. She sat up in bed, her cheeks flaming.

"I saw you this morning," she said, "and how you went on. Things like that I never beheld in all my life before. What do you do it for?"

"Eh?" said the woman, her jaw dropping in amazement.

"What do you do it for?" repeated the little Princess sharply. "You know what I mean—the kissing, and the way you look when you speak of him, and the flowers and all the rest of it. What does it mean?"

"The Lord love you and preserve you for an innocent, Miss Princess," said the woman; "why, that we love each other."

"Love?" echoed the little Princess. She had heard about love, of course; children were supposed to love their parents and were told to love God and that God loved them, and she loved her little spaniel dog and she loved the woods. What a great many different kinds of love there seemed to be!

"Josef and I," said the peasant, the light coming back into her eyes and the smile and the blush to her face, "we loved each other always. Neighbors we were, Miss Highness, and playfellows and schoolmates; and two years agone we got wed, because we loved each other so dearly. Such marriages as ours, the Father Pastor said, are made in Heaven. And there is the sweetest childkin at home Your Highness ever saw. Does Your Highness like babies?"

"Your marriage was made in Heaven," repeated the little Princess dreamily. Then she suddenly burst out laughing. "My marriage is made by His Highness, my papa, and the Ministry," she said. "Only just think, I am to marry and be a reigning Princess! I have seen the picture of my husband; he has a face like the old ox—the father ox, you know, with the big pink face—only he has a nice curled white wig. Can you fancy," said the little Princess, shaking all over with laughter, "can you fancy the old ox in a white wig?"

"Ach! Herrje!" cried the woman and clapped her hands, "what is the child saying? God preserve us! You cannot be going to marry a gentleman with a face like an ox!"

"But I am," said Charlotte Ottilia Isabella, importantly nodding her head. "He is one of the richest Princes in the Empire—he is the Duke of Lausitz. He has already had one wife, and he is not very young, and I have never seen him. But my mother says I am extremely fortunate."

The peasant woman was nearly in tears. "Fraulein Princesschen, this is something dreadful! It cannot be possible. Why, how could you love a gentleman like that, were he twenty times the Emperor himself!"

"Oh, love!" said the little Princess again and stopped laughing. "You see I have not been told about that."

The wife of Josef stepped quite close up to the bed.

"Your Highness," she said solemnly, "I am only a poor peasant woman, but I have been taught my religion, and I

DRAWN BY HENRY HUTT

"IS OUR DAUGHTER DAFT?" SAID THE MARGRAVE

Digitized by Google

know it is God's law that a man must love a maid and a maid must love a man before all things if they wish to wed each other; otherwise it is a great sin."

"Oh!" said the little Princess, and fell back in her bed.

There was silence for a while, the peasant woman stood gazing with pitiful eyes at the childish face and the tossed curls on the pillow. Presently the Princess said faintly:

"You had better light my fire." And there was no more conversation that morning.

In the evening when the Princess was with her mother and the ladies of the Court after supper, she remarked casually that she would prefer not to espouse the Duke of Lusatia.

"Heavens! what is this?" cried the Margravine.

"That is, of course," said the little Princess, with her pretty curtsy, "subject to your and my father's pleasure."

"But why?" gasped the exalted mother, too genuinely surprised for the moment to find room for any other feeling.

"Oh, it is very simple," said Charlotte Ottilia Isabella candidly. "You see, I do not love him, and you know it is God's law that a man must love a maid and a maid must love a man above all things if they wish to wed each other; otherwise it is a great sin."

If the faded blue skies and the swollen cupids on the painted ceilings above them had suddenly launched forth fire and thunderbolts the poor Margravine could scarcely have been more perturbed.

"Heavens!" she ejaculated, "I never heard such wicked nonsense in my life. Fraulein von Toggenburg, with whom can the Princess have been speaking? To-morrow, child, the High Chancellor is expected, and your betrothal will be announced."

The little Princess was genuinely concerned and rather ashamed of herself. She went to bed in quite melancholy spirits. She did not wake till the entrance of Lise next morning; but she woke with a smile, for she had been looking forward to this moment. She had hoped, indeed, to have been at the window in time to view a repetition of the palpitating scene of yesterday.

"Have you met your Josef?" she asked, rubbing her eyes and blinking at the kneeling figure that had its back turned toward her. To her surprise the woman did not answer. The little Princess repeated her question and was alarmed to see the broad shoulders heave.

"Lise," she said, "what hast thou?"

Lise sprang to her feet and turned a besmeared and swollen visage toward her.

"Ach! Miss Princess," she cried, then flung her apron over her head and sobbed out loud.

"Mercy on us!" said the little Princess; she did not like to see people cry. "What is the matter?"

Down went the apron.

"Oh, I think my heart is broken. Oh, oh, oh!"

"Oh, dear!" said the little Princess. A broken heart sounded very serious.

"Josef was up home this morning before daybreak," the woman went on between convulsive sobs, "and he says—he says—His Highness is so pleased with his service that he has given orders that he is to accompany him back to the town as one of his private servants. Oh, what shall I do?"

"But, you silly woman," said the Princess, "that is very good news."

"Ah! Miss Princesschen, good news to be separated from my Josef for eleven months!" Then as if struck by a sudden flash of hope—"If Your Highness would speak, would intercede? There is the post of under-ranger, which has been vacant these six months. Josef is so knowing about the woods. A word from Your Highness——"

She came quite close to the bed and laid her work-worn, roughened hand upon the little Princess' belaced sleeve and looked into her chubby face with great, straining eyes.

"If I am going to be a reigning Highness," thought Charlotte Ottilia Isabella, "the least I can expect is to have my will done. Do not cry, but go home now; you are not fit for work," she said aloud and placed her delicate hand over the woman's. "I shall see that you get what you want."

Then the little Princess arose in a great hurry. She could hardly wait, indeed, to have her morning chocolate and accomplish her toilet; she was sadly indifferent to decorum, in spite of her excellent up-bringing. She sent, before her hair was powdered, to demand an audience of her father.

This unprecedented request threw the Margrave into a fine fuss. He had heard from the Margravine of the Princess' remarkable conduct of the night before and anticipated nothing less than set resistance to his cherished desires. He gave orders that his daughter should be admitted immediately—although he himself was yet in his nightcap and dressing-gown—and prepared to receive her with all the thunders of parental authority.

She tripped into the room, however, with the most cheerful countenance in the world, dropped him a magnificent curtsy, and said:

"The Duchess of Lusatia has a petition to make."

The Margrave was so relieved that he would have given her anything she asked on the spot. He pinched the little Princess' cheek and vowed she was a rogue; she clapped her hands, radiant with joy.

"WHAT DO YOU DO IT FOR?" REPEATED THE LITTLE PRINCESS SHARPLY

Back again in her room, laughing out loud to herself, she rushed to the window to share her happiness with her beloved forest. It was raining hard from a dull gray sky, and the raindrops went patter, patter, patter upon every side. The trees looked as if they liked it and the little Princess thought it had a pleasant sound.

"We have done a good stroke of business," she said, nodding at the pines; "you shall keep der Josef and your Liserl will not have to weep."

The pine tops swayed and nodded back at her.

"They are quite glad," thought Charlotte Ottilia Isabella.

Suddenly across the clearing between the forest and the castle she saw the figure of the new ranger pass like a flash.

"He has gone home," she thought, and was seized with an intense desire to be witness of his joyful meeting with his wife. She flung a lace shawl over her untidy head and without other preparation slipped out of the castle and into the rain, in her lace and beribboned morning frock and her little yellow satin slippers.

"They can't scold me now," she told herself, smiling, "that I am going to be a Queen."

Down the slippery path she went, still smiling, delighted with the falling rain and the wet smell of the leaves and the charming sense of mischief and freedom. Soon a white-washed cottage glimmered before her. She skipped across the wet moss and peeped in at the low window.

"Is this the place?" she wondered.

Sure enough, for that was Liserl's unmistakable yellow head, and there was Liserl sitting in a chair and at her feet knelt the dapper Josef. His arms were around her waist, her hands were on his shoulders; they were looking into each other's eyes. Farther off stood old white-capped Gretel, her wrinkled face all rapture, holding a chubby baby that waved its little hands and feet, and seemed to be crowing and dancing in unison with the general jubilee. In another second Liserl's head sank forward upon Josef's shoulder and the little Princess turned away.

"I don't think I will look at them any more," she said. She turned to make her way home, but her steps were very slow and her face was thoughtful. It had been a very little room she had looked into, but it had held a great joy.

"After all," said the Princess to herself, "it is something to be a reigning Princess; one can always do good!" Then all at once she began to run, stumbling over the rough ground. The mud sucked off one of her yellow slippers, but she would not stop to put it on again; she wanted to get back to her own room as quickly as ever she could, and she did not want any one to see her. For as she went the little Princess was crying.

* * * * * * *

The wood-ranger's wife found the yellow slipper in the mud and recognized it at once by its color and smallness. She lifted it tenderly, cleaned it with her apron and swore that she never would part with it. And thus it remained in the family and was a cherished heirloom long after its owner had ceased to laugh—or to weep.

* * * * * * *

It is no doubt (even now, as we write) throwing a gleam of faded color from under its glass case in a corner of a dark, low-ceiled room of the chief forester's house, near Tannenfels. It was there that we saw it on a certain day, some years ago, having taken refuge under its hospitable roof during a thunderstorm. We wondered at it, of course, and mused long over it. And finally, from the vaguely alluring mist of the past, we elucidated the only plausible account of its preservation, in all its rococo quaintness, deep among the woods, among the household gods of large-footed forest folk.

The further story of the little Princess who, having been sold in marriage for convenience of State, was so little like ever to know love herself, seemed to us one that ought to be followed up. We found, however, little about poor Charlotte Ottilia Isabella (alas, no longer Princesse Rit-Tonjours when she had become Duchess of Lusatia) beyond the fact that, of the wicked union of that laughing child-wife with the mature reigning Prince, there was but one offspring: Marie-Ottilie. From her mother the heiress of Lusatia took her grace and high spirits, and valiant, sunny heart; from her father, happily, nought but her life and her name.

Of Marie-Ottilie, the young Princess of Lusatia, on the other hand, fuller records were discovered, as a result of deep and sympathetic research. Among other things it was ascertained quite clearly, even at this great distance of time, that one of her innermost thoughts as she grew to womanhood was a firm resolve, God willing, never to be disposed of as her mother had been for State purposes; a determination, if on her path she found love, true and loyal, not to let it be brushed aside by royal parchment and rule of etiquette or hereditary prejudice. How she fared when the hour and the man had come (as they were bound to come) is already known to the readers of a certain romance of ours. And it may interest the latter to hear that in this unpretending tale of a yellow slipper lurked the idée mère of The Pride of Jennico, even as the little laughing Princess of Anshach was destined to give birth to the brave, witty and bright-souled Marie-Ottilie of Lausitz.

Digitized by Google

The Making of a Railroad Man
The Chances for Office Men

By Charles S. Lee

General Passenger Agent Lehigh Valley Railroad

MOST persons think that about the easiest job to secure is a railroad clerkship. If a man can't do anything else successfully in the world he turns to a railroad office. If a father or a guardian has a boy who has made a failure, even of a commercial college, he tries to fix the youth in a railroad department. But all these people are very far from right. One of the hardest places I know of to get a start in is a railroad office. I shall tell you about that in detail, later. A large number of railroad clerks are the sons or relatives of railroad men, and they usually seek the department toward which their bents of mind lead them. Some young men are mechanical in tastes, some have tendencies toward electrical work, some want to be bookkeepers, and others are active, restless, hustling, ambitious—ready to take a try at the biggest, liveliest kind of business in the world. There is a place for them all in the railroad office. It is so varied in its work and so broad in its field that it has room for almost every kind of a man imaginable except the average man who knocks at its door for a job.

There is no room in a railroad office, however, for a shirk, an incompetent, the man who works for money, or the man who counts his hours. Such a man may find foothold, and frequently does, but he seldom retains it. I know of few places where a man will find his level quicker than in a railroad office. Of late years the growth of the business has been so enormous that it has led to specialization among its employees. The field covers so much territory that one man cannot get over it all, as used to be the case; so he only takes a part of it.

Specialization exists as much among clerks as other classes of railroad men, such as brakemen, firemen and telegraphers. The mechanical man naturally gets work in the departments of the superintendent of motive power. Here he studies engines and their manufacture, cars and coaches, rails and switches. He figures on the "strength of materials" and studies to avoid the "perversity of inanimate things." He learns all about the hauling power of a certain quantity of coal and a given amount of steam over known grades with a specified weight in cars and contents. That involves a practical knowledge of mechanics.

When it comes to the adoption or rejection of new devices in machinery it is the trained clerk in the department who does the figuring for the chief of that branch. On our road we have had men begin in the shops as apprentices to fit themselves for these clerkships.

The Chances in the Various Departments

The man with a liking for electricity generally goes into the transportation department or the office of the superintendent of telegraphy. In one he has practical experience with the key and sounder, and in the other he deals with the higher branches of the science, construction and maintenance of lines, new methods of transmission of light, heat and power. In the office of the superintendent of the road the clerk attends to the details of the movement of trains, among other things. The present appliances for block signaling require sufficient study to make that branch of work a special training in itself.

In the general passenger agent's department there are several divisions. The rate department looks after the division of business between the road and its auxiliaries. The ticket department attends to the issuing, handling or charging up of the tickets. Then there is the advertising department, which places the advantages of travel over the line attractively before the public; and, besides this, there are the soliciting department, which is engineered from the main office but is conducted chiefly in the field, and the baggage department, which attends to the handling and tracing of baggage.

More clerks are employed in the accounting department than in any other division. Here the railroad bookkeeping is done. The comptroller has a large clerical staff to check up the accounts from all the other departments, and the treasurer has a corps of aids equally numerous, who receive, pay out and keep track of the money that comes in.

The freight department employs a great army of clerks, and is organized on the same general lines as the passenger and other departments. The station agent at small places is often the passenger, freight, operating and dispatching clerk combined in one man, jointly paid and severally controlled by these departments. Such a man is accountable to almost every officer of the road, but, naturally enough, when it is possible to concentrate so much responsibility in one man, the work is not hard and the duties are largely routine. In all the larger cities the departments have their own representatives working under the immediate supervision of the division heads. Take Buffalo, for example. I have a division passenger agent and a local passenger agent. There are division and local freight agents, a local dispatcher, train master, station master, and so on.

The Average Line of Pay and Promotion

So much for the specialization. Now let me say a word about the routine of office work, the grades of pay and the chances for promotion. All offices depend almost wholly upon their clerks. Of course the head of the department is responsible. Directly under the head of the department comes the assistant, or if there is no such officer, the chief clerk. All matters of office work pass through his hands before going to the head. He is the clearing-house association for the other office divisions. Take the passenger department for a general illustration. I have a chief clerk who is, under me, the head of my office. To him come the reports of the heads of the rate and ticket bureaus. The general advertising agent and the general baggage agent report direct to me. All other reports reach me through the chief clerk. I do not mean that I am only to be reached through the chief clerk. I refer to the routine office business, that necessary drudgery that makes up so large a part of every railroad man's life. The clerks are all graded, and each grade receives pay according to the value of its services.

The pay of clerks varies according to the road and the city that the clerk works in. Larger salaries are paid in New York, as a rule, than anywhere else, but there are a dozen applicants for each vacancy where there is one in any other town. The expenses of living are greater in the metropolis. Messenger boys get from fifteen dollars a month up to twenty-five dollars. Clerks get from forty to one hundred dollars a month. Chief clerks receive all the way from one hundred to two hundred and fifty dollars. I know of one chief clerk in New York who holds a unique position in railroad circles, and I have been told that he gets $10,000 a year, but he is the exception, and the only exception I know of. Station agents get from twenty-five to two hundred and fifty dollars. That is about the range throughout the country, New York included. Pay is about twenty per cent. higher in New York than in Philadelphia, and about twenty-five per cent. more than in interior towns. The hours of work are the same as in other lines of business.

Promotion for a railroad clerk depends more on the man than anything else. In most offices civil service rules obtain. In my own department I never go outside the office to fill a vacancy if I can help it. If I am forced to, I try the other offices of the road, and, if they cannot supply the man I want, I look around for one who has had railroad experience. Possibly his name may be on my waiting list. Perhaps he may be suggested to me by one of my men and he may be working elsewhere. In that case I write to his employer, telling him what I am willing to pay for his services and asking whether he objects to my offering the place to him. If he does not object, I make my offer. If this fails I sometimes advertise for a man. I did that not long ago and received a bushel of letters. Some were written on paper from the Holland House and Waldorf-Astoria. Two or three reputable clubs furnished applicants, but the man who got the job came from the Mills Hotel, where the living expenses are less than three dollars a week. If I fill a vacancy by promotion or create a new place, I recruit my office staff by hiring a new office boy and make promotions all along the line wherever it is practicable.

The Requisites for Success and Promotion

Many clerks never advance much above their original positions. They are the kind of men who work in railroad offices merely to draw their pay. They would work as readily in any commercial office. They have no love for their business, no ambition, and yet they wonder why new men are promoted over their heads, and lay it to prejudice, injustice and discrimination. I know some clerks who figure this way:

"I've got to be down at the office at nine. I go to lunch at twelve. I get back at one and leave at five. Between hours I can probably get out in the hall for half an hour to read the paper and smoke a cigarette."

And yet this is the very man who will sit down in the evening over a smoke and tell you how the railroad business ought to be run; give you some ideas of his own that ignorance on the part of the chief clerk or head of the department has prevented from being adopted, and will inform you seriously that he has been kept down by jealousy from drawing twice as much pay as he gets.

There are certain essentials that all clerks must possess if they wish to hold their jobs for any length of time. But many men overrate these necessary things. For instance, a clerk must be accurate in his figures, grammatical in his expressions, neat and plain in his handwriting and respectful to his superiors. He must obey orders and do the work that is set before him. These are as requisite as the wearing of clothes, but no more so. I know some men who have been clerks for twenty years. They have had all these essentials and have them still. Their manners are perfection, their obedience is beautiful, their handwriting copperplate and their neatness like unto a Holland housewife's; but they are clerks to-day even as they were when they began. Their trouble was that they stopped at the essentials, which are only the beginning of a man's career.

The clerk who advances is one who works for his office, his chief, his road, as well as for himself. He studies the work of the man directly in his own way of promotion. He not only does all that he is called on to do, but finds tasks that are outside the routine of his desk. He makes suggestions. He has ideas. He doesn't find ideas by dreaming, gossiping or talking with other clerks when he ought to be at his work, but by studying and by close observation. There is not a clerical place that I know of that does not offer an ambitious, studious, observant man an opportunity for impressing himself so strongly on the management that promotion must come to him. Sometimes it may be slow in his own office, but if he is alert and wide-awake, he can find his chance in some other office. There have been cases in railroads following strict civil service rules when capable men have been kept back for years until vacancies in higher positions have occurred. But these men could easily have found better pay on other roads had they cared to make the change.

Room for New Ideas in the Business

The interests of a railroad are so vast and varied that almost any practical suggestion finds a place in some department. A clerk in the cashier's office may have an idea for increasing speed on engines, a man in the motive power department may devise a new plan of soliciting passenger business, a man in my office may work out a plan for simplifying the keeping of freight accounts. There is room for all these ideas, and the man who makes them is the man who rises, and, if he does not neglect the essentials of his daily work while figuring out these problems, he cannot be kept down.

Most men imagine, if they give the matter any thought at all, that a railroad clerk is hired solely to take care of the line of work he is set to do. If that were the case there would be no such thing as promotion. A man would have to begin as general superintendent, general freight agent, and superintendent of motive power. But this is not the case. All of these higher places are filled by promotion. There is not a general officer of a railroad in this country who has not served some sort of an apprenticeship in the service.

Railroads are run, primarily, to make money. To make money the public must be served fairly and honestly and as generously as circumstances permit. Railroads cannot exist without business, and the two sources of business are passenger and freight traffic. This business must be solicited in a large measure. The clerk who plans successfully to aid this canvas may make himself an important factor in the management of the road. Let me give you an illustration of the kind of work that is useful in the passenger service. Not long ago the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company sent to its passenger and ticket agents throughout the country a circular concerning the proper reading of newspapers for business. In substance it was as follows:

"Watch the local columns of the newspapers. When you see items like these:

"'Mr. and Mrs. Smith, of San Francisco, are visiting the Jones' on Riverside Drive.'

"'Mr. Wilson, who has been very ill with pneumonia, is convalescent.'

"'The marriage of Mr. Miller and Miss Brown on the twenty-fifth promises to be one of the social events of the season.'

"I want you to clip these articles or to take note of them, and at the first opportunity call upon Mr. and Mrs. Smith and explain to them the merits of this line on the return trip to their home; they will in nearly every instance be glad of the information, and appreciate your courtesy and enterprise, with the result that business will be secured.

"Before calling upon Mr. Wilson you could ascertain, probably without much trouble, just what place and climate would be most suitable for his convalescence, as it would be folly to urge him to take a long-distance trip when he could not afford to go beyond one hundred miles. By studying customers in this way business is increased. Those who travel for pleasure or for health are generally glad to be advised and helped in this way, and it is wise policy to do so.

"In the case of the bride and groom—this is the one period in life, of all others, when cost is not counted, so that you may feel secure in suggesting all the luxuries as well as comforts obtainable if the wedding journey is made over the road.

"These points seem small in themselves, but if once tried you will be astonished at the results obtained."

Keeping the Next Step Up Well Cleared

This will give you an idea of the chance for advancement in a railroad office for a quick-witted, industrious man, who has ambitions and ideas that extend beyond the walls of his own particular office. The railroad business is essentially one in which ideas count, and practical suggestions turn quickly into money. My advice to clerks is to use their brains as well as their hands, study the road and its interests, avoid office politics, and be

Editor's Note—This series, of which this paper is the sixth, began in the Post of January 6. Other articles will follow in early numbers.

Digitized by Google

loyal to the head of the department. The chief trusts his employees. He has to do so. If he did not he could not do business. This confidence must be reciprocal if good results are to follow. The clerk who is sure to go up must do his own work as well as it can possibly be done and at the same time be prepared to do the work of the man who is a step higher up. He must get right down to "brass tacks." He must have a purpose in his work. He must not count hours. The day should be too short for him—not too long. Not long ago an applicant for a stenographer's place called on me. After he had told me his name and experience he said:

"What are the hours?"

"I guess I don't want you at all," was my answer.

Another thing to be remembered is the cultivation of tact, patience and affability. A clerk should treat every one courteously, from the president down to the office boy. He should also always be polite to visitors. No matter who the caller may be, or how foolish his inquiry, the clerk should answer it fully, satisfactorily and politely. Then again, let me advise all clerks not to imagine that they know it all. I began as an office boy in a railroad office in Cleveland twenty-nine years ago. I have served as clerk in passenger and freight departments, in the accounting and treasurer's offices, under the general officers and the superintendent, and I know whereof I write. Don't know it all. You can't do it. I learn things every day, and so does every other railroad official who studies his calling conscientiously.

As to habits. The same rules obtain as in all other lines of work. The man who cannot control himself can never control others. A drinking man, a gambler and a man who does not know how to take care of his money and is always in debt is as sure to fail as he is to live.

The Advantages of Experience and Education

This brings me up to the chances for entering a railroad office as a clerk. It is difficult, unless an applicant is recommended by some one the head of the department knows, or has some peculiar fitness for the work. The best advice I give is to be on hand when a vacancy occurs. Every officer in New York City is loaded up with applications for clerkships. Every office is overrun with applicants who call in person to present their claims for employment. And there are five hundred applications for every vacancy. A man of twenty-five or thereabouts with no experience in railroading might walk the streets of New York until he wore his boot soles through looking for a job and not find it. If, on the other hand, he has had experience in some other town and can bring acceptable references he might secure work without trouble. It all depends upon circumstances. Sometimes clerks are taken from brakemen, firemen, conductors and mechanics, if the men have sufficient education and adaptability. Of course the better education a man has the better off he is. A college man stands a better chance than a common-school graduate, everything else considered. The man who has been through a college of technical training such as Sheffield, Stevens, Troy or Pratt and understands mechanics has fitted himself for one kind of railroad work to begin with. A thorough knowledge of telegraphy, stenography or typewriting are useful and may aid a man in getting a place. The man who is neat in his appearance and gentlemanly in his address is more favorably received than the sloven or the boor. I have known clerks to ruin their future altogether by inattention to their dress and by impatience and gruffness in manner.

The Man that Can't Be Held Back

I cannot tell you precisely what kind of a man can find an opening, because that depends so largely upon circumstances over which the head of an office has no control, but I will tell you about one man who got his chance through me several years ago. It will serve as an illustration.

"I am twenty-two years old," he said. "I have been through college and I want to be a railroad man. I can work at almost anything. I am willing to work from morning until midnight until I have finished my task. I don't care what you pay me or what you set me to do. All I want is a chance, and if I can't do the work satisfactorily you can let me go. I am ready to begin to-day."

Now I did not have anything in my office, but I went into every department and I said to the heads: "Do you want an A No. 1 man, who is willing to do anything and do it well? If you do, I've got a man for you."

There was no vacancy then, but the next week that young man began work.

Du Maurier's Legacy to His Sons

IT WILL be remembered that the well-loved George du Maurier turned to writing toward the end of a life which had been busy with something else—drawing. It is curious to find that his sons have already begun to show something of this versatility. A short play in one act was lately produced in London "by Guy du Maurier and S. O. N. Frere." This is Captain du Maurier and, under the very thin disguise of the last name, son frère, his younger brother, Gerald. It is understood that this is only a beginning, and that the brothers intend to do more important dramatic work.

But this is in addition to the occupations they already pursue. The elder brother is in the British Army and Mr. Gerald du Maurier is one of the most promising of the younger school of London actors. He has a ready gift of humor, and in private life can give impersonations of the leading actors of the world which would compare favorably with those which Miss Cissie Loftus gives in public of its leading actresses. It is too early to know how much of the talent of the author of Trilby has descended to his sons, but even a very little might be enough to charm the public, which still finds magic in the name Du Maurier.

SOME one has said that when sailors cease to swear it is time for passengers to pray. In general, this may be so; yet there are happenings at sea, dangerous to the mind of the passenger, that do not in the least trouble the sailor. A shipwreck, a ride through surf in an open boat, a capsizal, wetting and scrambling half dead to a rocky beach is a terrible experience to a landsman, but Jack and his masters would make light of it. A famous novelist (and landsman) recently met with such an adventure, and wrote it up with all the power of his pen backed by the deep impression it had made on his sensitive mind. In the book On Many Seas, the sailor-author treats of the same experience, and his humorous handling of the subject, compared with the strained intensity of the other, is more than laughable, and is appreciated best by first reading the powerful word-painting of the landsman.

Jack has perils of his own. A boy was once warned against the calling by an aged sailorman, who, on being asked to define the greatest danger of the sea, solemnly closed a wrinkled eyelid and said, "The mate's brass-knuckles." He was a crippled, disfigured and broken-down "packet-rat," and spoke from the fullness of his rough experience in the packet-ships that foreran steam craft in the Atlantic passenger trade; the boy was the writer. Later in life, imbued with the ethics of the forecastle, he understood the viewpoint of the old packet sailor, understood how small and trivial the risking of his life may appear to the forehand when compared with the stinging rebuke and sarcasm of his shipmates, and the prompt and brutal punishment inflicted by the officers in case he shirks a dangerous duty; for it requires more courage for a sailor to refuse taking his life in his hands at the behest of a mate—often needless—than would carry him through the danger; and so, in time, he ceases to regard this danger as vital to his value or place in the world, consoling himself with the aphorism, "A man can die but once," and often supplementing it with a personal clause, "The sooner the better."

It is to the educated officer and passenger that danger presents itself in a defined and avoidable shape; and theirs is the only standpoint from which the subject may be approached.

The perils of the sea can be classed, broadly, under two headings: those arising from storm in its many aspects, and those due to obstructed vision—fog, darkness and snow. Fire, collisions with other craft, ice and derelicts, and strandings consequent on carelessness, might be considered as a third class, and dangers against which no vigilance or efficiency may prevail, such as tidal waves, waterspouts, spontaneous combustion, leakage of a rotten ship, and striking of uncharted sunken reefs could also be classed by themselves; but these, in their developed results, are so closely allied to the others that they may all be treated together.

Fighting Fire on the High Seas

Though not a common one, fire at sea is the most terrible of the happenings that can mar a voyage. A smell of smoke is noticed and a search for the cause begun. If not in the cabin or the forward-house, hatches are opened. Visible smoke arises, thicker as the air descends and fans the hidden and smouldering flame. Men, holding their breath, spring down and hunt for the fire—speculating wildly—until driven back. Hose is rigged and water poured tentatively over the cargo, to locate, if possible, by the thickening of the smoke, its situation. But the smoke is too black and too hot. Hatches are hastily closed and battened air-tight. Holes—as many as there are separate deck pumps—are cut in the deck over the presumed position of the fire, hose is inserted, well wrapped and the wrappings jammed into the holes to exclude the air, and the cargo is deluged; for no commander will hesitate to ruin a cargo to save his ship and her human freight. If the fire is conquered, and the vessel, with a charred and ill-smelling mess in her hold, reaches port, that ship is lucky. But the chances, with an inflammable cargo in a wooden hull, are against it.

Exploding lanterns in the hold or 'tween-decks, bursting of boilers in steam craft and scattering of the furnace coals, the carrying away of the galley stove lashings in a gale and the spontaneous combustion of damp cotton or oil-soaked, non-conducting, organic material in the cargo, are the usual causes—fortunately rare—of fire at sea.

A very common peril of the sea is collision. Errors in judgment or the absence of lights and signals on either side may bring your craft into smashing contact with another. If your ship is the aggressor, grapple your victim, and, if a steam craft, keep your engines going ahead at full speed, keep your bow in the gaping wound you have made until the last man has climbed over your rail—and if your own ship is the wounded one, climb yourself. Aside from the case of compartment steamers, there is little hope for the vessel that is rammed by another at full speed, though the bow of the assailant will often escape serious damage.

Or, instead of another craft, an iceberg may loom out of the fog to leeward, and you brace sharp on the wind only to find that the berg, impelled by a submarine current, is driving to windward faster than you can tack. Frantically you clap on sail and brace sharper. The white monster draws near; then there is a turmoil of choppy sea over your lee rail, a snapping of yardarms and gear above, a descent upon your deck of riven wood and tons of ice, a smashing and scraping as your ship is pounded along, then a hurried clearing away and manning of boats, and an almost hopeless struggle to windward—for what? Escape from the cold enemy and ultimate rescue, or death by starvation?

Uncharted rocks in mid-ocean occasionally come to light, and fortunate is the ship that finds them by sight instead of feeling. Captain L. Lloyd, of the English ship Compton, reports seeing early in May, 1896, a rock sixty feet long, eight or ten feet wide, awash at the ends and about eight feet high at the middle, unknown and unmarked on any chart ever issued. He says that he found this menace in latitude forty-seven degrees north and longitude thirty-seven degrees twenty minutes west, a position squarely on the Southern Lane Route of transatlantic travel, with the nearest land, one of the Azores group, fully five hundred miles to the southeast. If this report is true, and submarine navigation is to be perfected, how many Naronics may be found scattered around its base? Captain Lloyd claims that he saw it near by, at 7:40 o'clock in the morning of a clear day, under conditions which preclude all presumption of its being a derelict, and was so sure of its character that he did not lower a boat to examine it closer.

The Crazy Cruise of the Derelict

A danger to navigation that has of late years received specific attention from governments is the large number of water-logged hulks abandoned by their crews to drift aimlessly until broken up by a gale or destroyed by cruisers. The number—subtracted from and added to by each heavy gale—varies during winter months in the North Atlantic alone from twenty-five to forty-five. These dead ships, if lumber-laden, will float indefinitely. The derelict schooner Fannie E. Wolston, abandoned off Cape Hatteras in October, 1891, remained afloat nearly three years, and was reported forty-four times, making, in her wanderings, a zig-zag track around the Saragossa Sea of 8575 miles. She was last reported about five hundred miles due southeast of where she started. Next on the list in point of time afloat comes the schooner Wyer G. Sargent—a beautiful, yachtlike craft, that carried the writer among her crew on her first voyage—with a record of twenty-one months and a track of 5500 miles to her credit, and, after her, the schooner W. B. White, abandoned off Cape Hatteras in the blizzard of March 13, 1888, to wallow her way seaward, and, impelled by the middle of the three Gulf Stream divisions, lay her water-soaked bones upon one of the Hebrides ten months later. As a further instance of the tenacity with which derelicts may cling to existence may be quoted the case of the ship Fred B. Taylor, cut in two by the steamship Trave about eighty miles southeast of Nantucket, in June of 1892. The after end went north, grounding at Wells' Beach on the coast of Maine, seven weeks later; and the bow, caught by the southerly shore current, drifted south, and was last seen off the Delaware capes on September 6, two and a half months from the time of collision. How many more vulnerable craft these floating reefs sent to the bottom during their wanderings can only be conjectured.

The Playful Pranks of the Passing Squall

Of all the perils of the sea, none is so frequently met with in low latitudes as the atmospheric disturbance known as the squall—a combination of wind, rain, thunder and lightning, presenting, however, two or three of these aspects oftener than all four. Air-currents maintain their homogeneity and identity much as do the currents of the sea, which travel thousands of miles before becoming diffused and lost in surrounding water. An area of warm, moist air at the surface may be overlain and inclosed by colder, dryer, compressing air. There is contraction and consequent increase of heat until, from some cause, a break occurs in the walls at one side, and toward this break the hot, humid air rushes, expanding and cooling, condensing its moisture as it goes, condensing its electricity—positive or negative—on the smaller aggregate surface of enlarging raindrops, and discharging this rain and electricity, until we have all the familiar phenomena of the thunder storm or squall. An inclosed body of warm, dry air, subject to the above conditions, will possibly manifest itself as a white squall—an invisible fury that strikes without warning.

A schooner with sheets aft, struck by a squall, if not relieved by dismasting, may capsize, fill through open hatches or cabin windows, and sink before the pressure is raised. A becalmed ship, with no steerageway and yards square, or nearly so, receiving this sudden pressure on the forward side of her canvas ("struck-aback"), provided, of course, that the masts do not fall, may settle her stern, bury her cabin windows and doors, and founder helplessly before she can gather sternway or be boxed around. But this does not always happen. A squall may pass harmlessly overhead or a quarter of a mile to one side, and again may strike the ship with no more manifestation of force than could be aroused by a fan. No man may gauge the amount of wind in a coming squall.

Digitized by Google

The Wild Chase of the Whirling Terror

Consider that the inclosed area of warm, moist air finds no escape in a lateral direction and is pressed down by the heavier cold air until it breaks through above at one or more points of least resistance—punctures holes for itself to ascend. Toward these ascending columns the surrounding air rushes with a force varying with the distance from other columns, assumes a whirling motion—right or left—condenses as it rises—at the upper part first, then lower down—drags upward a spinning, cone-shaped turmoil of water from the sea that almost meets the inverted cone of condensed vapor above, and here we have the waterspout—a tornado born at sea, with a possible vacuum centre which, if large enough, may surround a small craft and explode her hull from the sudden expansion of air in the hold as easily as farmhouses and barns are demolished in the West. But this is theoretical, as waterspouts are unruly subjects for study, presenting little opportunity for inductive reasoning, and scientific data are rare. It is known, however, that the furious velocity of the whirling air-currents is sufficient of itself to tear the masts out of the strongest of ships; the American bark Reindeer, Captain Strandt, for instance, had all three masts cut off below the lower mastheads by a waterspout that struck her while running up the Gulf Stream in February of 1888. The hull was not injured, and the crippled vessel reached Bermuda.

But it is also known that a modern steamship need not fear an ordinary waterspout. More than one of them has been shattered to a harmless fall of rain by the twenty-foot nose of a liner.

Ever present in the mind of a ship captain is the peril of storm, with its concomitant heavy sea. And here it is well to say that it is not the wind that is dreaded; it is the waves. A ship will claw away from a lee shore in smooth water against any wind that will permit her to show a patch of slanting canvas. The heave of the sea is what annuls the law of physics and throws her on the rocks; and with sea-room to leeward it is the tossing, straining, pounding of the waves that forces oakum from seams, wrenches plank-ends from fastenings, and causes the leak that sinks her.

The Smell of a Blow in the Air

Certain indications of a gale speak to the ship captain. He notes a falling barometer. The peculiar sensation—a combination of low-pressure and humidity—which he calls the "smell of a blow," is upon him. Running at an angle with the wind is a long, rolling swell, and he knows that somewhere beyond the horizon is the revolving storm that sent it. The sky obscures, the wind increases—steadily or in puffs—and a change in the temperature, warmer or colder, helps to indicate the ship's position in regard to the storm centre; for in the track of an advancing cyclone the thermometer will fall, and behind it, it will rise. Sail is shortened, and by this time the wind has assumed a definite direction. The captain consults his chart and his storm-card—a transparent diagram with the vertical markings of a cyclone, the concentric circles—isobars—which show similar barometric readings, and a series of curves radiating from the centre—one for each point of the compass, on every part of which curve the wind is blowing from the same direction. Finding the ship's position on the chart, he selects the curve on the card marked with the direction of the wind at the ship, and placing the outer end of this curve—for he is probably on the outer circle of the storm—over the place of the ship, with meridians parallel, he marks through the centre of the card to the chart, and knows that about here is the "eye of the storm"—an area of "low barometer" ten to thirty miles across, where there is little or no wind, but which is marked by an agitated cross-sea caused by the different directions of the blast as the centre advances.

How a Master Out-Manœuvres a Storm Centre

It is this centre and surrounding wind that he must avoid. He knows its direction, but not the actual distance; though his barometer readings compared with those of the storm-card isobars may give him an idea. He knows that all circular storms larger in area than the short-lived tornado or waterspout revolve, in the Northern Hemisphere, in a direction contrary to that of the hand of a watch—face upward; and that in the Southern Hemisphere the whirl is reversed. And he knows that the track of a storm centre is invariable. North of the Line, with sea room, he will bring his ship to the wind on the starboard tack under short sail, unless, as may be, the increasing gale is fair, or nearly so; then he scuds, while he may, with a greased hawser towing astern, or oil bags over the side, keeping the wind on the starboard bow or quarter; for, hove-to or scudding, the wind on the starboard bow or quarter will tend to drift or blow the ship away from the centre, provided, of course, that she is not in a position to be overtaken by the advancing storm, which travels bodily from twelve to thirty miles an hour. In this case he must use his best judgment—scudding across the centre when he would have preferred heaving-to, or heaving-to when he could have shortened his passage by scudding.

Take me out, sink me deep in the green profound,
To sway with the long weed, swing with the drowned,
Where the change of the soft tide makes no sound,
Far below the keels of the outward bound.

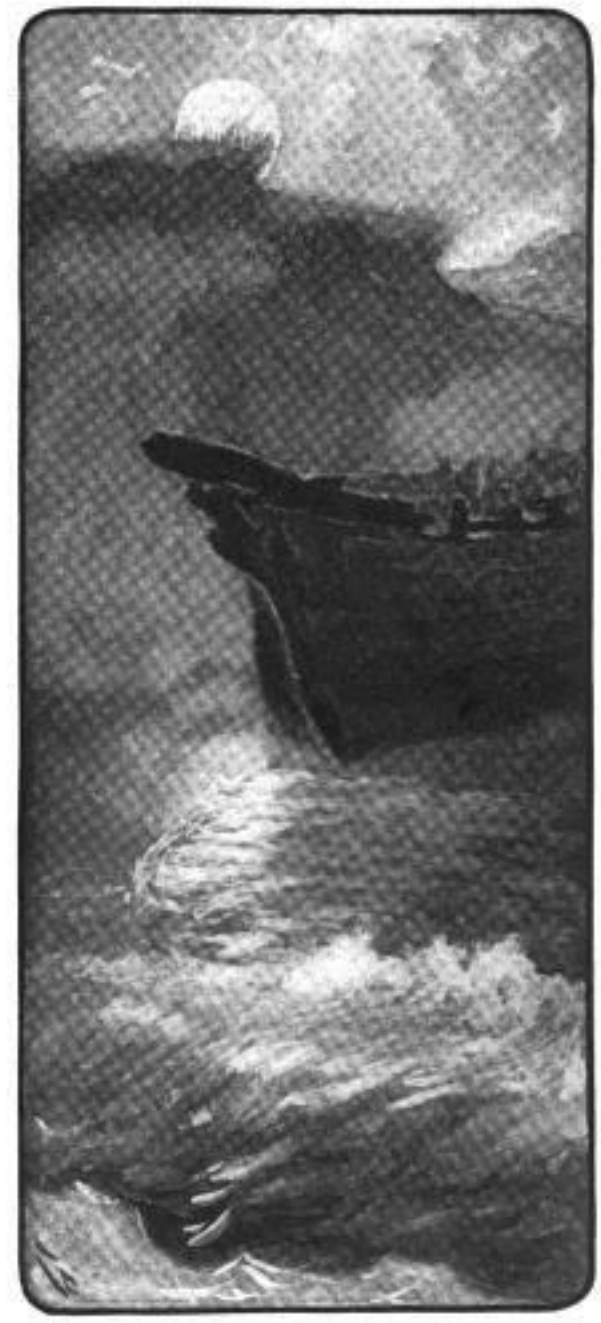
The Stranded Ship

By Charles G. D. Roberts

Far up the lonely strand the storm had lifted her,
And now along her keel the merry tides make stir
No more; the running waves that sparkled at her prow
Seethe to the chains and sing no more with laughter now.
No more the clean sea-furrow follows her; no more
To the hum of her gallant tackle the hale Nor'westers roar.
No more her bulwarks journey; for the only boon they crave
Is the guerdon of all good ships and true, the boon of a deep-sea grave.

Take me out, sink me deep in the green profound,
To sway with the long weed, swing with the drowned,
Where the change of the soft tide makes no sound,
Far below the keels of the outward bound.

No more she mounts the circles from Fundy to the Horn,
From Cuba to the Cape runs down the tropic morn,
Explores the vast Uncharted where great bergs ride in ranks,
Nor shouts a broad "Ahoy" to the dories on the Banks.
No more she races freights to Zanzibar and back,
Nor creeps where the fog lies blind along the liners' track.
No more she dares the cyclone's disastrous core of calm,
To greet across the drooping wave the amber isles of palm.

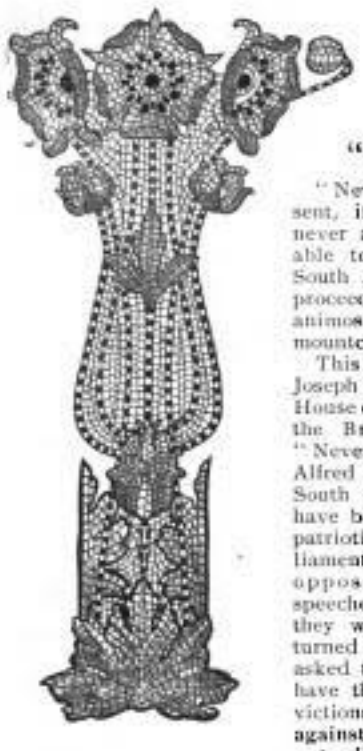


Take me out, sink me deep in the green profound,
To sway with the long weed, swing with the drowned,
Where the change of the soft tide makes no sound,
Far below the keels of the outward bound.

Amid her trafficking peers, the wind-wise, journeyed ships,
At the black wharves no more nor at the weedy slips
She comes to port with cargo from many a storied clime.
No more to the rough-throat chantey her windlass creaks in time,
No more she loads for London with spices from Ceylon—
With white spruce deals and wheat and apples from St. John;
No more from Pernambuco with coffee-bales—no more
With hides from Buenos Ayres she clears for Baltimore.

Take me out, sink me deep in the green profound,
To sway with the long weed, swing with the drowned,
Where the change of the soft tide makes no sound,
Far below the keels of the outward bound.

Wan with the slow vicissitudes of rain and wind and sun,
How grieves her deck for the shipmen whose hearty brawls are done.
Only the wandering gull brings word of the open wave,
With shrill scream at her taffrail deriding her alien grave.
Around the keel that raced the dolphin and the shark
Only the sand-wren twitters from barren dawn till dark;
And all the long, blank noon the blank sand chafes and mars
The prow once swift to follow the lure of the dancing stars.



And when the winds are low, and when the tides are still,
And the round moon rises inland, over the naked hill,
And o'er her parching seams the dry cloud-shadows pass,
And dry along the land-rim lie the shadows of thin grass,
Then aches her soul with longing to launch and sink away
Where the fine silts lift and settle, the sea-things drift and stray,
To make the port of Last Desire and slumber with her peers
In the tide-wash rocking softly through the unnumbered years.

Take me out, sink me deep in the green profound,
To sway with the long weed, swing with the drowned,
Where the change of the soft tide makes no sound,
Far below the keels of the outward bound.

Digitized by Google

'PUBLICK OCCURRENCES' That are Making HISTORY

"Never Again"

"Never again with our consent, if we have the power, never again shall the Boer be able to erect in the heart of South Africa a citadel whence proceeds disaffection and race animosity to endanger the paramountcy of Great Britain."

This was the challenge which Joseph Chamberlain flung to the House of Parliament just before the British victories began. "Never again," repeated Sir Alfred Milner, the Governor of South Africa, and the words have become a text for British patriotism. In that critical parliamentary struggle when the opposition had made their speeches—very mild speeches they were!—Mr. Chamberlain turned upon them again and asked them why they did not have the courage of their convictions; why they did not vote against the war? And when the vote did come up it was overwhelmingly in support of the national policy. All this illuminates the situation. Great Britain is to-day as determined to crush the South African Republic as the United States was to defeat Spain two years ago, and Great Britain is three hundred times more powerful in men and wealth than the Boers.

In the debate Mr. Chamberlain admitted that he really meant to accept President Kruger's offers about the franchise, and that he thought he had done so, whereupon Sir Edwin Clarke, one of the greatest of Englishmen, said crushingly: "You intended to accept and avert war, yet you did not draw up your note so as to make your meaning clear; and when you found that the Boers did not understand you to accept, you did not lift a finger or telegraph a word to clear up the matter." To this Mr. Chamberlain made no reply.

In another debate Mr. Asquith, who is also one of the ablest of English statesmen, remarked, in view of Chamberlain's admissions, that he would doubtless re-edit his dispatches if it were all to be gone over again.

"I would not alter a single word," said Mr. Chamberlain.

It is the purpose of Great Britain to win in South Africa at any cost. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent; more than twenty thousand men have been incapacitated by death or wounds or illness, but there is a greater determination than ever to spread English authority over all of South Africa. It is a fight for supremacy.

The Leadership of Great Britain in Africa

In spite of the disappointments in battle and the splendid valor of the Boers, Great Britain has already gone ahead with the program. The Orange Free State, with its 48,500 square miles of territory and its population of 286,000 and its trade of nearly $15,000,000 a year, has been proclaimed a British possession. The South African Republic, if conquered by Great Britain, will add an area of 120,000 square miles and a population of nearly a million and a half, an annual trade of almost $200,000,000 and mines whose wealth no one can estimate. Already in Africa Great Britain controls an area of 2,761,000 square miles, with a population of nearly 36,000,000, and a trade of almost $300,000,000, and the new additions will give Great Britain almost a third of the entire area of the dark continent—the most of it that is worth having.

The Key to South Africa

It takes no great prescience to see that in the course of time Great Britain will also acquire Delagoa Bay. There was a time when she might have bought it for fifty or sixty thousand dollars, and just now she would probably be glad to pay as many millions, if Portugal would or could sell it to her. This bay is one of the keys to South Africa, and by reason of its being in the hands of another nation and the fact that railroads run direct from it to Pretoria constitute the greatest possible factor in the strength of the Boers. It is by long odds the finest harbor in South Africa, and the navies of the world might find anchorage within it.

It is through this port that the Transvaal now has communication with the world, and the railroads are enjoying a great prosperity. The administration of the port by the Portuguese is described as being about as bad as anything could possibly be, and as Portugal does not seem long for this world as an independent nation, Great Britain will undoubtedly watch every opportunity to possess the bay.

A Greater Problem in Asia

Ever since General Sherman said that war was hell the expression has been quoted in every country and in every language. Even at best the horrors of it are appalling. For every hero it creates it digs a thousand graves. But war is something else than mere destruction. It is the rearrangement of boundaries, of politics, of civilization itself. It is in the end, however frightful, a business transaction.

The conflict in South Africa has been peculiarly destructive of reputations and preconceived ideas. It has broken some of the best of English commanders, and it has made certain the very thing brought about by our war with Spain—the complete reorganization of the army. But the army is the machine and the men who work it; the larger problems lie far beyond it, even though this machine be that of hundreds of thousands of men costing millions of dollars. That is what the leaders of the British Empire look to. It is not the loss of a few thousand lives in battle, or whether or not the given causes of inevitable conflict were excusable, but that, in the work done, the supremacy of the British Empire shall be not only maintained but increased.

Thus, next to South Africa, is that infinitely larger and more portentous situation on the borders of Afghanistan, for the power of Russia and the future of Great Britain in Asia come within hailing distance over the boundaries of an Ameer who holds his place because he has on each side of him two hungry giants, neither of whom would hesitate to eat him up if he did not fear the big fellow on the other side of the lot. Unquestionably Russia has taken advantage of the South African difficulties to push her lines farther and farther toward India, and thus comes the plea from the Ameer that Great Britain should do something to protect him from the Bear; but at the same time he informed the British Government that he wanted no railroads or telegraph lines built across his dominion, a mountain region of 279,000 square miles, with a population of 4,000,000, greater, in fact, than the territory in South Africa for which Great Britain is now fighting. He wants cash, but not civilization.

A Calamity that is Worse than War

And on the other side of Afghanistan down toward the Indian Ocean there are troubles of the most pathetic kind which the British Government is compelled to meet. Fancy a country not quite one-half as large as the United States, containing four times its population; that is, for every person we have in the United States, according to the same area, there are eight in India. Hundreds of thousands of these work all day for less than five cents each, and, in addition to being the poorest-paid people in the world, they are inordinately taxed. The margin between enough to eat and starvation itself in such a vast population must always be small. Twenty-odd years ago there was a famine, and the official mortality report of the British Commissioners had the incredible total of seven millions. Only three years ago there was another famine, and its horrors were spread before the world.

So close is that margin that the failure of a few rains means suffering and death to millions. Last fall the usual southwest monsoons did not come—did not bring the moisture from the Indian Ocean and the Arabian Sea—and now in thousands of square miles, which fructify when there is dampness, there is not a single stalk of corn or anything to feed those dependent upon the soil. Thus has come another famine, and the number of the starving is placed all the way from ten to forty millions. More than five millions are receiving relief.

The American consul at Bombay thus writes to Washington: "The famine district embraces the greater part of Bombay Presidency, most of the Nyzam's dominions of Haidarabad, the western half of the Central Provinces, the western states of central India, the entire part of Rajputana, the southeast Punjab, and a large portion of the native states of Cutch and Gujarat. The true famine area in British India and the native states will thus be about 300,000 square miles, with a population of 40,000,000. There is a further area of about 145,000 square miles, with a population of 21,000,000, in which more or less scarcity and distress prevail, where relief is already being given in a tentative form, or will probably have to be given before the advent of the next monsoon."

The Work the Young Men are Doing

In the larger practical work of the contest for supremacy Great Britain is using its younger men, and they seem to be the ones who are making the fewest mistakes. The older officials with their long lists of titles and their long years of comfort have been blundering along at a great rate, but the youngsters as a rule have been clear of head and prompt in action. George Wyndham, who is doing most of the hard work in the House of Commons, is not yet thirty-seven. Lord Curzon has only turned forty, and he is helped in his vast work of governing India by an American wife; and Sir Alfred Milner, the Governor of Cape Colony and High Commissioner of South Africa, is still a young man, who left journalism to become one of the strongest and most important figures in British politics. There are others of the same kind who could be named, and it is worth while to remember that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, whom we always look upon as a young man, has a son of thirty-seven who is also coming to the front in the political life of his country. And if Lord Salisbury, whose retirement has been so frequently reported, should really retire, the Premier would undoubtedly be his nephew, Arthur James Balfour, who, at fifty-two, has kept himself young by regular exercise and open-air life.

COPYRIGHT BY ELLIOTT & FRY, LONDON

SIR ALFRED MILNER

MR. BALFOUR, M. P.

COPYRIGHT BY ELLIOTT & FRY, LONDON

LORD CURZON

COPYRIGHT BY ELLIOTT & FRY, LONDON

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

Professor Worcester's Magic

Professor Dean C. Worcester, of the Philippine commission, tells of a curious wager he once made with a Filipino. When Mr. Worcester, as a student, was with the Steere expedition, a native leading a band of not over-friendly Filipinos approached the hut where he slept and began to shout. When the American awoke, the natives made known that their leader was a man whom nothing could kill, and promptly challenged the American to try his new-fashioned weapons if he thought there was any virtue in them.

Mr. Worcester found that the Filipino's confidence lay in the supposed efficacy of a magic piece of paper carried by the leader. This paper had power to ward off all dangers. The leader dared the American to shoot, and waved his spear in a manner that made the consequences of a refusal seem dubious.

Mr. Worcester stopped to argue. The Filipinos at once jumped at the conclusion that the American was afraid his weapons would prove powerless against so great a charm. Then the man demanded that if Mr. Worcester was unwilling to shoot he should surrender his rifle. The American objected, and, as a compromise measure, offered to fire at the magic paper if the Filipino would place it against a tree. If he made a bullet hole in the paper the charm was to go to him. If not the Filipino was to have the rifle.

The target was duly arranged. Mr. Worcester fired at point blank range. The paper was knocked from its place and the Filipinos set up a shout of victory. They imagined the charm had jumped to avoid the bullet. But examination showed it punctured and the natives admitted their defeat.

Japan's Progressive Empress To Be

The Princess Sada, who is to marry the heir to the Japanese throne, matriculated at the Peeresses School at Tokyo and while there was the favorite pupil of one of the American teachers. She had a passion for the study of the heraldry of her own land and extended this to that of her teacher's native country. It was her delight to read and talk of Colonial times, and even more to look at old prints which pictured the men, women and fashions of the American Colonies at that period. She had many tastes in common with her teacher, but upon one point they disagreed. It was the wearing of the native Japanese kimono. The Princess would persist in donning stays, skirts, shirt-waists and all the adjuncts of the Western toilet.

One day the American said to her:

"Your Highness, why do you not wear your beautiful kimono to-day? It is so much more picturesque than that tailor-made gown."

Sada laughed and, passing a book of old Colonial prints to her, replied, "Why don't you wear clothes like those your ancestresses wore?"

The Honorable "Joe" Manley's Convert

Probably the best-known man in the State of Maine is Joseph H. Manley, the Republican leader of that commonwealth. No Southern enthusiast respecting State rights has a more intense love for his native State than has Mr. Manley for his. He was born in Bangor, and during the fifty-eight years which have elapsed since that event he has kept in touch with everything pertaining to the welfare of Maine.

A lawyer by profession, he has shown himself to be a capable publisher and editor, an efficient postmaster and a successful business man. His manners are easy and pleasant, sometimes a little blunt, but the very bluntness is admired more in Maine than any other quality.

Some years ago Mr. Manley ran for the Legislature. Among his neighbors was an old line Bourbon Democrat, who, according to Dame Rumor, voted religiously every Presidential year for Andrew Jackson. To the surprise of the city of Augusta this voter cast his ballot, for the first time, for a Republican, Mr. Manley. He was reproached by his party friends and replied, "Yes, I'm a Democrat; always was and always will be. I chipped in to your campaign fund and I helped you on the rest of your ticket and you've never done nothin' for me. Now when it comes to going against Joe Manley, who got us a State house, a post-office, a reservoir and a gilt-edged jail, and who if he is elected is liable to get us anything, and who doesn't mind calling me hard names when I deserve them, I'm for Joe, Democrat or no Democrat."

Mr. Manley tells this story of a flying trip to Europe: One day a college professor of great learning was seen leaning over the gunwale miserably seasick. He was so sick that he was talking aloud to himself and bemoaning the fate which had intrusted him to the tender mercies of the Atlantic.

A bystander remarked, "The learned member from Boston is having a quiet debate with the ocean."

"Yes," answered Mr. Manley quickly, "it is a case of deep calling unto deep."

Where Ignorance is Bliss

John D. Rockefeller, the Standard Oil magnate, usually travels between Cleveland, his former home, and New York in a private car. On a recent trip from the former city one of Mr. Rockefeller's party found in the sleeping car two men from Cleveland whom he knew very well. After a few minutes' chat he invited them into the private car to meet Mr. Rockefeller. They found the oil man deeply interested in a game played with colored cards which he was piling up into stacks according to their color. He explained the pastime to the young men and then went on with the game.

"Did you ever play it?" asked Mr. Rockefeller.

"A great many times. But never with colored cards. It is generally played with playing cards and is called solitaire."

"Solitaire?" repeated the oil man. "I never played with playing cards in my life. You must be mistaken."

As the visitors left the car they saw the multi-millionaire deep in his game in spite of the warning.

Miss Loew's "Free Law Hospital"

When Miss Rosalie Loew, LL.B., was made attorney for the Legal Aid Society of New York, some of the directors shook their heads; but her linguistic abilities have naturally enough helped her, and so have her wit and sympathy. She inherits her legal cleverness from her father, Judge William Loew. Miss Loew's office looks like a miniature lecture-room, and almost any forenoon one may find ten or twelve benches filled with poor men, women and children who have come to what she calls her "free law hospital."

"I have my 'matrimonial patch-up department,'" she said, "and I am more proud of it than perhaps anything else. Then I have a 'bad lawyer' department where I corner and prosecute all dishonest practitioners, and a 'bad debt' division and hosts of others. One of my cases, which I call 'the appreciative family,' shows how legal aid is valued by those who need it and get it free of cost. A pretty little woman came to me one day and said her husband had run away to Europe and left her penniless and ill, with two children by a former husband and one by her present one to support. I consulted with the Hebrew Charities Organization and we decided not to send her to Europe. I advanced money and helped her to open a little candy store and got friends to guarantee other salable stock. I did not hear from her for some time except when she returned the money. One day she came to me and asked me to get her children out of an orphan asylum, which I did and found them good situations. Then I thought she would never return, but she called a while afterward and said that she had sold out the candy store and loaned the money to the son of the truant husband, who had run away with it to Boston and gone into business there. I straightened this matter out for her and succeeded in getting her money back. Nevertheless, she wrote to me a few weeks after the transaction that she had decided to forgive the son and would thereafter reside with him in Boston. Then I put her way back in my memory. But she would not stay there. She walked in, in tears, one day and told me that I must help her; the Boston scheme had failed, and her dear husband had been unsuccessful in Europe and had returned to live with her, and I must make them happy and get him work. And I did," she said.

Madame Bauermeister's Repertoire

Among the heroes and heroines unknown to fame, there is none to compare with a dark-eyed little woman who, while grand opera goes gloriously on in the glare of the footlights below, sits quietly in her dressing-room at work upon delicate embroidery. She is Madame Bauermeister—"Little Bauermeister"—to whom Impresario Grau turns with calm confidence, no matter what the contretemps. Is Susan Strong, or Madame Barna, or Suzanne Adams ill? Little Bauermeister lays down her embroidery, dons the needful gown and sings the part correctly, sweetly, artistically. Soprano, mezzo soprano and alto numbers are all one to her. A mezzo soprano of unusual compass herself, she finds the whole range of the female voice facile to her powers.

Living with her parents in London, she studied at the Royal Academy and secured an opening at Her Majesty's Theatre in The Magic Flute—as one of the genii. The curtain was trembling for its rise when the discovery was made that there was no Queen of Night.

"Does any one know it?" cried the frantic manager.

Forth stepped the small genius.

"I do, sir; if you care to try me."

She sang the part of the Queen perfectly. But there was another tumult. Papagina was missing.

"Now we'll have to close the house," wailed the manager.

"Oh, no, sir," observed the youthful Queen. "I know Papagina."

M. Grau knows that she knows everything; for within a single week she has been on Monday, a gypsy; on Tuesday, a French actress; on Wednesday, a lady of honor; on Thursday, Martha, in Faust; on Friday, a Scotch countess; on Saturday afternoon, a page; and on Saturday night, housekeeper to Rigoletto.

PHOTO BY MARSHALL, ANN ARBOR, MICH. — D. C. WORCESTER

ROSALIE LOEW — PHOTO BY GEBFORD & VAN BRUNT, NEW YORK

J. H. MANLEY — PHOTO BY BOND, AUGUSTA, ME.

Digitized by Google

The Hermit of the Yews

By E. Nesbit

MAURICE BRENT knew a great deal about the Greek anthology and very little about women. No one but himself had any idea how much he knew of the one and no one had less idea than himself how little he knew of the other. So that when, a stranger and a pilgrim hopelessly astray amid a smart house-party, he began to fall in love with Camilla, it seemed to be no one's business to tell him, what everybody else knew, that Camilla had contracted the habit of becoming engaged at least once a year. The habit of years is not easily broken; Camilla became engaged to Maurice, and for the six months of the engagement he lived in Paradise.

About Easter time Camilla told him, very nicely and kindly, that she had mistaken her own heart. She hoped he would not let it make him very unhappy. She would always wish him the best of good fortune, and doubtless he would find it in the affection of some other girl much nicer and more worthy of him than his sincere friend, Camilla. Camilla was right—no one could have been less worthy of him than she; but, after all, it was Camilla he thought that he loved.

He took it very quietly, sent her a note so cold and unconcerned that Camilla was quite upset, and cried most of the evening, and got up next day with swollen eyelids and a very bad temper. She was not so sure of her power as she had been—and the loss of such a certainty is never pleasant.

He, meanwhile, advertised for a furnished house, and found one—by letter—which seemed to be the very thing he wanted: "Handsomely and conveniently furnished, seven miles from a railway station—a well-built house, standing in its own grounds of five acres—garden, orchard, pasture, magnificent view." Being as unversed in the ways of house agents as in those of women, he took it on trust, paid a quarter's rent, and went down to take possession.

It was on an inclement June evening that the station fly set him down in front of his new house. The drive had been long and dreary, and seemed to Maurice more like seventy miles than seven. Now he let down the carriage window and thrust his head into the rain to see his new house. It was a stucco villa, with iron railings, in the worst possible taste. It had an air at once new and worn out; no one seemed ever to have lived in it, and yet everything about it was broken and shabby. The door stuck a little at first with the damp, and when at last it opened and Maurice went over his house he found it furnished mainly with oil-cloth and three-legged tables and engravings in frames of bird's-eye maple—like a seashore lodging-house. The house was clean, however, and the charwoman was clean. But the atmosphere of the place was that of a vault. He looked out through the streaming panes at the magnificent view so dwelt upon in the house agent's letters. The house stood almost at the edge of a disused chalk-quarry; far below stretched a flat plain, dotted here and there with limekilns and smoky, tall chimneys.

DRAWN BY JNO. CASSEL

THEN HE REMEMBERED THAT FAINTING PEOPLE SHOULD BE LAID FLAT

When the woman had gone he sat long by the fire. His dreams were, naturally, of Camilla. His thoughts were of his work.

"I've taken the house for three years," said he. "Well, one place is as good as another to be wretched in. But one room I must furnish, for you can't work on oil-cloth."

So next day he walked to Rochester and bought some old bureaus and chairs and bookcases, a few Persian rugs, and some brass things, unpacked his books and settled down to the hermit's life to which he had vowed himself. The woman came every morning from her cottage, a mile away, and left at noon. He got his meals himself—always chops or steaks or eggs—and presently began to grow accustomed to the place. When the sun shone it was not so bad. He could make no headway against the thorns and thistles on his five acres, and they quickly grew into a very wilderness. And he worked away at his book about Greek poetry.

He almost believed himself contented; he had never cared for people so much as for books, and now he saw no people, and his books began to crowd his shelves. No one passed by the Yews—so called, he imagined, in extravagant compliment to the decaying cypress—for it stood by a grass-grown byway that had once connected two main roads, each a couple of miles distant. These were now joined by a better road, down in the valley, and no one came past Maurice's window save the butcher and the postman.

Summer turned brown and dry, and became autumn; autumn turned wet and chilly, and grew into winter, and all the winds of Heaven blew cold and damp through the cracks of the ill-built house. Maurice was glad when the spring came. He had taken the house for three years, and he was a careful man, and also, in his way, a determined, yet it was good to look out once more on something green, and to see sunshine and a warm sky. It was near Easter now. In all these ten months nothing whatever had happened to him.

It was on the Saturday before Easter that the quarry-side fell in. Maurice was working in his study when he heard a sudden crack, and then a long, loud, rumbling noise, like thunder, that echoed and reechoed from the hills on each side. And, looking from his window, he saw the cloud of white dust rise high above the edge of the quarry, and seem to drift off to join the cotton-wool clouds in the blue sky.

"I suppose it's all safe enough here," he said, and went back to his manuscripts. But he could not work. At last something had happened; he found himself shaken and excited. He laid down the pen.

"I wonder if any one was hurt," he said; "the road runs just below, of course; I wonder whether there'll be any more of it; I wonder——"

A wire jerked, the cracked bell sounded harshly through the silence of the house. He sprang to his feet.

"Who on earth!" he said. "The house isn't safe, after all, perhaps, and they've come to tell me." As he went along the worn oil-cloth of the hall he saw through the comfortless glass of his front door the outline of a sailor hat.

He opened the door—it stuck, as usual, but he got it open There stood a girl, holding a bicycle.

"Oh," she said, without looking at him, "I'm so sorry to trouble you; my bicycle's run down, and I'm afraid it's a puncture, and could you let me have some water to find the hole—and if I might sit down a minute?"

Her voice grew lower and lower.

He opened the door wide and put out his hand for the bicycle. She took two steps past him, rather unsteadily, and sat down on the stairs; there were no chairs; the furniture of the hall was all oil-cloth and hat pegs.

He saw now that she was very pale. Her face looked greenish behind the white meshes of her veil. He propped the machine against the door, as she leaned her head back against the ugly marbled paper of the staircase wall.

"I'm afraid you're ill," he said gently. But the girl made no answer. Her head slipped along the varnished wall and rested on the stair two steps above where she sat. Her hat was crookedly twisted. Even a student of Greek could see that she had fainted.

He got her hat and veil off—he never knew how, and he wondered afterward at his own cleverness, for there were many pins, long and short. He fetched the cushion from his armchair and put it under her head; he took off her gloves and rubbed her hands and her forehead with vinegar, but her complexion remained green, and she lay all in a heap at the foot of his staircase. Then he remembered that fainting people should be laid flat, so he very gently and gingerly picked the girl up in his arms and carried her into his sitting-room. Here he laid her on the floor—he had no sofa—and sat beside her on the floor, patiently fanning her with a copy of the Athenæum, and watched the pinched, pallid face for some sign of returning life. It came at last, in a flutter of the eyelids—a long-drawn, gasping breath. The Greek scholar rushed for whiskey, lifted her head and held the glass to her lips. The blood had come back to her face in a rush of carnation. She drank—choked—drank. He laid her head down and her eyes opened. They were large, clear gray eyes—and they and the clear red tint in cheeks and lips transformed the face.

"Good gracious!" thought he, "she's pretty. Pretty? She's beautiful!"

"You're better now," said he with feverish banality. "Give me your hands—so. Now you can—yes, that's right—here—this chair is the only comfortable one."

After a few moments she stretched her arms like a sleepy child, yawned, and then suddenly broke into laughter. It had a strange sound. No one had laughed in that house since the wet night when Mr. Brent took possession of it, and he had never been able to bring himself to believe that any one had ever laughed there before.

"Did I faint?" she asked with interest. "I never fainted before. But—oh, yes—I remember. It was rather horrible. The quarry tumbled down almost on me, and I just stopped short in time, and I came around by this road because the other's stopped up, and I was so glad when I saw the house. Thank you so much. It must have been an awful bother. I think I had better start soon."

"No, you don't; you're not fit to ride alone yet," said he to himself. Aloud he said:

"You said something about a puncture. When you are better I'll mend it. And—look here—have you had any luncheon?"

"No," said she.

"Then, if you'll allow me." He left the room, and presently returned with the tray set for his own lunch. Then he fetched from the larder everything he could lay hands on: half a cold chicken, some cold meat pudding, a pot of jam. He set these confusedly on the table.

"Now," he said, "come and try to eat."

"It's very good of you to bother," she said, a little surprise in her tone, for she had expected luncheon to be a set, formal meal at which some discreet female relative would preside. "But aren't you—don't you—do you live alone?"

"Yes; a woman comes in the mornings. I'm sorry she's gone—she could have arranged a better luncheon for you."

"Better? Why, it's lovely!" said she, accepting the situation with frank amusement. And she gave a touch or two to the table which seemed to set everything in its place.

Then they lunched together. He would have served her standing, as one serves a queen, but she laughed again, and he took the place opposite her. During luncheon they talked.

After luncheon they mended the punctured tire, and talked all the while. Then it was past three o'clock.

Digitized by Google

"You won't go yet," he said then, daring greatly for what seemed to him a great stake. "Let me make you some tea. I can, I assure you—and let us see if the tire holds up."

"Oh, the tire is all right, thanks to your cleverness."

"Well, then," said he desperately, "take pity on a poor hermit. I give you my word I have been here ten months and three days, and I have not in that time spoken a single word to any human being except my bed-maker."

"But if you want to talk to people, why did you begin being a hermit?"

"I thought I didn't, then."

"Well—now you know better, why don't you come back and talk to people in the ordinary way?"

"I have a book to finish," said he. "Would you like to have tea in the wilderness, or in here?" He wisely took her consent for granted this time, and his wisdom was justified. They had tea in the garden. It seemed to him that his mind was opening like a flower, and for the first time. He had never talked so well, and he knew it. All the seeds of thought sown in those long, lonely hours bore fruit now. She listened, she replied, she argued and debated.

"Beautiful—and sensible," said Maurice to himself. "What a wonderful woman!" There were, besides, an alertness of mind, a quick brightness of manner that charmed him. Camilla had been languid and dreamy.

Suddenly she arose to her feet.

"I must go," she said, "but I have enjoyed myself so much. You are an ideal host—thank you a thousand times. Perhaps we shall meet again some day if you return to the world. Do you know we've been talking and wrangling for hours and hours, and never even thought of wondering what each other's names are. I think we've paid each other a very magnificent compliment, don't you?"

He smiled and said, "My name is Maurice Brent."

"Mine is Rose Redmayne. It sounds like somebody in the Family Herald, doesn't it?"

He had wheeled the bicycle into the road, and she had put on hat and gloves and stood ready to mount before she said:

"If you come back to the world I shall almost certainly meet you. We seem to know the same people. I've heard your name many times."

"From whom?" said he.

"Among others," said she with her foot on the pedal, "from my cousin Camilla. Good-by."

And he was left to stare down the road after the swift flying figure. Then he went back into the lonely little house, and at about half-past twelve that night he realized that he had done no work that day, and that those hours which had not been spent talking to Rose Redmayne had been spent in thinking about her.

"It's not because she's pretty and clever," he said, "and it's not even because she's a woman. It's because she's the only intelligent human being I've spoken to for a year."

It was three weeks later that the bell again creaked and jangled, and again through the spotted glass he saw a sailor hat. To his infinite disgust and surprise his heart began to beat violently.

"I grow nervous, living all alone," he said. "Confound this door, how it does stick! I must have it planed."

He got the door open and found himself face to face with—Camilla. He stepped back and bowed gravely.

She looked more beautiful than ever—and he looked at her and wondered how he could ever have thought her even passably pretty. "Won't you ask me in?" she said timidly.

"No," said he. "I am all alone."

"I know," she said. "I have only just heard that you're living here all alone, and I came to say—Maurice—I'm sorry. I didn't know you cared so much—or——"

"Don't," he said, stopping the confession as a good batsman blocks a ball. "Believe me, I've not made myself a hermit because of—of all that. I had a book to write—that was all. And—and it's very kind of you to come and look me up—and I wish I could ask you to come in—but—— And it's nice of you to take an interest in an old friend. You said you would, didn't you, in the letter? And—I've taken the advice you gave me."

"You mean you've fallen in love with some one else."

"You remember what you said in your letter."

"Some one worthier, I said," returned Camilla blankly, "but I never thought—and is she?"

"Of course she seems so to me," said he, smiling at her to express friendly feeling.

"Then—good-by—I wish you the best of good fortune."

"You said that in your letter, too," said he.

"Who is she?"

"I mustn't tell even you that until I have told her."

"Then good-by," said Camilla softly. "Forgive me for troubling you so unnecessarily."

And he found himself standing by his door, and Camilla on her bicycle sped down the road, choking with tears of anger and mortification and deep disappointment. Because she knew now that she loved him as much as it was in her to love any one, and because she, who had humbled so many, had now at last humbled herself—and to no purpose.

Maurice Brent left his door open and wandered down across his five acres, filled with amazement. Camilla herself had not been more deeply astonished at the words he had spoken than he himself had been. A moment before he had not even thought that he was in love, much less contemplated any confession of it. And now, seemingly without his will, he stood committed to this statement. Was it true, or had he only said it to defend himself against Camilla and the past, and against those advances of hers in which he saw merely a new trap? He had said it in defense—yes—but it was true, for all that. This was the wonderful part of it. And so he walked in the wilderness, lost in wonder. And as he walked he noted the bicycles that passed his door. Along his unfrequented road, by ones and twos and threes—for this was a Saturday, and the lower road was still lying cold and hidden under its load of chalk and none might pass that way. Perhaps some day she would come that way again. She would surely stop, especially if he were at the gate—and perhaps stay and talk a little. As if in mocking answer to the new-born thought came a flash of blue along the road: Rose Redmayne rode by at full speed, bowed coldly, and then at ten yards' distance turned and waved a white-gloved hand, with a charming smile.

DRAWN BY JNO. CHINEL

"MR. BRENT, THERE IS A VERY MALICIOUS PERSON IN THIS PART OF THE COUNTRY—A PERFECTLY DREADFUL PERSON"

His work went but slowly on that day and in the days that followed. On the next Friday he went over to Rochester, and in the dusk of the evening he walked along the road, about a mile from the Yews, and then, going slowly, he cast handfuls of something dark from his hand, and kicked the white dust over it as it lay.

"I feel like the enemy sowing tares," said he.

Then he went home, full of anxious anticipation. The next day was hot and bright. He took his armchair into the nightmare of a veranda, and sat there reading—only above the top of the book his eyes could follow the curve of the white road. This made it more difficult to follow the text. Presently the bicyclists began to go past by ones, and twos, and threes; but a certain percentage were wheeling their machines. Others stopped within sight to blow up their tires. One man sat down under the hedge thirty yards away and took his machine to pieces. Presently he strolled up and asked for water. Brent gave it, in a tin basin, grudgingly, and without opening the gate.

"I overdid it," he said. "A quarter of a pound would have been enough. Yet I don't know—perhaps it's well to be on the safe side. Yet three pounds was perhaps excessive." Late in the afternoon a pink figure wheeling a bicycle came slowly down the road. He sat still and tried to read. In a moment he should hear the click of the gate. Then he would spring up and be very much astonished. But the gate did not click, and when next he raised his eyes the pink blouse had gone by, and was almost past the end of the five acres. Then he did spring up—and ran.

"Miss Redmayne—can't I help you? What is it? Have you had a spill?" he said as he overtook her.

"Puncture," said she laconically.

"You're very unfortunate. Mayn't I help you?"

"I'll mend it as soon as I get to a shady place."

"Come into the wilderness. See—here's the side gate. I'll fetch some water in a moment."

She looked at him doubtfully, and then consented. She refused tea, but she stayed and talked till long after the bicycle was mended.

On the following Saturday he walked along the road, and back, and along—and again the place was alive with angry cyclists, dealing, each after his fashion, with a punctured tire. He came upon Miss Redmayne sitting by the ditch, mending hers. That was the time when he sat on the roadside and told her all about himself—reserving only those points where his life had touched Camilla's.

The week after he walked the road again, and this time he overtook Miss Redmayne, who was resolutely wheeling her bicycle back in the way by which she had come.

"Let me wheel it for you," he said. "Whither bound?"

"I'm going back to Rochester," she said. "I generally ride over to see my aunts at Felsenden on Saturdays, but I fear I must give it up and go by train. This road isn't safe."

"Not safe?" he said with an agitation which could not escape her notice.

"Not safe," she repeated. "Mr. Brent, there is a very malicious person in this part of the country—a perfectly dreadful person."

"What do you mean?" he managed to ask.

"These three Saturdays I have come along this road; each time I have had a puncture. And each time I have found embedded in my tire the evidence of some one's malice. This is one piece of evidence." She held out her ungloved hand. On its pink palm lay a good-sized tin tack.

"Once might be accident; twice coincidence; three times is too much. The road's impossible."

"Do you think some one did it on purpose?"

"I know it," she said calmly.

Then he grew desperate. "Try to forgive me," he said. "I was so lonely—and I wanted so much——"

She turned wide eyes on him. "You!" she cried, and began to laugh. Her laughter was very pretty, he thought.

"You didn't know it was I?" said he.

"You!" she said again. "And has it amused you to see all these poor people in difficulties, and to know that you've spoiled their poor little holiday for them—and three times, too?"

"I never thought about them," he said. "It was you I wanted to see. Try to forgive me; you don't know how much I wanted you."

Something in his voice kept her silent.

"And don't laugh," he went on. "I feel as if I wanted nothing in the world but you. Let me come to see you; let me try to make you care, too."

"You're talking nonsense," she said, for he stopped on a note that demanded an answer. "Why, you told Camilla——"

"Yes, but you—but I meant you. I thought I cared about her once, but I never cared really, with all my heart and soul, for any one but you."

She looked at him calmly and earnestly.

"I'm going to forget all this," she said, "but I like you very much, and if you want to come and see me, you may. I will introduce you to my aunts at Felsenden—as a friend of Camilla—and I will be friends with you. But nothing else—ever. Do you care to know my aunts?"

Maurice had inspirations of sense sometimes. One came to him then and he said:

"I care very much."

"Then help me to mend my bicycle, and you can call there to-morrow. It's the Grange—you can't miss it. No—not another word of nonsense, please, or we can't possibly be friends."

He helped her to mend her bicycle, and they talked of the beauty of spring and modern poetry.

It was at the Grange, Felsenden, that Maurice next saw Miss Redmayne—and it was from the Grange, Felsenden, that, in September, he married her.

"And why did you say you would never, never be anything but a friend?" he asked her on the day when that marriage was arranged. "Oh—you nearly made me believe you! Why did you say it?"

"One must say something!" she answered. "Besides, you'd never have respected me if I'd said 'Yes' at once."

"Could you have said it? Did you like me then?"

She looked at him, and her look was an answer. He stooped and gravely kissed her.

"And you really cared, even then? I wish you had been braver," he said, a little sadly.

"Ah, but," she said, "I didn't know you then. You must try to forgive me, dear. Think how much there was at stake! Suppose I had lost you!"

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA
421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
Five Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

Why We Have Bosses

WHEN Mahomet entered upon his missionary career he promised that any warrior killed in battle for the true faith should be attended in Paradise by a retinue of houris. No intimation of this promise had been vouchsafed in the earlier revelations; the idea was an afterthought. It is possible that Mahomet himself believed it; it is certain that Mahomet was building up a powerful political "machine" and he had promised earthly rewards until, what with fulfillments and inability to secure more spoils, there was nothing left to promise. So he mortgaged the hereafter to supply himself with the means of holding his machine together. For Mahomet realized that the actual performances of a political leader are always a disappointment to the greater portion of his retainers, and that his strongest hold upon the allegiance of the average selfish mortal is the hope of what he is yet to receive. Mahomet was a shrewd "boss." All later bosses have imitated his methods.

This is one of the reasons for the frequent appearance upon the great and little kopjes of politics in America of men who in fact represent a standard in morality, in information, and even in intelligence, below the average of the citizenship which elevated them. The skepticism of the nation forbids the use of post-mortem delights as a reward for political fidelity. The blessings which may be distributed while the giver and the recipient are still upon earth are, if the truth be known, limited. And yet the mass of mankind can be held only by promises of some personal advantage. The conscientious and moderately mathematical aspirant for leadership soon finds himself at the end of his resources. Accordingly he is crowded out by some one who reckons with looser calculation upon the inevitable sequence of the day of fulfillment after the day of promise. And since the line of demarcation between being over-sanguine and being a conscious liar is too indistinct to be of practical use to any one except a criminal lawyer, the stress of competition soon perverts the promising politician into the habitual liar. "When one has said that a man is a liar, it is a waste of time to inquire of his other vices."

The people are themselves to blame for this condition of things, because it is the people who demand this reckless feeding of their hopes. Only at rare intervals of popular upheaval are the people willing to elect a public servant for no other reason than that he will give good service. Usually he must drag his way to power or to responsibility bound by myriad pledges to advance the interest of this and that and the other little leader; each pledge, if you will, innocent and insignificant in itself, but the sum of them all as fatally imprisoning to his actions as the Lilliputian twine with which Gulliver was held immovable. There is no escape except by humiliating compromise or insolent repudiation. Either alternative is disgusting to a man of independent honesty. And so the people force to the front the amiably irresponsible, the unscrupulously bold and the skillfully illusory. Sturdy, downright devotion to duty (a blood-relative to Conscious Worth) balks early—and is picked up for the service of wiser masters. The directorates of hundreds of private companies are filled with men of intelligence and integrity in cities where the municipal council reeks with ignorant dishonesty. Innumerable trustworthy guardians of any and every sort of private interest can be had in communities which seem to find it impossible to send out a loyal legislator.

The remedy has been said to be the education of the masses in patriotism. That sounds pretty. The suggester, of course, never considers himself as of "the masses." Is not this remedy, however, really a bit of impertinent and baseless Pharisaism? Are not the masses in fact the ones from whom all efforts at reform have had their beginnings? Are not the masses to-day teeming with perfectly honest, even though mistaken, theories for the betterment of politico-economic conditions? And are not all their attempts butting helplessly against the corpselike lethargy of the so-called classes?—the persons who deem themselves educated and cultured, and clean and righteous—but who are too busy with their own comfortable lives to throw away time on "politics" (for it would jar their complacency to give these matters their true name of "patriotism"). Study the lists of the voters. How many of the masses stay away from the polls? And how many of the educated go to them? Of the persons who do go to the polls, how many of the masses vote for some laboriously conceived theory?—and that means for principle. And how many of the intelligent remnant vote one way or the other only because "all the best people vote that way here"? or because "my business is good and I believe in letting things alone"? Yet the classes could outvote all the masses, if all the masses needed to be outvoted. And the classes—who require no jobs—could omit to exact any pledges.

The renaissance of American patriotism must begin, not at the economic bottom, nor even at the economic top, but in the great, comfortable, careless, self-satisfied middle class, where a modicum of education and a measure of success have bred an indolent, unobservant, egotistic conceit. If the good middle classes could be husked of this benumbing content and taught to regard thoughtful and dispassionate voting as among the obligations of conscience, the millennium would be imminent. At least, the rule of the political boss would presently have gone to consort in the realms of a mournful oblivion with the other resurrectionless superstitions.

—E. RUSSELL.

In the use of money in politics two rigid rules should be observed: First, don't do it; second, don't get found out.

Mending Morals by Making Muscle

THE renaissance of physical culture which marks this age has many amusing features. As the lost art of being beautiful slowly returns to our apprehension, as the human body dawns anew upon our thoughts as being a clean and comely thing—not a secret shame we are obliged to carry and conceal—the observer notes with keen appreciation the various manœuvres which accompany the great revival.

Physical culture was never utterly forgotten among men, as masculine beauty was never supposed to cease at the collar bone or at some fluctuating shoulder-line. The masculine body—though as ill-dressed as a rhinoceros—not having been "hidden under a bushel," men have always valued and honored fine physical development. Their lives, too, have allowed of a freer following out of natural instincts, and in both work and play they have been nearer to Nature than were women.

But women, sworn servants though they have been to the cult of Beauty, have not in these thousands of years understood the first and greatest of her laws—that a living creature cannot have beauty without health, nor health without exercise. Dimly do they now perceive this law, and vague and wild are their glimmering ideas and practices. Along many avenues the new standard of Beauty is advancing—outdoor sports, gymnasium work, Delsarte exercises and a thousand modifications and combinations—and now a deeper truth is being shown us through careful scientific experiment with "defectives"—that body and soul are so inextricably connected that you can improve the moral character by improving the physical condition.

The marvelous experiments at the Elmira Reformatory, where hopeless criminals—absolute "degenerates," with all their "stigmata" upon them—were submitted to the influence of the finest physical culture, to which they responded most remarkably, have proven conclusively the value of such treatment even in the worst cases. But what is true in the extreme must be true also in the mean. If the worst criminals can be sensibly improved by the best physical care, so can ordinary people.

And there is the suggestion of the converse—that if high physical condition tends to promote a higher moral state, so a low physical condition tends to produce a lower moral state—and, therefore, that the unhealthy and ill-developed people are potentially immoral! If this could be universally accepted, and an honest shame be felt for gross physical deficiencies and excesses, and if there could be cultivated a sturdy pride in building up a clean and noble body, it would be a vital factor in social advancement.

—CHARLOTTE PERKINS STETSON.

The man who simply sits down and waits is still wondering if the limited express ever stops at his station.

The Triumph of Quality

IT IS a common complaint nowadays that nothing counts but money. Merit has to give way to millions. All success in life is measured by cash. The idea of any one taking a leading position simply because he has done something besides accumulating a fortune is looked upon as antiquated. Wealth rules, and we must bow down to it.

All this is a penalty for the publicity of the age. When we live in the open or travel or dine at the hotel the longest pocketbook naturally gets the most attention. So when the waiter neglects us and rushes to the table where the new millionaire is dispensing his bounty in tips, we naturally resent the neglect of our own comfort and call this age bad names. But, in fact, it is nothing new. Over a half century ago Washington Irving used the term "the Almighty Dollar," and called it "that great object of universal devotion throughout our land," and there was just as much complaint then as there is now about the prominence of money. Then a man with $100,000 was a plutocrat, while to-day he is only respectably well off with a million. At the same time, in the public exhibition of men and manners, the wealthy person inevitably gets the largest share of passing notice. He gets it because he pays for it. He may do this by self-advertising, or he may do it by contributions to charity, but all the same he buys his way, and receives the worth of his money.

But in spite of all this it is not true that money is securing the higher prizes of this age and generation. It has its limitations, just as there are limitations to the size of show bills, or the number of diamonds Mrs. Newlyrich can wear. The great distinction that should be remembered is that while money can buy quantity there is something beyond its limitations, and that is quality.

We have recently been through an era of quantity. Our newspapers have been bursting with bigness until their readers have suffered with satiety, and have called for quality. In politics we have had money and pretension and humbug galore, with would-be leaders who could not make a respectable speech of an hour if they were to be hung the next minute. And now amid all the miserable shuffling there has arisen a clear demand for something higher and better, and in the recent debates in Congress, especially over the wretched Puerto Rican business, the whole nation applauded with fine enthusiasm the few men who stood for the honor of the country, who showed the qualities of independence and statesmanship.

In the pulpit we find a remarkable reaction from the quantities of creeds and dogmas, and hear the clarion call for the higher quality which turns from the dead past to the living present. On the battlefields the courageous soldiers who had their brief glory while the band was playing are already forgotten, while the men with quality in them have come into our respect and affections.

It is useless to decry wealth or to keep people from worshiping the golden calf. It is human nature to do so, but, at the same time, beyond all this there is something better, nobler and purer, and to doubt its triumph is to doubt human progress.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

How civilization refines everything! For instance: the people of the United States give up more in tips every day than they used to lose by highway robbery in a whole year.

Must the Japanese Go?

WORKINGMEN in general throughout the Pacific Coast are deeply concerned at the present time over the great immigration to this country from Japan. Wage-earners in the far West, and more especially those dependent upon manual labor for the support of themselves and their families, view with decided alarm the thousands of Japanese who are yearly flocking to America in search of employment. Though the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Japan are being rigidly enforced by our officials, they only prevent the coming of those physically disabled, those not absolutely penniless, and contract laborers; consequently, under the existing treaty, the door is comparatively open to the vast majority of Japanese.

The agitation caused by this influx of cheap labor from the Orient is similar to that which resulted a few years ago in the passage by Congress of the Chinese Exclusion Act. However, unlike the Chinaman, the Japanese is very progressive, and quick to adopt American manners and customs. Nor does he possess those vices which render the lower element of the Chinese so repulsive to our people, and which had much to do with the placing of the bars against them. There is no question that, of the two races, the Japanese are far preferable, but it is their very shrewdness and ability to learn readily that make them such formidable competitors in the field of labor. They are exceedingly energetic, and seek employment at whatever wages they find it possible to get, thus endangering the welfare of the American laborer, who asks a reasonable remuneration for his services. Nor are they prone to underestimate their capabilities, for even now they are entering the domain of skilled labor, and in time, if unchecked, will certainly cause a marked drop in the wages usually paid to those in this field.

The Pacific Coast, because of its geographical location, is naturally the first to feel the effects of Japanese labor, and that the agitation among the working people of this region will sooner or later spread to the Atlantic seaboard there is no doubt. Already the Congressmen from California are being called upon by the Trades Council of San Francisco to place the matter before the law-making power of the country that it may enact a measure prohibiting the hosts of the Orient from landing on our shores. It is clearly apparent to all who have watched the rapidly increasing Japanese population on the Pacific Coast that the welfare of the American laborer, who is forced to rely solely upon his two hands for bread, is seriously threatened by this tide of immigration, growing stronger as the weeks pass by. Shall it be restricted? This is a question of vital importance to the laboring people of the country, and one which this nation must decide in the near future.

—HERBERT BASHFORD.

Sometimes it is hard to escape the thought that there is possibly more doubt about the future of the stomach than of the soul.

Digitized by Google

Americans in Paris

ALL PARIS went to see L'Aiglon—this poet's dream of the life that might have been real to Napoleon's unhappy son. Probably there has never been quite so exciting a "first night" in Paris. Single seats sold for as much as thirty dollars apiece. Of course, all the famous Parisians were present, from the old poet Coppée to the newest member of the Academy, M. Deschanel. The two colonies best represented were those of Russia and the United States. On the one hand the Grand Dukes of Russia, on the other General Horace Porter and the chiefs of the Consulate and the Exposition Commission; why—it would be hard to say. Only there are certain events that are distinctly international, and this, it seemed, was of them. Since Victor Hugo, no French poet has entered the lists with so strong a lance and swept so wide a career as this young poet, Edmond Rostand. His Cyrano de Bergerac carried his name into all parts of the world. Do you remember how you and I and all the rest of us over in America turned to this play with joyous welcome, not because it was either very great or very new, but because it was a splendid protest against the base realism and tawdry clownery that had driven poetry and purity from our stage? We were glad that Rostand succeeded because we saw that he stood for the finer impulses and the better thoughts—and the more accomplished art.

The night L'Aiglon was produced—and of course it is the drama of the Eagle's son, Napoleon's wretched heir—M. Rostand was so ill he could hardly face the friends who swarmed in to congratulate him.

To one of us he said: "It is not all my work—a man never does anything alone—always there is a woman in the background—this is my collaborator," and he introduced us to a slight, nervous, brown-haired woman, Madame Rostand.

"At least, I know every line of the play by heart," she said, and she said it in English, for Madame Rostand has the good fortune to be an American. She was born of an old French-American family and her early years were spent in a drowsy, opulent plantation on the Mississippi River. She came to Paris to be educated in her ancestral tongue. She was a bright and thoughtful girl.

She wrote poems that were recited in drawing-rooms and finally made their way into print. They were white little songs, gracious as the phrases Mozart wrote for the flute. She called them Pipeaux, a dainty word which you may translate for yourself. And so she had her hour of celebrity here in Paris.

In the meanwhile, there was a young poet over in the Latin Quarter. He had read Pipeaux, and as he had just finished a play, Les Romanesques, he dedicated it to Rosamonde, who was no other than Mlle. Gerard, the young American girl who had written those fluted verses. A little while after that he made her a formal offer of marriage. The document lies on the table beside me as I write. It is in verse. The twenty stanzas may be summed up in this: "If you will marry me, Rosamonde, I shall love you all my life—and therefore I shall be a great poet."

Doubtless it was the "therefore" that won her. In any case, she married him.

Calmly, I fancy, the historical critic will come to the decision that Rostand did not accomplish much before he was married. Over in the Latin Quarter they called him The April Fool—perhaps because he was born April the first, perhaps because he was a dreamer. But, since his marriage, success has rained on him. He has won fame and name—a pleasant house in one of the suburbs of Paris and a château in the South of France, near Tours, in Balzac's country.

The night of the play Rostand was ill from overwork, and happy—as only the man who has worked well can be. We did not question him, but I daresay if we had put the query that was in every mind he would have said: "In order to write a great play one must have a collaborator," and then I think he would have taken off his hat to that slim American girl who has collaborated with him in literature and in life.

The Disadvantage of a Paternal Government

There is probably not an American of all those who will be in Paris during the next golden half year who will not visit two places—he will go to number 20, Avenue Rapp, and to number 18, Avenue Kléber. At the former address he will find marble halls—an automatic elevator (you work it yourself by pushing electric buttons), grinning darky porters, and Commissioner Ferdinand W. Peck and his fifty assistants. Mr. Peck is hedged about with a good deal of dignity, which is the prerogative of busy men, but every right-minded American citizen who visits the Exposition will see that it is his duty to break through that hedge. A mere indication of what Mr. Peck may expect can be gathered from the fact that over 200 letters a day come to his address—from good fellow-citizens of whom he has never heard. When I went to see Mr. Peck to-day I found his secretary feebly waving off a crowd of insistent visitors.

"What's the matter?" I asked.

The secretary said gloomily: "They seem to think that the United States has sent us here to find boarding-houses for them and tell them where they can learn French in five lessons."

And then he tried to tell them.

But the American who is in trouble, who doesn't know quite what to do, usually tells his cabman—if he is not familiar with the 'bus lines—to drive him to the Avenue Kléber. There he finds himself in a quarter which Paris has dedicated to its friendship for the great republic over seas. He is only a stone's throw from United States Square and Washington Street. The home of the Ambassy is quiet, grave and unpretentious. You have to walk up stairs, for there is no elevator. If you wish to see the Ambassador you have but to send in your card. The American colony here says that General Horace Porter has brought back to the Ambassy a democratic courtesy as frank and fine as that of Benjamin Franklin. Still, it is not very often that one beards an Ambassador in his den. If you want a certificate of citizenship—if you need advice on any of the perplexing difficulties that confront the exile—the man to see is Mr. Vignaud. He is a pleasant, smiling gentleman who has already got into the gray years. Ambassadors come and go in Paris; Whitelaw Reid passes and Horace Porter comes; but always Henry Vignaud, First Secretary of the Ambassy, remains. He is the father-confessor of Americans in Paris.

"A quarter of a century ago," he will tell you, "I began to write a book on the diplomatic history of France and the United States. I commenced with Benjamin Franklin's arrival in Paris and carried the story on to the sensational visit of Aaron Burr—when he came over to persuade Napoleon to make him Emperor of Mexico. Then I stopped. I was too much interested in reading the scroll of American history as it was unrolled day by day to go back into the past. And then," Mr. Vignaud would add, poking the old-fashioned wood fire that heated one corner of his old-fashioned room, "the American invasion into Paris is reaching such proportions that I have no time to give to the affairs of one hundred years ago. Now I am looking forward to the time when some young historian from Harvard or Princeton will come over here to study these wonderful documents in which is recorded the truth, real and unknown, of many an event that changed the current of American life. In our matured strength we do not realize the seriousness of our childish ailments, or how near we came to never being a nation at all. Who is prepared to say what might have overtaken the starving Continentals if—well, if Benjamin Franklin's 'republican simplicity,' his snuff-colored coat and his drab stockings, had not caught the whimsical favor of the French Court?"

There will be millions of Americans in Paris this year; perhaps among them may be the historian who will rifle the archives of which Mr. Vignaud holds the key.

—VANCE THOMPSON.

Digitized by Google

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, 1900.

I AM convinced by my own experience that fear is divided into two distinct halves. One half is almost invariably groundless and the other half is utterly discreditable; and this conclusion has been reached by finding out that my pangs concerning Robert's political welfare were well-nigh baseless, but that my fears concerning the coming of our old cousin from Spruce City, if discreditable to me, are more than likely to be realized.

In the first place, Robert came home in high good humor; I may say he was quite hilarious. He would not tell me whether it was because he had succeeded in persuading the Legislature that black was white, or whether it was because of Cousin Melinda's naive remarks upon everything connected with their journey. I really could get no satisfaction whatever out of Robert concerning his political status. I thought, perhaps, that after he had been subdued a bit by his second vote in the House on the Puerto Rican bill he would tell me seriously how he stood. When the vote was over and he had helped to make the final narrow majority of eight, I asked him how his affairs had progressed. He only answered me in this wise:

"Well, Agatha, I feel rather like Dickens' character of Stephen Blackpool, who was beset at every turn by trades unions and politicians and agents and bosses, who tried to capture him for their own profit, and who, when asked where he stood and how he regarded things, said, ''Tis a muddle and that's all. There is where I stick. I come to the muddle many times and agen, and it is alwus a muddle.'"

I was no wiser than before and said impatiently:

"Oh, come down to plain statement, Robert. What about the Legislature? And the Flapjack?"

"Well, the Flapjack has turned a handspring on the griddle and is browning on its other side now. And the Legislature? Well, who knows? I may wear a toga yet!"

And this was all that I could get out of him. The only assurance I could find of the whole thing being in good shape was in his good spirits, and I wondered what jugglery he had used. When I undertook to reckon with him for bringing Cousin Melinda back at such an unpropitious time, he only laughed at me. It was in vain that I painted to him all the smart things I had on hand: the dinners I was giving to the diplomats, the fête I was arranging, the dances at various smart houses, and, last but not least, the coming of Alain de Courcelles, and Page's wedding, which would come off in May, just before the curtain should be rung down on the season's final performances. I even recited to him all the things that Cousin Melinda would want to do, all the things she would say, which would surely cause a ripple of amusement at our expense, but Robert only laughed the more at my undisguised concern, and said:

"I could not help it. As soon as Cousin Melinda knew I had reached Spruce City she simply announced that she should come with me to Washington, and here she is, Agatha."

"Yes, here she is!" I echoed dismally, but it was no sort of use to get into the doldrums over it, so I took a mental brace and determined to make the best of it and to give the old lady the best time she had ever had in her life.

At the first of my Easter dinners, which was on Easter Sunday, I tried to prepare her for both the occasion and the day. I said to her:

"Now, Cousin Melinda, you must get out your best gown and your best lace cap, for there will be a large company at dinner on Easter Sunday."

"See here, Agatha, where on earth do you expect to go to when you die if you give dinners on Sabbath day? I never heard of such heathenish doings. Seems to me you take great liberties with the Lord's day down here. I can't see any reason why my new stuff gown with the extra gore in it won't do. I didn't expect to stay dressed up all the time, anyway, and I think, my dear, that the new-fangled way you dress for dinner every day, with your shoulders bare and your head all diked out with feathers and Robert tricked out in his swallow-tail, is simply monstrous! I don't see what you are all coming to!"

"But, cousin," I said coaxingly, "at this dinner there will be a number of foreign ministers who are used, in their own countries, to seeing women dressed up a good deal, so I want you to get out your lovely puce satin gown with that fine old lace on it. I want you to wear it for my sake, and, besides, I want Page to see the beautiful lace."

This last argument I thought would fetch her, for she had taken a violent fancy to Page, although she professed not to understand her "outlandish talk," as she called it.

"Well," replied she, considerably mollified, "seeing that you are to have ministers here, perhaps I'd better get out the puce satin."

I never dreamed that the old lady did not understand what sort of people I had meant by foreign ministers. I thought she looked amazed when we were assembled just before dinner, for I saw her look with fascinated eyes at a jeweled order which a South American wore conspicuously on his breast. From him she glanced with acute interest and curiosity at the wife of his bosom, who was, I must confess, most remarkable in the way that some of the South American women alone know how to be. As I noted Cousin Melinda's gathering bewilderment, I said to Robert in an aside as we passed to the dining-room:

"Keep your eyes and ears upon Cousin Melinda, and do head her off if you can if she gets started on anything queer."

I knew that this might be entirely wasted advice, for Robert would be more likely to laugh and to encourage the old lady, so I whispered to Page:

"Don't let her out of sight or hearing, Page."

"No, Ah won't. Ah'll watch out."

THEY WERE ABOUT TO GREET THE CHILDREN

Everything went along well in Jules' most perfect style and I forgot our old cousin. Then suddenly in one dreadful pause I heard her say to the South American, while her eyes were glued to the glittering bauble on his breast:

"Cousin Agatha tells me you are a minister from a foreign land."

I interrupted my own conversation to listen, while my heart dropped down into my satin shoes. The South American bowed and replied:

"Yes, madame."

I tried to break into the conversation, but Cousin Melinda was seeking information and continued in her high, thin voice:

"Do all ministers down in your parts wear a badge like yours? Is it a badge of denomination?"

I was entirely paralyzed and so was the South American. He had not the vaguest idea of what she was driving at. He tried to stammer out the word she had used:

"De-nom-i-nassion?" then he stopped confusedly and said helplessly, "I not onderstan' ze word, madame."

Here Mr. Morelos, with quick inspiration, seized the situation and saved it. He turned to Cousin Melinda courteously and said:

"It is the order of Isabella, madame, and it is worn by some few of the Ministers of State from the Spanish countries of South America."

He emphasized the words "Ministers of State." Cousin Melinda echoed his words as though scandalized:

"Ministers—of—what?"

"Of State, madame—that is to say, 'Ministers Plenipotentiary and Envoys Extraordinary.'"

A look of keen disappointment and disapproval swept over the old lady's face, and I caught something that sounded like "heathens." But Mr. Morelos continued to engage her attention until the rest of the table was absorbed with some other topic.

Of course from that time on there was no peace of mind for me. I knew that everybody around our board, and for that matter my stolid butler and impassive footmen as well, were simply exploding inwardly at the idea that this gorgeous South American, bedecked with the order of Isabella, had been supposed to be a minister of the Gospel and had been asked about his denomination. I knew that so far as Cousin Melinda was concerned her only regret was that she should have worn her puce satin in honor of these foreign heathens. I shall never cease to bless Mr. Morelos. He devoted himself almost exclusively for the rest of the dinner to Cousin Melinda, and I knew that it was his tact and courtesy that induced him to throw himself into the breach, and that my kinswoman would have no chance to distinguish herself again that night. But that this little episode would make a fine bonne bouche for the smart world to take hold of and that it would pass from lip to lip I had no manner of doubt. I never was so glad in my life as I was when that dinner was over.

The next day was Easter Monday, and I, in consideration of my friendly relations with the Presidential family, had been granted, practically, the freedom of the White House from which to view the children's annual egg-rolling. I was, of course, permitted to include Page and Cousin Melinda, and, though I knew that we should very likely see nothing of the family, it was too good an occasion to show our cousin the sights to let slip.

Robert went off early to the Capitol, there to help along the wrangle over the Naval Appropriation bill; for every member of the House thinks he knows more about the relative merits of Harveyized plate versus Krupp armor plate than the Secretary of the Navy himself, and not one hesitated to echo and applaud Representative Wheeler's statement, made on the floor the other day, that the Secretary of the Navy "knows no more about armor plate than the man in the moon." I certainly can vouch for one fact, that the member from Spruce City knows no more about armor plate than the man in the moon, but bless you! that won't deter him from assuming a virtue if he has it not, and wrangling and disputing over every armor plate proposition that may chance to be submitted.

Meantime, on our way to the White House, Page regaled Cousin Melinda with the splendors of the mansion and with the impressive ceremony of egg-rolling until the dear old lady was plainly nervous, and said with decision:

"Well, it beats me all hollow that William McKinley will countenance such pagan doings! Who ever heard of such a custom as egg-rolling?"

"Why, Miss Melinda," said Page, "there's an' ole tale of the Orient that tells us 'an egg of wondrous size fell into the river Euphrates, the fishes rolled it to the bank, the doves settled upon it an' hatched it, an' man came forth,' an' the egg has been a symbol of life ever since."

"Humph," sniffed Cousin Melinda contemptuously; then she added, "I don't see how they came to hitch such a heathen story on to a Christian festival, anyway. Land sakes, Agatha, where are all these sights of children going? And they're black and white and big and little, and all got baskets. Why, there are thousands of them!" And she craned her head out the carriage window in wonderment.

The custom and occasion were new to me, too; and I was almost as much interested and astonished at the spectacle as our old

Editor's Note.—The papers entitled The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 3. Each paper is complete in itself.

Beautiful Homes

directly influence the lives of their inmates. Not so much the house from without as from the interior. Our business is to furnish, to decorate, to make beautiful in many ways the rooms in which you pass most of your lives. Individuality is a strong point in interior decorating. We encourage that. We get up designs for woodworking and frescoing, which are, if satisfactory, yours exclusively. Our taste in selecting wall paper, hanging portières and designing cozy corners is to be relied on. We'll send a representative anywhere east of the Mississippi, and gladly furnish estimates. We've an unequalled stock of furniture, or make specially to your order.

If interested, write for further particulars.

For economy and artistic results BUY OF THE MAKER.

HUNT, WILKINSON & CO.
1219-21 Market Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

You will not get left
If you own one of the Reliable
"Accurate-to-the-Second"
DUEBER-HAMPDEN WATCHES
LOOK FOR THE NAME "DUEBER" IN CASE
"John Hancock." 21 Jewels. For Gentlemen.
"Special Railway." 21 Jewels. For Railway Men.
"The 100." For Ladies.
Our "Guide to Watch Buyers" sent free.
The Dueber-Hampden Watch Works, Canton, O.

"Business System"

Is the title of our 64-page book, illustrating and explaining model business methods used by our largest and most successful business houses—it is free upon request.

$1.25
And upward buys a complete
"Macey" Card System

Shipped "On Approval," freight prepaid, to be returned at our expense if not found in every way positively the best obtainable.
Your Choice of three distinct card-locking devices.
It Gathers—Arranges—Classifies—Indexes every character of office and factory records and lists—it is the perfect system—it encourages system.

The Fred Macey Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.
Makers of Office and Library Furniture

PENCIL NOVELTIES

No. 80. "Railroad Signal." 2 Red and 2 Green Stones. Nickeled, 20 cents

No. 78. "Cut Nail." Perfect Imitation. 15 cents
Each 4 inches long. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.
Free—Illustrated list of useful and novel goods for men and women.
D. A. HUEBSCH & CO., 33 Rose St., New York

BOYS' PAPER FREE. If you will send us the names of 5 boy friends over 12 years of age we will send you "The Star" for 3 months free. Greatest boys' paper published. Address, with stamps, THE STAR, Dept. 23, Oak Park, Ill.

Digitized by Google

cousin was. The noise when we reached the grounds was much like what it would be if all the fussy, chattering little sparrows in Christendom were to be gathered in one spot and then loosened. Above all this was the sound of the Marine Band.

"When did this custom of egg-rolling originate, or with whom, Page?" I asked.

"Ah don' know. It began with our early Presiden's 'way back, oh, ever so far. Ah remember hearin' my mother tell of comin' to an Easter egg-rollin' in Mr. Buchanan's time, but it goes back farther still."

We alighted at the portico and entered the big, barnlike vestibule. While I was sending in a card, Page darted quickly to the door of the East room, then hurriedly beckoned to us to join her. As we did so, she said:

"There's a lot of school ma'ams here, an' Ah think the Presiden' is goin' to receive them, an' it would be a good chance for Miss Melinda to see him."

Sure enough, the big yellow damask sofas of the East room were drawn out across the doorway of the red corridor, to form a barrier against the eager women who were pressing forward to catch the first glimpse and get the first handshake of the Chief Executive when he should appear. Cousin Melinda gave herself up to a prolonged stare at every object in the vast room. She eyed the crystal chandeliers, she shuffled her feet over the yellow carpet to make sure that it was velvet. She passed her hand over the yellow upholstery of the chairs and sofas and pulled out the folds of the yellow hangings and fingered the tassels at the windows. She wanted to be convinced that there was no sham anywhere, and she only desisted from her delightful investigations when the sudden opening of the doors and the hush which fell upon the room attracted her attention and she found herself facing the President. She stood in rapt silence and watched closely every motion of the President as he rapidly disposed of the delegation. There was on her face almost an expression of awe. At last she said, as though to herself:

"So that's William McKinley. He is a shorter man and a stouter man and a grayer man than I'd have thought, and he looks very tired;" then she wound up with an enthusiasm that was quite out loud and that was wholly unrestrained:

"But he's handsomer and bigger and greater every way than I——"

I plucked her by the sleeve and drew my eyebrows together in warning, while a huge man, almost the only one among all that throng of women, said heartily in response:

"I echo your sentiments, madam."

When the whole thing was over and the President had retired, we were ushered into the red corridor and were permitted to wander through the private part of the house much as we pleased, save that an usher was in discreet attendance. It was just as we were about to enter the Green room that I noticed that Cousin Melinda seemed to be hanging back in the darker corridor without. As I stepped back she seemed to shrink from me, and I noticed that one hand was buried in the folds of her ample gown. I said concernedly:

"What is the matter, Cousin Melinda?"

She drew out reluctantly something she was holding in her hand, and to my horror and surprise I saw it was one of the yellow tassels from the hangings in the East room. All sorts of dreadful stories flashed through my brain of the devastating relic-hunter kind. I said impatiently:

"How did you get it, and why?"

"I did not mean to get it at all. I only took up the thing to see whether it was all silk or all worsted and it came off in my hand, and just then you called me."

"Throw it down anywhere and come along," I said in a vexed way.

"I can't: that man's right behind me and he'll see it."

"Then cram it into your pocket," I said exasperatedly.

"My goodness, Agatha, it's a quarter of a yard long and weighs a ton," she answered in desperation.

By this time the usher was catching up to where we stood, so we hastily stepped into the bright light of the Green room, and Page, whipping a long hat pin out of her hat, said, under her breath:

"Give it to me; Ah'll pin it to somethin'."

And Page took the stiff, clumsy, yellow thing and pinned it to the first object that came to hand, which was a green upholstered chair, and there it dangled in most conspicuous and disgraceful fashion. When the usher joined us we were all examining the famous Malachite clock on the mantel. But we did not tarry, for the room which held that tassel held no charms for us. Page rattled away to the usher and they became quite chummy. He had been in the White House for thirty-five years or more and told many interesting things in quaint, queer English. He told of the early struggles the Presidents had to get an appropriation from Congress to light the White House by other means than tallow-dips, and it was not till the time of Polk that tallow-dips were abolished, and they were only abolished then because some enterprising politician made campaign capital out of them.

We did not stop long in the Blue room,

THE SHOUTING, EGG-ROLLING CROWDS IN THE GROUNDS BELOW

where the President receives foreign Ambassadors, nor even in the cheerful Red room, where the Presidential family usually congregates, and where Mr. Lincoln spent the last moments of his home life, talking animatedly to Mr. Colfax until the carriage was announced to take him to the theatre from which he never returned. From the Red room we went to the State dining-room. It was here that Cousin Melinda found her first real sham in the shape of the State dining-table with its mahogany legs and top made out of pine boxes. Not even the handsome plateau of glass with its gilt standards for flowers and bonbons, which Jefferson purchased in France, could make up to her for that table top. Nor yet did the beautiful china purchased by Mrs. Hayes quite make her forget it. I pointed out to her one particularly magnificent set of plates and said:

"How would you like to dine off that plate with that prairie fire sweeping over it and with those lurid flames almost leaping up into your face?"

"Well, I'd a sight rather have less china and more top to my table," she said, returning to her grievance.

Of course we did up the Conservatory, and I was careful not to let the old lady out of my sight during our walk through this embowered garden, lest she should get herself into more trouble. Afterward we viewed the State bedroom upstairs, with its gloomy rosewood furniture and sombre hangings. Here it was that President Harrison died, and that the Prince of Wales had slept when he visited this country. Cousin Melinda could not take her eyes off the cumbersome bed, with its curtains which reached nearly to the ceiling and with its cushioned sides. She said to the attendant:

"Do you call that thing a bed? Well, it only needs wheels to be a first-rate catafalque."

Page retired to a window to laugh while the usher said solemnly:

"They do say, madam, that after the inauguration of a new President, the first night of the second week the ghostly form of William Henry Harrison, who died in this bed, is seen to issue from this room and, with slow and solemn tread, to make a tour of the house, and fade finally into the dim obscurity of the darkest hour before dawn."

"Well, I'm not surprised," returned Cousin Melinda in all seriousness.

The next spot we visited was the Library, the gem of the White House. Our attendant first went to see that we should not be intruding upon any of the family before he ushered us into this charming room. Page, to whom everything here was familiar, went to the deep-cushioned window-seats in the windows to gaze down upon the shouting, egg-rolling throng of children in the grounds below, while we inspected things within. The writing-table, made from the ship Resolute, was covered with every article one could possibly want, either to guide the hand or to help the thought, and upon every sheet, envelope and card was stamped "Executive Mansion." The Milton shield, purchased at the Centennial, stood upon an easel and the usher quite descanted upon it:

"Observe, ladies, that Adam and Eve as represented upon this shield are strictly 'Scriptorial.'"

I was sorry Page had missed this description. I found that Cousin Melinda was interested in the contents of the bookcases, and when I drew near she was reading aloud:

"Edinburgh Reviews and Blackwood's Magazines, humph! Lots of reports—nothing there to vitiate the mind——"

"Unless," I interrupted, "you deem Maria Edgeworth's Moral Tales calculated to such mischief."

"Maria Edgeworth!" she sniffed contemptuously. "Why, Agatha, there's not a scientific nor a philosophical work to be seen, and scarcely a poet save Hood. As for any modern works, why there's not a thing here that has been issued later than twenty years ago!"

Just here a messenger came to the library to say that, if the ladies would descend to the Blue room, the President and Mrs. McKinley would be there for a few minutes and would receive them, for they were just about to greet the children from the portico which opens off the Blue room. Cousin Melinda was radiant at the prospect and I dared not take my eye off her for a single instant during the next half hour.

When we reached the Blue room, the long windows that led to the portico were open, and coming in upon the spring air were the strains of Hail to the Chief and the joyous cheering of the children at the sight of the Presidential pair waving to them from the balcony railing. It was but a moment later when I was making my greetings to them and was turning to present my old lady cousin. Scarcely had the President taken her hand in his than she half bent her knee and, with the prettiest old-fashioned dignity, swept him a curtsy. The President, not to be outdone, bent low over her hand. This quaint respect Cousin Melinda repeated to Mrs. McKinley, who smiled and spoke graciously. And it was all like a bit out of an old-time play.

When we were driving away, Page attempted to rally her upon her sweeping obeisance. She said with the utmost simplicity:

"It was not to the man, but to the Chief of our Nation, to whom I was paying homage."

Egerton Castle's Warlike Avocation

IF MR. EGERTON CASTLE were to lack all other means of support he could earn his living as a fencing master. It is rather pleasant to think that a writer of novels of the school in which broadsword and rapier play such an important part should know how to handle those weapons. When Mr. Castle is in London, which is the greater part of the year, he goes regularly every afternoon to the London Fencing Club, a little low building which visitors to London will notice just across from St. James' Palace. Here Mr. Castle has a lively hour of fencing, and, although his skill is the result of years, he is still an earnest student of the technique of the foils.

It is, indeed, on the subject of fencing that Mr. Castle first appeared as an author. Schools and Masters of Fence, published in 1884, and Bibliotheca Dimicatoria, in 1890, were his first two books. Nowadays, when Mr. George Alexander is producing a romantic play at the St. James' Theatre, it is generally Mr. Castle who is called in to arrange the fights.

INCOMPARABLE FOR THEIR GREAT CREAMY LUXURIOUS LATHER
WILLIAMS'

SHAVING SOAPS
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cts.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cts.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cts.
Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cts.
Jersey Cream (Toilet) Soap, 15 cts.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barber's) 4 Round Cakes, 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 2c. stamp.
THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
GLASTONBURY, CONN.

PROTECT YOUR CHECKS WITH THE Indelible Automatic Check Perforator
$5.00
CHECKS pass through many hands—a temptation for the dishonest. $5.00 invested in our AUTOMATIC CHECK PERFORATOR prevents trouble, lawsuits and a loss of many dollars. This is the only machine that perforates holes in paper with indelible ink—spread ink—an absolute protection to the signer. This small, simple machine ever devised by an ornament to your desk, and is sent, express paid, on receipt of $5.00. Money returned if not satisfactory.
SCHOOL AND OFFICE SUPPLY COMPANY
Grand Rapids, Mich.
Illustrated office supply bargain catalogue free.

Are You a Machine?
If you do mechanical work in a mechanical way your hope of success depends on your turning squarely around and putting brains and originality into your work. Whether you work at a lathe or a ledger you can take a technical course by mail and change your occupation without loss of time or salary. Courses in Engineering, Drafting, Surveying, Book-Keeping, Shorthand, etc. Capital, $1,500,000. Fees, cash or installments.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1171
Scranton
Pa.

$2 to $6 a Day You can make it by taking agency for the wonderful
HARP-O-CHORD
A Mouth-Harp and Zither combined. Sells like hot cakes. Every Mouth-Harp player wants one. A Whole Band in one instrument, and any one can play it and astonish everybody. Remarkably sweet, powerful tone; sounds like a complete orchestra. 17 inches long, elegant finish. Price $5.00. To agents $3.00, including full outfit, tape, key, instructions, printing outfit to stamp agent's name, circulars, etc. Less price after first sample.
Send but $1.00 with order and pay balance of $2 only if perfectly satisfied after trial. Money refunded if not exactly as represented. Fine illustrated catalogue and testimonials sent prepaid for 2 names harp-players. Write to-day for agency.
The Harp-O-Chord Co., 28-30 L St., Columbus, Ohio

TEACH YOURSELF MUSIC
DURING LEISURE MOMENTS AT HOME
Piano, Organ, Guitar and Voice
Any one can learn all TUNES, NOTES, CHORDS, ACCOMPANIMENTS and the LAWS OF HARMONY in a short time. It is the CHEAPEST, EASIEST, most rapid and correct way on earth to learn music. Over 40,000 youngest kind of testimonials received. Goes to the bottom of music, makes it clear to the beginner; creates a fondness for music because you succeed from the start. A few days' practice and you play perfect ACCOMPANIMENTS IN ALL KEYS. CIRCULARS FREE. Write for them. Worth hundreds of dollars to any one interested in MUSIC. SAMPLE LESSONS, 10 CENTS.
U. S. RICE MUSIC CO., 8/211 Wabash Avenue, CHICAGO

"Look at the beauty of the view," says the Deacon

Parsons' Pond

By W. L. Alden

"YES, sir," said the keeper of the Prairie Hotel, "there used to be a pond in that there identical hollow. Blue Lake, the folks used to call it, though it wasn't much of a lake, being only about an acre in size. I remember all about the draining of that pond, and it's considerable of a story.

"You see, in those days—it was along in about 1885—this house where we are sitting and enjoying the beauties of Nature at about as low a figure as they can be furnished for in any part of the State of Illinois, belonged to a man by the name of Parsons, and just over yonder on the flat, on the other side of where the pond used to be, was a house that belonged to Deacon Smedley. Parsons and Smedley were both farmers and they were mighty good friends, though the Deacon was a particular straight-laced old chap and Parsons wasn't even hopefully pious. Parsons' farm ran down to one side of the pond and the Deacon's farm was on the other side. One of them—I don't rightly remember at this minute which one it was—owned a skiff, and every evening he would row across the pond and sit for an hour with the other, smoking just as you and I are doing; or else engaging in profitable conversation about the crops, or the interests of the church, or something of that kind. Neither of the men were married and they were both what you might call old bachelors, though the Deacon was considerable the oldest of the two, being close on to sixty years, while Parsons might have been anywhere this side of fifty; he being one of those men who never trouble themselves about anything, but just go along smiling a little here and cussing a little there, and getting pretty near all there is to enjoy out of life.

"One day an idea struck Parsons. There was a chap spending a day or two with him who was a surveyor, and this chap calculated the amount of land that was under the water of that pond, and how much it would be worth if it was above water and could be cultivated. Then he showed Parsons what an easy thing it would be to drain the pond by digging a ditch about ten rods long and, say, four or five feet deep. Parsons thought it over and made up his mind that he would do it, and so the next evening when he rowed over to the Deacon's—and now I remember that it was Parsons who owned the skiff—he told the Deacon what he calculated to do.

"Deacon Smedley was a good man, or he wouldn't have been a deacon, but his best friends had to admit that he was set in his way. He was about the slowest man to take in a new idea that you could find in the whole United States. Consequently, when Parsons proposed draining the pond, the Deacon said that he'd never consent to it.

"'But,' says Parsons, 'what's the use of the pond, anyway? There's the creek over the other side of the pasture and that's all either of us wants for watering the stock. There ain't any water power to be got out of a pond, and what's the use of water that can't run a mill and that the cattle don't need to drink is more than I can see.'

"'Look at the beauty of the view,' says the Deacon. 'I can set here on this veranda and enjoy it every day in the week except, of course, on Sunday; and I tell you that a taste for enjoying the beautiful creations that are all around us is one of the things that a true Christian ought to have.'

"'I can't see any beauty in a lot of stagnant water,' says Parsons. 'Now, if that pond held buttermilk, it would be an interesting sight, and we could make money by fencing it in and letting people through the gate to look at it for a quarter of a dollar each; but why any man should enjoy looking at nothing but plain water I can't see.'

"'That, brother Parsons, is probably because you are a worldly man,' says the Deacon. 'You can't see things in the light that I do; but you can probably see that I won't agree to have that pond drained just to gratify your carnal instincts.'

"'There ain't no occasion for cussing and swearing at me,' says Parsons, who was a little riled at what the Deacon said. 'Besides, I consider that using language such as you just used ain't the thing for any deacon to do.'

"'I didn't ask your opinion of my language,' says the Deacon. 'All you have to do is to understand that while I'm living, and owning this particular farm, that pond ain't going to be drained by no man.'

"'And what I want you to understand,' says Parsons, getting more and more riled, 'is that one-half of that pond belongs to me, according to the deed that was drawed when I bought it of you. The line between our two farms runs exactly through the middle of that pond, and the deed says that I own the land under the water up to that dividing line. Now I'm going to drain my half of the pond, and if you don't like it you can do the other thing.'

"'Mr. Parsons,' says the Deacon, getting up and standing where he could shake his finger in the style that he used to shake it when he was exhorting sinners in the church, 'if you drain that pond I'll have the law of you, if I have to spend my bottom dollar. That's all I have to say to you, and you are at liberty to take that skiff of yours and go over to your own side of the pond and stay there. I've done with you, and I'm sorry that I ever forgot myself so far as to have any dealings with a man of sin.'

"That was enough for Parsons.

"The next morning he sent for his friend, the surveying sharp, and asked him to calculate just how many gallons of water there were in the pond. At the same time he set to work to drain his half of the pond. He dug a ditch, and put a six-inch iron pipe into it, and a gate to keep back the water when he didn't want it to run. The surveyor told him exactly how many gallons of water would run through the six-inch pipe in the course of an hour, and Parsons calculated that when he turned the water into the pipe he could let it run until his half of the pond had been emptied, when he reckoned to shut down the gate and let the Deacon keep his half of the water. In the course of a month the ditch was finished and the pipe laid and the gate all ready. Then, one morning, Parsons opened the gate and let the water go on its way rejoicing.

"It took pretty near four days for Parsons' share of the water to run off, but before it was all gone he got a summons from the court, requiring him to answer the complaint of the Deacon that he had willfully, and with malice aforethought, ruined a pond that belonged to the Deacon as much as it did to him. The case came on to be tried at the next session of the county court, and both sides employed the best lawyers in the State. It lasted for about a week and the lawyers had it nip and tuck, as you might say. Parsons' lawyer claimed that, according to the deeds of the property of the Deacon and Parsons, each of them owned one-half of the pond, and that the dividing line ran through the middle of it. He said that what Parsons owned was, of course, his own property, which certainly did seem reasonable. Being his own property he had a right to do what he chose with it. According to the testimony of the surveyor, Parsons had drained away only one-half of the water, and therefore the Deacon had no call to object to Parsons using his own water in his own way.

"Then the Deacon's lawyer had his inning. He allowed that half of the water belonged to Parsons; and he said that if Parsons had only used his half of the water the Deacon would have had no reason for complaining of him. But he claimed that Parsons had drained away water that did not belong to him. The Deacon's water, so the lawyer argued, had always risen to a certain point on his farm. Since Parsons began his draining operations, the water on the Deacon's side of the pond had fallen about three feet. This clearly showed that Parsons had drained away water that didn't belong to him, and consequently he must pay the Deacon damages. Then Parsons' lawyer said that if the Deacon had allowed his share of the water to run away, that was his own fault, and Parsons was not responsible for it. If the Deacon had taken the trouble to build a water-tight wall down through the middle of the pond, separating his half of the water from Parsons' half, none of it would have been lost. The Deacon had not been willing to take this trouble; and he had only himself to blame if some of his water had accidentally run away, along with the water belonging to Parsons.

"The jury were beginning to think that Parsons was in the right, when the Deacon's lawyer started a new idea. He said that Parsons and the Deacon undoubtedly owned the pond together, and that each of them owned half of the water, but that the dividing line which ran through the middle of the pond divided the land under the water, and not the water itself. He read from half a dozen big books to prove that the Deacon and Parsons owned half of each and every drop of water that there was in the pond, and that if Parsons wanted to claim his own share of the water and separate it from the share owned by the Deacon, he should have divided each and every drop of water in the pond—taking his half drop and leaving the other half drop to the Deacon. This sounded so scientific and astonishing that the jury almost made up their minds that it was right and that Parsons had made a big mistake; but Parsons' lawyer soon convinced them that the other lawyer's argument wasn't worth anything. Says he, 'When a man goes to a grocery and buys half a gallon of molasses he doesn't require the grocer to divide every drop of molasses that he has in the grocery. He merely expects him to draw half a gallon out of a cask and give it to him. That half gallon is his and the rest of the molasses is the grocer's.' It never seemed to me that this was a first-class argument, but it hit the jury where they lived, for the reason that the foreman was a grocer, and didn't want to have any precedent which would require him to spend time dividing drops of molasses, or anything of the sort, every time he sold a half gallon or so. The grocer was a prominent citizen and half of the men on the jury owed him money. Naturally they thought as he did; so the Deacon's lawyer lost that point in the game.

"The Judge summed up in something of a hurry, for the trial had lasted a good while and the arguments were of the kind that naturally make a man thirsty. He charged the jury that, as a matter of law, Parsons undoubtedly owned half of the pond and undoubtedly had a right to do what he chose with his own property. That was as good as telling the jury to decide in Parsons' favor, which accordingly they did, and Parsons got judgment with costs. The Deacon was like a raging lion, and he swore, so folks say—though I don't believe myself that he went further than saying 'darn,' or something more or less innocent of that sort—that he'd get even with Parsons yet.

"The next day Parsons opened the gate and let half of the water that remained in the pond run off. The Deacon immediately brought another suit, but Parsons' lawyer took the ground that the dividing line mentioned in the deed still ran through the middle of the pond; and that, consequently, Parsons still owned all the water that was on

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

Folding Pocket Kodaks have achromatic lenses, automatic shutters, are made of aluminum and load in daylight. $10.00 to $17.50.

Eastman Kodak Co.
Rochester, N. Y.

Catalogues free at the dealers' or by mail.

Letters Copied While Writing

No press; no water; no brush; no work. Any ink; any pen; any paper. Our Pen-Carbon never smuts; our clip holds paper firm. Write with no extra pressure, and our Pen-Carbon Letter Book produces a perfect copy. For letters, bills, etc. Can be used anywhere. If your stationer does not keep it, write for free sample. Address Dept. G.

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.
145-7-9 Centre Street, New York

Magni-Photo Process

Enlarges the smallest negative or photograph to any size, so that it excels in beauty the finest engraving.

SAMPLE OFFER

Send negative and 50 cts.

Or photograph and

75 cts.

Which we will re-mail promptly with finished enlargement 8 x 10. Money refunded if not satisfied. FREE, circular price-list for sizes up to 40 x 72.

Send 10 cts. for an 8 x 10 enlargement of this picture as a sample of what we can do with a 2-inch negative.

AMET MAGNI-PHOTO COMPANY, Waukegan, Ill.

NATURAL COLORS BY

Photography

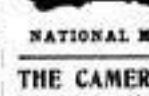
All Ready for the Amateur

McDonough Method. One Negative—One Exposure. Send for Descriptive Catalogue.

INTERNATIONAL COLOR-PHOTO CO.
139-141 East 56th Street, CHICAGO, ILL.

A Revival of the Dainty Portraiture of the 17th Century

Exquisitely Hand-Colored Miniatures, fitted in Handsome Gem-Set Rolled Gold Brooch, 1 or 1¼ inch in diameter. These Miniatures retail regularly at $2.00. To introduce, we will copy from any picture sent us one of these set gems and mail free on receipt of $1.00, currency or P. O. Order. Copy returned. Address



ANGLO-AMERICAN ART CO., York, Pa.

BRADLEY Platinum Paper

For sale by dealers everywhere, or by mail direct. Sample picture for stamp. The Paper on which Photographic Masterpieces are made.

JOHN BRADLEY, 47 N. 13th Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Wonder Instrument of the Age

A Musical Novelty, the Multiphone Clarionet. Any one can become a virtuoso and produce enthralling music on this instrument with 5 minutes' practice. Postpaid, 50 cents, with full instructions.

NATIONAL MULTIPHONE CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CAMERA Is a Monthly Magazine, devoted entirely to the Amateur Photographer. It is full of practical hints, told in plain language. To introduce ourselves, we will send it for 1 year for 50c. (Philadelphia subscribers, 50c.) No sample copies. The Camera, 18 S. 5th St., Philadelphia his side of the line. The case was tried before the same Judge who had tried the first case, and by this time he was getting tired of it. Parsons' lawyer admitted that before the draining operations began half of the water that was in the pond belonged to the Deacon, and that it was his business to take care of it. This he had failed to do, and it had run over to Parsons' property and, consequently, he had the right to drain it away. The Deacon's lawyer did his best to contradict this, but he didn't succeed. The Judge charged again clean in Parsons' favor and Parsons got a second verdict.

Digitized by Google

"Parsons wasn't content yet. When the trial was over he started in and drained away half of the water that was left, thus reducing the pond to a little puddle that the sun dried up in the course of a week. The Deacon didn't bring another suit. He knew that there would be no use in it, and, besides, he had a better plan in his head. There was a creek, as I think I mentioned, on the east side of the two farms, about two hundred yards from where the pond used to be; and the Deacon set to work to dig a ditch through his own property from that creek to the place of the pond. It cost him considerable money, for there was a small hill in the way that had to be cut through, but he was ready to spend his last dollar for the sake of getting square with Parsons.

"When the ditch was dug, the Deacon turned on the water one night, and in the morning the pond was pretty near half full again. You see, the water came in through the Deacon's ditch about three times as fast as it could run off through Parsons' pipe.

"Parsons brought an action against the Deacon for flooding Parsons' valuable land with water. However, the suit never came to trial, as you will see when I get on a little further in thishyer story.

"Parsons was, as I've been saying, a good sort of chap, and, after he had beaten the Deacon in court, he began to feel sorry that they had ever quarreled. They had been friends for going on thirty years and had smoked a good many tons of tobacco together. Neither of them was a married man, so they had trusted each other with all their private affairs. Parsons had enjoyed getting the best of the Deacon about the draining of the pond and in their two lawsuits; but now it came over him, especially at evening, when he sat smoking alone, that he sort of wished that he and the Deacon were friends, so that he could go over to the Deacon's place and have a little general and improving conversation once more. Once he met the Deacon in Mather's store, over in the village, and said 'Good-morning' to him; but the Deacon, after looking through him for a minute, as you might say, just remarked in a general sort of way, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' and turned and went out of the store. After that there didn't seem to be any prospect of a reconciliation, and most people thought that the difficulty would come to be settled in the end by shooting, in spite of the fact that the Deacon was a deacon and that Parsons was the sort of useless man who don't know a gun from a shoe horn.

"You've probably heard of cloudbursts. No? Well! I am surprised to hear you say that you haven't. That shows that you don't know much about the resources of our country. A cloudburst is when a shower, instead of coming down in drops, just comes down in a solid lump—or I suppose I ought to say in a liquid lump, though I don't believe in being so particular careful in selecting words, so long as I can say what I set out to say. You pour water out of a watering-pot and that will be like a shower. Then you dump a whole washtub full of water on the ground and that will be like a cloudburst.

"Now, along in the month of August, or mebbe September, it don't matter particular which, there was a cloudburst a few miles to the northward of here. The pond between Parsons' farm and the Deacon's was full, just as it had been before Parsons undertook to drain it. Parsons was setting on his front veranda after his noon meal, smoking his pipe and wondering when the two-foot pipe that he had ordered for the purpose of draining the pond over again would arrive, when a man rides by on a horse at full gallop, yelling to him that there had been a cloudburst and that the creek would be down in a few minutes. Parsons didn't care much about it, for his house stood on high ground, just where this house stands, and the creek was a good distance away from him. All of a sudden he remembers the ditch that the Deacon had dug from the creek to the pond, and wondered whether the water that the cloudburst was bringing down would follow the old bed of the creek or would turn off through the Deacon's ditch and come into the pond. If the water did take a notion of coming into the pond, the chances were that it would carry off the Deacon's house, which was close to the edge of the pond, and was set up on piles about a foot above the ground. Parsons rushed for his skiff, calculating to cross the pond and warn the Deacon, but before he could cast the skiff loose he heard a tremendous roar, and looked up and saw a big wave of water and mud and driftwood, about ten feet high, coming along the route of the Deacon's ditch and making straight for the pond. He saw it wasn't of any use trying to reach the Deacon ahead of the water; so he hauled his skiff, which was a light one, up toward his house, until he was sure that it was out of danger, and then he looked to see what the water would do.

"He didn't have to wait many seconds. The water struck the Deacon's house and carried it away like a feather. As it went tearing down the valley, where Parsons' drainage pipe was located, he saw the Deacon climbing out on the roof, where he set down, straddling the ridge pole, and looking like a castaway sailor on a big hen-coop. He went out of sight, around a curve in the valley; and then the water settled down to run in a steady stream, say a hundred yards wide, and as swift as the rapids below Niagara.

"Parsons didn't waste any time in speculating on the Deacon's probable fate. He just dragged his skiff back to the edge of the water and launched her, jumped in and took to the oars like all possessed. He was a middling handy man with the oars in quiet water, but this was the first time he had ever tried to outrow a cloudburst, and naturally he had to bend his back and do his level best. He rowed so, he afterward said, about two miles, never looking out for floating trees, or drowned cattle, or anything of the kind, but just rowing his level best and taking his chances. At the end of the two miles he overtook the Deacon and his house, and, catching on to a window-blind, he sung out for the Deacon to hurry up and get in the boat. The Deacon looked at him but never said a word, and Parsons began to get a little riled.

"'See here, you blamed old idiot,' he yelled. 'There's the Jumping-off Place only a mile below you!' You see, the Jumping-off Place was a precipice about fifty feet high, and the flood was making straight for it. But the Deacon kept on hardening his heart, same as old Pharaoh, and Parsons tried another tack.

"'Deacon,' says he, 'I've risked my life to save you, for the sake of old times. Come along, and I'll never meddle with that darned pond again.'

"Then the Deacon softened and, climbing down very careful, for he hated to get his feet wet, got into the boat. After a bit he said:

"'Mr. Parsons, I suppose that thishyer is a humiliation laid on me for my sins and I'd do wrong to neglect it. I'll even go so far as to say that I'm much obliged to you for your trouble.'

"Parsons didn't say nothing, but just pulled for the shore. He had a close shave from going over the precipice before he could fetch a landing place; but he finally ran the boat into an eddy, and then he and the Deacon climbed ashore. They stood looking at one another without speaking for a minute or two, and then Parsons says: 'Deacon! I ain't what you call hopefully pious, but it seems to me that we ought to thank God for this escape.' And the Deacon says: 'We will thank God for this escape, and also for bringing two foolish old friends together again.' And then he put his arms around Parsons, as if he had been his old woman, and he just gave a sort of sob, and then burst out praying in his best style.

"There wasn't any more question about draining the pond. The cloudburst attended to that, and when it was over the creek went back to its old bed, and there wasn't a drop of water left in the pond. The Deacon and Parsons were better friends than ever, and the day the Deacon brought Parsons into the church and stood by him while he was baptized won't be forgotten by any who saw it."

DRAWN BY C. CHAPIN EASTON.

"SEE HERE, YOU BLAMED OLD IDIOT," HE YELLED. "THERE'S THE JUMPING-OFF PLACE ONLY A MILE BELOW YOU!""

Not How Much You Pay But What It Costs!

G & J TIRES may cost most in the beginning but cost nothing for repairs.

OTHER TIRES may cost less in the beginning and prove most expensive in the end.

OUR CATALOGUE EXPLAINS IT ALL.

226 G & J TIRE CO., Indianapolis

It Would Look Better

More homelike, if your lawn were neatly fenced. This HARTMAN STEEL ROD LAWN FENCE With steel posts is MOST DURABLE, HANDSOME and CHEAP. Look into the matter. Illustrated catalogue free.

HARTMAN MFG. CO., Box 125, Ellwood City, Pa., or Room 101, 309 Broadway, New York City

ANY MAKE BICYCLE

You want at one-fourth price.

600 Second-Hand Bicycles, all makes, good as new $3 to $10

NEW 1899 and 1898 MODELS, High Grade, $8 to $13

1900 Models, best makes, all styles, fully guaranteed $11 to $20

Great Factory Clearing Sale

We ship anywhere for inspection. Send your address. If you are UNABLE to BUY we can assist you to EARN A BICYCLE distributing catalogues for us. Write for agency and commence work AT ONCE.

MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. 117 K, Chicago

LET US STRAIN

The Bugs, Flies and Mosquitoes

FROM THE SUMMER AIR FOR YOU

Our Good Fly Screens for Good Houses are delivered anywhere at moderate cost.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED DESCRIPTION AND SAMPLES OF MATERIALS.

THE A. J. PHILLIPS CO., Fenton, Mich.

We also have a good line of agency goods.

You Want a Swing

That is made of steel, with canopy top—a really comfortable seat. Not the old, screeching, saw-buck kind, but one that is an ornament to your lawn. ALL kinds—for Parks, Whole Family, for Baby, and even for Dolls. Largest variety in the World. Booklet free.

D. H. BAUSMAN, Mfr.

Bausman, Lancaster County, Penna.

The Man in the Bubble

An amusing novelty. You can blow a single bubble with a figure inside, or a cluster of 3 to 15 bubbles alone, or with a figure in the centre of the cluster. The outfit is unbreakable. It contains one fancy turned-wood pipe, one tin cluster blower, two fancy metal figures with wire attachments. Complete outfit, with prepared soap and illustrated circular giving full directions, sent, postpaid, for 15c. stamps or currency.

Home Amusement Co., 251 Knickerbocker Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

SHADE TO ORDER

At a small cost. It makes no difference whether there are trees in your yard or not if you have a

Wayne Hammock and Canopy Stand

Wears for years. Easily moved. A treat for the children, comfort for the old folks. Send for free circulars and price list. Parts sold separately.

QUICK MFG. CO., Sole Mfrs., Dept. Z, Galien, Mich.

The Great Secret of the Canary Breeders of the Hartz. מאננא BIRD MANNA restores song to cage birds and preserves them in health. 15c. by mail. Sold by druggists. Directions free. Bird Food Co., 400 N. 3d St., Phila., Pa.

STARK TREES PAY BEST by Test—74 Years. Largest Nursery. Fruit Book free. We Cash Weekly and want More more and traveling salesmen.

STARK BROS., Louisiana, Mo.; Dansville, N. Y.

Digitized by Google

Results Make Reputation

Singer Machines, either lock-stitch or chain-stitch, are the successful result of long experience and constant improvements in the endeavor to make nothing but the best sewing-machines for family use. The accomplishment of this result requires six of the largest, best-equipped factories in the world, and the best inventive talent of the age. Twelve thousand workmen are employed in these factories. Experience counts with THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY. The average term of employment among these workmen exceeds a decade.

Sold on instalments
Old Machines taken in exchange

The Singer Manufacturing Co.
"Sewing-Machine Makers for the World."

B. Eldredge AUTOMATIC

The Best All-Around Family Sewing Machine Made.

Easy Running, High Speed, Simple and Silent.

SOLD AT A REASONABLE PRICE AND FULLY GUARANTEED.

Send for Circular.

NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO.
BELVIDERE, ILL.

Chicago House, 49 JACKSON BOULEVARD. New York House, 93 READE STREET.

Daisy Gas Ironing Machine

Saves Time
Saves Work

This Mangle will screw to any ordinary kitchen table. It is simple in construction and non-destructible. With this machine in your house, where it takes four hours to do your ironing, you could do the same amount in fifteen minutes. Cost of gas, one cent per hour. We also manufacture large Mangles for hotels and laundries. Price, $12.00.

Send for circulars and particulars to

T. & P. COLLIER, RACINE, WIS.

New Hat 3c

HAT BLEACH cleans straw hats in 5 minutes. Makes an old hat look as good as new without injuring the straw or thread. Price per box (cleans 8 hats), 25c, postpaid. Trial package, 10c. Agts. wanted.

HAT BLEACH CO.
99 E. Market St., Xenia, O.

BRAIN TICKLERS. "Mental Nuts" and how to crack 'em. 100 real, old catch problems. First Class Entertainment for Home Circle, Club or Socials. Mailed, 10c stamps.
HOME SUPPLY COMPANY, A. S., 102 Nassau Street, New York

Are You Deaf?

We have 25 kinds of Instruments to Assist Hearing. Sent on approval. Write for catalogue.
W. T. WILLIS & CO., 136 South 11th Street, Philadelphia

TYPEWRITERS. All Makes

Machines ¼ Mfr's prices. RENTED ANYWHERE, allowing rental to apply. Write for catalogue. Typewriter Emporium, 206 La Salle St., Chicago.

The Cash-Boys' College

By Perriton Maxwell

IN MODEST quarters in New York there is carried on with systematic zeal an educational enterprise which promises to develop into a far-reaching factor of modern business life. It is a school for cash-boys, where they may not only acquire those educational benefits denied them by poverty or neglect, but may be trained in the way a successful business man should go. In a word, the cash-boy attending this particular school is taught with his penmanship the uses of commercial paper; with his spelling, the practices of trade in the purchase and sale of goods; with his geography, the extent of exports, and with his arithmetic, the true purposes of money. The cash-boys' college is two years old and owes its existence to Mr. John Wanamaker, and its present success to one who serves that great merchant in a responsible position in his New York establishment.

The "cash-boys' college" began as a matter of experiment; it flourishes to-day as an essential part of a money-making property. Its success has inspired other large concerns to imitate it in a small way. Before many years the cash-boys' school as an adjunct of the department store will doubtless have passed into permanency. As for the original institution, it now numbers three hundred students—the full staff of cash-boys employed in the store in New York.

The hours of attendance at school are from eight to ten in the morning. Each student must report for study twice each week. It is obvious that all the boys could not attend in a body while their services were required elsewhere; hence they are divided into classes of one hundred each.

The school was first opened in a section of the basement of the big New York store. It has outgrown its original quarters and is now settled in a building just across the street from the establishment—on Ninth Street near Broadway. Here are the usual furnishings of a school—desks, maps, blackboards, books of reference, writing materials—all school-room paraphernalia.

The Boy Who Never Lacks a Place

There is one notable fact about the students of the "cash-boys' college" which differentiates them from other youngsters in the race for knowledge: they are wage-earners as well as pupils. Not a lad of them but is adding his mite to the support of a family; they know what the struggle for existence means. That is why they delve into their books with an intentness not usual among care-free boys of their age, and that is why they need no urging to take advantage of the opportunity for an education.

The man whose business it is to hire the cash-boys declares his no easy task.

"It is much more difficult to hire a boy than it is to hire a man," says he. "The look of a man's face is fixed, and his character is more or less indicated in his countenance. It is not so with a boy. I never engage a boy on first sight, for when a lad applies for a position he is seen at his best. If clothes and shoes and teeth and finger-nails are unclean, then you may be sure they will not be different afterward.

"The first step in employing a cash-boy, so far as our rule is concerned, is to note his face and general appearance. The first question asked a prospective cash-boy concerns his age, for the law requires that he must be at least fourteen years old. If the applicant says he is under fourteen, we inquire if he has a certificate from the Board of Health, which gives a general description of him. If he says no, we tell him his application cannot be considered until he gets this document, as the firm employing a boy under age, without proper license, is open to a heavy fine. It is the neat, quick, polite boy who is given employment in our establishment.

"I would employ any boy with these qualifications even if he came unrecommended. The trouble with most boys is that they are too impatient for promotion; they will not work with an eye to the future. When we do find a lad who works as if he hoped to own the place some fine day, who gets down to harness at the outset, he is pushed right ahead by more willing hands than he can count."

To appreciate the workings of the "cash-boys' college," the cash-boy himself and his store duties must be understood. Some positions in a large department store are too difficult for a boy to fill constantly. As an example, the work for boys in the mail department involves such nervous strain that the young fellows who work there alternate with each other. One boy begins work at seven o'clock in the morning and continues until noon, and another boy then takes his place and works until five, the rest of the time being passed in doing light incidental work. Unless one has worked in the mail department of a big store he cannot appreciate the severity of its duties.

Breaking in New Material

After a boy is engaged he has to be broken in. When he is put in a particular department he is placed with an older boy who shows the newcomer the different parts of the house to which he will be dispatched on errands. Though the pneumatic tube system of sending cash to the desk is in vogue in some large stores, it in no way affects the usefulness of the cash-boy. The boys must report for duty at a quarter to eight o'clock. They are arranged in alphabetical divisions. They are kept down stairs, in the basement of the big store, until eight o'clock is sounded. Their badges are distributed, they are commanded to fall in and then march past the timekeeper, division by division. During business hours they are under the control and surveillance of the aisle managers or floor-walkers.

When the bell rings at six o'clock and the day's work is done, each boy deposits his badge in a place set apart for it and is free to go home. The conduct of each lad is noted in a ledger. That ledger will be of biographical worth some day when a few of the obscure names now written in its pages shall have become known in the business world. Read some of the comments opposite the boys' names: "Excellent boy," "Bright and willing," "Resigned to take better position." Are these not significant entries? There are others just as significant: "Impudent and careless," "Hard to manage," "Do not recommend to other firms," "Lazy," "Not desirable," "Discharged." There is a simple forecast of the future.

The "cash-boys' college" is in the hands of a very competent instructor, and it is a part of the method of the school to encourage every sign of aptitude, every show of talent for the business life. The books of the students here are of the kind most beneficial for the purpose in view—that of making alert men of affairs. Many of the formalities of ordinary school life are not found here, but a careful record of the work of each boy is maintained from his entrance to graduation. These records have much weight in determining the promotion of the student from cash-boy to stock-clerk—the first step upward to success.

The Aims and Successes of the College

The schoolboys, who are cadets as well as cash-boys, are divided into three classes. The lowest grade attends school Mondays and Thursdays; the next grade attends Tuesdays and Fridays; the highest grade on Wednesdays and Saturdays. The lower grades are taught writing, spelling, English composition, arithmetic and rapid calculation. These studies have been selected as the essential ones for a dry-goods man to have at his command. Listen to the opinions

Yerba Maté

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup."

Travelers returning from the Argentine Republic and other parts of South America where Yerba Maté is the national drink, invariably speak of the liveliness, healthy freshness and superb physical condition of the people. They abstain entirely from alcoholic drinks, feeling no need of them, and use tea or coffee but rarely.

Yerba Maté combines all the good qualities of tea and coffee, and is more delicious. It is prepared the same and is drank at meal time.

Ask your dealer, and if he hasn't it, we will send sample and booklet for 30 cents; or enough for 500 cups on receipt of $1.00. Agents wanted.

Yerba Maté Tea Co., Sole Importers
257 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia

Foster's Ideal Spring is as much more restful and comfortable than other springs as a Pullman Palace Car is more luxurious than an ordinary day-coach.

It is springy enough to conform to the shape of your whole body—it does not put your body in a cramped position as do woven-wire springs, by letting your body down where the weight is and leaving your feet up. It rests you from head to foot. Sleep on one 30 nights—if you're dissatisfied we'll see that

YOUR DEALER WILL REFUND MONEY

If you find one dealer who won't supply you, write us; we'll tell you of another who will.

Booklet Free. Write for it
FOSTER BROS. MFG. CO., 8 Broad St., Utica, N.Y.

Trim Waists

A shirt-waist may be as trim and stylish as a tailored gown if it is worn properly; but it must not draw up behind, nor cut the skirt sag.

The Priscilla

Skirt and Waist Holder keeps them securely together, does not make irregular fastenings, nor tear, like pins. The equalized strain assures perfect hang and contour. Insist on having the PRISCILLA—no other is as good. If your dealer hasn't it, send 10 cents to

The Safety Skirt Placket Co., 310 Main St., Ann Arbor, Mich.

THIS AUTOGRAPH IS NEVER ON A POOR SHADE-ROLLER AND NEVER ABSENT FROM A GOOD ONE

Stewart Hartshorn

GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

100 VISITING CARDS On fine quality card 2 x 3½ inches. Printed with name and address postpaid in any of the latest styles. Satisfaction guaranteed Booklet, "Card Style," free. 25c

A. P. SCHUSTER PRINTING CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Digitized by Google

DAWN

(Child Study from Life)

A platinum print of the above cut, 6½ x 8½ on 11 x 14 mount, sent to any address, together with our complete illustrated catalogue of

BEACON HILL PRINTS

For Fifty Cents

CATALOGUE ONLY, 10 CENTS

Celebrity Photo and Art Company
256 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

Ladies' Watches

OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.

The Blue Book sent free.

New England Watch Company
11 and 23 Maiden Lane, New York, 149 State Street, Chicago
Sprechels Building, San Francisco

LIFE INSURANCE

Our little, free booklet, "The How and The Why," tells about protecting one's life, financially speaking, and at the same time saving and accumulating money. The Company's aim is to take care of you in case you live. This is as important as to take care of somebody else in case you die. Read the booklet. It has the merit of brevity.

PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
921-923-925 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

CUFFS HELD

With the Improved Washburne Patent Cuff Holders can be placed just where you want them; will never slip but may be instantly released. Dainty. Suppressors, easily adjusted or taken off—excellent for holding golf trousers. By mail, 25c. the pair.

Catalogue showing these and other novelties, free.

American Ring Co., Box 93, Waterbury, Conn.

Ad Sense

Retailers, wholesalers, manufacturers, office men—all classes of business men read AD SENSE, and they say they like it. Monthly, $1.00 a year; to see how you like it send 10 cents—in coin or stamps—for a sample copy to AD SENSE, 81 Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

Parquet and Hardwood

Floors

Wax Floor Polish, etc.

J. DUNFEE & CO.
Cor. Franklin and Washington Sts.
CHICAGO

Send for Book of Designs

PATENTS FRANKLIN H. HOUGH
Washington, D. C.
No Attorney's Fee until Patent is Allowed.
Write for "Inventor's Guide."

DEAF OR HARD-OF-HEARING ADULTS CAN ACQUIRE

LIP-READING AT HOME

In six weeks. Easy, practical, interesting lessons by MAIL. One hour a day for study and practice. Results guaranteed. Thirty-sixth Year. Terms moderate. Send for circular.

DAVID GREENE, 1180 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

on this score of one who holds a high place in the house that has established the "cash-boys 'college":

"Blunders are more frequently made by men through lack of knowledge in the several educational branches taught in the 'cash-boys' college' than for any other cause. Legible writing, accurate orthography and correct, rapid figuring are the prime essentials in every business career. Without these fundamentals there is no hope for any one who embarks in a commercial pursuit.

"Cash-boys start in our place with a salary of two dollars and a half a week and, if found capable, are soon raised to three dollars. Stock-boys receive five dollars, and from thence the line of promotion and increased salary goes on up to salesman at fifteen or twenty dollars a week. Nearly all of the trusted employees of this establishment who are now drawing comfortable salaries have come up from the ranks of the cash-boys. The heads of the firm are self-made men, and it is only natural that they should take a keen interest in the educational adjunct of the business. Their wish is to graduate from the 'cash-boys' college' not only young men who are equipped intellectually for the life before them, but who are gentlemen in the full sense of the term.

A Graduate of the "Cash-Boys' College"

Politeness, good conduct, suave speech are things not easily instilled into the young mind; as soon as the big store becomes crowded the boy nature comes to the surface. But despite the difficulties in the way, we are willing to pit the three hundred students of the 'cash-boys' college' against the same number of lads from the schools or another establishment like ours, as models of deportment, or for alertness of brain and hand, or for general business qualifications."

Perhaps the most interesting branch of study in this unique school is that of composition. For the most part the youngsters have something to say and say it with a breeziness that is often startling, but never doubtful as to its meaning. The compositions of the third grade are upon such topics as The Duties of a Cash-Boy, The Necessary Qualifications for Success in Business, The Obligations of American Citizenship, What is Patriotism? and so forth. There are ideas behind the clearly expressed thought of most of these essays. And, aside from their literary merit, there is that other rare merit—rare for a boy—cleanliness. Not a blot on the pages of composition and penmanship books, not a cover bent.

How the Work Affects the Scholars

In all three grades of the little college spelling is the favorite study; indeed, it is looked upon by the boys more as a pastime than a duty. "The language the boys use is really astonishing," avers the chief instructor. "I do not mean to say that they employ long words without knowing their meaning. On the contrary, they are careful in their choice of words, and that, for a boy at fifteen, is uncommon indeed. I frequently hear them talking among themselves in true boyish fashion, but using such words as 'departing,' 'conversing,' 'habitual' and the like.

"Though our school lads are of a serious cast of mind they are not glum. Both in the 'cash-boys' college' and in the store we have grown to mistrust any boy who is too serious. There's something awry in a lad, mentally or physically, when he lacks boyish spirit and has no tendency to pranks and mischief. The most mischievous boys are invariably the brightest. Every boy has to be treated differently in the college; it is an erroneous idea that all boys are alike. What will inspire one boy to greater efforts will send another in the dumps if it does not wholly destroy his ambition; a soft or joking word to one kind of boy will seem to him a license for every degree of liberty, whereas the same word to another lad will bring the flush of pride and good intention to his face."

The principle upon which the "cash-boys' college" is founded is to superadd to the education of a youth in the business methods of the house that gives him a living a share of sound, general instruction. The cash-boy graduated from such a school is necessarily superior and more desirable than the little chap who can scarcely write his name and who knows only the routine work required of him. A graduate of the "cash-boys' college" is in a position to leave his training-ground at any minute and take a more remunerative position in a strange store. The success of the "cash-boys' college" is evidenced by the success of its graduates; it is one of the important end-of-the-century achievements.

The Moon and Green Cheese

MR. H. G. WELLS' new wonder story is to be entitled The First Men in the Moon.

Mr. Wells has lately appeared as a contributor in a curious quarter. The Grocers' Assistant has from him an article of advice, wholesome and witty enough to deserve a wider hearing. Here is an extract:

"Certainly I have every reason to sympathize with grocers' assistants, for, though I was not one myself, I was for some time apprentice to a draper, and I had the pleasure and benefit of the friendship of several assistants in the grocery trade. I know the pinch of it all; the intolerable hours, the brutal competition, the many petty tyrannies of retail trade, and I only wish I could see my way to suggest drastic reforms that would at one blow remove all these evils. But I cannot. Two things I would counsel. One is that the grocer's assistant should set before his eyes, and keep before his eyes, the supreme duty of kindliness, help and charity toward his fellow-assistants, and especially toward his juniors; and, secondly, that he should endeavor to expend every bit of energy he can honestly avoid expending upon his master's business in increasing his own efficiency. Let him learn French, read sedulously the trade organs, master business correspondence, and eschew all frivolous pursuits. Above all, let him avoid dancing classes, the society of condescending persons of a superior class, the banjo, fiction, and the feminine sex. And cultivate orderly habits."

AMERICA'S MOST POPULAR RAILROAD

CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD.

PERFECT PASSENGER SERVICE BETWEEN

CHICAGO AND KANSAS CITY.
CHICAGO AND ST. LOUIS.
CHICAGO AND PEORIA.
ST. LOUIS AND KANSAS CITY.

Through Pullman service between Chicago and

HOT SPRINGS, Ark., DENVER, Colo.
TEXAS, FLORIDA, UTAH,
CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

If you are contemplating a trip, any portion of which can be made over the Chicago & Alton, it will pay you to write to the undersigned for maps, pamphlets, rates, time-tables, etc.

GEO. J. CHARLTON,
Gen. Passenger and Ticket Agent,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Chicago to Omaha

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD — MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL VALLEY ROUTE

Double Daily Service

New line via Rockford, Dubuque, Waterloo, Fort Dodge and Council Bluffs. Buffet-library-smoking cars, sleeping cars, free reclining chair cars, dining cars. Send to the undersigned for a free copy of PICTURES AND NOTES EN-ROUTE, illustrating this new line as seen from the car window. Tickets of agents of I. C. R. R. and connecting lines.

A. H. HANSON, G. P. A., Chicago

The Peerless Grinder

Sharpens scissors, knives, needles quickly and perfectly. Instantly attached to any sewing-machine. Indispensable to Housewife, Dressmakers, Milliners, etc. Corrugated bread knives easily sharpened.

The Peerless Grinder

Is made of steel and brass; nickel-plated; solid carborundum wheel, only cool cutting stone. It meets everybody's wants. We send it express prepaid for $1.

Good Agents Wanted

PEERLESS MFG. CO., 115 Dearborn Street, Chicago

COLFAX PONY "RIGS"

CATALOGUE FREE. 50 STYLES AND SIZES

Address COLFAX, South Bend, Indiana

New Buggy, $26

Two ENORMOUS FACTORIES producing buggies by automatic machinery, from materials bought for cash. We sell direct and

Save Dealers' Profits

Can't stop running factories. ENORMOUS SACRIFICE on unfinished lines. Write immediately for SPECIAL OFFER.

Union Buggy Co., 36-48 Saginaw St., Pontiac, Mich.

MY GET THERE

Will last a lifetime. Non-sinkable and indestructible.

16 feet long, 36-inch beam. Made in Galvanized Steel.

TWENTY DOLLARS NET
W. H. RULISON, 854 Depot Street, SALEM, O.

DUCKING BOAT

Use Dixon's American Graphite Pencils

Their tough, smooth leads don't break or scratch when in use. Made in all styles, covering the whole field of pencil use.

THEIR GRADES NEVER VARY

Ask for them at your dealer's. If not obtainable, mention THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, and send 16 cents for samples worth double.

JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Jersey City, N. J.

Digitized by Google

WHAT to READ
The Books of the Week

A Proem and a Play*

Mr. Friedman has handicapped a discerning and sympathetic study of tenement life with a doleful preface. Only a heart brave with irrepressible faith in the sure triumph of the good, or a pessimistic mind which feeds, by choice, on the musty food of philosophic despair, will be able to get beyond the proem of Poor People. But those who skip this doleful foreword or persevere in spite of it have no uncertain reward. Quickly they find their sympathies and their animosities deeply stirred by the humble affairs of the tenement.

Wilson, who tells the story, is a gentle and refined man of mature years, who clerks in a music store and bases his hopes of salvation from the thraldom of poverty upon the opera he is writing. The same simple and genial qualities which have endeared The Vicar of Wakefield to generations of readers draw the heart of the reader to the kindly old flute-player. His daughters, Jane and Ida, are delineated with cleverness and strength. The former hides a kind heart behind a handsome face and the effrontery of the ribbon counter; Ida reads the hidden moods of Adolph, the shy and morose watchmaker who battles with inherited appetite and finally wins fame and success by his simple play, Poor People. The story ends with this triumph which is witnessed by the chief inhabitants of the tenement.

This book cannot be put aside without the conviction that Mr. Friedman has written from a close knowledge of the life which he has depicted. His Poor People are very real, very human personages and persistently haunt the memory. Here and there in the story are to be found didactic sentences which might well have been spared.

However, there are many quaint touches in the incidental philosophizing and character-drawing which give the book flavor and piquancy. "To be old, to be useless, to be poor—this is the triology of misfortune!" exclaims the old flute-player who has lost his position in the store and is refused a second assignment of envelopes at the "addressing bureau." The fortune-teller of the tenement is described, in a line, as "the kind of a woman that goes with a parrot."

It is not too much to say of this picture of tenement life that it is a worthy contribution to the annals of the poor, for it shows how the truest charity is that done by those who are themselves but a shade removed from destitution. —Forrest Crissey.

The Iron-Shod Steed†

The great railroad story, like the great American novel, remains to be written.

However, there have been many good examples of both, and Mr. Spearman's collection of eight stories of the doings of the West End of a certain road between Chicago and Denver is entitled to rank among the many. In The Nerve of Foley and the seven Others which go to make up the volume, Mr. Spearman, who is, perforce, the narrator, figures as Mr. Reed, the train master of the division. He demonstrates his ability to fill the place. Mr. Spearman knows the road. His engine-drivers handle their throttles, their Johnson levers, their air and their sand with the skill and caution of men freighted with responsibility; to him the intricacies of the train chart are an open mystery, and, with the knowledge of one who has traveled much, he declares a ballast of slag "the sweetest, springiest bed under steel." His men, too—Georgie Sinclair, Foley, and Neighbor, the division superintendent of motive power, and the others—are honest, steady, loyal, and, in so far as they can be, walking on such volcanic ground as would seem to have underlain the West End, and seen through such a cloud of steam, dust and cinders as everywhere envelopes them, are living figures."

No doubt a certain measure of adventure is incident upon a railroad life—though those clear-sighted analysts, the rate adjusters of the insurance companies, write it, in their tabulated statements, only "a trace"; no doubt, also, it is precisely this illusive trace, strengthened and reinforced, that lends the wine of literature its tonic shock (for, after all, we read fiction as we drink wine, for the reason that it is not water); but to live in one continual whirl of flying car wheels and twisted axles, threshing side rods and bursting boilers, cyclones, strikes and burning bridges, must, in the end, become wearing on the nerves. No wonder that Foley—who was as agile as most of them and possessed, so Andy Cameron declared, of all kinds of nerve—in all other respects a self-contained gentleman, craved the solace of a chew.

Mr. Spearman writes: "Many locomotives as I have seen and ridden, a new one is always a wonder to me; it chokes me up, even, it means so much." This is good, but it is not enough. One wishes for a calmer, saner appreciation of "the man who occupies a position which for the exercise of temperance, of courage, of honesty, has no equal at the altitude of prime ministers"—the engine-driver—"who is altogether more worthy than the soldier and better than the man who moves on the sea in ships, who for outright performance, carried on constantly, coolly and without elation, is the farthest point." One remembers that declaration of Mr. Stephen Crane's, and his kindred one that "surely there is no engine-driver who does not appreciate the beauty of the business," that "the whole thing is æsthetic"—and with the remembrance comes the wish. However, as has been said before, the great railroad story is not yet written—and these are good. Wherefore we are thankful with those who love the road.—Thornton Sherborne Hardy.

A Prophet of the Unknown*

A dozen bright aphorisms to the contrary, the task of the pioneer is a rather thankless one. Six or seven years ago it was a common thing to hear Mr. Vance Thompson referred to as a man who knew more about unknown people than any other contributor to the current press and periodicals. When the names were meaningless to the majority of readers and seemed to some clever creations, Mr. Thompson wrote with enthusiasm, and as the late Professor Hjalmar H. Boyesen said, "with a knowledge that very few Americans possess."

French Portraits is not a perfect book, nor will any of us accept all that the author says as the final or the ultimate opinion. He tells us by way of preface that it is not his business to manufacture opinions for the people—these are his opinions, and very clever and interesting opinions they are, too. When one considers how completely the "young writers of France" have been considered, and without drearisome detail or didacticism, one wonders at the author's deftness. Verlaine is put aside with an "impression," and then follow careful, critical, semi-personal discussions of Mallarmé, Maeterlinck, Lemonnier, Emile Verhaeren, Rodenback, Catulle Mendès, Pierre Louys, Jean Richepin, Maurice Barrès, Marcel Schwob, and a dozen others not so important. If these last in themselves are not interesting, Mr. Thompson's analysis of them is.

It is, of course, unnecessary to point out that these writers (the unknown a trifle more vociferously than the known) are part of the "new movement" in France. There is a chaos there. René Doumic, a critic not so brilliant as Jules Lemaître, nor as conservative as Brunétière, and therefore an acceptable mean, suggests as a genesis that these men realized the awful force of the "époque critique"—such as this is—knew that no matter how high the production, the standard of our overwrought consciousness must find it wanting. Their hope was in absolutely defying criticism and ignoring order. These general statements do not, of course, apply to men like Verlaine, Mallarmé and Mendès. These three would, under any literary conditions, be great. As it is, they have been swept on by the flood, but to them also is the credit of having influenced its direction.

What we know will be received anywhere with favor are the few translations that the author has put in. Mr. Thompson has a facility of phrase and a vocabulary most striking, and he gets all the soul of his author with an almost miraculous ease. His translation of the stories of Catulle Mendès is as beautiful as the original itself. He calls it a "paler English," but it is every bit as opalescent as Mendès' French.

—George Henry Payne.

* Poor People. By I. K. Friedman. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

† The Nerve of Foley, and Other Railroad Stories. By Frank H. Spearman. Harper & Brothers.

* French Portraits. By Vance Thompson. Richard G. Badger & Co.

THE COLLEGE MAN'S NUMBER

DOUBLE NUMBER OF

The Saturday Evening Post

On All News-Stands May 24

¶ The College Man's Number will contain 32 pages of reading matter of especial and timely interest to all college men, past and present and future. Its strong features are:

Does a College Education Pay? By ex-President Cleveland

¶ Mr. Cleveland contributes an able discussion of a question that is now uppermost in the minds of many thousands of young people and parents all over the country. Mr. Cleveland thinks a college education does pay, and in telling how it pays he makes out a strong case for the young man whose heart is set on a college career.

Papers by College Presidents

¶ Doctor Francis L. Patton, President of Princeton, and Doctor David Starr Jordan, of Leland Stanford, Jr., University, show the increasing importance of the college man in commercial and business life. Doctor Angell, of the University of Michigan, gives some practical hints to young men who are choosing a profession. Doctor Butler, of Colby, writes of things not in the catalogue that are learned at college; and Doctor McClure, of Lake Forest, says a word to the wise about the college man's money matters.

College Fiction Features

¶ The Borrowed Sonnet. A story of the English Department at Harvard, by Charles Macomb Flandrau, author of Harvard Episodes.

¶ The Crime of '73. Not a plea for free silver, but a tale of freshman life at a Western college, by Stanley Waterloo.

¶ The Advantages of a College Education. Not an essay, but a story of a young Princetonian who "suffered with an enlarged Ego," by Jesse Lynch Williams, author of Princeton Stories.

¶ The Count. The first of a new series of stories of Spiug and Nestie, Bulldog and the Dowbiggins, by Ian Maclaren, author of A Scots Grammar School.

Other Special Features

¶ Mrs. Burton Harrison, the popular novelist, contributes to this number a very entertaining paper on The Education of a Woman of Fashion.

¶ Doctor D. K. Pearsons, who has given nearly three million dollars to the smaller colleges of the country, tells what the freshwater college is doing for young men, and why he believes it should be encouraged.

No Increase in Price. Five Cents the Copy

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING CO.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Digitized by Google

Literary Folk as they Come and Go

Guy Boothby is one of the lucky people whose books are certain of a steady sale, even in time of war. The adventure novel is simply a grown-up development of the adventure story with a circulation that does not stop at the schoolroom; and perhaps we should never have taken it seriously at all had not Stevenson proved so delightfully that it could be made a work of art.

Guy Boothby would be the last person to take himself or his work seriously. Any one who can undertake to write four novels at a time, and within a given time, and do what he undertakes, can hardly be expected to spend much time in worrying over the mot juste. All last summer, for instance, this is what he was doing, and very little it seemed to trouble him. Rising at six he would speak his four installments for the day into four separate phonographs to be afterward transcribed by his secretaries, and dispatched to their various destinations. This left him free for the greater part of the day to attend to what is really the serious business of life to him—to the management of his charming little estate on the banks of the Thames at Sunbury.

Here he has kennels stocked with every size and variety of dogs, from the great, white, Russian wolf-hound down to the tiniest specimen of black Pomeranian, though his principal hobby is the breeding of bull-dogs. Here, too, in the conservatory leading out of the drawing-room, are his aviary of foreign birds and his collection of quaint tropical fish, collected by him in his wanderings in the South Seas; and here, too, on the beautiful stream at the bottom of the sloping green lawn lies his steam launch. It is the home of a successful writer and the characteristic home of a writer of adventure novels that are never to be taken seriously. Yet there was an early effort of Mr. Boothby's, a little story, soon forgotten, called A Lost Endeavor, that showed promise of rare qualities. It is not by stories of that kind, though, that palaces on the river are to be built up, and the promise of that little story has never been realized by its host of successors. But, then, when Mr. Boothby wrote it he had no bulldogs and no phonographs.

A Comedy in Socialism

Mr. Bernard Shaw is best known in both England and America as a writer of brilliant plays and witty dramatic and musical criticism. But the biggest part of his work, if not the best known, is his writing on questions of political economy; for Mr. Shaw is a socialist and a leading member of the Fabian Society.

Radical theories in politics are apt to mean radical theories as to costume, and, in consequence, Mr. and Mrs. Shaw sometimes form an amusingly contrasted couple. The Fabians do not believe in evening dress for men, and Mr. Shaw's favorite costume is a double-breasted blue serge coat with a red cravat. Mrs. Shaw has the common feminine liking for pretty frocks. At a first performance of one of Mr. Shaw's plays, You Never Can Tell, the author and his wife sat prominently in a stage box, the one in his kind of yachting suit, the other in a beautiful evening gown of white satin and lace with a necklace of pearls and diamonds. It rather reminds one of the sympathetic independence of Count Tolstoi and his wife.

Mr. and Mrs. Shaw live in a delightful house in the Adelphi Terrace, from the windows of which there is a noble view of the Embankment Gardens, the Thames with Cleopatra's Needle, Waterloo Bridge and the dome of St. Paul's dimly seen through the London smoke. But it is amusing to notice that the door-plate reads "Mrs. Bernard Shaw"—Mr. Shaw will not lend his name to sanction such luxuries!

Mr. Shaw is one of the hardest working and most useful men in London. He is a member of the vestry of St. Pancras' parish and is grappling with the practical problems of municipal government. He is also constantly hard at work on socialistic tracts and booklets—so hard at work, indeed, that witty plays must wait and the promised Plays for Puritans are not yet written. Yet there is an amusing legend of a rabid socialist who went last summer to see Mr. Shaw at Hindhead, where the Shaws were living in the charming literary colony which exists there, and who found on the pathway leading to the house the stubs of several gold-tipped cigarettes, jumped at once to the conclusion that Mr. Shaw was a renegade to the cause, turned about and hurried away in despair.

Count Tolstoi's Two Daughters

From the letter of a recent visitor to Count Leo Tolstoi it appears that the famous Russian novelist and reformer enjoys the assistance of his two daughters, who have more than ordinary talent. The elder, Tatjana, differs with her father in respect to nearly every one of his pet theories, while the second, Marcha, is almost fanatical in following out his doctrines, going so far as to work daily in the fields along with the peasant women of the district. Both girls are deeply attached to their father and find their greatest pleasure in relieving him of clerical labor. They read, write and speak six languages and compose with hereditary ability.

The differences of opinion do not disturb the harmony of the household, which is a model of equanimity and gentleness.

The novelist paid a high tribute to his daughters when he said to his visitor: "However great I may be as a novelist, I am much greater as a correspondent, but that's because my two girls write all my letters."

Banquo's Ghost in a Frolic

Of the leading literary lights of London, Stephen Phillips is certainly one of the most eccentric. His metrical work gives no idea of his personality. His verse is strong, dramatic, musical and picturesque. It is never morbid and seldom displays whimsical fancy or humor of any sort. Yet from his boyhood the poet has been an odd combination of deep melancholy and wild fun. At school he was a perpetual wonder to his teachers—incorrigibly lazy and phenomenally bright.

He began life's serious work as an actor. He says himself that he was a very bad actor, but competent judges say that he varied from very bad to very good. Even here his moods played havoc at times with the success of both himself and his colleagues. On one occasion, while playing Banquo and Banquo's ghost in Macbeth, he started a series of comical pranks in the famous banquet scene just before the curtain went up.

The merriment proved contagious and Macbeth and Lady Macbeth joined in the fun, which culminated in their throwing at one another the eatables upon the board. They were so carried away that they did not hear the bell for the curtain. As this rose, a tart struck Banquo's ghost in the eye, to the wild amazement of the audience. Mr. Phillips, in commenting upon the scene, says, "I question if the good old tragedy ever before in its history provoked so much laughter." This incident was one of several which caused him to give up the profession.

In his literary career he encountered the usual hardships at the beginning, but the public soon recognized the high talents if not the genius of the new singer. The poem which is said to have made the deepest impression upon the public was a powerful composition, an ode to melancholia dedicated to A. S. P. The dedication aroused much inquiry, and it was not until nearly a year had elapsed that the curious learned that A. S. P. stood for Agatha Sophia Phillips, his mother, a studious Quaker lady, who had died from that rare complaint, melancholia.

Maurice Hewlett's Wanderings

Maurice Hewlett, whose Forest Lovers and Little Novels of Italy have put him in the first rank of English story writers, resides, when he is at home, in Talbot Square, Bayswater, London. His wife is a skillful pastel painter, and their little boy of eight, a child of remarkable beauty, is known to multitudes through having served as a model for both Millais and Leighton. The novelist and his wife ought to have gypsy blood in their veins, so fond are they of travel and change. When the mood strikes them they pack their trunks and start off at a moment's notice for John O'Groat's or Granada.

Among his intimate friends the author is noted for the copperplate beauty of his handwriting, and for his fondness for brown velvet and velveteen wearing apparel. He says the first saves him from his publishers and the second from miscellaneous callers.

JUST PUBLISHED

A Guide to the Trees

By ALICE LOUNSBERRY

ILLUSTRATED BY MRS. ELLIS ROWAN

64 beautiful colored plates, 100 full-page black-and-white plates, 64 engravings of entire trees, and 55 diagrams, etc.

THE ONLY POPULAR WORK WITH COLORED PLATES OF TREES.

Contains descriptions of nearly 300 trees and a number of shrubs.

A handy companion in the woods, fields and roads.

Arranged according to the kind of soil in which trees grow—the most natural classification. Family, shape, height, range, and time of bloom are all given in each case. Indexes of illustrations, entire trees, common names, scientific names, technical terms and a miscellaneous index aid in making identification easy.

As a text-book for the instruction of beginners (adults or children), the book is unexcelled, and non-botanists will enjoy it as much as botanists.

Mrs. Rowan's drawings are from the trees and plants in or near their homes, and while artistic and beautiful, are technically correct. Dr. Nathaniel L. Britton, Director-in-Chief of the New York Botanical Garden, has written an introduction.

Size, 5⅝ x 7½ inches. Cloth, $2.50 net
Field Edition, full leather, gilt edges, $3.50 net

This is a companion volume to "A Guide to the Wild Flowers," by the same author and the same artist, which comes in similar bindings at the same prices.

For sale by all booksellers, or sent postpaid. Send for Descriptive Circulars

FREDERICK A. STOKES COMPANY, NEW YORK

Genuine Georgia Brunswick Stew

For more than 100 years the delicacy at every old-fashioned Georgia barbecue, is in fact the most famous of all Southern dishes. Made of selected chicken, beef, corn and tomatoes (not made in a packing house). You have no idea how delicious it is until you try it, because you have never eaten anything that is like it.

A Full-Size 12-oz. Can Free

If you send 12 cents in stamps to pay postage. Retails everywhere at 15 cents. With it a coupon for another can free, if you like it, and can get your grocer to put it in stock to accommodate yourself and friends.

It is a complete meal in itself. One can enough lunch for three. Makes a perfect lunch for clubs, picnics, camping or hunting. Never out of season. Ready for use in three minutes.

Booklet, "New Recipes for Good Livers," FREE

COLD SPRING PACKING COMPANY, Atlanta, Georgia

LEADAM'S SHOE TREES

Keep the shoes in perfect shape. Easy to put in and take out. Prevent wrinkling, toeing up and curling of shoe and sole when not in use. Make shoes more comfortable and longer wearing.

Wet shoes do not shrivel up in drying when LEADAM'S SHOE TREES are used.

Made in all styles, widths and shapes: for men and women, and sold everywhere by first-class dealers.
If your dealer does not keep them, send us the size and style of your shoe and we will mail you a pair on receipt of $1.25.

LIONEL H. LEADAM, Sole Manufacturer
82 Wall Street, New York
Descriptive pamphlets on the care of shoes free.

Alabastine

This is the nickel-and cement wall coating which you have seen so extensively advertised. It is pure, cleanly and durable. In 16 tints and white. Mix it with cold water and a child can brush it on. The most beautiful and economical coating for walls and ceilings. Paint dealers sell it. Instructive and interesting booklet mailed free for the asking.

ALABASTINE COMPANY, Grand Rapids, Mich.

French Talcum Powder

Highest Standard Quality. Sold only in Bulk. 1 lb. Stick, by mail, 40c. Equal in quantity to 8 of the ordinary fancy tin packages sold in drug stores.

ANDERSON & CO., 339 Dock Street, Philadelphia

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Digitized by Google

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

Tomatoes grown from a potato root

Improving on Nature Botanical experts nowadays are much interested in finding out novel and extraordinary results that may be obtained by the process of grafting. It is wonderful what queer things Dame Nature, ordinarily so shrewd and conservative, can be persuaded to do when cajoled in this fashion. Certainly nothing more notable in this line has been accomplished up to date than the grafting of the tomato on the potato. There is no very great difficulty about it, apparently, and the manner in which the tomato plant may be made to bear fruit, with a potato for a root, is very prettily illustrated by a photograph reproduced herewith.

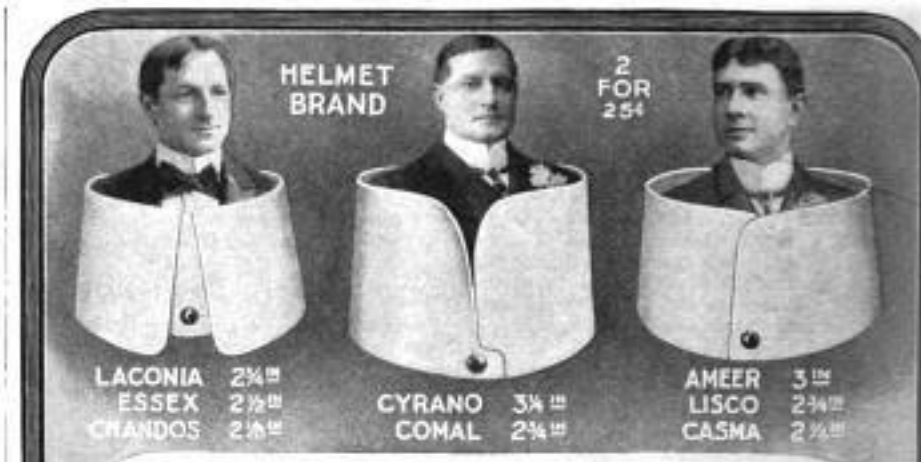
Oddly enough, the process seemingly cannot be reversed, and nobody has yet succeeded in grafting the potato on the tomato. This, evidently, is too much even for amiable Mother Nature to put up with.

Beef Extract Without Meat The notion of making extract of beef without meat seems absurd, and yet it is now being done on a considerable scale in England. At all events, if the product be not meat-extract, it tastes so much like it as to be indistinguishable from the genuine. It is the invention of an Englishman, and vegetarians abroad have taken to it with such enthusiasm as to promise untold wealth to the patentee; for it should be realized that vegetarians, as a rule, do not abjure meat because they do not like it, but for the reason that they deem it unwholesome or forbidden from a humanitarian standpoint.

The basis of the preparation is simply brewers' yeast, which, in a fresh condition, is a soft, whitish paste somewhat resembling flour paste, with a peculiar and rather pleasant smell. To convert it into "meat extract," it is treated by a process that is as yet a secret. There seems to be no doubt of the fact that it has no meat substance in it, though it has all the flavor of the concentrated essence of beef. The inventor sells it with a guarantee of one thousand pounds sterling that it contains not a particle of animal matter.

Midwinter Market Farming The business of glass gardening, as it has been called, for the production of fresh vegetables and garden truck of all sorts in the winter time, is growing at a great rate in this country. It is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that no fewer than one thousand establishments in the United States are now engaged in this industry, the output consisting largely of lettuce, tomatoes and cucumbers. In the neighborhood of Boston this sort of farming is being conducted on a particularly large scale. About forty [illegible] of glass in that vicinity are devoted to [illegible]pose. Around the city of Providence [illegible]ten acres or more, while the glass [illegible] forcing winter vegetables in the neighborhood of New York, Chicago and other cities bring the total up to about one hundred acres, yielding an annual crop worth something like two and a quarter millions of dollars.

It seems likely that within a dozen years from the present time at least one thousand acres of glass will be utilized in this country for the growing of winter vegetables, and, in the vicinity of the great cities, will be numerous farms wholly under glass, catering to the cold-weather demands of the urban populations. The requirements of luxury are steadily increasing, and people of means are no longer content to be deprived of any table delicacy at any season of the year. In fact, the time has almost passed by when any vegetable or fruit may be said to have a season, save in so far as its natural production out of doors is concerned. Not only fresh tomatoes and lettuce, but strawberries and peaches are obtainable by the well-to-do in January as readily as in August.



The business of raising flowers for market is likewise growing at a wonderful rate, and it is estimated by the Government experts that there are now in this country considerably over five hundred acres devoted to this purpose exclusively. In New York State there are, perhaps, one hundred and three acres, in Illinois ninety-eight acres, and in Pennsylvania ninety-three acres. The retail value of the flowers turned out annually is about twenty-two and a half millions of dollars, or one dollar for each square foot of glass.

Fortunes in Cut Flowers Of roses there are sold in this country, annually, one hundred millions, worth six millions of dollars. To these must be added an equal number of carnations, valued at four millions of dollars, and seventy-five millions of violets, valued at seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Of lilies and miscellaneous flowers enough are sold to fetch, at first hand, a million and a quarter of dollars, while the single item of chrysanthemums grown in the United States represents half a million dollars every twelvemonth. In addition must be reckoned the plants sold in pots, which are said to number something like one hundred millions in a year. Their estimated value is ten millions of dollars.

The demand for flowers in this country, as with other luxuries, is steadily growing, and the business of producing them under glass is sure to increase enormously during the next decade. Prices obtainable for rare and beautiful blossoms grow higher from year to year, and rich people are spending fortunes in the creation of private glass gardens for the production, most particularly, of roses and orchids. This might be called The Age of Flowers; for never in the history of the world have flowers been so highly appreciated as they are at the present time.

As for vegetables, the art of forcing them in winter is said to have been understood to some extent by the ancient Romans, who, carrying the luxury of the table even further than the moderns, were willing to pay the most extravagant prices for fresh garden truck raised, during the cold season, in pits with manure, or in baskets with the same heating material. With the destruction of their civilization, however, the art was lost entirely.

Making Gems by Chemistry Various kinds of gems have been reproduced by chemical artifice. Moissan, in Paris, has manufactured diamonds by melting wrought iron with carbon and permitting the mixture to cool very slowly, the carbon being crystallized out. The diamonds thus made are almost microscopic, but it is believed that they will be produced of sufficient size before very long to be of commercial value. Rubies, as beautiful as the genuine, are turned out artificially, though people will not buy them because they are deemed bogus. This is accomplished by fusing small ruby "sparks" by means of electricity. The same thing is done with sapphires, and it is believed that emeralds will be reproduced by a like method.

We Make Collars and Cuffs

EXCLUSIVELY

The best goods it is possible to make to sell at any price. They are

15c each, Two for 25c

If you have not been suited in style, fit, quality or wear, give them a trial

Secure them of your dealer; if he does not keep the Corliss-Coon Collars, send to us, stating size desired. Write for our handsome new 1900 Catalogue, showing "Correct Dress for all Occasions."

DEPT. S, TROY, N. Y.

CORLISS, COON & CO.

NEW YORK CHICAGO BOSTON SAN FRANCISCO

DETROIT MOTOR LAUNCH

As shown, 20 ft. special A 1 grade — speed 7 miles — seats 12 grown persons. Designed, built installed and tested by experts — is an assured success. Built for hard and constant use Delivered equipped and ready to run. Racing is controlled by a governor. Reversing lever can be placed anywhere in the boat. Man at wheel controls everything. Send for catalogue FREE, showing up-to-date launches, 18 ft. to 30 ft., from $300 to $900.

Special Designs submitted for Cabin Launches of larger size.

Detroit Boat Works, 1362 Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Mich. Pleasure and Hunting Boats, Electrical Launches and Yachts

IT'S WORTH YOUR WHILE

To investigate the difference between our prices and those of agents and dealers for the same grade of work.

WE DO NOT SELL

No. 475 — Single Strap Harness. Price, with nickel mountings, $9.50. As good as sells for $16.00 more.

No. 191 — Buggy, with leather quarter top. Price, with shafts, $53.00. Guaranteed as good as others sell for $25.00 more than our price.

Though agents or dealers, therefore we do not have them to protect, and in making our prices are enabled to figure them as low as the grade of work we manufacture can be sold. We save you the profits that are added between the manufacturer and the consumer, by selling direct to you from our factory. This has been our method of selling for the past twenty-seven years, and we are to-day the largest manufacturers of vehicles and harness in the world selling direct to the user exclusively. We make 175 styles of vehicles and 65 styles of harness and ship anywhere for examination, guaranteeing safe arrival. Send for FREE catalogue, showing all of our different styles.

ELKHART CARRIAGE AND HARNESS MANUFACTURING CO., Elkhart, Indiana

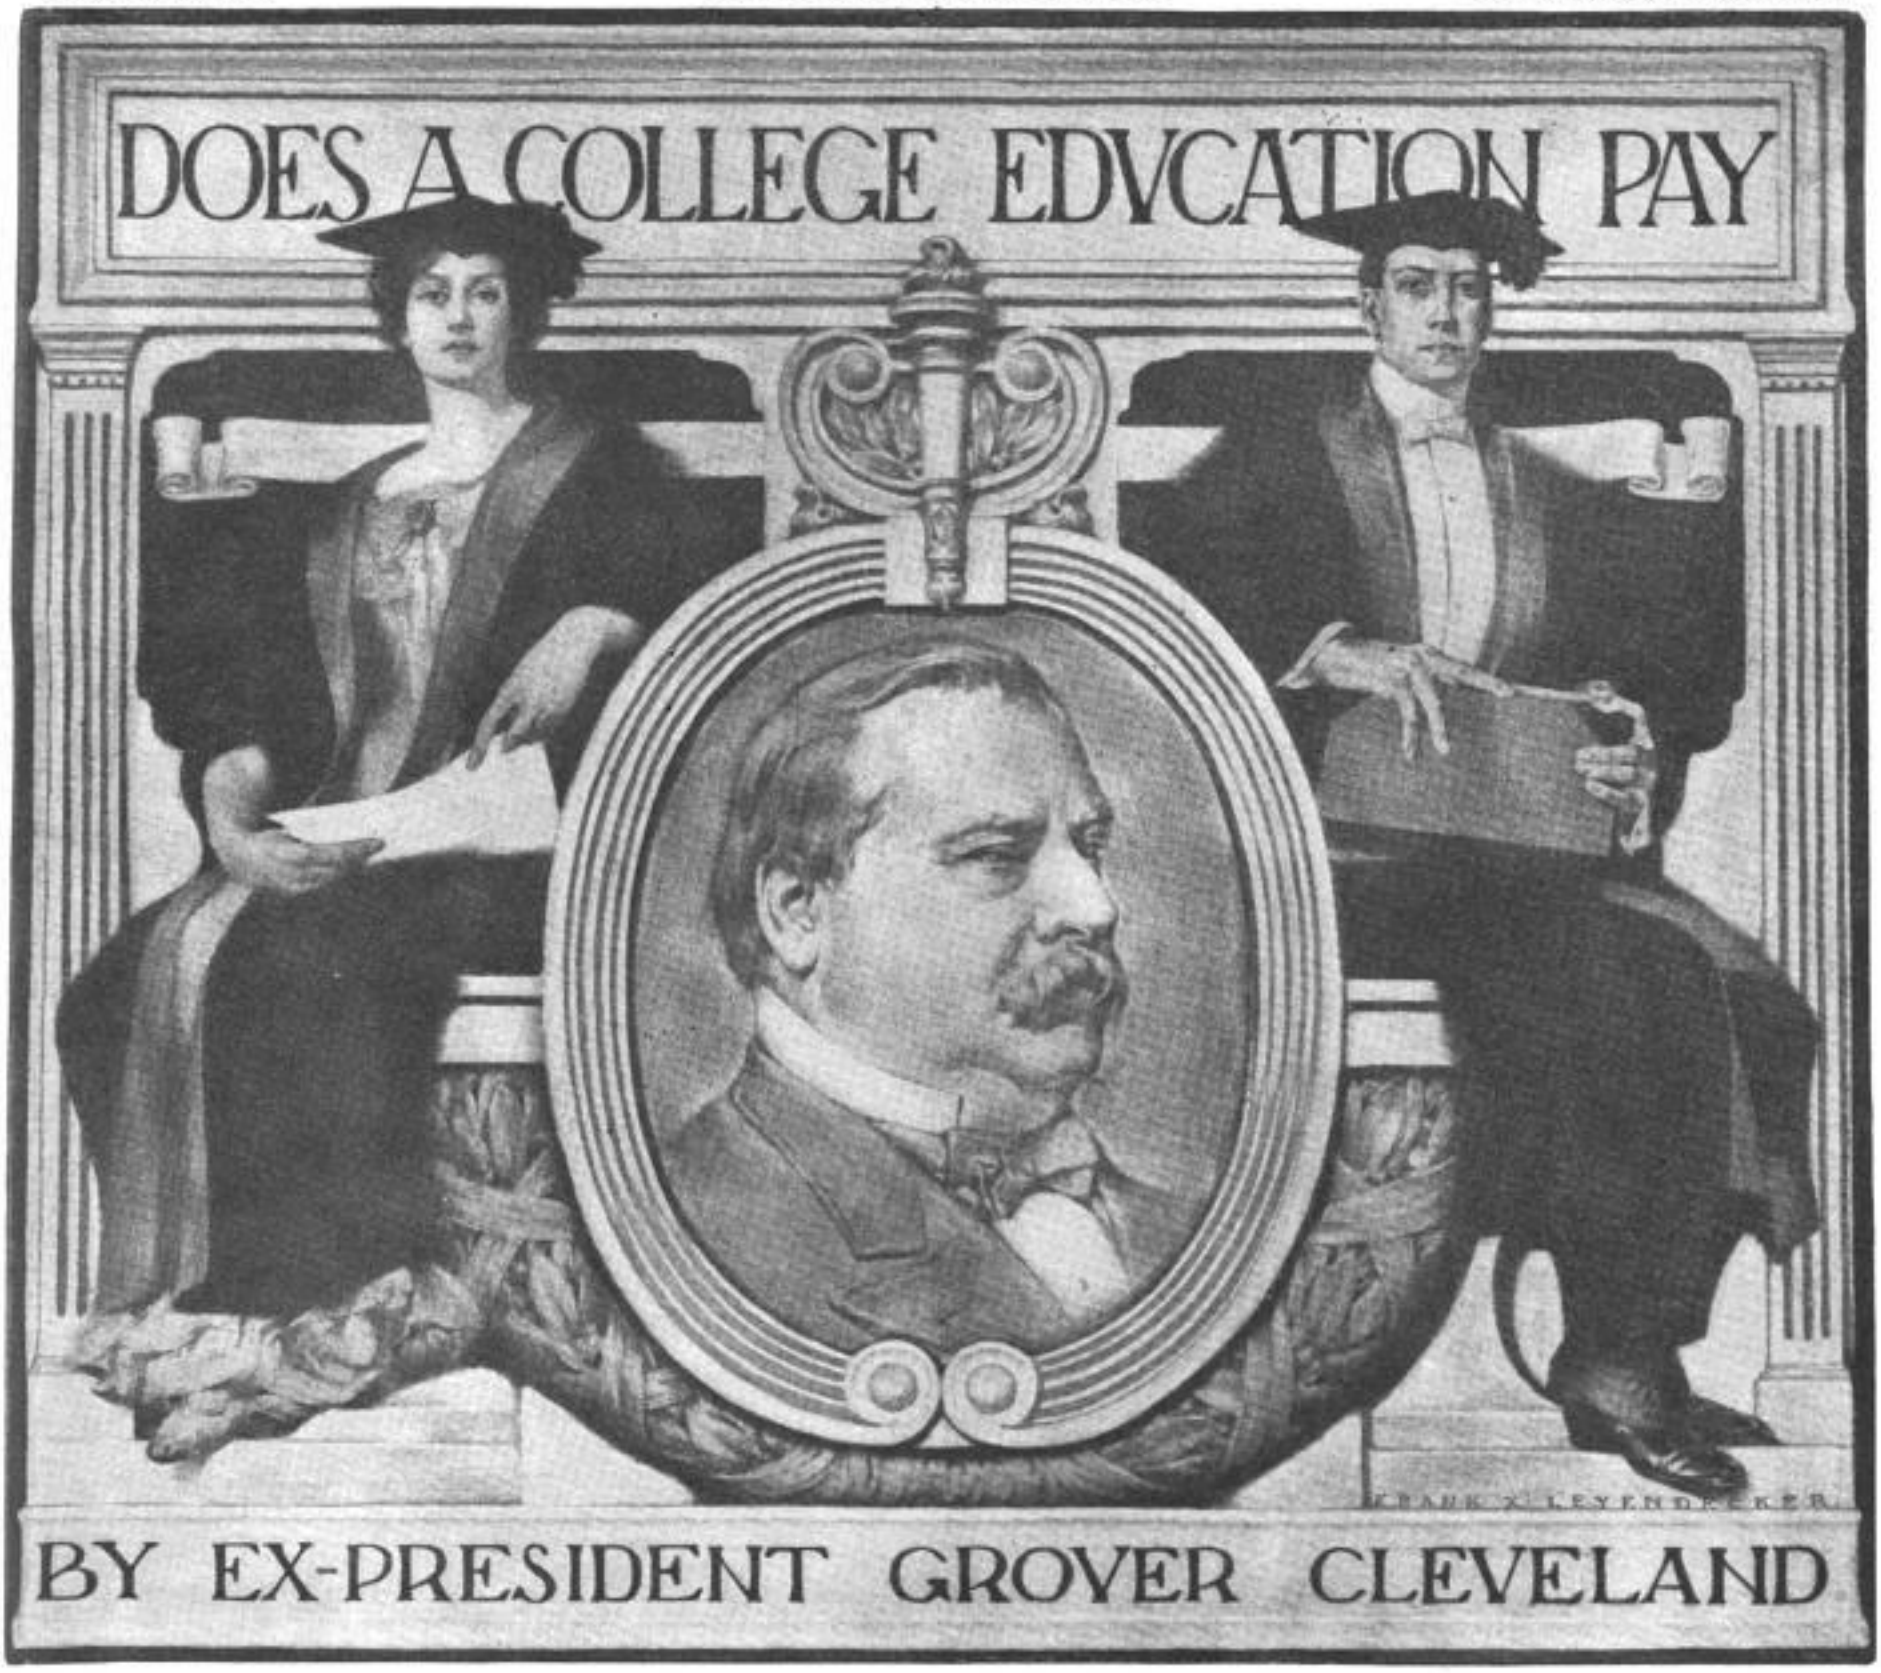
The Best Office Clock

Is this one. Wind it once in two or three months and it will tell month, day, hour and minute at a glance. It is handsome, a perfect time keeper and the most durable clock made. Would you like to see a

Prentiss Calendar Clock

We will send one to any reputable business firm or man on Thirty Days' Trial. If not perfectly satisfactory, return it and we will pay express charges both ways. That is square. We are not anxious to throw away money, but this is a case where "seeing is believing." Write to-day for Catalogue No. 6B, of calendar, programme, system and novelty clocks.

PRENTISS CLOCK IMPROVEMENT CO., Dept. 41, 49 Dey Street, New York



Digitized by Google

The COLLEGE MAN'S NUMBER

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

An Illustrated Weekly Magazine
Founded A^o D^i 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Volume 172, No. 48 PHILADELPHIA, MAY 26, 1900 5 Cents the Copy; $2.50 the Year

The Curtis Publishing Company Philadelphia

THE CENTRAL NEWS COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, GENERAL AGENTS

Digitized by Google

IT will pay you to make a clean sweep this Spring. Collars, Cuffs and Shirts unmated pull out at the buttonholes, strain seams apart, and constantly wear on the nerves. LION BRAND Collars and Shirts, made for each other, with Cuffs to match, wear longer, feel better, and look best all the time. Throw out all the old stuff. Start fresh. It's cheaper.

Two Collars or two Cuffs cost 25c. It doesn't pay to pay more. Shirts cost $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00, depending on the kind you want. Ask your furnisher.

UNITED SHIRT AND COLLAR CO., Makers, Troy, N. Y.

MOTHER GOOSE IN PROSE FREE

Pettijohn's Breakfast Food

ALL THE WHEAT BUT THE OVERCOAT

FREE — MOTHER GOOSE IN PROSE — FREE

Beautifully printed in 12 parts.
Full Page Illustrations by MAXFIELD PARRISH.

"Better entertainment than the jingles on which it is founded."—Boston Transcript.
"A world of entertainment for the little ones."—Chicago Evening Post.
"Will surely keep the children happy."—St. Louis Post Dispatch.

Send Three Bears cut from Pettijohn's Breakfast Food package and 6 cents in stamps to pay for mailing, and we will send you FREE a copy of the first part of Mother Goose in Prose.

THE AMERICAN CEREAL COMPANY, Monadnock Building, Chicago, Ill.

For Every-day Use

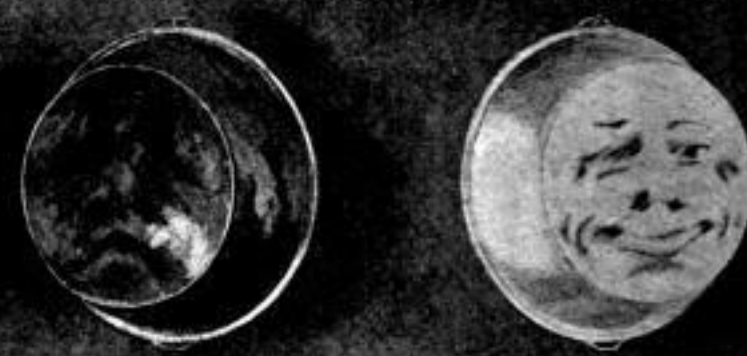
Libby's Luncheon Specialties

Ready to Serve.

ONLY ONE

Of anything can be superlative. The "Best" always stands alone. For variety, delicacy, fine flavor and general excellence, nothing equals

Libby's Perfect Food Products



Prepared in hygienic kitchens under Government inspection. They are absolutely pure and wholesome. Libby's are the convenient foods for in-doors and out-doors. Put up in handy-sized key-opening cans.

Write for our little book, "How to Make Good Things to Eat." Tells you all about the 71 kinds of Libby's ready-to-serve foods.

LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY, Chicago

SAPOLIO

·CLEANS · SCOURS · POLISHES·

GLOOM MADE BRIGHT

USE SAPOLIO

Every day in the week and Rest on Sunday.

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Founded A.D. 1728 by Benj. Franklin

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT 421 ARCH STREET

Entered at the Philadelphia Post-Office as Second-Class Matter

Does a College Education Pay

By Grover Cleveland

THOSE who antagonize collegiate education are always with us; and we often hear them inveighing, with differing degrees of emphasis, against the expenditure of time, money and effort which such an education exacts. We ought not to be surprised at the volume of these attacks when we recall the different sorts of people enrolled in the opposition; nor should we be astonished at the pertinacity of the onslaught when we consider how naturally self-conscious inferiority derives satisfaction from disparaging assaults of this nature. It is not difficult to classify the various forces engaged in these attacks; and if we examine their positions and offensive operations, we shall be entirely satisfied that the high point of vantage occupied by our universities and colleges is, or at least ought to be, absolutely impregnable.

As we look over the field, we first discover, standing on open and exposed ground, a collection of the enemy, who have a kind of sullen, sodden hatred of all education above the lowest and most rudimentary variety. They are tough, awkward and undisciplined fighters, always ready to make an assault, which can by no possibility injure any one but themselves. These we may properly disregard, with the wish that an intelligent environment may improve their condition.

The Peculiar Logic of Certain Self-Made Men

We find others among the antagonists of collegiate training who are recruited from the body of our so-called self-made men. These are posted behind the infirm defense of the things they have achieved without the aid of a liberal education; and they confuse the contention by much noise and thick clouds of smoke. They maintain a steadfast complacency among themselves by recounting the difficulties and trials they have overcome; while by some unaccountable but not uncommon mental process, or want of process, they connect in the relation of cause and effect their lack of education with their success. These are very often useful, active men in the business world, whose general recognition of duty as citizens and neighbors, as well as their frequent manifestations of benevolence and generosity in certain directions, must be cheerfully conceded.

They are, however, afflicted with two unfortunate difficulties which they seem unable to overcome, and which detract from their completeness of character and prevent their reaching the highest grade of liberal thought. One of these is the binding, fettering imagination that their own success indicates that the slight education they have been able to gather, and which has answered their needs, must be sufficient to compass success in all other cases. Their second difficulty is so intimately related to the first that it might be treated as a branch of it. It consists in their failure to recognize the extent of the revolution in the conditions of success that has taken place since they struggled and conquered. They seem to be strangely slow in comprehending how fast the world moves, and how certainly all who strive for rewards must move with it, or be left high and dry on the shoals of failure and disappointment. It certainly should not escape their notice that the methods profitably employed in every enterprise and occupation have so changed within the last fifty years that a necessity has arisen for an advanced grade of intelligence and education in the use of these methods; and that as this necessity has been supplied, a new competition has been created which easily distances the young man who is no better equipped for the race than our self-satisfied, self-made man. Therefore, while the perseverance, industry and thrift which entered into their early struggles can never become obsolete, and as factors of success can never be abandoned, it will hardly do for them to say that, notwithstanding new methods and new activities, it is undesirable to supplement these traits by the best attainable education. There are Indians in our Western country who, though surrounded by civilization, still wear the blankets and feathers to which they were long ago accustomed, and hold in utter contempt all observance of present-day customs; but while they wander about, still sullenly proud of their blankets and feathers and lead lives of vagabondage, younger men are making railroads through their lands and building houses which they might have built and occupied.

Our criticism of those who have joined the opponents of liberal education, from the large mass of our successful fellow-citizens who have lacked its advantages, should not, however, prevent our acknowledging cheerfully and heartily the different inclination of those who, though belonging to that general class, do not share the notions we deprecate. These are they who, in taking stock of their achievements and successes, plainly see in their lack of education a lack of opportunity, and regretfully place in the column of loss the diminution this deficiency has caused in the things they might otherwise have accomplished for themselves and for others. This appreciation of lost opportunity, accompanied as it must be by a correct apprehension of the changed conditions in the struggle of life, insures the enlistment of these candid and thoughtful men on the side of the best education. Consequently their sons are found among the students in our universities and colleges, and their influence and aid are frequently forthcoming in efforts to enlarge the opportunities of these institutions.

Another contingent arrayed against college education is made up of those who suppose they are in the occupation of strong ground when they point out the numerous failures in life among college graduates, and the slight impress often made in ordinary affairs by such of them as may be considered to a greater or less degree successful.

Differing Standards of Success

Of course the arguments with which these opponents make their attack are neither entirely just nor fair. In the first place, we can confidently claim that whatever may be included in their conception of failures, their proportion among graduates of our universities and colleges is certainly less than among the aggregate of non-graduates. Beyond this, we are entitled to a distinct definition of the words failure and success; and when we are told that failure is indicated by the lack of wealth or honors, and that their acquirement proves success, it is quite pertinent for us to reply that the rewards of liberal education are not thus limited. Many a college-bred man labors in the field of usefulness without either wealth or honors, and frequently with but scant recognition of any kind, and yet achieves successes which, unseen and unknown by the sordid and cynical, will bloom in the hearts and minds of men longer than the prizes of wealth or honors can endure.

We must remember, however, that it is never wise to underrate our adversary's position; and that a dogged, wholesale denial of all truth or merit in an opponent's argument usually fails to meet the needs of discussion. Let it be admitted, then, that there are absolute and properly defined failures among university and college graduates; and let it be further admitted that, after making allowance for those foredoomed by their inherent slothfulness and mental deficiencies, these failures are more numerous than they ought to be. What is the result? Are we thus driven to the confession that a thorough course of college training is unprofitable? It is only necessary for us to point to its triumphs and achievements, plainly seen on every side and in every walk of life, to avoid such a confession. The limit of all needful concession is reached when these failures are admitted, with the qualifying suggestion that our universities and colleges cannot attempt to supply the requisites of success which should result from judicious home training, or which can only be cultivated and developed by the student himself.

Parents should never send their sons to college simply for the purpose of educational ornamentation. The fact that parents have the fate of a son largely in their keeping should not only enlist their parental love and pride, but should, at the same time, stimulate their parental judgment. Furthermore, they should be constantly mindful that they have in charge not only a son, but an uncompleted man, who is soon to become their contribution to the manhood of the world. They therefore owe a dual duty, which demands on the one hand that the education of the son be undertaken as a help to his success in life, and on the other that this education shall promise for the maturing man the equipment necessary to insure his value as an addition to civilized humanity. Before he leaves home to enter upon his student life his sympathy with these purposes should be fully aroused, and he should be impressed with the importance of keeping them steadily in view. He should also take with him to his new surroundings a love of truth and honor, a cheerful, manly disposition and truly democratic inclinations. With these his collegiate advent must be auspicious, and his future life well guarded against failure. Lacking these, his way is made immensely more difficult and uncertain.

PHOTOGRAPHED ESPECIALLY FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

MR. CLEVELAND IN HIS LIBRARY AT PRINCETON

Digitized by Google

But whether well or ill accoutred, and without ignoring the influences for good that meet the student at the threshold of every well-regulated university or college, it is still true in a general sense that he himself must remain the responsible factor in the success or failure that waits upon the close of his collegiate career. As we are attempting to account for failures after graduation, we must assume a class standing sufficiently satisfactory to earn a degree. Therefore, we have no reference to deficiencies in studies when we assert that such failures may be charged, with considerable certainty, to stumbling-blocks in the student's path that he might have avoided, and to the neglect of certain aids incident to his college life which he ought to have appreciated and cultivated.

Two Extremes to be Avoided

There is such a thing as a sour and morose pursuit of study which leads to a sour and unsympathetic temper. This threatens unfitness for a profitable association with the outside world which is a handicap in dealing with every-day affairs. An opposite extreme is reached by a superficial and light-headed skimming of studies, which leaves in the mind just enough to meet the requirements of recitation and examination. This practice brings about self-deception and so unsubstantial an acquaintance with the subjects studied as to be almost useless. A loose habit of thought and conduct is also thus contracted, which must certainly stand in the way of success.

Another and constant source of some of the difficulties that lessen the graduate's chances of success remains to be mentioned. It may properly be called the introversion of college life. This term is here used to define a very natural inclination among collegians not only to look upon their student association as an independent world, but to permit it to completely encompass and limit their interests, their thoughts, their ambitions, their social relations, and nearly all things that seem to them worth having.

It would be a sad and brutal decree that unreservedly condemned a condition that lends to a college community its cheerfulness and happiness. The obliteration of a fervid attachment on the part of students for this world of theirs, and the destruction of the enthusiasm which its pleasures and incidents arouse, would usher in a time when the pursuit of higher education would be a forbidding and cheerless task. It is only a too profound and exclusive introversion that we deprecate; and it is only a wholesome dilution of college-world devotion, and its admixture with an interest in the affairs of the greater outside world, that, for the sake of the student's future success, we advocate.

It will not be denied that a constant and substantially unbroken confinement of our students in their thoughts and associations to the things that environ them, during their years of college study, produces a sentiment of separateness, which by a natural process is apt to lead, first to ignorance of movements and currents beyond their circle, next to a feeling of self-satisfied superiority, and frequently, at last, to a supercilious distrust of the intelligence of all who are not members of their order.

These conditions may not be general, nor even usual; but if they exist at all, and if in any number of cases, however small, they present obstacles to success, they are worthy of attention and correction.

When it is recalled that a college course is undertaken as a preparation for a prosperous career, and to fit the student to meet the requirements of manhood and citizenship, it cannot be denied for a moment that ignorance of the situation which awaits the graduate in the world's great field is an obstacle in his path; and inasmuch as his career must be wrought out, and the obligations of manhood and citizenship must be discharged in contact and coöperation with his fellow-men of every degree, it is worse than folly to say that any real or even suspected assumption of arrogant superiority does not interfere with his success.

The mention that has been made of some of the causes of the failures of college-bred men, which constitute the stock in argument of certain opponents of higher education, suggest natural and easily applied remedies.

Let the students in our colleges go beyond their studies and their sports, and with as much zeal and industry as they devote to either of these things, let them cultivate an interest in all that stirs and influences the great outside world, into whose strifes and struggles they must soon enter.

PHOTOGRAPHED ESPECIALLY FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

MR. CLEVELAND ON THE VERANDA OF HIS HOUSE AT PRINCETON

And since no more congenial soil can be found for the cultivation of a truly democratic spirit than our well-organized and conducted universities and colleges, let their students rid themselves of the notion that this spirit can safely be limited to their college world and its especial conditions. Let them rather cherish it as a lasting possession, which in the larger world lying beyond college pursuits and associations will constitute a ready help in every relation of life and an unfailing safeguard against self-pride and arrogant behavior.

What, then, is the conclusion of the matter? Shall the value of a college education be impeached because a measure of success may be attained without it, or because there are failures among those who have had the advantage of such an education? Shall these things prevail against the leadership which the graduates of our universities and colleges have maintained in all things that elevate and improve mankind? This would be strangely irrational.

While the training of the mental powers paves the way to success in every occupation; as long as pioneer work is needed in every extension of our progress and civilization; as long as our national safety rests upon the intelligence of our people; and as long as we require in our public service pure patriotism, obedience to quickened conscience and disinterested discharge of duty, a college education will pay.

The College Man's Advantage in the Coming Century

By David Starr Jordan

PRESIDENT OF LELAND STANFORD, JR., UNIVERSITY

THE best time to be a boy the world has ever known is just this time—just at the outstart of a great, vigorous, forceful, wisdom-loving century. And just the best place to be a boy is right here in the United States, the one part of the earth where a boy can grow up with a reasonable chance of making the most of himself. "America means opportunity," says Emerson, and to the right kind of a boy this is the main thing.

Now, to the right kind of a boy, a boy with something in him, the best advice that anybody can give is summed up in these two sentences: Keep yourself clean. Go to college.

As to the first, cleanliness is strength. The various forms of evil mostly show themselves as short-cuts to happiness. Gambling and stealing are short-cuts to wealth. But they do not often lead thither and, when they do, wealth does not bring happiness. You cannot have a really good time in life unless you earn it, unless you deserve it. So with immorality and intemperance in all their various forms. They promise pleasure; they do not bring happiness. A spurious pleasure is not permanent; it leaves "a dark brown taste in the mouth," "it is different in the morning." Real happiness makes room for more happiness. The joy of action, the beauties of Nature, the pleasure of accomplishment, the charm of congenial society, the strength of being clean—all these delights grow on us with our enjoyment of them. They take nothing away, but leave us with still greater strength.

"We may," says President Ripley, of the Santa Fé Railroad, speaking of the demands of "a soulless corporation" on its employees, "we may be perfectly sure that the man who walks with truthfulness, sobriety and morality, who is what the world calls straight, and who can look everybody in the eye, will command the respect of his neighbors and himself, and will be infinitely happier in the world than the man who does not."

To go to college is to seek the training which will fit for the duties of life. It should be to find the secret of power. A man may be educated, and well educated, without darkening the college doors. But he is educated in the longest and slowest way. He has lost valuable time and wasted much effort.

A college is a device to bring students together that they may educate each other and that older and wiser students may educate them. "It brings," says Emerson, "every ray of genius to its hospitable halls, that their combined influence may strike the heart of the youth in flame."

The college should train through personal influence of professor and of student. "The fellow-feeling among free spirits" has long been famous in the universities of Germany. It was said of Doctor Nott, of Union College, that "he took the sweepings of other colleges and sent them back to society pure gold," such was his influence on young men. Something of the same influence is exerted for good in every college. The great teacher never fails to leave a great mark on every student whose life he touches.

The college and the university train men for definite ends in life. The graduate of the well ordered college in these times knows some one thing very well and he can make his knowledge practical. The best teachers, the best lawyers, the best electricians, the best statesmen are those the university sends out. To excel in knowledge and action is to insure a fair salary and a worthy position in society.

Avoid the Middlemen of Education

The college gives a man a scholar's horizon. It enables him to see things which lie beyond his trade. A shoemaker is likely to measure the world by shoestrings, a grocer to think in terms of tea and sugar, a carpenter to put his universe together by rule of thumb. A scholar wherever placed should look beyond his profession and should see the affairs of the world in their true perspective. This should save him from bigotry, from intolerance, from selfishness. This should make him a more helpful member of society as well as better company to himself. This last fact alone is reason enough to justify a man in spending ten years of his life in higher education.

The higher education should make him a better citizen. It should give him the courage of his convictions, for only the educated man has any real convictions. Education shows how convictions should be formed. What the scholar believes he takes on his own evidence, not because it is the creed of his church or the platform of his party. So he, and he alone, counts as a unit in the community. "To see things as they really are" is the crowning privilege of the educated man. To help others to see them so is the greatest service he can render to the community. A tried beacon in the swaying tides of democracy is the educated man wherever he may be. You will go to college—where shall you go? The answer to this is simple. Get the best you can. You have but one chance for a college education. You cannot afford to waste that chance on an inferior school. Libraries, laboratories, rules, regulations, names and numbers do not make a university. It is the men who teach. Go where the masters are in whatever line you mean to work. Go to that school, in whatever State or county, under whatever name or control, that will serve your purposes best, that will give you the best return for the money you have to spend. Do not stop with the middlemen. Go to the men who know.

Digitized by Google

The Borrowed Sonnet

By Charles Macomb Flandrau

WITH the next theme we shall, as you probably know, complete the work of this course for the year." The instructor paused and meditatively rearranged some papers on his desk, while there was a perceptible compulsion of the attentive faculties among the hundred and fifty listless young men of the class. Billy Watson in the back of the room discontinued a languid game of tit-tat-to with his neighbor; Herbert Dunn destroyed with an impatient pencil stroke the sketch he had been making for the Lampoon and closed his notebook; here and there men put down the novels and text-books they happened to be reading with perfect safety under the eyes of the near-sighted instructor; Blakely Fordham turned from the open window through which, during the lecture on "periodic sentences," he had been watching the robins disport themselves in the sunflecked grass outside.

"We have had expositions and descriptions and narratives in great profusion," the instructor went on, "and for the last exercise of your skill and ingenuity I am going to make a somewhat radical departure by asking you to write a sonnet." There was a little flutter of amusement and dismay. "Of course," he continued, "the request is not based on an inference from your past work that the class is composed of a hundred and fifty poets, although there are several of you whose manner of observing is distinctly poetic and whose style in prose often responds most gracefully to the temperamental demand. From these men I shall look forward to receiving work at least equal to the average sonnet of the contemporary magazines, and from the rest of you"—he glanced about the room with a puzzled expression at which the class amiably laughed. "Well, I shall not, on second thoughts, indulge in prophecy," he smiled; and went on to give them a few general instructions. "Take some famous sonnet as a model," he advised; "one of Milton's or Wordsworth's or Keats'. Study its structure—the scheme to which the rhymes conform; note the manner in which the generalities of the octette or first eight lines are synthesized in the sextette or last six. Be sure and have a definite thought before you begin to write; the whole value of this exercise to most of you will consist in the literary discipline that comes of confining your idea within the limits of an inexorable form. Your vaporous thoughts subjected to poetic fire must prove themselves—crystals," he ended encouragingly, and dismissed the class.

When Fordham and Dunn strolled out of the recitation hall they found Billy Watson lying in the grass, his head resting on his hand.

"It's absurd to ask any one to express himself in thirteen lines," he complained. Dunn smiled as he pulled a blade of grass and nibbled its tender white end. He was a thoughtful, rather delicate-looking person.

"Why—does it have to be thirteen?" asked Fordham idly. "I thought they were just short spurts that filled up the page when a story left off in the middle."

"That would be too easy," answered Billy. "Heaven only knows why they have to have thirteen lines—it seems very arbitrary; you might get through in twelve or perhaps you might have enough material to stick on a fourteenth. But you mustn't. You've got to let it go at thirteen—don't you?" He appealed to Dunn, who looked dreamily into the trees. Dunn was often guilty of writing verses for the college papers.

"Oh, I shouldn't feel bound down to the unlucky number," he answered impartially. "I've seen lots of good sonnets with fourteen lines; in fact, many of the greatest have been written that way."

"Well, I want mine to be a corker," Billy declared; "I'm not going to run any risks. It's all right, I suppose, for Wordsworth to add a sort of a postscript if he wants to, but it's different with me. Have you thought of anything yet? I'm as full of ideas as this grass is full of mosquitoes; only they're just as hard to catch," he added, slapping wildly in the air. Dunn said he had already begun one for the Advocate that he might use, and Billy turned to Fordham.

"What on earth are you going to do?" he demanded, throwing a handful of grass at the big fellow's hair. "Your degree depends on this course, doesn't it?"

"I'm afraid it does," the other answered lightly; even now the rapidly approaching academic peril did not seem to him particularly imminent. He was not brilliant and he knew it; but he had always managed to "scrape through" somehow. A terrible week or two with a tutor just at the last had been always sufficient to give him the mediocre marks essential to remaining in his class. Even these occasional renunciations of his easy-going, happy existence were exceedingly trying to him; but they were less unendurable on the whole than would have been Dunn's or even Billy's method of "grinding" a little every day and taking their examinations as a matter of course. There were always so many other things to do that bore immediate fruit, so to speak. Systematic application to one's books in fine weather was almost like laboring for the benefit of posterity: the end seemed so far distant. He tipped his straw hat over his eyes and stretched his great length on the cool grass.

"I suppose I'll have to scribble something," he groaned. "It isn't the sort of thing you can pay a tutor to teach you; and I have about as much idea of poetry as a cow has of handling a musket."

"Do you know—I think I'll make mine about the death of Shelley," Billy declared with sudden ecstasy; "it was an awfully dramatic thing, his death, and I can end it up—where you crystallize the generalities' the way Penfield told us to do—by comparing the Bay of Spezzia to the sea of life that cuts off so many a young flower in the bud—you see what I mean, don't you?

Shelley is dead! Oh wind and waves lie down——

What do you think of that for a starter?"

"I think I'll write of Memorial Hall," murmured Dunn. "I know more about that than I do of most things."

II

FORDHAM climbed the steep stairs slowly, reluctantly, and let himself into his room. He had sat on the piazza in front of his boarding-place after dinner as long as there had been any one to sit with; it had been impossible to tear himself away from the crowd of pleasant fellows who lingered there in the soft summer evening, to talk and smoke and listen to the music of a harp and a flute and a violin that was wafted toward them from the other end of the short, leaf-embowered street. He had stayed on even when he had for companionship but one uncongenial man—even, in fact, for a short time after he had been left quite alone. But at length, with a laugh at his indolence, he got up and strolled along between the lilac hedges in the old-fashioned gardens of Cambridge to the college yard. There was in the night air a suggestion of unseen spring flowers and the pungent odor of box.

His room seemed very warm after his walk and the long ascent of the stairs, and after lighting the gas he threw himself across the couch and leaned out of the window. In the square below the music had collected a listless, amiable evening crowd; groups of men—some of whom Fordham felt sure he knew—were waiting for open cars to spirit them across the breezy bay into town; there was everywhere a seductive, whispering sound of loafing footsteps—the footsteps of happy people who had either finished their work or had decided not to begin it; the footsteps of people whom no one expected to write a sonnet before morning, Fordham reflected. He became absorbed in waiting for the empty electric cars to whirl around the corner and in watching the eager crowd scrambling for front seats. The occupation was scarcely exciting, but with the knowledge that in the room behind him a hot drop-light on his desk was awaiting him with irritating patience, it assumed a factitious kind of importance; he would wait for three more cars and then—to work. The three cars came and went more swiftly than any he had ever before waited for in Cambridge; he almost fell out of the window as the last one flashed from view. Then with a yawn he drew himself into the room and turned toward his desk.

That long-neglected piece of furniture was, he found, but ill equipped for the pursuit of literature. There was in the bottom of the ink bottle a thick, black paste and a collection of strange, slimy substances whose presence he was unable to account for. In dredging for them and dissecting them on a bit of blotting paper under the light (half an hour sped past in this employment) he broke the rusty, solitary pen he had discovered after a diligent search at the bottom of a box containing old golf-balls, empty shot-gun shells, broken pipes and useless fragments of objects whose entirety he could scarcely remember. Paper he was for a long time unable to find at all. He was under the impression that he owned two notebooks, but he had not seen them for weeks. For a moment he thought seriously of going into somebody's room on the same floor and borrowing a scratch-block, but appreciating with unusual perspicuity that the intention was the most puerile of excuses for further dawdling, he tore the fly-leaf from Mill's Political Economy and, with an altogether uncomfortable silver pencil Christmas present between his fingers, sat down to manufacture a sonnet.

It was at this stage of the evening that he realized with sudden irritation and disgust his complete ignorance of the sonnet form. The fact that he had not as yet even the flimsiest idea to embody in that form did not begin to worry him until later. As he sat there staring at the sheet of paper on his desk, Penfield's advice of two weeks before came for the first time dimly back to him. Well—his meagre shelf of books did not comprehend Wordsworth, Milton or Keats; this time he surely would have to borrow from his neighbors—unless (he accepted the inspiration most unwillingly) he could find a sonnet in one of the old Advocates he had subscribed to at some pre-historic period of weak-minded opulence. He blew the dust from a pile of college publications on the floor and began to turn the leaves—stopping here and there to read pages and sometimes whole stories. His search was rewarded by the discovery of three poems that he decided must be sonnets, although they contained fourteen lines apiece, and the author (they were all sparks from one intense, central fire) had with devilish glee, it seemed to Fordham, neglected to advertise the fact. They were called respectively Soul Sadness, World Woe and Heart Hurts. He laboriously read World Woe through twice. It treated with vague omniscience of "gray pain," and "the drift of moon-wrack in an evil sky." If he could have shorn the idea of its phraseology, he felt—with an almost irresistible desire to seek the author out and knock him down—it might suggest something similar around which he could, perhaps, drape a collection of unintelligible words himself. But it was impossible for him to discover what the infernal ass was attempting to prove in the first place in any one of the three poems, and he finally swept the whole pile of Advocates off the desk and leaned back in sullen despair.

"What to do?" If he failed in the course he lost his degree. And if he lost his degree he would have to spend six weeks in the summer school instead of going abroad. The Rhine—Switzerland—Venice—his mind for a moment was a vitascope of alluring scenes he knew well and delighted in. He leaned over his desk once more and painfully traced across the page:

"The sun was setting in the——" It was too idiotic. Exasperated by a mingled feeling of defiance and defeat, he pushed away from the desk, grasped his hat and flung out of the room.

Across the yard he saw a light in Dunn's window. Purely from a desire to curse his luck in sympathetic ears, he strode over and knocked on his friend's door. When he went in, Dunn, with a writing pad in his hand, was leaning back in a steamer chair. Fordham threw himself on the window-seat.

"I've been slaving all evening over my sonnet," he groaned.

"How's it getting along?" Dunn asked simply. "I've just finished mine," he said, holding up the scratch-block.

"It isn't getting along at all," the other answered. "I'm no earthly good at that sort of thing."

"Let's have a look at it," Dunn urged, as he erased a word and substituted another. "I may be able to help you out in some way—or did you bring it over?" Fordham laughed ironically.

"There wasn't anything to bring," he said. "I simply can't write a sonnet; I suppose I might have if I'd spent the last two weeks in stalking some sort of an idea and dressing it up until its own mother wouldn't recognize it," he added honestly, "although I'm not sure; I can't think of anything I wouldn't rather say right out, the way I'm talking now."

"Well, I wish I could help you," mused Dunn. "Perhaps if I read you mine it might suggest something," he ventured modestly. Fordham assented politely but without enthusiasm to the suggestion and listened to a sonnet on The Yard at Night. It was vastly more intelligible to him than World Woe and Heart Hurts. This fact and the manner in which Dunn read it tended somewhat to soothe his ruffled temper.

"I have another one here," Dunn said, when he had finished reading; "it's about Memorial Hall; I can't decide which to hand in. Which do you like best?" And he read a second sonnet, called The Transept. This one Fordham scarcely heard; he was pettishly wondering why Dunn should have with apparent facility reeled off two of the wretched things while he—Fordham—had been unable to grind out one. Then as he lay on the window-seat, staring at the discolored ceiling, a reason insidiously suggested itself, and he got up and crossed over to Dunn.

"I think I like the first one better," he said, for the sake of saying something. "Let's look at them." He took them to the light behind Dunn and pretended to read. In reality he stared at the back of his friend's head and speculated on the best way to begin.

"Yes, I think I like the first one best," he at length repeated, and, as Dunn made no reply, he asked indifferently, "Bertie, what are you going to do with the one you don't hand in?" He hoped the fellow would see what he meant; there was something rather revolting in the possibility of having to ask for the verses outright. But Bertie with maddening innocence merely replied: "Oh, I'll probably print it in the Advocate or Monthly if they want it, or I may just keep it; I have a whole drawer full of stuff I've scribbled since I've been in college."

"I wish you'd give it to me," Fordham compelled himself to say.

"Why, of course you can have it," the other declared—pleased that his sentiment had been appreciated.

Fordham wavered an instant between telling Dunn and not telling him that he intended to hand in the sonnet as his own. It came hard to tell him; but to leave in silence—he understood all at once what people meant when they asserted that the thought of having to do certain things nauseated them.

"If you give it to me, I'll let Penfield think I wrote it myself," he at last said boldly. "It's a question of doing that or losing my degree."

Bertie got up and looked at Fordham as if to make sure that he was in earnest. Then he strolled silently up and down the room with his hands in his pockets until his wanderings brought him by accident face to face with his friend.

"It's comparatively easy for a man to get back a lost degree," he said slowly.

III

TO BILLY the fortnight allotted for the writing of the sonnets had not been a period of unmixed delight. His classmates would gravely accost him in the yard—draw him aside and, with a kindly hand on his shoulder, say hesitatingly:

"I'm awfully sorry, old man—I hate to have to tell any one bad news; but did you know that Shelley was dead?" For days his mail—in addition to the bills that toward the end of May habitually fluttered through his letter-slide—was numerous with engrossed resolutions of sympathy and notes of condolence. The cards of every one he knew (and of many whose acquaintance he never expected to make), with "To inquire" scribbled across them, were left at his door. He was a little puzzled at first in trying to account for the visits of "L'Ambassadeur de Russie," several members of the Korean Legation and the entire Cabinet of the United States in a body, until he remembered with a giggle that Dick Benton's father was in the Senate. The arrival of a cable message from London and an unpaid telegram from Florida announcing the poet's demise, aroused him one morning at an unearthly hour. He became extremely tired of the relentlessness of undergraduate humor. It was rather more than annoying, for instance, to have an usher at the theatre call his name up and down the aisles—to leave the theatre amid a buzz of wondering voices—to drive frantically in a cab to the Massachusetts General Hospital, and there to learn that Shelley was no more. But he wrote his sonnet, notwithstanding the discouragement he hourly suffered, and was inordinately pleased with it. He confessed to Fordham, as they strolled over to the last lecture in English 47, that, considering his inexperience in such matters, it was a very remarkable bit of versification.

Digitized by Google

"Penfield will probably read it to the class," he declared. "You don't think he'll read any of them aloud, do you?" Fordham asked. He stopped abruptly in the path and looked furtively at Billy, who laughed a complacent laugh.

"Well, I don't think he'll read many of them," Billy answered. "But of course he'll read the good ones; he always does read a few good themes, and some of the bad ones, too. I don't see why he shouldn't to-day."

The possibility of having the sonnet he had handed in read in class had not until then occurred to Fordham. He knew, of course, that Penfield read and commented upon themes at every lecture; but his—Fordham's—themes had never been so honored, and as he rarely listened to that feature of the course, it had not made much impression on him. To-day, however, it worried him. Dunn's work he knew had always found favor in Penfield's eyes. What if the instructor should read it this afternoon—praise it, and perhaps let slip, as Penfield now and then did, Fordham remembered, the writer's name? It was odd, he was conscious of reflecting, that this contingency should so upset him. The repulsion he had experienced in asking for the verses and in afterward copying them and signing his name to them was nothing in comparison. And it was a feeling, moreover, with which the fear of detection had nothing to do. There was no danger of being found out; it was not as if he had taken a sonnet, however obscure, from some book. No one but Dunn knew who had written it, and Dunn—Fordham's emotions were a mixture of disgust at having had to hand in another man's work and satisfaction that the other man was the reticent, kind-hearted Dunn.

Fordham had never, during the four years he had spent at college, listened so attentively to a lecture as he did that afternoon, and Penfield's remarks seemed interminable. The instructor reviewed in considerable detail the work of the year, gave advice to men who hoped to make a career of letters or journalism, and, for the benefit of the men whose graduation was not imminent, explained the various courses in composition offered by the Department of English. At first, Fordham, with a nervous eagerness to "get it over with," tried mentally to hurry him; he was almost unable at times to resist the inclination to call out, "Oh, go on, go on, go on—you've told us that before." But as the end of the hour drew nearer he reversed the exercise of his will with painful intensity. When Penfield became absorbed in a comparison of English 12 and English 5, or sketched the daily life of a reporter, Fordham's mind became a pleading protest against the instructor's neglecting any aspect of the subject, or of reaching the point where he glanced at his watch and exclaimed, "So then you see——" and began to "sum up." If Penfield only would talk for eight more minutes, the young man reflected, as he took out his own watch and held it in his hand, there would be no time for the reading and comment.

"YES, I THINK I LIKE THE FIRST ONE BEST"

As if Fordham's action had suggested the lateness of the hour, Penfield broke off in the middle of a sentence.

"I know you are all anxious to get back to your sonnets," he said quickly, "so I shall proceed at once to read in the usual manner some of the worst and best examples of the work that has been handed in." The little experiment, he went on, had been for many reasons of great interest to him. Many of the themes he had received were not sonnets at all; a few of them were amazingly good sonnets; the rest of them were just—sonnets. Comment upon the verses that had not observed the required form was unnecessary; he had simply given the writers of them E—the lowest possible mark—without further thought. It surprised him to find, he declared, that in more than one instance men whose prose was unmistakably the work of a poetic temperament had handed in sonnets—technically correct, perhaps—but lacking in imaginative power—in a sense of words—in everything that gave to composition of this kind the quality he could only describe as "distinction." On the other hand, one or two members of the class—notably one—whose efforts in the past had been perfunctory, barren of sentiment and guiltless of grace, had achieved results of which no one could be ashamed. At the words "notably one," Fordham tried to assume the impersonally interested expression of the men who sat near him; but before the instructor had reached the end of the sentence he found himself staring fixedly at the desk in front of him, with a slow, hot, red sensation slowly creeping above the merciful limits of his collar into his neck and face. Well, there would be a bad ten minutes he told himself, for which he ought to have had sense enough to prepare himself. The ordeal once over, however, he would be rid of the course and Penfield and sonnets for ever; at that moment he hated not only poor Penfield, but the whole college and everybody officially connected with it.

He did not listen to the first two themes the instructor read, but was merely conscious that the class laughed uproariously at each of them. The writer of the first, in attempting to use his sonnet as a vehicle for humor, had achieved a tragedy; the second writer's treatment of an occurrence indisputably tragic was received by the class as the year's farewell climax of humor. It concerned the death of Shelley, and, as Penfield remarked when the merriment subsided, "its thirteen explosive lines might well have caused all lovers of poetry to regret even more keenly that the young genius had met with so premature a fate." Of the two good themes, the first—a vigorous appreciation of Michael Angelo's David—was received by the men with characteristic apathy, enlivened here and there by an impatient shuffling of feet.

It may have been partly owing to the simple, manly fashion in which Penfield read the second sonnet, and partly that its subject must always command the attention and respect of Harvard men; but at any rate The Transept was listened to amid an absolute silence that lasted—lasted—Fordham closed his eyes and dug his finger-nails into the palms of his hands while it lasted—until after the reader's voice died away in the summer stillness. Then came a crash of applause that ripped spontaneously into being like the bolt that tears the roof from over one. Fordham lost control of his lips for a moment, and when he opened his eyes he saw the room as if through glass upon which rain had blown. Penfield was fingering the sheet of paper in his hand as if he meant to continue his criticism; but when the room was once more silent, he merely took off his glasses and said:

"Gentlemen, the comments I intended to make upon this poem have been expressed."

The men surged toward the instructor's desk to get back their corrected themes. With a sudden realization that many of the class turned to look at him as they passed, Fordham pushed into the crowd and stared blindly over the heads of the men who surrounded him. He tried not to hear the confusion of flattering words through which he made his way, and it was not until he reached the desk and Penfield spoke to him that he could bring himself to reply.

"I congratulate you, Mr. Fordham, on a noble piece of work," the instructor said earnestly.

Fordham took the theme. All of the fellows near him had heard the instructor's remark and glanced up at its recipient with kindly appreciation. In avoiding Penfield's small gray eyes, Fordham found himself looking into Dunn's big brown ones. But he managed to smile a little and murmur, "I'm glad you liked it," before he turned to leave the room.

IV

WHEN Fordham reached his room and locked himself in he had a moment of exquisite relief. All the way from the lecture-hall the inquisitive and the congratulatory had overtaken him and asked him questions that seemed to him devilish in their innocence. His progress across the yard had been a continuation of the nightmare he had hoped to leave behind him when he left the crowded lecture-room. But now that he was alone—he experienced something almost like happiness in knowing that he was alone. What if he had a room-mate to catechise him—to ask him why he walked up and down so insanely and breathed so hard? Room-mates were inevitably personal—they seemed to spend their lives in annoying one another and apologizing afterward. He was immensely glad that he hadn't one. The cool, quiet solitude of his study had never been so altogether welcome and soothing; he had not until then known what it was to feel deeply grateful that inanimate objects were so tactfully, so wonderfully inanimate.

It had been worse—much worse—than he had imagined it could be. Asking Dunn for the sonnet in the first place had made him feel despicable enough; but that somehow was his own private affair—he had counted the cost and he had found himself willing to pay it. The torture he had just gone through, however, was different; he had not counted on that at all.

For a time he sought consolation in the fact that, since it had been so indescribably hideous, he would be able to endure with outward equanimity whatever further happened, and he had almost decided on the modest, rather deprecatory manner with which he should thenceforth meet all reference to his triumph in English 47, when a footstep in the hall and a rap on his door brought him to an abrupt standstill in the middle of his room. He stood there not daring to move—scarcely permitting himself to draw breath—while the door was pounded and his name was called with the exasperation of some one who had seen him enter the building. The noise at last ceased and the man who had been making it clattered down the stairs. Fordham threw himself on his couch. It was absurd to take the thing so seriously, he told himself. Other fellows had now and then handed in work not their own; he had known it at the time, but, beyond pausing to reflect that he himself would scarcely do it, he had not experienced any particular shock at the essential dishonesty of the act. He had never been conscious of any change in his feelings toward those fellows, nor had their attitude toward the college world seemed to undergo any alteration. They were probably not proud of what they had done when they chanced to think of it, but then they did not apparently often think of it. Why should he, who was of no finer clay than the others, feel so abjectly the whole affair? Of course the somewhat theatrical scene in the lecture-room had accentuated certain aspects of it. But that, after all, was a mere accident; the principle in either case was the same. If others could lightly consider such matters, he certainly ought to be able to. He would have to be man enough, he told himself, to stand by himself now and "back himself up."

In his own room, with the late afternoon sun serenely warming the friendly walls he had known so long, this, after a time, became comparatively easy to do. He sat there until the dinner hour, and gradually persuaded himself into believing that, as there was no possibility of his being found out, he could meet his friends and hear with more or less indifference what they said of his unexpected part in the last lecture of the English course, and then forget it all, just as they would. Time, he had so often read in books, softened the bitterest memories.

He jumped up to wash his face and hands. The cool water contributed materially to the serenity of mind that his long meditation had induced. But a moment later when he stood before the glass, brushing his hair, he found himself scrupulously avoiding his own eyes. With intense irritation he put down the brushes and looked himself square in the face. Then, telling himself that he had done with that sort of sentimental weakness, he strode off to dinner.

Fordham never tried to analyze just what took place within him as he swung into the short street in which stood his boarding-place. He was only conscious that, at the farther end, Billy and Dick Benton and one or two others had paused with their backs toward him, to call to some one in the street beyond. Actuated by motives he could not have explained, Fordham abruptly stopped, turned and retraced his steps.

It flashed through his mind as he did so that, if by any chance the fellows had seen him, he could say that he had forgotten something in his room.

He hurried toward the square, but without in the least knowing why he hurried or where he should go for dinner. After the long hours he had spent alone in his room he craved companionship, and shrank from going into any of the dreary little restaurants in the vicinity of the square. It was not that he hesitated to make so frank an admission of weakness; he admitted his weakness with a sort of dull despair. But he dreaded, as it were, to dine with it. He had stopped and was looking into the windows of a book-shop, without seeing any of the books, when three men he knew opened the door and came out to catch the bridge car. They were dining in town, they said, and intended to go to the theatre afterward. Would Fordham join them? Fordham didn't care for the fellows particularly—they had never been intimate friends of his—and the prospect of the theatre was not very alluring in his present state of mind, but he accepted the invitation with alacrity. For the moment he forgot, somehow, his disconcertion on having suddenly come across Billy and the others. With these men he felt no embarrassment. Until almost the end of dinner it was as if his self-respect were unimpaired. And then it came over him that Harrison—one of the three—had narrowly escaped expulsion in his sophomore year for very much the same sort of thing that he—Fordham—was guilty of. He could not recall the story in detail, but it concerned a thesis bought, paid for and handed in to the instructor of one of the philosophical courses. A stupid typewriter in copying the work had made a blunder that almost cost Harrison the rest of his academic career, but in some way or other—Fordham could not remember how—Harrison had ingeniously explained everything to the Dean's satisfaction and had remained in college. Fordham had heard Harrison tell the anecdote; it was, in fact, considered one of his best.

Digitized by Google

This, then, Fordham reflected dismally, was why he found himself so at ease in the society of Harrison and his friends: he had become one of them. He changed his mind about the theatre—he had a headache, he said—and walked back to Cambridge instead.

The next morning he found in his mail a printed slip from the Advocate requesting leave to publish in the next number the sonnet entitled The Transept. At first Fordham did not intend to answer the note, but a sickening fear that the paper might, on its own responsibility, bring out Dunn's sonnet with his—Fordham's—name under it caused him on second thoughts to decide to refuse his permission at once. He usually wrote his letters at the club, but this morning he bought paper, pens and ink in the square, returned to his room, and, as graciously as possible, informed the editors of the Advocate that he hoped to dispose of his sonnet elsewhere. It was the only plausible excuse he could think of. He breakfasted at The Holly Tree, with his back to the other tables and his face in a newspaper, and as no one he knew came in, he lingered there until late in the morning. His one lecture, he decided, after a short struggle with himself, to cut. Ordinarily, when he had no lectures, he went to the club or to the room of a friend. This morning, however, he hastened back to his own room.

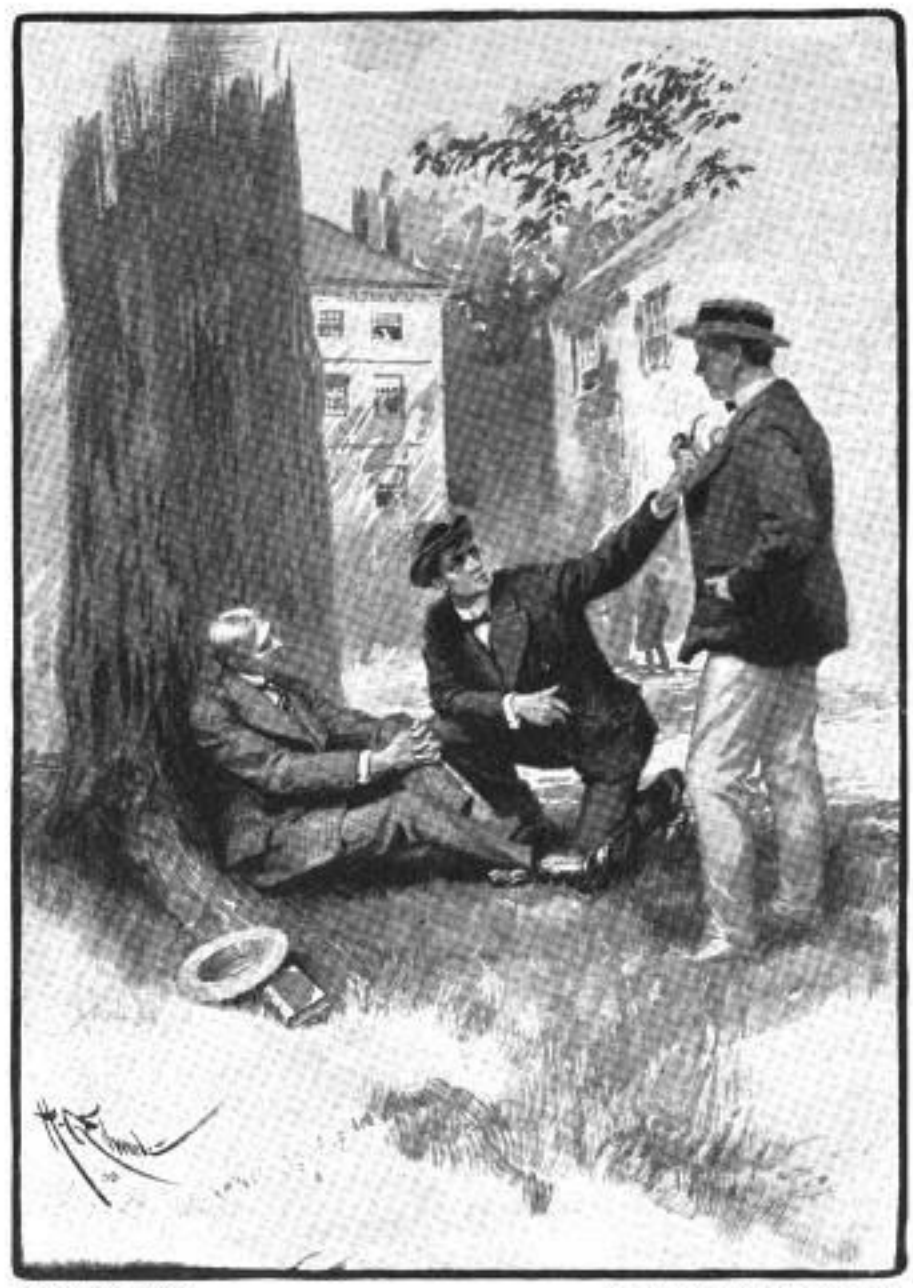
In the corridor there was a middle-aged man examining the cards on the various doors. He was looking, he said, for Mr. Fordham's room. Fordham introduced himself and took the man—who was obviously not a creditor—into his study. He explained—employing a pleasant formula that had become fluent from long practice—that he was one of the editors of Lespers and was making a little trip for the purpose of meeting new writers, looking into their work, and, where it seemed to be mutually advantageous, of coming to an understanding with them. Mr. Penfield had sent him to Fordham—had, in fact, read him one of Fordham's sonnets—a very beautiful and promising bit of work, by the way. . . .

After he had gone, Fordham seized a book from his shelf and tried to read. That the man must have thought him rude, eccentric, half-witted even, was annoying but, after all, of very little importance. It was the injury to Dunn that actually hurt him. He had defrauded his friend of the first great opportunity that had come to him. Of course, if Dunn's verses were as good as every one seemed to think them, recognition under the fellow's own name would surely be accorded them sooner or later. But knowing Dunn as he did, he was inclined to believe that the recognition would be later rather than sooner: Dunn was such a quiet creature; he would never know how to peddle his wares and "push" himself. His chance had come and gone.

That afternoon, while the rest of the college swarmed across the river to a baseball game, Fordham slipped out of his room and strolled through quarters of Cambridge he had never seen before. He hated to walk alone, but he could not bring himself either to go to the game or to look for some one who, like himself, had stayed away. His relations with his fellows had become sickeningly perverted, he felt, and he told himself as he sauntered along the shady streets that he would almost rather die than drag through another twenty-four hours like the last. As he had no intention of dying, the only practical escape from the situation lay in an immediate flight from Cambridge. Heretofore his relations with the college and the world generally had always been so extremely simple that the necessary details of the undertaking assumed definite form in his mind wearily—unwillingly. He would have to say he was ill, he reflected, and was going home to rest and take care of himself until the examinations. What an unending procession of repugnant lies it all entailed! He would dine in town and leave that evening.

On his way back to the yard he saw Penfield hurrying along a side street with his inevitable bundle of themes. The instructor was probably going over to his office in Gray's, Fordham thought, and, fearing that the man might overtake him, he walked quickly up the path leading to the dusky entrance to Memorial Hall.

It was cool and dim inside, and Fordham sauntered through the transept slowly. From the farther door he could see Penfield crossing the street, so he turned and walked back again, listening to the slight echo of his own footsteps on the stone pavement and noticing for the first time the soft rose-colored light on the marble tablets. When he reached the door through which he had come in, he seated himself on the steps and leaned his head against the cool bricks. A robin in the grass below eyed him curiously, as if questioning, Fordham thought, his right to sit there. It was all very peaceful and beautiful; the young man turned half way around in order to look again at the softly lighted interior. He wondered how he could have passed through it so often without ever having really seen it; how ironical it was that his first sight of it should also be his last. As he looked and was moved, a certain harmonious combination of words drifted through his mind; he was scarcely conscious that they were words, so perfectly did they interpret his emotion. It was not until Fordham came to the line that told of "a robin in the greening grass" that he realized that he was repeating The Transept. . . .



When, at last, Fordham left the steps he jumped up actively and hastened in the direction of the yard. He met many fellows he knew on their way to Memorial for dinner and he spoke to them eagerly—as a man might who had been away from Cambridge for a month.

He crossed the yard, ran up the steps of Gray's and knocked on the door of Penfield's office. The instructor dropped the themes he was reading with an air of relief when Fordham entered.

"I'm so glad to see you," he exclaimed. "I didn't have time yesterday to say all I wanted to about your sonnet."

Fordham went up to the table at which the instructor was sitting and let his fingers rest on the edge. He had not considered just how he should begin, but now that he was there it seemed easy enough.

"I've come to tell you that I did not write it," he said as his eyes met Penfield's.

DRAWN BY H. C. EDWARDS

"WELL, I WANT MINE TO BE A CORKER"

Trade in Queer Animals

By René Bache

THERE is no branch of the animal kingdom, nor any corner of the world, that is not ransacked and explored nowadays for the purpose of collecting natural history curiosities to supply the commercial demand. Special expeditions are sent to remote and almost inaccessible regions to gather strange and rare animals, for which the market is as unfailing as for any staple product of the soil or the factory. Firms dealing in such merchandise in a large way are located in most big cities both in this country and abroad, and, judging from the comprehensiveness of their catalogues, it would seem as if there was nothing that flies or walks or swims that they are not prepared to furnish on short notice at list prices.

One of these catalogues advertises a large assortment of "live material," as it is termed. From this document one learns that he can obtain large bullfrogs at three dollars a dozen, alive and kicking; medium-sized bullfrogs are cheaper, costing only $1.75 for twelve. Turtles are two dollars a dozen for "adults," and small ones for aquaria are offered at fifteen cents each. Pond snails, "in assorted lots," are listed at twenty-five cents a dozen; crayfish cost one dollar a dozen, and newts are fifteen cents each. In ordering crayfish, it is requested that a few days' notice be given in which to secure them in case the stock should be low. No such reservation, however, is made in the case of earthworms, which come at sixty cents a dozen. It is safe to say that any small boy will furnish earthworms under this rate.

It will be understood that all the above animals are shipped alive. The catalogue quotes small alligators at fifty to seventy-five cents apiece. Live rattlesnakes come higher—especially the diamond rattlesnake, which costs from five to twelve dollars. Economical persons, however, may prefer a ground rattlesnake at one dollar. The copperhead is supposed to be about as deadly as the rattlesnake, and may be obtained for two dollars, while chicken snakes, king snakes and garter snakes sell as low as fifty cents each.

Crabs are not offered alive, but in alcohol, and in this shape one can buy sand crabs, blue crabs, spider crabs, fiddler crabs, mud crabs and hermit crabs at prices running from ten to seventy-five cents apiece, spider crabs being the dearest. Insects, similarly preserved, are so cheap as to tempt purchase. Squash-bugs cost only fifty cents a dozen, while giant water bugs come at only half that price. Earwigs are quoted at fifty cents a dozen, antlions at ten cents each, crickets at fifty cents a dozen, seventeen-year locusts at ten cents apiece and June bugs at fifty cents a dozen. Horseflies invite the buyer at only ten cents the fly, "true wasps" may be obtained for the same price, and bumblebees foot the list at six cents.

In London, which is the great bug market of the world, auctions of insects are held every year, and startling prices are paid sometimes for rare specimens. As much as $800 has been brought by a single butterfly, while an out-of-the-way beetle may be valued at many times its weight in gold.

Hamburg is a great market for wild animals, largely from Africa, that city having an important trade with the Dark Continent. To London comes much material of the same sort from Australia and New Zealand, and many rare creatures are obtained from sailors who fetch them from various parts of the world. An American dealer, not very long ago, made a special trip to White Bay, New Zealand, for the purpose of procuring a kind of lizard called the "sphenodon," which is regarded by scientists as a wonderful curiosity, inasmuch as it is the only survivor of an entire order of reptiles, all the other genera and species having long since become extinct. This lizard, which is known to the native Maoris as the "tuatera," is about a foot and a half long and, oddly enough, seems to have affinities with the crocodile. Of course, all the kangaroos, wombats and flightless birds come from Australia or New Zealand. A while ago the American dealer above referred to made a special trip to South America for the purpose of obtaining guanaco skeletons and steamer ducks. The guanaco is chiefly interesting because, like the llama, it is a representative of the camel tribe on this continent. The steamer duck is particularly odd, inasmuch as it flies when it is young, but cannot do so after it has matured. The adult bird beats the water with its wings as it swims, and this suggested the name given to the species at a period when all steamers were side-wheelers. It cannot rise in flight, for the reason that, as it gets older, its wings do not develop in proportion to its increase in weight.

Digitized by Google

The Problems and Prospects of College Men as Seen by their Presidents

Should a Business Man Have a College Education?

By Francis L. Patton

PRESIDENT OF PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

A BOY fifteen or sixteen years of age, let us suppose, has decided on a business career, but wishes to know whether it would be better for him to go to college first. This is a very important question and he must settle it soon, for unless he is at one of the schools which are specially intended to fit boys for college he may find that his school curriculum, however excellent in its way, is not of the kind to open to him the doors of many of our universities.

It is rather unfortunate that there are two types of secondary education in this land, one having in view "the entrance requirements" of the leading universities, and the other intended to fit men for the activities of life in the various avenues of employment. The High School principal says very naturally that he must plan his curriculum with reference to the wants of the great mass of his pupils who, when they leave school, must earn their living, and who cannot go, or at all events do not intend to go, to the university. He must see to it, therefore, that certain studies which are not included in the college entrance requirements, but that are, as he supposes, important factors in fitting boys to be good citizens and in enabling them to earn a livelihood, are incorporated in the High School's schedule of studies. If, therefore, a boy discovers toward the close of his career at the High School that he wishes to go to college it may easily happen that he will find that he has learned the things that he ought not to have learned and left unlearned the things that he ought to have learned. It is a pity that through lack of a proper articulation of the High School and the universities so few of the High School graduates go up to the universities. This condition of things is not likely to last, and there are indications now of an approximation of the High School curriculum to the requirements for admission to our colleges and universities. This approximation would go on more rapidly, perhaps, if there were, on the one hand, a little more elasticity in the construction of entrance requirements, so that a liberal substitution of "equivalents" would be allowed, and particularly if, on the other hand, the custodians of High School education would more commonly recognize the fact that the general mental discipline which fits a boy for college is the best discipline also to qualify for the work of life.

The Problem of the Poor Man's Son

Were this dual system of secondary education eliminated from our problem the question then would be whether a young man about to enter upon a non-professional career would do well to go from school into an office, or whether he would be the gainer by going through the four years of a college course.

This question should not be answered without a careful consideration of both sides of it. There are some, of course, whose circumstances preclude the possibility of a college education, and the problem before us does not assume any practical form with them. Others, again, are so abundantly able to defer indefinitely the period of remunerative employment that they need not be considered in this discussion. Those to whom our question presents a serious problem are the sons of parents of limited means who are willing to make great sacrifices in order that their children may have the best advantages, but who are in doubt whether the gain to be secured by a college course is sufficient to justify these sacrifices. Let us understand, then, that in the case supposed the young man is under the necessity of earning his living, and that he has decided to earn it in one of the many forms of commercial activity covered by the word "business." We must treat this necessity and the proposed method of meeting it with proper respect. It is all very well to say that there is something in this world besides money. So there is: but it is hard to get on without a certain amount of it; and the simple ambition to "get on" is in itself a very worthy one. Few men can make fortunes; but every man has a natural desire to be independent, and any man who in these days of competition is able to maintain himself and his family in a position of modest comfort, who is able to educate his children and enable them to grow up in an atmosphere of refined living, has escaped the just imputation of failure. What, then, shall I say to a young man who has the ambition to realize social comfort and independence? Will he be more or less likely to succeed in business because he has taken the time to acquire a college education?

The Limitations of Office Education

It is safe, I think, to say that a university career will not lessen his business prospects. It is true that he will have spent four years in college which might have been devoted to business and that his companion who went from school to the office has got the start of him. It is but fair also to recognize the elements of advantage which the boy who does not go to college has over the one who does. He goes to business say at seventeen years of age. He is not ashamed to do the humble duties which are assigned to him. He learns to be prompt, industrious and obedient. He acquires, that is to say, business habits. His range of knowledge is limited, but of such resources as he has he is in full command. He writes a fair hand, spells correctly, and while his mathematical knowledge is chiefly of the kind which college professors speak of sneeringly sometimes as mere "business arithmetic," he is a master of it and performs the common operation of that arithmetic with readiness and accuracy. If now he has a knowledge of stenography and typewriting or will be at the pains to acquire it he may be in a position to earn a salary, and will perhaps be advanced to the post of private secretary to the head of his house, with a fair chance of further promotion, at a time when the college graduate is vainly looking around for something to do. In a few years he will have mastered the technique of his business, whatever it may be, and while business as a science, if that word may be used in regard to business, he may never know, business as an art he will have learned very thoroughly. Put him in the company of educated men and he will appear at a disadvantage, perhaps, in regard to questions in economic science. He knows nothing about "unearned increments" or the "law of diminishing returns." He is not on such easy terms with generalizations pertaining to business life as the college graduate is, but he understands the details of his own calling whatever it may be, and he has a certain commercial value in the labor market which the college graduate will not acquire without some trouble.

FRANCIS L. PATTON

Still, this knowledge of technique the college graduate will acquire in a much shorter time than it took the schoolboy to acquire it. He is more mature to begin with, and if he has not wasted his time in college he has the great advantage of coming to his business with trained powers. He has learned to give his undivided attention to any subject that needs it, and to do this by an act of will. His powers have not been trained to work in a narrow groove and are not limited to the automatically accurate performance of a single task, but they are at his command and under his control. He has been accustomed to handle the leading concepts of science or philosophy and to reason about them. When he is addressing himself to business problems he simply has a new set of concepts to be handled in the same way. Logic is logic, whether the subject of thought be insurance or astronomy. The power which comes as the result of a liberal education will soon show itself, and some day the opportunity will arrive for the university man to reveal the advantage which he has over the man who left school to go into an office.

Business that Demands College Men

It will be strange indeed if it is not found that the college graduate is capable of doing a kind and quality of business which the man who lacks this training is unable to do. For while the ordinary duties of buying and selling may not require much education, there are, on the other hand, enterprises which involve a comprehensive knowledge of affairs, which call for careful reasoning, which tax a man's power of exact statement, which demand the use of refined forms of expression, and which presuppose a man's ability to associate on equal terms with cultivated and highly educated men. It is needless to say that a man with only an ordinary school education is at great disadvantage under these circumstances compared with the man who has made good use of his time during the four years of his undergraduate life. Besides, it must be remembered that the number of university men in business is increasing all the time. This is changing the character of the competition which one must expect to meet in business life. The university man in the Old World is usually in one of the learned professions or he belongs to the leisured class. But in our land and in this day the business world is claiming an increasingly large proportion of our graduates. Attention was called not so long ago to the fact that the college man does not often come to the front and take a leading position in business. That is simply because until a comparatively recent day so few college men entered business life. The great fortune-builders have, as a rule, not been university graduates. But this is not likely to be the case in the future. The time is rapidly approaching, if it has not already arrived, when the young man without a liberal education will find that the most coveted places in the business and the social world are to all intents and purposes closed to him on this account. In a word, the business man must go to college because the college man is going into business. More and more, therefore, is it likely to be found that for the successful prosecution of the highest forms of business pursuits a liberal education is indispensable.

Another Side of the Problem

There is, I confess, another side of this question which is suggested by the ever-increasing complexity and magnitude of commercial transactions. So large a place does commerce hold in our civilization that it may well be asked whether a knowledge of its principles and of its phenomena may not properly enough be made part of a liberal education. A man can hardly be said to be abreast of his age who lives in entire ignorance of the principles and methods of the business world. I do not wonder that men who have a large vision of the mighty changes that are going on in commerce are beginning to feel that in making generous provision for a liberal education some place should be given to the scientific treatment of the phenomena of industrialism. But I am not discussing the question whether a liberally educated man should know something of business, but whether a business man should have a liberal education. I am trying to show that he should, and the argument would be all the stronger if, in addition to the study of geology, metaphysics, the history of art and civil engineering, an opportunity were given the undergraduate of learning, in a large and scientific way, something about the principles that underlie the great financial operations of the world.

It must be admitted, of course, that the undergraduate does not always make good use of his time in college. He is tempted to fall into idle habits, and he may come out with a diploma authenticating his liberal culture without having gained as much as he ought to have gained by his four years in college. I am in no sympathy with the disposition to look leniently upon the course of a young man who thus wastes his father's money, and who regards a college course as an indolent introduction to the more serious work of life, or a university diploma as a passport to social recognition. And yet it must be conceded that the education one gets in college is not altogether of the intellectual kind. The art of living the community life is nowhere better learned than through the comradeship of undergraduate days. There a man learns, if he ever does, how to get on with his fellows, has his manners conventionalized, is taught self-restraint and learns the lessons of respect for others. It is there that he learns to feel his share of responsibility for public sentiment and to realize his power and influence in making it. There, too, he is apt to get his first lessons in the art of dealing with men, and this in after life is apt to be of far more value to him as a part of his business training than would be the routine and not very intellectual duties that devolve upon the junior clerks of the counting-house.

There is still something else to be said. For after material success has been achieved and after it has expressed itself in material things—a man's house, his furniture, his plate, his pictures, his horses and his liveried servants, there are some things that money cannot buy, and there must be a degree of disappointment in the discovery on the part of the uneducated man that what he covets most is still denied him. There are men, of course, who transcend the defects of education. And men sometimes acquire grace of manner, refined taste, the ability to appear at ease in the society of cultivated people, and to appreciate the best that has been said in literature, who never matriculated at a university. But it would not be wise to be governed in our decision of the subject under consideration by these exceptions.

Digitized by Google

A college education, however, must be looked at apart from its bearing upon a man's success in making money, or his capacity for enjoyment, or his eligibility for refined society. A man is superior to his environment. The life is more than meat, and the body than raiment. By so much as a man is educated is he realizing the possibilities of his selfhood. There is a profound and a very true philosophy in the advice that is sometimes given a man to make the most of himself. For this, apart from the pleasure that comes of it or the place it gives one in the world, is one's duty. Nor must it be forgotten that every man is part of a great social organism and that he owes duties to this organism. He should not be willing to be a leech and simply suck a living out of the community upon which he happens to fasten himself. If he has worthy views of life he will consider not only what he should do in order to achieve success, but how he shall use his success after he has attained it. His power for good will depend upon his influence, and that will depend largely upon his strength of character and his intellectual equipment.

My advice to any boy who may read these lines is, not to miss the chance to secure a liberal education. And let me say to any parent under whose eye this article may fall: Give your son an education, and though it be at cost of patrimony, give him a chance to earn a college diploma.

The Choice of a Calling

By James B. Angell

PRESIDENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

ONE old question is ever new to each member of a graduating class in the last hours of his college course: "What pursuit shall I follow in life?" The aim of this paper is to give a few suggestions which may help one in finding the answer.

Some persons are by their very make and temperament so preëminently fitted for one pursuit that it never occurs to them, or to any one else, that there is any room for hesitation in deciding what shall be their calling. It is a great fortune to a man to be so constituted that he falls to his work in life as naturally and as easily as the young bird takes to her wings. For all his energies, his studies, his experiences work toward the real end of his life.

What we call the providential circumstances of some men determine their calling so plainly that there can be no doubt about the matter. A son, for instance, is left with the care of a large patrimony, which he can best administer. His duty to mother, brothers and sisters may be paramount to all other duties. Illustrations need not be multiplied.

These cases are simple. The really difficult case remains for consideration. It is that of the man who has apparently equal aptitude for different pursuits, say for law, for teaching and for journalism, and is shut up to no one of them to the exclusion of the others. Some men are so versatile that they could do any one of two or three things equally well.

In determining the question of aptitude we may frequently find help in taking the opinions of judicious friends, men of experience who will be frank enough to tell us the plain truth. There is a strange propensity in men to suppose that what is their foible is really their forte. It is said that General Scott believed to the day of his death that his fame would depend on his literary productions, which nobody reads, rather than on his Mexican campaigns. Goethe apparently felt more pride in his Essays on Color than in his Egmont or Tasso. Even in the range of college experience not a few men convince themselves that they are poets, while the rest of the college community remain unconvinced. The explanation of this self-deception is probably found in the fact that we are inclined to consider as our best productions those which have cost us most toil, because we have not been working in the direction of our talent. Let us then be prepared to hear the counsels of our associates who will tell us true things, rather than pleasant things, vera pro gratis. The faithful wounds of a friend are better than the flatteries of a foe.

One who is seeking to learn what his future duty is to be will find help in the faithful discharge of present duty. The path opens as we march on. It is the young man who is busy that is most in demand. It is the brave fellow fighting in the ranks for whom shoulder straps are waiting. Go bravely at the work which Providence puts within your reach. Remember that fine saying of Carlyle that the best teacher for the duties that are dim to us is the performance of the duties which are clear to us. Keep your soul open in a spirit of candor and honesty, ready to receive whatever may prove to be the divine command for you.

Is Scholarship a Promise of Success in Life?

By Benjamin Ide Wheeler

PRESIDENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

THIS is a common question, and the upshot of it is the other question: Do the tests which the college work applies resemble those which life exacts? The answer can be given only in terms of individual experience and observation, and I give mine for what it is worth. There are individual cases, as every one knows, of success from the lowest third of the class, and the comment of surprise gives them lustre. I believe they are comets, however. In my observation, the successful men come chiefly from the first third. When the high scholar turns out a commonplace man, as he not infrequently does, the dunces have their delight, and the one exception outweighs five illustrations of the rule.

A college man wins in life not by virtue of the special knowledge he has acquired so much as by the habits he has formed. Habits of mind involve an attitude toward truth. Habits of thinking involve a control of the mental processes. Habits of work involve sense for time and for duty. A man who does things at the time when they ought to be done is likely to be wanted. It is the men who are wanted that are the successes. The men who are forever toiling to create a demand for themselves, they are the nuisances.

The best scholars succeed best in life chiefly, I believe, because they have been most regular and punctual in doing their college work. My experience with college students teaches me that they are intellectually much nearer a level than their achievements indicate. It is power of will more than power of mind that differentiates them. Must and ought have fifty times more stuff in them than might and could.

I have known men of the superbest equipment and the finest intellectual and athletic training who were of no possible use for any sublunar purpose, because they could not be relied upon to keep an appointment or to do anything they had agreed to do at a specified time. Having lost faith in their own wills, they had ceased to plan their own work, and went drifting on through life swept with every current.

The college tests are not always such as to prevent some fairly small men and pretty mean men from reaching class honors by sheer digging, but the modern college offers them less opportunity than the old curriculum. Digging is good, for it betrays will-fibre, but the "digs" and "grinds" who lack heart and vision will prove to be men of the muck-rake.

There is a type of man found well represented in every class of modern American college from whom one may expect a successful life. He does his college work faithfully and stands well in his class. He takes part in student sports and student affairs without being pure athlete or impure class politician. He is clean in manners, morals and dress. He holds the solid respect of his class without being flabbily popular. He plans his work, keeps his appointments, moves toward a goal, and spends no time in watching himself grow. It matters little whether such a man is valedictorian or not.

The Student and His Money Account

By James G. K. McClure

PRESIDENT OF LAKE FOREST UNIVERSITY

HAPPY the man so well educated that his finances add wings to his success. Genius, without ability to live within means actually possessed or reasonably expected, is synonymous with misery. The true blessedness of life—whatever sphere of activity a student enters—depends largely upon his ability to keep outgo less than income. Many an ordinary mind has unceasingly advanced to influence, as well as has constantly held happiness, simply because it knew how to manage its money account. Of two students equally bright going out into the world from graduation day, one capable in money affairs and the other incapable, the chances—no, the certainties—of a successful career are with the former rather than the latter.

A student's use of the money that comes into his control is therefore of most significant importance. His sense of its worth, his appreciation of the source from which he received it, his method of expenditure, his power to obtain the best and largest results from it are elements of his character that he cannot afford to underestimate. Even if it comes to him freely as a lavish gift of wealthy parents, all the more should he be on guard lest misuse of it unfit him for the thoughtfulness that, sooner or later, his own personal responsibilities will demand. Here is where the poor boy, struggling to obtain an education, and necessarily counting every cent he himself can earn, or can secure from self-denying friends, is at an advantage: he must practice self-control, denying himself luxuries, remembering the sacrifice of his parents, and striving to make his resources as far-reaching as possible.

But rich or poor as the student may be, each alike needs the scientific method of using money. Truth applies to money as much as to electricity. Carelessness—not to say recklessness—in the use of money is a handicap. Avoidable debt hurts the moral and mental conception of the man, and prejudices the world against him. The teacher, minister or engineer who cannot manage his own finances wisely is an unsafe man with whom to intrust interests; the physician, lawyer or merchant whose methods tend toward bankruptcy would better be passed by.

The student, as a student, may not know the fact, but fact it is, that this world of ours, whose progress depends upon the ideal and whose sweetest experiences are those of sentiment, is still, and so far as we can see, ever will be, exceedingly prosaic. Some day bread must be secured, and perhaps children clothed and educated. Then the man who, years ago, learned how to manage comes gradually to the front; he can provide for a home, can do his part in public improvements, and can keep good cheer. His fellow who failed to see the moral obligations of money, who did not pay his debts, did not feel gratitude to his benefactors, and did not have wit enough to adapt his expenses to his income will be far behind in life's race.

It may be right for a student to borrow money wherewith to secure his education; many men have done so to their lasting advantage. Such borrowing is justifiable only where a student's industry, thrift, application and uprightness are worthy collaterals for the loan. But that student does well who somehow succeeds in preserving a good bodily condition and still comes out of college without burdensome indebtedness—such indebtedness is often a long-abiding incubus.

This is the thought that should be in every student's mind: "Other men provided the money by which this institution whose advantages I enjoy was founded and is continued. Here, I am a recipient. When I go out into the world I must be a giver. Thus alone can I show my manliness. Somewhere or somehow I must make my contribution to the welfare of the world. To that end I must now acquire the money habits that will fit me in my turn to be a giver."

With this thought animating him the student will do no dishonorable thing in any business transaction with his comrades or with the institution which educates him. As manager of any student organization, as subscriber to any student movement, as member of any student body, as borrower from any educational fund, he will be as careful with finances as though he were teller in a bank. So doing, he will protect his own integrity, secure the respect of his associates and hold a mortgage on influence and comfort.

Yes, happy the man so well educated that his finances, whether small or large, speed him on to success.

Digitized by Google

Stories of A Scots Grammar School

The Count

By Ian Maclaren

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

IF YOU excluded two or three Englishmen who spoke with an accent suggestive of an effeminate character and had a fearsome habit of walking on the Sabbath, and poor "Moossy," the French master at the Seminary, who was a quantity not worth considering, the foreign element in Muirtown during the classical days consisted of the Count. He never claimed to be a Count and used at first to deprecate the title, but he declined the honor with so much dignity that it seemed only to prove his right, and by and by he answered to the name with simply a slight wave of his hand, which he meant for deprecation, but which came to be considered a polite acknowledgment.

His real name was not known in Muirtown, not because he had not given it, but because it could not be pronounced, being largely composed of x's and k's, with an irritating parsimony of vowels. We had every opportunity of learning to spell it, if we could not pronounce it, for it was one of the Count's foreign ways to carry a card-case in his ticket-pocket, and, on being introduced to an inhabitant of Muirtown, to offer his card with the right hand while he took off his hat with the left and bowed almost to a right angle.

Upon those occasions a solid man like Bailie MacFarlane would take hold of the card cautiously, not knowing whether so unholy a name might not go off and shatter his hand, and during the Count's obeisance, which lasted for several seconds, the Bailie regarded him with grave disapproval. The mind of Muirtown during this performance of the Count's used to be divided between regret that any human being should condescend to such tricks, and profound thankfulness that Muirtown was not part of a foreign country where people were brought up with the manners of poodles.

Our pity for foreigners was nourished by the manner of the Count's dress, which would have been a commonplace on a boulevard, but astounded Muirtown on its first appearance, and always lent an element of piquant interest to our streets. His perfectly brushed hat, broadish in the brim and curled at the sides, which he wore at the faintest possible angle, down to his patent-leather boots, which it was supposed he obtained in Paris, and wore out at the rate of a pair a month, all was unique and wonderful, but it was his frock coat which stimulated conversation. It was so tight and fitted so perfectly, revealing the outlines of his slender form, and there was such an indecent absence of waist—waist was a strong point with Muirtown men, and in the case of persons who had risen to office, like the Provost, used to run to forty inches—that a report went around the town that the Count was a woman. This speculation was confirmed rather than refuted by the fact that the Count smoked cigarettes, which he made with Satanic ingenuity while you were looking at him, and that he gave a display of fencing with the best swordsman of a Dragoon regiment in the barracks, for it was shrewdly pointed out that those were just the very accomplishments of French "Cutties."

This scandal might have indeed crystallized into an accepted fact, and the Provost been obliged to command the Count's departure, had it not been for the shrewdness and good nature of the "Fair Maid of Muirtown."

There always was a fair maid in Muirtown—and in those days she was fairest of her succession: let this flower lie on her grave. She declared to her friends that she had watched the Count closely and had never once seen him examine a woman's dress when the woman wasn't looking, and after that no person of discernment in Muirtown had any doubt about the Count's sex. It was, however, freely said—and that story was never contradicted—that he wore stays, and every effort was made to obtain the evidence of his landlady. Her gossips tried Mistress Jamieson with every wile of conversation, and even lawyers' wives, pretending to inquire for rooms for a friend, used to lead the talk around to the Count's habits; but that worthy matron was loyal to her lodger and was not quite insensible to the dignity of a mystery.

"Na, na, Mistress Lunan, I see what you're after; but, beggin' your pardon, a landlady's a landlady, and my mouth's closed. The Count disna ken the difference atween Saturday and Sabbath, and the money he wastes on tobacco juist goes to ma heart; but he never had the blessin' of a Gospel ministry nor the privileges of Muirtown when he was young. As regards stays, whether he wears them or disna wear them a'm no prepared to say, for a thank goodness that I've never yet opened a lodger's boxes nor entered a lodger's room when he was dressin'. The Count pays his rent in advance every Monday morning; he wanted to pay on Sabbath, but I told him it was not a lawful day. He gives no trouble in the house, and if his doctor ordered him to wear stays to support his spine, which a'm no' sayin' he did, Mistress Lunan, it's no concern o' mine, and the weather is inclinin' to snow."

His dress was a perfect fabric of art, however it may have been constructed; and it was a pleasant sight to see the Count go down our main street on a summer afternoon, approving himself with a side glance in the mirrors of the larger shops, striking an attitude at our bookseller's when a new print was exposed in the window, waving his cigarette and blowing the smoke through his nostrils, which was considered a "tempting of Providence," making his respectful salutations to every lady whom he knew, and responding with "Celestial, my friend!" to Bailie MacFarlane's greeting of "Fine growing weather." When he sailed past McGuffie's stable-yard, like Solomon in all this glory, that great man, who always persisted in regarding the Count as a sporting character, would touch the rim of his hat with his forefinger—an honor he paid to few—and after the Count had disappeared would say "Gosh!" with much relish.

This astounding spectacle very early attracted the attention of the Seminary boys, and during his first summer in Muirtown it was agreed that he would offer an irresistible temptation for snowball practice during next winter. The temptation was not one which could have been resisted, and it is to be feared that the Count would have been confined to the house when the snow was on the ground had it not been for an incident which showed him in a new light and established him, stays or no stays, in the respect of the Seminary forever.

There had been a glorious fight on the first day of the war with the "Pennies," and when they were beaten a dozen of them, making a brave rearguard fight, took up their position with the Count's windows as their background. There were limits to license even in those brave old days, and it was understood that the windows of houses, especially private houses, and still more especially in the vicinity of the Seminary, should not be broken, and if they were broken the culprits were hunted down and interviewed by "Bulldog" at length.

When the "Pennies" placed themselves under the protection of the Count's glass, which was really an unconscious act of meanness on their part, the Seminary distinctly hesitated; but the "Sparrow" was in command and he knew no scruples as he knew no fear.

"Dash the windows!" cried the Seminary captain; and when the "Pennies" were driven along the street, the windows had been so effectually "dashed" that there was not a sound pane of glass in the Count's sitting-room. As the victorious army returned to their capital and the heat of battle died down, there was some anxiety about to-morrow, for Mistress Jamieson was not the woman to have her glass broken for nothing, and it was shrewdly suspected that the Count, with all his dandyism, would not take this affront lightly. As a matter of fact, Mistress Jamieson made a personal call upon the Rector that evening and explained with much eloquence to that timid, harassed scholar that, unless his boys were kept in better order, Muirtown would not be a place for human habitation; and before she left she demanded the blood of the offenders, and compared Muirtown in its present condition to Sodom and Gomorrah.

As the Rector was always willing to leave discipline in the capable hands of Bulldog, and as the chief sinners would almost certainly be in his class in the forenoon, the Count, who had witnessed the whole battle from a secure corner in his sitting-room and had afterward helped Mistress Jamieson to clear away the débris, went to give his evidence and identify the culprit. He felt it to be a dramatic occasion and he arose to its height; and the school retained a grateful recollection of Bulldog and the Count side by side

Between him and the boys there grew up a fast friendship

—the Count carrying himself with all the grace and dignity of a foreign ambassador come to settle an international dispute, and Bulldog more austere than ever, because he hated a "telipyet," and yet knew that discipline must be maintained.

The Count explained with many flourishes that he was desolated to come for the first time to this so distinguished a Gymnasium upon an errand so distasteful, but that a lady had laid her commands on him ("Dis the body mean Lucky Jamieson?" whispered the Sparrow to a neighbor), and he had ever been a slave of the sex (Bulldog at this point regarded him with a disdain beyond words). The Rector of this place of learning had also done him, an obscure person, the honor of an invitation to come and assist at this function of justice, and although, as the Count explained, he was no longer a soldier, obedience was still the breath of his nostrils. Behold him, therefore, the servant of justice, ready to be questioned or to lay down his life for law; and the Count bowed again to Bulldog, placing his hand upon his heart, and then leant in a becoming attitude against the desk, tapping his shining boots with his cane and feeling that he had acquitted himself with credit.

"We're sorry to bring ye out on such a day, sir"—and Bulldog's glance conveyed that such a figure as the Count's ought not to be exposed in snowtime—"but we'll not keep you long and I'll juist state the circumstances with convenient brevity. The boys of the Seminary are allowed to exercise themselves in the snowtime within limits. If they fight wi' neighboring schools, it's a maitter of regret; but if they break windows, they're liable to the maist extreme penalty. Now, I'm informed that some of the yoding scoundrels—and I believe the very laddies are in this classroom at this meenut" (the Sparrow made no effort to catch Bulldog's eye, and Howieson's attention was entirely occupied with mathematical figures)—"have committed a breach of the peace at Mistress Jamieson's house. What I ask you, sir, to do"—and Bulldog regarded the Count with increasing disfavor, as he thought of such a popinjay giving evidence against his laddies—"is, to look around this classroom and point out, so far as ye may be able, any boy or boys who drove a snowball or snowballs through the windows of your residence."

During this judicial utterance the eyes of the Count wandered over the school with the most provoking intelligence, and conveyed even to the dullest, with a vivacity of countenance of which Muirtown was not capable, that Bulldog was a tiresome old gentleman, that the boys were a set of sad dogs capable of any mischief, that some of them were bound to get a first-class thrashing and, worst of all, that he, the Count, knew who would get it, and that he was about to give evidence in an instant with the utmost candor and elegance of manner.

When his glance lighted on Spiug it was with such a cheerful and unhesitating recognition that the Sparrow was almost abashed and knew for certain that for him, at least, there could be no escape; while Howieson, plunging into arithmetic of his own accord for once, calculated rapidly what would be his share of the broken glass. Neither of them would have denied what he did to save himself twenty thrashings.

Editor's Note—This is the first of a new series of six stories by Ian Maclaren, under the general title, A Scots Grammar School. Others will follow at intervals of a month. Each story is complete in itself.

Digitized by Google

but they shared Bulldog's disgust that a free-born Scot should be convicted on the evidence of a foreigner, whom they always associated in his intellectual gifts and tricks of speech with the monkey which used to go around seated on the top of our solitary barrel-organ.

"When it is your pleasure, sir," said Bulldog sternly; and there was a silence that could be felt, whilst the Sparrow already saw himself pointed out with the Count's cane.

The shutters went suddenly down on the Count's face; he became grave and anxious, and changed from a man of the world, who had been exchanging a jest with a few gay Bohemians, into a witness in the Court of Justice.

"Assuredly, monsieur, I will testify upon what you call my soul and conscience," and the Count indicated with his hand where both those faculties were contained. "I will select the boy who had the audacity, I will say profanity, to break the windows of my good friend and hostess, Madame Jamieson."

The Count gave himself to the work of selection, but there was no longer a ray of intelligence in his face. He was confused and perplexed, he looked here and he looked there, he made little impatient gestures, he said a bad French word, he flung up a hand in despair, he turned to Bulldog with a frantic gesture, as of a man who thought he could have done something at once and found he could not do it at all. Once more he faced the school, and then Sparrow, with that instinct of acute observation which belongs to a savage, began to understand and gave Howieson a suggestive kick.

"As a man of honor," said the Count with much solemnity, "I give my testimony, and I declare that I do not see one of the boys who did forget themselves yesterday and did offer the insult of an assault to Madame's domicile."

And it would have been curious if he had seen the boys, for the Count was looking over their heads and studying the distant view in the meadow and the River Tay with evident interest and appreciation.

The mind of the Sparrow was now clear upon the Count and Bulldog also understood, and in two seconds, so quick is the flash of sympathy through a mass of boy life, the youngest laddie in the Seminary gymnasium knew that, although the Count might have had the misfortune to be born in foreign parts and did allow himself to dress like a dancing-master, inside that coat, and the stays, too, if he had them on, there was the heart of a man who would not tell tales on any fellow, but who also liked his bit of fun.

"Itz's a peety, Count," said Bulldog with poorly concealed satisfaction, "that ye're no in a poseetion to recognize the culprits, for if they're no here my conviction is they're not to be found in Muirtown. We can ask no more of you, sir, and we're muckle obleeged for yir attendance."

"It is a felicitous affair," said the Count, "which has the fortune to introduce me to this charming company," and the Count bowed first to Bulldog and then to the school with such a marked indication in one direction that the Sparrow almost blushed. "My sorrow is to be so stupid a witness, but, monsieur, you will allow me to pay the penalty of my poor eyesight. It will be my pleasure," and again the Count bowed in all directions, "to replace the glass in Madame's house, and the incident, pouf! it is forgotten."

There was a swift glance from all parts of the room, and permission was read in Bulldog's face. Next instant the room was rent with a round of applause such as could be given only when fifty such lads wanted to express their feelings, and the Sparrow led the circus.

"Ye will allow me to say, sir," and now Bulldog came as near as possible to a bow, "that ye have acted this day as a gentleman, and, so far as the boys of Muirtown Seminary are concerned, ye're free to come and go among us as ye please."

The departure of the Count, still bowing, with Bulldog attending him to the door and offering him overshoes to cover the polished leather boots, was a sight to behold, and the work done for the rest of the hour was not worth mentioning.

During the lunch hour the school was harangued in short, pithy terms by the Sparrow, and, in obedience to his invitation, Muirtown Seminary proceeded in a solid mass to the Count's residence, where they gave a volley of cheers. The Count was more gratified than by anything that had happened to him since he came to Muirtown; and, throwing up one of the newly repaired windows, he made an eloquent speech, in which he referred to Sir Walter Scott and Queen Mary and the Fair Maid of Perth among other romantic trifles; declared that the fight between the "Pennies" and the Seminary was worthy of the great Napoleon; pronounced the Sparrow to be un brave garçon; expressed his regret that he could not receive the school in his limited apartments, but invited them to cross with him to Mistress McCrum's, the Seminary tuckshop, where he entertained the whole set to Mistress McCrum's best home-made ginger-beer. He also desired that Mistress Jamieson should come forward to the window with him and bow to the school while he held her hand—which the Count felt would have been an interesting tableau. It certainly would have been, but Mistress Jamieson, in the most decided terms, refused to assist.

"Me stand wi' the Count at an open window, hand in hand wi' him, and bowin', if ye please, to thae blackguard laddies? Na, na; I'm a widow o' good character and a member o' the Free Kirk, and it would ill set me to play such tricks. But a'll say this for the Count—he behaved handsome; and a'm judgin' the'll no be another pane o' glass broken in my house so long as the Count is in it." And there never was.

It were not possible to imagine anything more different than a Muirtown boy and the Count; but boys judge by an instinct which never fails within its own range, and Muirtown Seminary knew that, with all his foreign ways, the Count was a man. Legends gathered around him and flourished exceedingly, being largely invented by Nestie and offered for consumption at the mouth of the pistol by the Sparrow, who gave it to be understood that to deny or even to smile at Nestie's most incredible invention would be a ground of personal offense.

The Count was in turn a foreign nobleman, who had fallen in love with the Emperor of Austria's daughter and had been exiled by the imperial parent, but that the Princess was true to the Count, and that any day he might be called from Mistress Jamieson's lodgings to the palace at Vienna; that he was himself a King of some mysterious European State, who had been driven out by conspirators, but whose people were going to restore him, and that some day the Sparrow would be staying with the Count in his royal abode, and possibly sitting beside him on the throne. During this romance the Sparrow felt it right to assume an air of demure modesty, which was quite consistent with keeping a watchful eye on any impertinent young rascal who might venture to jeer, when the Sparrow would politely ask him what he was laughing at, and offer to give something to laugh for; that the Count was himself a conspirator and the head of a secret society which extended all over Europe, with signs and passwords, and that whenever any tyrant became intolerable, the warrant for his death was sent from Mistress Jamieson's. Whenever one fable grew hackneyed, Nestie produced another, and it was no longer necessary in Muirtown Seminary to buy Indian tales or detective stories, for the whole library of fiction was now bound up and walking about in the Count.

Between him and the boys there grew up a fast friendship, and he was never thoroughly happy now unless he was with his "jolly dogs." He attended every cricket match and at last, after he had learned how, kept the score, giving a cheer at every new run and tearing his hair when any of his boys were bowled out. He rushed around the football field without his cane and generally without his hat; and high above all cheers could be heard his "Bravo—bravo, forvards! Spur-r-ow!" as that enterprising player cleft his way through the opponents' ranks. It mattered nothing to the Count that his boots were ruined and his speckless clothes soiled; he would not have cared though he had burst his stays, so long as the "dogs" won and he could go up in glory with them to Phemie McCrum's and drink to their health in flowing ginger-beer. During the play hour his walk seemed ever to bring him to the North Meadows, and if a ball by accident, for none would have done it by intention, knocked off the Count's hat, he cried "Hoor-r-rah!" in his own pronunciation and bowed in response to this mark of attention.

It was a pretty sight to see him bending forward, his hands resting on his knees, watching a battle royal between the tops of Sparrow and Howieson, and if anything could be better it was to see the Count trying to spin a top himself, and expostulating with it in unknown tongues. As the boys came to the school in the morning and went home in the evening up Breadalbane Street, the Count was always sitting at one of the windows which had been broken, ready to wave his hand to any one who saluted him.

As time went on this alliance told upon the Count's outer man; he never lost his gay manner nor his pretty little waist, nor could he ever have been taken for a Scot, nor ever, if he had lived to the age of Methuselah, have been made an elder of the Kirk; but his boots grew thicker, though they were always neat, and his clothes grew rougher though they were always well made, and his ties became quieter and his week-day hat was like that of other men, and, except on Sunday, Muirtown never saw the glory of the former days.

With his new interest in life every one noticed that the Count had grown simpler and kindlier, and Muirtown folk, who used to laugh at him with a flavor of contempt, began to love him, through their boys. He would walk home with Bulldog on a summer evening, the strangest pair that ever went together; and it was said that many little improvements for the comfort of the lads, and many little schemes for their happiness at Muirtown Seminary were due to the Count. It was believed that the time did come when he could have returned to his own land, but that he did not go because he was a lonely man and had found his friends in Muirtown; and when he died, now many years ago, he left his little all for the benefit of his "jolly dogs," and the Count, who had no mourners of his blood, was followed to his grave by every boy at Muirtown Seminary.

"ITZ'S A PEETY, COUNT," SAID BULLDOG, "THAT YE'RE NO IN A POSEETION TO RECOGNIZE THE CULPRITS"

Tattooed Men in the Army

THE Army keeps an interesting record of its tattooed men. There are a good many of them, and their embellishments furnish one of the principal means of identification. Indeed, this record may be said to be the basis of the military system of personal identification in connection with the detection of deserters, and is the nearest approach to the excellent Bertillon method of the French Government.

When a man applies at a recruiting station or at a regimental recruiting depot he is subjected to a physical examination. The physical standard of the enlisted man of the Army has been raised within the last few years by the determination of the authorities to accept for duty as soldiers only such men as possess hardihood, endurance and a good physique. In connection with this examination the Army surgeon indicates on a card, furnished for that purpose, the marks upon the body of the recruit, whose name, age, height, color of hair and eyes, and date of enlistment are also recorded. This card contains the outlined figure of a man, the body divided into sections for the convenience of classifying the distinguishing marks found on the recruit.

The card, with its faithful record, is sent to Washington, where it is properly indexed and then classified with cards which bear a similarity of bodily marks. Thus the cards which show a striking scar or tattooed emblem on the right forearm are put in a class by themselves; a card which shows the distinguishing mark to be on the left hip goes in a class with other cards presenting a like mark on the same part of the body. This makes it possible, when a man deserts and reinlists under an assumed name, to compare the card of the new recruit with the cards of other men who have served and who are distinguishable by similar telltale marks.

The most interesting of these distinctive features are the tattooed marks. Sometimes the design is a crude, meaningless splotch of India ink, an inheritance from schoolday trickery. Others are elaborate.

The designs are varied, and run the gamut of human ingenuity. They illustrate strange animals, reptiles, frightful faces, or again, some religious subject is depicted, or a romance which may or may not have left its memory in the heart, is thus perpetuated in the skin. Names, most of them feminine, frequently appear as a tattooed memorial, as do oftentimes initials, not always of the bearer's name. This record of the tattooed men of the Army is an interesting one. It is one of the most useful of the features of a simple system of identification. Many a deserter and wrongdoer has been found by some fantastic tattooed design on his body.

Digitized by Google

MEN & WOMEN OF THE HOUR

The New President of Mount Holyoke

Miss Mary E. Woolley, the new President of Mount Holyoke College, is the daughter of a Congregational minister. She was graduated at Wheaton Seminary, Norton, Massachusetts.

In 1891 Miss Woolley went to Dr. E. B. Andrews, the President of Brown University, and asked permission to enter that institution as a special student in history. This permission was granted. In a few weeks the Brown University for Women was opened and Miss Woolley was the first student enrolled.

During the summer after her freshman year she made up her preparatory Greek, and her second year found her with the regular sophomore studies, freshman Greek and post-graduate work in history. She studied night and day, and at the end of the summer after the second year she entered the senior class and was graduated with the class of '94, having taken the regular four years' course in three years.

During her first year in Brown Miss Woolley was a marked figure on the campus and in the library, where she usually could be found in the afternoon poring over some old Latin book or hunting out some buried historical fact. Her quiet, steady manner of work was an inspiration to the men, and many of them did more faithful work because of her presence in the classroom. Great things were prophesied of her. Doctor Andrews predicted that some day Miss Woolley would be at the head of some one of the large women's colleges. She was not only interested in the studies but in everything else pertaining to college life, and was thoroughly up on the victories of the Brown ball Nine.

She was asked what she found to be the difference between the men and the women in the college. Her reply was characteristically frank. "The girls study harder; the men think more," she declared.

After receiving her A. M. at Brown, Miss Woolley was offered the position of instructor of Biblical history at Wellesley College. She accepted. Her first year at Wellesley was a great success. The girls delighted to honor her, and she was in constant demand as chaperon. Her course became one of the most popular in the college and remained so.

In 1897 Smith College tried to get her to join its faculty, and at the same time she was offered the position of Principal of Wheaton Seminary. Both of these honors she declined.

During her first years at Wellesley she was very active as a member of the Rhode Island Women's Committee which raised the money to endow the Brown University for Women. The other day these Rhode Island women gave a dinner to Miss Woolley, and many delightful compliments were paid her for her many good works. Miss Woolley is above the medium height, slender, of the brunette type, with deep, searching brown eyes, and a high, intellectual forehead. Her manner is simple and attractive, and she is a delightful conversationalist. She loves her home life and prides herself on her cooking.

Miss Woolley's capacity for study is extraordinary. For instance, when she went to Brown University she took the freshman studies with the girls and junior and senior history in the men's classes, and did special honor work both in Latin and history. When she received the degree of Master of Arts from Brown, Doctor Jameson, her teacher in history, said that she was the peer of any man in New England teaching history who had been out of college nine years.

Mr. Bonaparte's Famous Pun

The most successful pun ever perpetrated at a commencement is attributed to Charles Jerome Bonaparte, the brilliant American member of that famous family, who is a trustee of Harvard, and who practices law in Baltimore. It was at the Johns Hopkins University, and there was a crowded and distinguished audience. Mr. Bonaparte presided. The address was to have been delivered by a member of the faculty who was remarkably absent-minded. When introduced he stood up and confessed to the large audience that he had forgotten entirely that he was to make an address; he recalled that something was on his mind and he intended the night before to write out a speech, but instead of that it slipped his memory and he went to the opera. With that he sat down. Mr. Bonaparte arose and spoke these three words:

"Opera non verba."

There was a slight pause, and then a roar of laughter filled the hall.

Doctor Pritchett's New Post

The election of Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, to succeed Dr. James M. Crafts as the President of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been universally approved by the alumni of this famous technical school.

Doctor Pritchett is a scientist of the first rank, and his astronomical and mathematical researches are known to astronomers and geographers the world over. Dr. Pritchett was born in Missouri in 1857. After taking his bachelor's degree he spent several years in study abroad and was given his doctor's degree by the University of Munich. His astronomical studies have taken him all over the world, some of his most valuable work having been done while at the head of parties of scientists sent out to observe eclipses and other celestial phenomena. He has also held several important positions in the leading observatories of the country.

Doctor Pritchett was for several years connected with Washington University, where his scientific attainments brought him into wide notice. Like most investigators he is a man of wonderful enthusiasm and tenacity of purpose, which should go far in making him a valuable acquisition for the New England technical school.

One of Doctor Pritchett's closest friends was Professor Asaph Hall, under whom he studied in the United States Naval Observatory, and who became Professor of Astronomy at Harvard and discovered the two moons of Mars.

Doctor Ward's Part in the Affair

Among the successful smaller colleges of the country is the Western Maryland, located at Westminster. For years the President of it was the Rev. Dr. J. T. Ward. One night some of the mischief-makers stole the molasses cans from the kitchen and poured streams of the treacle down the whole of the banisters that led from the sky parlor to the basement. Doctor Ward got up very early the next morning and as he went down the steps he gathered a handful of the molasses. The faculty sat in solemn session, but not an inkling could they find as to the identity of the miscreants. Suddenly the humor of the thing broke upon the doctor, and he said:

"Gentlemen, I may as well confess. I had a hand in it."

A Young Man of Action

Men who know James A. LeRoy, secretary to Dean C. Worcester, of the Philippine Commission, believe the Commissioners could not do better than turn him loose with instructions to run the rebel leader down. LeRoy has a faculty for meeting all sorts of emergencies in apparently impossible ways.

In '96, when he was captain of the University of Michigan track team, he sprained his ankle and had to break training. He went with his team to Chicago to attend the Western intercollegiate meet, but did not expect to contest, and did not even take his track suit. But a man whom he had counted on to win the broad jump got sick. LeRoy saw defeat staring his team in the face. He was entered for the games and had the right to take part. He borrowed a suit and pair of spiked shoes. He walked to the track with a look of determination on his face that made his supporters prophesy success in spite of his bad ankle and lack of training. When his turn came he tore down the field in a way that made the Michigan men hold their breath. He rose at the take off and landed just twenty-two feet and seven inches away, breaking the Western record and defeating his nearest competitor by more than one foot. When Commissioner Worcester offered LeRoy his secretaryship the athlete was in Detroit writing politics for the Evening News. He wired his acceptance and then wrote another telegram. It consisted of five words:

"Can I take my wife?"

"You have my best blessing," wired the Commissioner, who knew LeRoy was not married, "but I will have to get you permission from Washington."

Then LeRoy wrote another telegram. It was to Miss Mabel Pound, of Pontiac. Miss Pound had been in the university when LeRoy was a student there. This telegram contained eleven words:

"Will you marry me and start at once for the Philippines?" Just that and nothing more.

The answer to this dispatch has not been made public. However, permission came from Washington for LeRoy to take his wife to Manila. There was no time to be lost. LeRoy had to leave for San Francisco on Friday. Superstitions were laid aside and he was married to Miss Pound on that day. Now he and Mrs. LeRoy are on the transport bound for the Philippines.

A Friend of the Indians

Miss Alice Cunningham Fletcher, who is connected with the Peabody Museum of American Archæology and Ethnology at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and who is a member of the Anthropological Society of Washington and a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, is best known for her remarkable work in ethnology. But there are hundreds of Indians who remember her name and thank her for what she did for them. It was she who devised the system for loaning small sums of money to aid the Indians to buy land and build houses for themselves.

It was due to Miss Fletcher that many children of the Omahas were sent to the Indian schools at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and Hampton, Virginia, and she raised a great deal of money to pay for the education of Indians. A very unusual tribute to her work was the request of the Government that she write the book on Indian Civilization and Education.

Digitized by Google

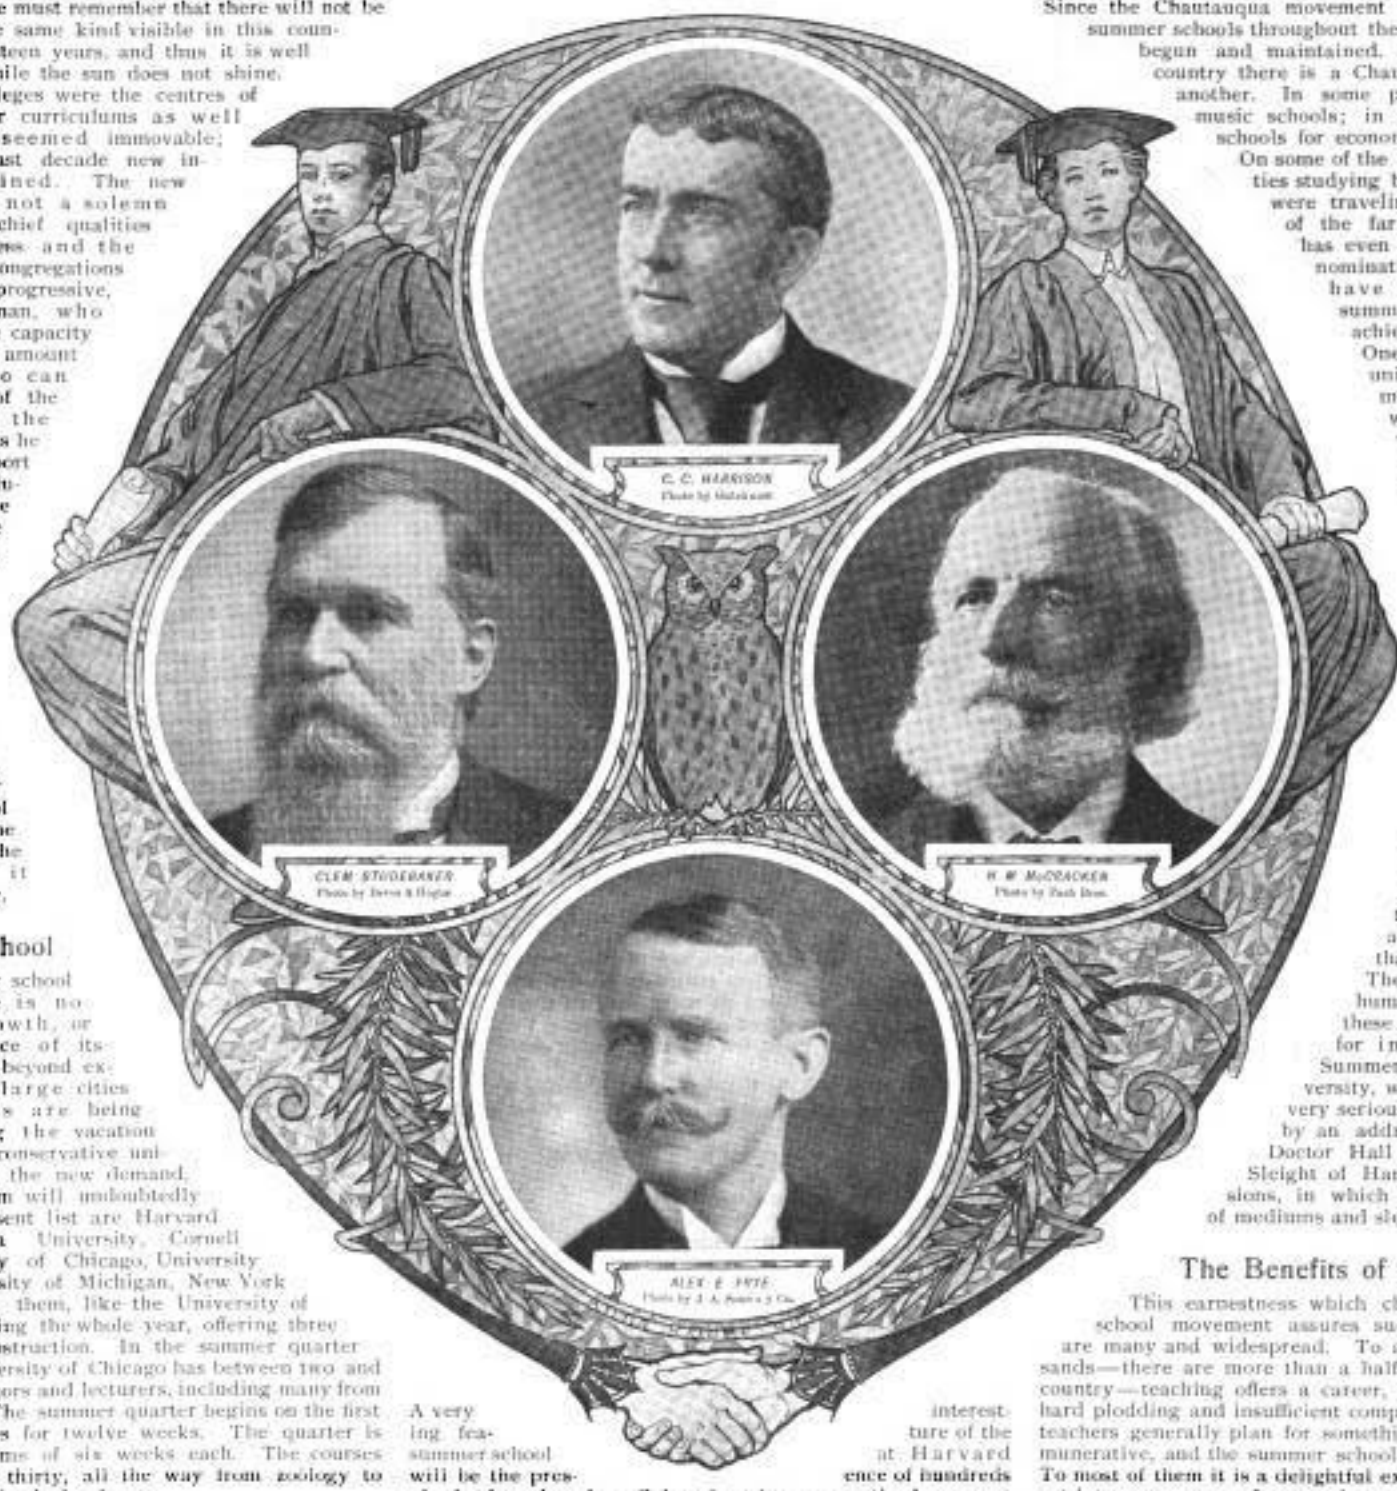
"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

The Enterprise of the Modern College

In many respects the finest eclipse of the sun that has taken place during the present century will occur next Monday. In one hundred years there have been seventy eclipses, but only eight of the total eclipses have been visible on the North American continent. This year all the way from the neighborhood of New Orleans to Norfolk in a straight line across the Southern States the eclipse will be total, and for several hundred miles on each side of the path of totality there will be enough of the eclipse to arouse the interest of the millions who will see it. Of course such an event is bound to enlist the attentions and activities of all the colleges interested in astronomy. Hundreds of thousands of cameras are being made ready for the day. But the fact that best illustrates the new era of education is that there is a sufficiently large number of people concerned in the study of the heavens to lead the railroad companies to advertise special trains and special rates for the great show, although it will last less than two minutes. But then we must remember that there will not be another eclipse of the same kind visible in this country for more than eighteen years, and thus it is well to make negatives while the sun does not shine.

For years our colleges were the centres of conservatism. Their curriculums as well as their theologies seemed immovable; but within the past decade new influences have obtained. The new college president is not a solemn theologian whose chief qualities are absent-mindedness and the ability to preach congregations to sleep, but a live, progressive, energetic business man, who combines executive capacity with a satisfactory amount of learning, and who can raise the standards of the institution with the same enthusiasm as he raises cash to support it. Thus in the evolution of things the university and the college are bridging over the long summer vacation. Until recently, the church and the school, which we most need, were about the only things that were closed during the summer months. In the new order of things, the school is now ahead of the church; but give the church time and it will surely do its duty.

The Summer School



Hence the summer school movement. There is no doubt about its growth, or about the permanence of its stay. It has gone beyond experiment. In the large cities the public schools are being thrown open during the vacation days. Many of the conservative universities are meeting the new demand, and the rest of them will undoubtedly follow. On the present list are Harvard University, Columbia University, Cornell University, University of Chicago, University of Wisconsin, University of Michigan, New York University. Some of them, like the University of Chicago, continue during the whole year, offering three months of summer instruction. In the summer quarter for this year the University of Chicago has between two and three hundred instructors and lecturers, including many from other universities. The summer quarter begins on the first of July and continues for twelve weeks. The quarter is divided into two terms of six weeks each. The courses offered number over thirty, all the way from zoology to public speaking and physical culture.

Seeking Comfort as Well as Culture

Some of the colleges are not located where summer study would be particularly attractive. For instance, the University of Pennsylvania, of which Dr. C. C. Harrison is the Provost, is located in the midst of a great city where the summer heat drives people to the seashore and the mountains. The University of New York, of which Dr. H. M. McCracken is Chancellor, being located high in the hills, the summer students are able to think of something more than the conditions of the atmosphere. Further North and throughout the Northwest colleges maintain their summer courses and attract thousands of students from all parts of the country. Cornell, 810 feet above sea-level and overlooking beautiful Lake Cayuga, will have more than twenty courses this summer, including one of special interest called Nature Study—a course which is open to teachers in New York State free of charge. This is getting fun and education at the same time, for the students go out to catch bugs and pull up plants and get at the roots of things generally.

Four Shiploads of Cuban Teachers

One of the most successful summer schools of the country is at Harvard University. Many attend from all parts of the United States. This, indeed, is one of the blessings of the summer movement. It enables people, especially school teachers, to get advantages which they would never obtain otherwise. This year the Harvard Summer School will have about sixty instructors, consisting of regular members of the Harvard teaching staff from the rank of professor down to that of an assistant.

A very interesting feature of the summer school at Harvard will be the presence of hundreds of school teachers from Cuba. American occupation has meant much in every way, but in no respect have the results been larger or more gratifying than in the prompt equipment and rapid advance of the educational facilities. A wide-awake American, Mr. Alexander E. Frye, was made superintendent of schools for the island. He went about his work with characteristic promptness and system, and the consequence was that in a few months the enrollment of pupils was many times the total under the Spanish régime. The time is coming when Cuba will have more than 200,000 pupils in the public schools. In the meanwhile it is necessary to educate the teachers, not only in English, but in the more advanced facts in education.

Thus it has come to pass that through Mr. Frye's energy the Government has consented to use four of the transports in carrying free 1450 of the school teachers of Cuba to Boston, where they will take the summer course at Harvard.

Summer Schools All Over the Country

The greatest summer school in the world is Chautauqua, and to it belongs a large part of the credit for the summer movement in education. Last year it had an enrollment of students that reached the astonishing total of 2202, and the probability is that this number will be largely increased this summer. In the list of instructors and lecturers are many of the familiar names in modern education. For instance, all these institutions are represented in the list: Yale, Clark, Princeton, Cornell, Columbia, Vanderbilt, Washington, Purdue, Bucknell, Chicago, Michigan, Missouri, California, the Western Reserve and the Northwestern.

The course continues for six weeks and includes a broad range of subjects. There are lectures, addresses, concerts, and a variety that will reach all classes and keep up the interest. The plan is to provide thoroughness on the side of instruction, and well-balanced and stimulated general public life on the side of recreation and popular education. Since the Chautauqua movement became successful other summer schools throughout the United States have been begun and maintained. In every State of the country there is a Chautauqua of one kind or another. In some places there are special music schools; in others there are special schools for economics and outdoor study. On some of the rivers and bays are parties studying biology. Last year there were traveling schools in the wilds of the far West. The movement has even reached the different denominations, and the Catholics have on Lake Champlain a summer school that has achieved excellent results.

One summer school that is unique is that of the Summer School of Theology which runs through the warm weather months in Boston. There are over one hundred students. "The atmosphere of the audience," wrote an observer, "is mildly orthodox, not over-critical, and intensely in earnest. The most liberal and scholarly interpretations produce the most applause, and there is no chill running down the conglomerated back when startling conclusions are announced," and the same writer called it the theological clearing-house, and said that the most startling thing about the whole affair is that nothing was startling. There is a great deal of fine humor and entertainment in these summer meetings. Take, for instance, the Worcester Summer School at Clark University, where the speeches upon very serious topics are lightened up by an address by the very serious Doctor Hall on such a subject as Sleight of Hand and Kindred Diversions, in which he explains the tricks of mediums and sleight-of-hand performers.

The Benefits of the Summer Work

This earnestness which characterizes the summer school movement assures success. The advantages are many and widespread. To a few of the many thousands—there are more than a half million teachers in this country—teaching offers a career, but to the majority it is hard plodding and insufficient compensation. So the school teachers generally plan for something higher and more remunerative, and the summer school helps them to climb up. To most of them it is a delightful experience. The students get into a new atmosphere, make new friends, and when they have to go back to their work they carry not only a better equipment for their duties, but a stimulus which reaches all with whom they come in contact.

And when we get better school teachers we give an uplift to the whole country. Our politics especially are improved, for it is a matter of record that more good office-holders graduate from school teaching than from any other calling. It furnishes us all kinds and abilities, from boodle aldermen to reform presidents.

It is thus in the nature of things that the summer school movement should prosper. Of course, the Government is now restricting its generosity to the teachers of its new possessions, but it might not be a bad idea for the counties to send some of their teachers every year to summer schools. This would do almost as much good as taking the public schools out of politics.

Digitized by Google

"The Advantages of a College Education" A Princeton Story

By Jesse Lynch Williams

—UPPER CLASSMEN WERE CONDUCTING THE MEETING AND SMOKING PIPES

ROBERT J. ELLIOT, 2d, the son of the well-known Robert J. Elliot, came to college from a large prep. school, suffering from enlargement of his Ego. It is a common disease, but usually they get over it in freshman year. At least they did in those days, though there were cases even then where serious relapses occurred. Elliot's symptoms were only aggravated by his freshman year—for the following reasons:

The faction from his school wanted to nominate one of their crowd for a class officer at the first elections, held early in the term before the freshmen knew many of each other even by sight. Elliot had been running nearly everything at school, and though some of them were down upon him they put him up for treasurer or secretary or something, because they thought he would stand the best chance of election with the class at large. He thought it was because the crowd liked him best.

He was elected; partly because he was known as the son of Robert Elliot—most freshmen have no personality at all—and partly because he had led some cheers during the rush with the sophomores the night before. He thought it was because they recognized in him "one born to command," as his doting old-maid aunt had once said of him in his presence. So he mounted the platform, stood erect beside the class president just elected (the latter a football giant, very rattled), and was inspected by his classmates while congratulated by the patronizing upper classmen who were conducting the meeting and smoking pipes.

He was pleasing to look at, older than some of them, and not afraid of a crowd. So the class approved and cheered him and pounded on the desks vigorously. He hearkened to the cheers with a reserved smile, and decided that his aunt was a good judge of human nature.

Now, in those barbarous days, freshman class officers were always sought out for especial attentions by the entertainment committees from the sophomore class. Elliot was hazed in proportion to his importance. But this he took, like the printing of his name in two-inch capitals on the annual sophomore proclamation, as due a man of such consequence in the class commune. It did not affect his disease except to increase it.

Again, at the regular class meeting, later—the first is only for temporary purposes—he ran for his class office once more, and was reelected, as were the other officers, because there was nothing against him.

At about the same time he was appointed manager of the freshman football team, and made a very good one. He was a capital organizer.

In short, young Elliot became very important; secretary of his class, which was large, led cheers at class games, had a nodding acquaintance with a number of upper classmen, and was sought out by the toadying elements of his own class who liked to be seen with him at football practice. And all those who have been freshmen know how inspiringly important all this seems at the time. Those who have gone the rest of the way through college know also that too much freshman year prominence is quite likely to be more like weight than wings to an ambitious undergraduate.

Elliot did not know it. He had his name put up for sophomore president, and was defeated because the class thought they had given him honors enough, and also because he had become accustomed to saying—by his manner, at least—"We prominent fellows," and was not especially cordial with all the obscure members of the class. This was not because he was a snob; it was because he did not know those fellows, and was too honest to pretend to be delighted to see them. But their votes count one each.

Then he tried for a prize in Clio Hall, and—"Oh, well, I didn't work hard enough," he remarked later. Next he decided to become an editor of the Princetonian, and did not write enough. And in the spring of the sophomore year he ran for the treasurership of the University Football Association. This was considered a very great honor, the most prominent official position in the undergraduate world. Or rather, the presidency was, which the treasurer inherited in his senior year, according to precedent. Elliot banked everything upon it. Gaining this, he thought, would mean an election to a certain well-known club which he wanted very much to make. He thought it would mean that; he never ascertained, because he was turned down hard, quite hard.

Now, if he had realized that the reasons lay in himself and had said, "Maybe I am not born to command. Maybe God did not mould me of special clay in special design," all this might have made a man of him. But he did not.

He told himself that all friends were fickle, that there was no truth or honor in mankind, that clubs were hotbeds of snobbery, and that the treasurer of the P. U. F. B. A. was stuck on himself. None of the Elliots has any humor.

He became what was called a "Sour Ball." He objected to everything, from the food at his eating club in Witherspoon to the decision of the board of trustees in regard to entrance requirements; proclaimed that Princeton spirit was dead, that the whole college and athletics in particular were going to the bad, and that every one was arrogant from the President of the institution to the captain of the freshman lacrosse team. He talked thus at dinner, in Sunday night pow-wows, and on walks to Kingston. And yet he was not altogether a nuisance to his associates, who respected the ability by which he maintained his position with interesting and impressive arguments. Besides, he had an agreeable personality and was exceedingly obliging. He possessed something of charm, in fact.

It was when he was in this frame of mind in his junior year that he joined the How-How eating club, which had rather good meals and plenty of fun—all in one room of a house on Nassau Street. This was ages ago, before there were many of the modern large elective clubs with permanent homes and expensive pins to wear on the waistcoat. The How-How club—most of it—had been one crowd ever since freshman year, and they liked one another well enough to stay together for the rest of their college course, as two or three of them had been obliged to inform the emissaries of a certain large permanent club. They represented a variety of phases of undergraduate activity. Most all of them amounted to something in some way.

And each one had learned to take care of his temper at the table. This was necessary in order to have any peace or self-respect. Three times a day keen, undergraduate repartee flew back and forth across that tablecloth. The man who could not sit up and defend himself was thrown down and trampled upon.

The trouble with the club just now was that they were all too well acquainted. Each knew what the rest thought about all subjects and how each one would take everything, and how he would say it. They were very fond of one another, but they had been together so much that all the mystery of personality had been rubbed off, and they weren't old enough to appreciate what good friends they really were to each other.

When they heard that Elliot wanted to come, they said: "Why, yes, we've nothing against Bob." They needed a new element.

Elliot thought he was rather favoring them in coming; they did not look at it in that way. They were under the impression that they were the best all-'round crowd in the class, and the only reason that he was allowed to cherish this newest delusion of his for some time was that they did not discover its existence at first.

Then by and by Mason, one of those who had been at the same prep. school and knew him better than the others, began to perceive it and to show him so by a few little pleasantries.

Elliot had been a big boy at school when Mason was a little boy at school, and Elliot had an idea that their mutual attitude was still relatively the same. So he continued to take what was said to him with an indulgent smile which meant, "Oh, I don't mind that from you, you know," until one day Mason said something which Elliot thought called for reproof; drawing himself up, he looked serious and said, "See here, I've had enough of that from you, Mason."

But this was not a tiny little prep. boy with an uncertain voice he was now addressing, but Mason of the junior class, who was getting a reputation in Whig Hall as a debater. "Oh, I don't believe so," he answered in a thoughtful manner; "I rather like it. In fact, I've been thinking it would be pleasant to have some fun with you."

"To tell you the truth, Bob," interrupted Downing with a good-natured voice from the end of the table, "we're just beginning with you."

Elliot paid no heed to that. The fact that Mason, timid little Mason, dared answer thus to him, R. Elliot, who used to ignore Mason's existence, roused him like a blow on the nose, and he turned upon the little one to crush him with a single blow. "Children should be seen and not heard," he said in a loud tone which was intended for withering sarcasm. It did not wither.

"Really? Is that the best you can do?" said Mason raising his eyebrows. "Try again, and see if you can't manage to keep from getting so red in the face this time; it isn't becoming to 'one born to command.'" Mason was a distant cousin of Elliot.

"Shut up, you little poler!" he retorted childishly.

"Your temper, I perceive"—Mason was buttering his potato and talking in an exasperatingly even tone—"is one of several things you have failed to command. A little poling"—which means hard study—"along that line might not hurt 'the pride and ambition of the family.'"

And Downing spoke up again. Downing was president of the class. "My young friend"—Elliot hated to be patronized by Downing—"we no longer consider it enormously witty to make remarks about polers as you did just now; that is an under-classman trick. You ought to be over it by this time."

"Say, fellows," remarked Skinny Harrison, "what a lot he has got to learn. But don't feel discouraged, Bobbie; you'll forget all about it when you are a grown man, like papa. Cheer up."

Then as they saw that he was becoming angry the whole table began taking shots at him. It was their duty to teach him to control his temper. And this they accomplished, but not by the crude, elemental battering of this rather puerile beginning, but by the delicate rapier thrusts of dialogue the flashes and subtleties of which would be obscured by printer's ink.

Thus began a new epoch in the life of R. Elliot, 2d. At school, and for a year or two in college, he had always been sought out as a personage of importance. At home, and wherever he went in summer, he had always been known as the son of Robert J. Elliot. He had never been mastered before. He had never acknowledged that any one was his equal in any respect and it amazed him, as when a child first learns there is no chance of getting the moon.

He made a hard fight for it, but around that table were heads better for this sort of thing and tongues considerably nimbler than his would ever be. At last he acknowledged to himself that, possibly, after all, he was not unique. This is one of the advantages of a college education.

They, his clubmates and friends, having turned Robert inside out and upside down, and rubbed him this way and that until they thought they had shown him his relative importance in the world, then turned their special attention to Skinny Harrison once more, who was getting lonely up there at the end of the table. They now considered Elliot one of themselves.

Now, all that they had done was meant kindly. At least not unkindly, as any one ought to have seen. They liked him, for otherwise they would not have allowed him to stay there. They were merely giving him his share with the rest, and, perhaps, were rather generous toward him because they deemed that his need was greater.

"TO TELL YOU THE TRUTH, BOB," INTERRUPTED DOWNING, "WE'RE JUST BEGINNING WITH YOU"

Digitized by Google

No one knew that it was going in deep. If they had they would have let up as they always did with Skinny Harrison when his jaw dropped. Elliot had not once lost control of his temper again, answered back about as well as the average, and was the sort of fellow that looks eminently incapable of having his feelings hurt.

But he was a very serious person, like his father. He was taking the things said to him at the club seriously, carrying them each to the campus with him, and repeating them to himself in bed, feverishly, when he ought to have been asleep.

The others at the table caught it about as badly, sometimes worse, but he did not take that into consideration, for he was not thinking about the others. So he concluded that they all considered him a boot-licker, a schemer, an utterly unscrupulous politician and a cad. What would be the object in talking as they did, unless they meant him to see a foundation of truth under it? he asked himself.

The worst of it was that when he stopped to consider carefully he did see a foundation of truth under some of it. But he did not stop there; that only set him going. He made up his mind to be quite honest with himself. He became still more serious. And in a short time he was wondering if there was any good in himself at all.

You see, for twenty years or so he had been a lively, energetic boy with a mind so occupied with external interests, as should be the case with all healthy young organisms, that he had never wasted time over introspection. When he got this attack of ingrowing thoughts he ran against a lot of stuff he had never dreamed of before, and it nearly took his breath away.

And, like many when they first realize some of the gray facts of reality at the bottom roots of living, he began looking for nothing but the gray ones, and, naturally, succeeded in his search. Then he turned, as one will in self-denunciation, for comparison with others, and began to wonder if they were not all wrong and built on selfish principles, too, and found that they were. He was all selfish, and they were all selfish, and everything ever done and said and thought in all the world was reducible to selfish motives, and similar schoolgirl morbidness. But Elliot thought he had stumbled upon an original discovery.

Making this discovery occupied the rest of his junior year. When he came back as a senior he took to strolling about the campus alone, with eyes open for self-motives. "Those sophomores that shouted 'Thank you, please,' so loud for that ball which rolled near me," he would point out to himself, "do so to show these freshmen over here how familiar they could be with a senior." Just then a classmate said "Hello, Bob," in a friendly tone, and Elliot smiled knowingly, for senior elections were near at hand. For these and similar atrocities he hated mankind.

No one suspected him of being so miserable. They called him "Sour Ball," but thought he was merely disappointed at the way some things had turned out, or a little serious thinking over what "next year" means to a senior. He was treated like every one else by the fellows on the campus and at the club, any one of whom would have been glad to have Elliot put an arm about him and have it all out. But Elliot had never learned to do such things.

Now what he really needed, of course, to make him realize what a good thing was life in that little world, was about one month of hustling in the big outside world with a taste of earning the price of his meals in a down-town-to-work-at-nine-one-hour-for-luncheon-up-town-at-six sort of life, among people who did not care enough for him to say sarcastic things. This was to come a year later. But meanwhile, as he did not know enough to consult friends or books about his ailment, if he had merely spent a little of the time employed in telling himself how miserable he was, in going down to the university field an hour a day and chasing himself about the track until he dropped, then after a tingling shower bath followed by a hard whiskey rub-down, he would have sauntered up to the club, while the sun was gloriously dropping behind the elms, with his cheeks aglow, a ravenous appetite and a heart full of thanks to his God for having permitted him to live and be an undergraduate for another twenty-four hours. But you see the others would have thought he was trying for the Track Athletic team and guyed him about it, and he cringed before ridicule. Besides, the misanthrope enjoyed wallowing in the mire of his misanthropy. They always do. So he sat around in his room telling himself how miserable everything was until his digestion deserted him, and then he was really miserable.

The climax came about in a very natural way. He came down to the club for dinner one evening with a loathing for food and human nature. He tried some of the first for duty's sake, but for human nature he had no use, and he sat there with his chin on his shirt bosom and his legs stretched out under the table, telling himself how he hated them all. He had a notion to tell them so.

As it was, he went around the table mentally, addressing each one in turn. He did not have to look up. He knew where each one sat and just how each looked, and how Grafton chewed with his lips apart.

"Oh, you huge ass!" he breathed, as Downing began to differ with somebody and to show his reasons for it. "You self-satisfied ass! You think because you won that debate last year that you're just about right, don't you? That's it! give them platitudes in a loud voice. They don't know the difference. It's all a game of bluff. Swell up your breast, stick out your chin; now smile! That's the way.

"And you, you poor little affected mannerism, next there. You absurd little fool with your ill-fitting English clothes. I wonder if it ever occurs to you what a ridiculous little figure you make when you go to Philadelphia for Sunday and put your padded coat on your sloping shoulders—and with your cockney manners, too—and then talk about your relatives among the nobility. But you don't know any better. You think you're the real thing.

"And you, you great tub of self-indulgence! you childish clown! I suppose you really think that you are a wonderfully fine fellow because the whole college knows you and says 'Hello, Skinny,' to you. You think that because you're popular you amount to something. That's right, grin and chuckle and slap Rankin on the back. That's the way you get your popularity. You are called generous and kind. That's because you're big. But I wonder if you ever stopped to think of any one else's comfort when it stood in the way of your dinner or your cigar. There you go again, with your childish capers. You are truly pitiable."

—THEY ALL CAME—THE NOISY, HEALTHY, PIPE-SMOKING CROWD

At that point little Mason bethought himself to call Skinny down a peg, and did so sharply.

For a moment Elliot was glad; and then he thought, "Why should that little fool think it his privilege to regulate this table? He has been told he is sarcastic, so he thinks he must live up to his part on all occasions. Anybody can curl up a lip and sneer; that's not very bright. He thinks he understands people's weaknesses and can pierce them every time. I wonder if it ever occurs to him that others see as much as he does. Look at him curling up his ugly mouth and glancing around the table to see which one to light upon."

"Great Scott! Elliot, don't talk so much. Give us a chance," Mason called out in a loud tone.

Elliot, who had not uttered a word for three meals, only smiled in a superior manner, murmured, "Don't excite yourself," and began to toy with his roast beef. He prided himself on being self-contained.

Then he took in the rest of the table in imaginary conversation; smiled contemptuously at the man who sang on the Glee Club and was good-looking and knew it; ridiculed the Princetonian editor who wrote long-worded, many-clausèd sentences and complacently considered himself a moulder of public opinion; laughed at the man who thought himself literary and wrote about shimmering curls and moaning the moan of remorse in the Nassau Lit; he heaped satire upon the young man who was making up his mind to become a preacher; and so on around the dozen or so at the table, each one of whom had foibles, which, if examined to the exclusion of their virtues, were enough to make their possessors appear ridiculous and, possibly, hateful.

Without waiting for dessert, or even to fill his pipe, Elliot left the table, walked slowly up the street, through the campus, climbed the stairs to his room and locked the door.

When a man does not appear at the club at meal time the natural inference is that he is a guest at some other club; and if he misses several meals in succession, his friends suppose him to be out of town, and ask his room-mate where he went, if he has one; if not, they wait until the absent member comes back and tell him to account for himself, if they think of it.

All day Friday Elliot's napkin remained cornucopia-shaped in the tumbler. This was the way Willis, the waiter, preferred fixing them. That evening some one said, "Where's Bob?" "Gone home over Sunday, I reckon," another replied. Then, as nobody changed the subject, Downing remarked, "Wonder what's the matter with Bob lately? He's so blamed morose. Notice him last evening?"

"Got a remorse-sour on, likely," suggested Cute Rankin, who knew what that meant.

"I think it's a girl," said the Glee Club man.

"Anyway," spoke up Mason, "he ought to talk. There's no excuse for a man's being that way. Talk will help anything that worries, same as yelling in pain."

Meanwhile, way up in the top story of Witherspoon lay the Sour Ball, flat on his back with an attack of acute indigestion, hating everything, especially the hot rolls he had eaten the day before.

Ben, the black man, had gone after the doctor, who said the patient should not try to get up "for a day or two," and then went away again.

This was at about noon on Friday, after he had already been in bed a long period of darkness, made up of interminable waits for Old North clock to strike the next hour; and then an unbearable age of daylight during which he saw Ben clean up the room and heard the bell ring for each of the recitation hours, and speculated about the mail which was noisily dropped through the slot in the outer room.

In those days there was no Isabella McCosh Infirmary with sun-baths and electric bells and trained nurses wearing clean, light blue dresses which rustle. When you fell ill in your room you stayed there. What you had to eat was brought by the waiter from the club—when he finished washing the dishes—in a basket with a napkin soaking in the soup. Your friends went for the doctor and nursed you until your health returned, or your relatives came, which was better.

But there were particular reasons why Elliot did not consider it worth while sending for things to eat. He breakfasted on cracked ice which Ben stole from the cooler downstairs. For luncheon he munched small bits of ice. He dined upon ice. And every two hours he took some foul white stuff that the doctor put in a tumbler on a trunk beside his watch, which latter moved very slowly these days.

At one time he began counting the half-inch circles and the two-inch circles in the wall-paper figure on the right-hand side of the room. Toward twilight he had gained considerable proficiency; he counted twenty-three more in the last half hour than in the first. He kept account with a pencil on an envelope, both of which he fished out of his clothes on the trunk by the bed.

Presently it became too dark to count, but he could hear the bell ring for Hall and afterward strike the hours, which is somewhat interesting. Also he could bet with himself how soon the entry door down stairs would squeak and slam again. He tried to name the owner of each footstep as various fellows came running or walking up the clattering stairs. For some reason or other they nearly all whistled or sang this evening. After a while they stopped running up and down. His watch ticked noisily.

And it came to pass in the course of time that morning dawned once more, and he began to count again. He saved the bureau, where were photographs and cards and things, to feast on the next day. The room was small and he had to economize. This was only Saturday morning.

By and by Ben, the man, came up to fix the room again. "Good-morning, Ben," cried Elliot eagerly. It seemed to Elliot that Ben did his work in a rudely short time. He would not be back now for twenty-four hours.

But the doctor would be along in the afternoon. To be sure! Only six or eight hours, and he would see the doctor! He became excited over it and counted his pulse beats.

After luncheon Skinny Harrison put on a sweater and his big tramping shoes to walk down to Lawrenceville and see his prep. brother. Then he remembered that his essay was due two days before and thought the prep. could wait. In order to write good essays students should cultivate their styles. So he went to the library, took down an eighteenth century novelist, cocked his feet up on the window-sill, and cultivated his style until he thought it would do.

On the way to his room he met Dave Haskell who charged upon him at full speed and leaped upon his shoulders. "Let's take a walk, say out to the battlefield and up Stony Brook and across to Cedar Grove," said Haskell.

"Wait at the corner of Reunion while I put away these books," said Harrison. "It's impossible to force the muse, isn't it?"

As he was hurrying toward Witherspoon, whistling, he met the doctor coming out and asked who was ill. The doctor said Elliot, and the one with the books under his arm very naturally went up the four flights of stairs to see what was the matter. He ran in without knocking.

"It's a wonder you wouldn't crawl off and hide yourself in your foul-odored roost and not let any one know you're laid up," said Skinny, who now panted. This was vernacular for "I am surprised to learn that you are ill and confined to your room, and regret that you have not acquainted me with the fact."

The misanthrope had heard the heavy footsteps coming nearer and nearer and thought he recognized them, but he

(Concluded on Page 1120 of this Number)

Digitized by Google

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED A.D. 1728

GEORGE HORACE LORIMER, Editor

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA

421 to 427 Arch Street

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1900

$2.50 the Year by Subscription
5 Cents the Copy of All Newsdealers

The Shortening of the College Course

WITHIN a very few years the stages of education have become pretty sharply differentiated. The term "education," as we are now using it, means that portion of training for life which may be accomplished in the schools, beginning with the elementary grades and ending with the university. Primary, secondary, college, graduate or professional or university study—these are the four well-defined steps. It is now generally agreed that, if time and money permit, not one of these steps ought to be omitted. The need of the best primary training has never been questioned. Its importance was never more distinctly felt than now. No less clearly is it seen that secondary education, represented by the high school and the academy, must be well organized, thorough and efficient. The very highest expert judgment and skill have, for many years, been spent upon problems of secondary education. And, as to the fourth stage, almost within the latter half of the period of the present generation, new and tremendous emphasis has been laid upon the importance of special, advanced, professional or technical training—graduate study of some sort—as a prerequisite for any high degree of success in the professions or the arts.

At first it seemed that this demand for special training would lead students to pass directly from secondary to special study. Indeed that tendency is even now strongly operative, especially in the Middle West. But wise men, desiring that sort of practical result from education which consists in the highest efficiency of the man, have seen that this leap from secondary to special study—that is, from the high school to the professional school—carries the student over into a realm for which he is not yet fully prepared; that he is not yet mature enough, not sufficiently alert and disciplined, that he has not yet sufficient command of his own faculties, to concentrate his activity upon some special subject to the greatest advantage, and that, in many cases, he is not yet even able to choose wisely his special path in life. It is seen that, before special study is taken up, there is need of a more complete development of the student's individuality and personal power, and a fuller revelation of the student to himself. The university is not content with the product of the secondary schools. It demands the finished product of the college as the raw material out of which to make a scholar or a professional expert.

Thus it has come to pass that, by the very development of the universities with their specialized schools, new emphasis is laid upon the third, or college, stage of education. The best schools of law, medicine, theology and pedagogy are demanding that the student bring his college diploma when he seeks admittance. Meanwhile the courses of the secondary schools have been enormously enriched. The best high schools and academies now carry the student beyond the point reached by the freshman in college not many years ago. The young man, emerging from this prolonged and excellent training, and beginning to assume a definite attitude toward things intellectual and spiritual, is very apt to ask why he should not at once begin specific preparation for his life work. The fact that he does not yet know himself well enough to choose his life work does not always diminish the eagerness with which he asks the question. Yet custom and association save him from a wrong answer, and he is carried by the current about him into college, impatient, nevertheless, at the prospect of four years more of "general discipline." That most men, long before they complete their four years' course, find their doubts fully removed by what the college does for them, not only by its courses and classrooms, but even more, perhaps, by its social and organic life, is no doubt true. But the impatience still remains. Life calls loudly for young men, but will have none but the fittest. And so the problem becomes more and more pressing, how we can condense this period of preparation and yet secure all that life demands as a prerequisite for its high places.

It is beyond doubt that the condensation is to be made. It it already making. Between the enriched secondary course on the one hand, and the imperatively demanded university or graduate training on the other, the college course will be squeezed into three years. For young men not destined for professional life, intending to pass at once to business, yet desiring the liberal culture of college, the four years' course will, no doubt, be retained, with enriched courses in history, literature and philosophy.

How this readjustment is best to be accomplished does not yet fully appear. Yet beginnings have been made. In some cases it is sought by the college allowing a man who has completed his junior year to pass thence to the professional school, and conferring upon him the bachelor's degree at the end of his first year of professional study. Others would have the college so arrange its senior year that the professional schools will accept that year as the first of the three years of training for the profession. The way is not yet well-defined, but the best way will be found, not so much by theorizing as by actual and repeated experiment. Gradually, and almost before we know it, the change will have been made, and we shall thereby all be gainers. For, with the saving of one year of time and cost, we shall have more men preparing for college, and hence more men in college, and hence a larger number of well-trained men in the professional schools, and, again hence, better trained men in the professions.

—NATHANIEL BUTLER.

It is true that the race is not always to the swift; but it will be observed that the American generally wins.

Are We a Country Without a Name?

WHEN Professor Freeman was in this country he was kind enough to regret that our nation had no single proper name by which to designate it, such as his own was favored with. As the official and proper name of his country is The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, it was not so evident that he had much advantage over us. It is true that he and others are in the habit of calling their country England, but that name became obsolete on the first of May, 1707, when England and Scotland agreed to unite as Great Britain. And to this day the Scotch are justly annoyed by the practice of attaching to the whole island the name of its larger portion. Within a few years past they addressed a remonstrance to the Queen, complaining that even her Ministers spoke of the country as England, as though Scotland counted for nothing in its make-up. And even Great Britain became obsolete as a proper and official name in 1801, when Ireland agreed—or at least her Parliament was bought into agreeing—that the two countries should unite as Great Britain and Ireland.

So careful and accurate a person as Mr. Freeman should have been incapable of the blunder of mistaking a popular and quite inaccurate name for his country as its real designation. And he should have looked a little closer into the facts before asserting that we have no one-worded proper name for ours. It is quite true that, in spite of the example and precept of Washington, the habit arose of suppressing the proper name of our country and calling it by a two-worded term, which designates the character of its government as a federal system. This was in the days when the political leaders of America were insisting on States' Rights at the expense of national unity. They claimed proper names for their several commonwealths, but refused any to their common country. They called it the United States, with entire indifference to the fact that that is not the name of our country any more than it is of Mexico, or Colombia, or Venezuela, or Brazil, all of which are officially called "united states" in Spanish or Portuguese. The practice of using this improper designation is really a survival from the time when it was a political offense to speak of our body politic as a nation, in spite of Washington's example in using that term. Now that we have reached the point at which all people in all places talk of it as a nation, it surely is time to revert to the example set by Washington, and to call ourselves Americans, and our country America.

It is true that there is some danger of confusion in the use of a proper name which is used also of the continent. But the confusion is by no means confined to America. There is a province of Asia, as well as a continent of that name. There was a Roman province of Africa before the term was applied to the whole continent. And these local names are still in use with historians and geographers, to the risk of some confusion. On the other hand, America and Americans are terms of national limitation in the use of our neighbors already. The Canadian may call himself a North-American, but never an American. He keeps that name for his neighbors to the South. A Mexican has but one sense for the word Americano, by which he designates the man from across the Rio Grande. So, throughout the whole continent, we are the Americans and our country is America in the usage of every people of the Western world. Only among ourselves, and as an inheritance from our period of Colonial politics, is there any hesitation in the matter. And as we have far more than the population of all the rest of the continent, to say nothing of wealth and power and other elements of national weight, the name is not unfit.

The Father of his Country may fairly claim the same right as other fathers in naming the child. In his Farewell Address he seems to have anticipated some such confusion, and he lays stress on the national name as a bond of union. "The name American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the pride of patriotism," he says, "more than any appellation derived from local distinctions." What was definite enough and accurate enough for him, should do for us.

—ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

A city that gets its public schools and police force out of politics can afford to let the other reforms take their time.

The Mischief of Bogus Science

AMUSING remedies—medical, religious, social and moral—are proposed by people who seem to have no other employment than to invent them, and their implicit acceptance by others would be amusing if it were not saddening. Yet there is a beautiful phase in this trust: it shows that the masses of humanity are unspoiled and believing, and that when one speaks with seeming authority they will take his words for truth.

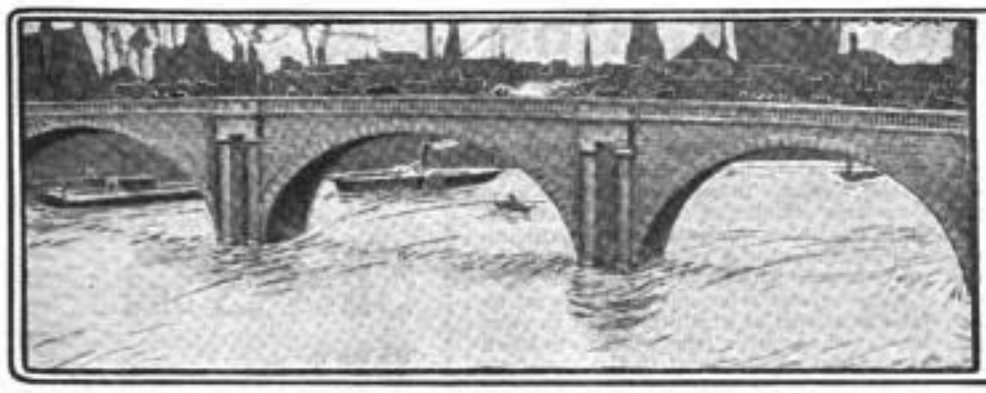
The queer things that alleged scientists write for some of the country journals and the scare columns of the cheaper dailies must be a constant refreshment to real scientists. Here is a man who will have us to sleep with our heads to the north—or is it our feet?—because "the magnetic currents thus pass through us readily." Now, who said that magnetic currents passed through us, or that it made any difference to us whether they passed lengthwise or across? Yet some people turn their beds north and south, possibly arguing that they have iron enough in their blood to be affected by the force that turns the needle poleward, and imagining that sleep depends on the greater or less resistance they offer to it.

And here comes a man who will not allow you to read on a train. To read on a shaking street car is not commended, certainly, and there are better places for a book than a train, yet our best lines have such level roadbeds and such well-balanced rolling stock that the jolting is reduced to a minimum, and the reading of light literature, in large type, may be less wearing than the monotony induced by not reading. This prohibition would not be so bad were it not that the same objector will not allow us to look out the window nor at the people in the car. "How few know enough to look straight ahead, not at people, and not out of the windows," he says.

There is a fear of certain insects. The beautiful, helpful, harmless dragon-fly creates a panic. The deadly spider is a common offender in the agony column. She is constantly fanging some unhappy creature in a remote village and causing death or struggles. Generally the article leaves the victim struggling, and the failure of the telegraph to bring further information leaves us in a dreadful doubt as to what happened after. Now, the spider in temperate regions is nearly always harmless. Its bite is not so troublesome as that of a flea. There is but one species—a small, red-marked variety—that has poison enough in its sac to cause a sore, and its effect depends on the condition of the patient, just as any irritation, such as a cut or bruise, is more troublesome when one is in poor health than at other times. If to such trifles as these we add the fears roused in the superstitious by meeting a cross-eyed person, or seeing the moon over the wrong shoulder, we can estimate the vastness of that unnecessary suffering which has been imposed on the human race by its inventive or imaginative members. One belief holds until a fact disproves it, and the world to-day is eager for facts. Any truth that shall do away with a fear or a restraint deserves publication in all quarters of the earth. It should be taught at home and in the school. Under the influence of a falsehood no man can be free.

—CHARLES M. SKINNER.

Sometimes life seems to be one long multiplication of ills and bills.



Looking at Both Sides of the Ledger

WE HAVE the word of several eminent expansionists that we shall receive back many fold every dollar that we have expended in the war with the Filipinos and that all of our new possessions will repay in trade—which is cash—the hundreds of millions which they have cost. It is not this that impresses us so much as the fact that in the Philippines alone over four thousand American soldiers have been killed, wounded or invalided. This is a part of the expenditure which finds its way into no account books, but which leaves sorrowful records in homes and hearts.

But viewed as a financial transaction expansion is going to cost us a pretty penny for many years to come. We hear a great deal from Washington about the necessity of the new officers in Cuba, Puerto Rico and the Philippines keeping up fine establishments and doing much entertaining in order to impress the natives with the dignity and generosity of the United States. It is a part of the game. Great Britain does it, and Great Britain has achieved more success in the colonization business than any nation in the history of the world. Some of the anti-expansionists in Congress have been objecting to allowing officers expense accounts that amounted to several times their salaries. But all that, of course, is ridiculous. Style has to be paid for. Food costs money, even in the tropics. Servants want their wages just as they do in other places. It will not be possible to limit these things—in fact, much as the taxpayers may complain about the returns from expansion, they may as well be prepared to pay out more as time goes on. Just when the profits will begin is one of those remote dates to be found in the prophecies of statesmanship.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

Digitized by Google

At the English Capital

HERE'S a story told at the expense of Sir Redvers Buller, V. C. It is going the rounds of the clubs in London just now. Lord Wolseley, Commander-in-chief of the British Army, was sitting in the Army and Navy Club the other afternoon when in dropped a retired Colonel who in his day was a famous wit in the Royal Enniskillen Fusiliers, and who, though old, still keeps up his fame as a humorist. After saluting the Field Marshal the two entered into a discussion on the war. Buller's name came up and the way the V. C. man had been held up at every turn was mentioned, when the Enniskillen Colonel said: "It strikes me that the Giniral was wrongly named at the very offgo. He should not have been called Buller at all; he should have been Piger."

"How do you make that out?" inquired Lord Wolseley.

"Shure," said the Irishman, "he's always getting shtuck."

The Duke of Buckingham's Good Memory

Some years ago the London press received invitations in the name of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos to a breakfast to be given in honor of the opening of a national exhibition at Earls Court. The hour set was 10:30 A. M.—an unearthly early hour for a London newspaper man to turn out. However, the event was of some importance and the reporters appeared. The earliest arrival happened to be a newspaper man who had practically a corner in reporting fashionable weddings. Finding himself very early, he strolled through the buildings, and seeing a bluff, hearty-looking man, evidently a master-builder, standing smoking a pipe, the reporter stepped up to him and asked a few questions. The man answered willingly enough and the two made a tour of the exhibition. Presently the reporter said to his guide:

"I suppose the old Duke won't be such a fool as to turn up at this ghastly hour?"

"I understand he has promised to come," said the man, and shortly after the two parted. It was quite an informal breakfast and the reporter noticed that his master-builder had been invited. At the finish there was a pause which ended by the master of ceremonies rapping on the table and bawling out: "Gentlemen, pray, silence for His Grace the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos." At once the reporter's master-builder got himself on his feet, and before beginning to speak he winked a huge wink at the press man.

The Duke is a splendid specimen of the old-fashioned English squire of the sort Washington Irving loved. Burly, bluff, good-natured, humorous, he never forgets a face. After the days of the exhibition, years passed, and the Duke, well on in life, was to be married. The reporter, on the day before that set for the wedding, visited the house of the bride to get a list of the magnificent wedding presents. When engaged in writing this out in slipped the Duke and, after saying "good-morning," gazed intently at the press man. Presently the Duke's face relaxed into a grin. "You see the old fool is to turn up again," he said.

Our First International Marriage

Some people are given to thinking that the Englishman's predilection for the American girl is a recently developed passion. Such is by no means the case. If American visitors should care to see a portrait in oils of one of the very first American girls to catch an Englishman of position let them journey to Booton Hall in the County of Norfolk, the hall that was in former days the seat of the Rolfe family. In this hall hangs a portrait by De Passe of a handsome young woman, with high cheekbones, and a complexion splendidly swarthy. Around this portrait are the words, Matoaka Rebecka, filia potentis Principe Powhatani Imp. Virginiæ, and on a space below the portrait are these words, "Matoaka, alias Rebecka, daughter of the mighty Prince Powhatani, Emperor of Attanough Komouck of Virginia; a Christian convert, and married to the Worshipfull Mr. Thomas Rolff. Aged 21. 1616." This portrait of the far-famed Princess Pocahontas was painted but a few weeks before she died on board a ship about to sail for America. She was buried in the parish church of Gravesend, at the mouth of the river Thames, and to this day the curious can see the following entry in the parish register: "1616, March 21. Rebecca Wrolfe, wife of Thomas Wrolfe, gent. a Virginia lady born, was buried here in the chauncell." Unfortunately the original edifice was burnt down a century ago, otherwise Americans could now look upon the tomb of the first American girl who took an English husband.

Debatable Evidence for the Purists

No doubt a majority of literary men and women in the United States have heard of the fierce discussion among literary and unliterary people here in England over the question whether long and general usage of "It is me" in place of "It is I" does not now justify the use of the first form of the sentence. I am not going to attempt to switch the discussion from London to America, but merely wish to give you Mr. Morley Roberts' opinions which are decidedly in favor of "It is I," and for a peculiar reason. Morley Roberts, as every one knows, spends most of his time kicking around the world, and wherever the fretful waves of civilization beat upon the rugged shore of savagedom there the story-writer paddles in the waters. When in London he spends much time among the vast docks of the East End, gazing upon ships coming from and departing for every out-of-the-way part of this little earth. Mr. Roberts holds with "It is I" because, he says, he heard that form of the sentence used by an East End tough down on the docks. Two cockney ruffians were talking together, one telling the other of a "slugging match" he got into. The fighter was speaking of the discussion with his late antagonist which had led up to the fight. "At that 'e ups and 'e says to me, slap out, 'You lie!'"

"And w'at did you do, Bill?" asked his fellow-ruffian.

"W'at did I do?—'it 'is eye, o' course."

Morley Roberts will now use no other form of the sentence.

Mark Twain has been living quietly in England for some time now, and were it not that he appeared to give evidence before a royal commission on the question of copyright, scarcely a soul outside his private and particular friends would have known he was here at all. The other evening he was dining at the house of a friend, and seated next to him was an American who had only that day reached England. They were, of course, talking war, and the newcomer, wishing to know the feeling in England in the matter of the future of the Transvaal, asked Mark Twain how he found public sentiment in England regarding the independence of the republics.

"Well," said the genial humorist, "I find the English are paraphrasing a part of the burial service. They are all quietly repeating, 'Mr. Gladstone giveth and the Lord Salisbury hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.'"

Aurora, the Goddess of the Hills

Not so very long ago the most striking figure in the House of Commons was Lord Arthur Hill. The Hills are now an Irish family, but once on a time they were English, they having quitted the shores of the "predominating partner" about the time of Cromwell, I believe. Lord Arthur Hill is a man of commanding presence, in figure well over six feet, of grand, square shoulders and handsome, open countenance. He is one of those men who not only attract the attention of women, but of men as well. When his lordship occupied a seat in the House of Commons he was always put forward on occasions of ceremony and display, and he invariably carried himself with dignity, courtesy and geniality. The first time that Lieutenant-Commander Colwell, the naval attaché at the United States Embassy, clapped eyes on Lord Arthur was at a private dinner-table. Colwell was seated next to a rather sprightly young English lady and, struck by the appearance of the stalwart lord, he asked who Lord Arthur was. The lady told the American all about Lord Arthur, ending up with the fact that he held the position of Comptroller of the Queen's Household, which, as she explained, is a lucrative appointment, the cost of which is, to all intents and purposes, borne by the country. "Our country," she added, "most certainly has been 'smiling morn' to him."

"Smiling morn?" queried Colwell. "I do not understand the reference."

"Why, you know," replied his fair neighbor, "it tips the Hills with gold."

—E. W. Sabel.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Young men who are seeking instruction on the vital subject of how to succeed in life should turn to the Proverbs of Solomon. I confess, though, that I, being a woman, cringe when I read the prophecy of King Lemuel's mother, contained in the thirty-first chapter. Think of sitting up at night, spinning, while Lemuel sits in the gates (club or lodge). Nevertheless, if the Proverbs of Solomon were studied and put into actual practice, we should have happy homes and successful lives.

Read carefully and you will find that Solomon constantly admonishes a young man to be industrious, virtuous and godly, and to marry an industrious, virtuous and godly woman. Could a career be aught but successful with this foundation? E.

West Collingswood, New Jersey.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I am still a young man and am called an expert accountant by those familiar with my work. I have, like a great many young men, worked long hours for an unappreciative employer; so I know how it feels to work for ten dollars a week when I knew I was worth twenty dollars. I, like others, have tasted despair and been nearly sick by burning the candle at both ends in my ambition to get ahead in the world; so I think I am in a position to sympathize with my brother bookkeepers and to give them the benefit of my experience.

In the first place, I should invite every young man to read Emerson's essay on Compensation earnestly and critically. It will tell him that compensation is a natural law which follows him from the cradle to the grave and from which he cannot escape, and if he is wise he will not care to. He will learn that for every hour he labors he will be fairly paid sooner or later, and that the longer the reward is withheld the greater it finally becomes. It accumulates like compound interest and can never become outlawed. Ask any successful man regarding the truth of the above. I will risk his answer. So do not think your employer can finally cheat you. Time will pay you back.

Who, may I ask, are to be the leaders twenty-five years hence when those now on the top round shall have passed away? There will be more places of responsibility to be filled then than at present. Who will fill them? It will be the young men who are now working conscientiously and doing all they can to forward the interests of their employers, and at the same time to build up a noble character. Let us not then be impatient for a quick success, remembering that he arrives none the less surely who gets there by a slow train. Personally I do not measure success by money, though not despising the latter. There are no low positions in life—all are important, and the man who can do the work he is asked to do and do it perfectly is a success, I care not what his salary may be.

So be not discouraged. Cultivate patience as well as perseverance. Love your work and do it perfectly, and the reward will come or natural law will cease to exist. Accountant.

Auburndale, Massachusetts.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I have read the articles regarding the way for a young man to succeed which have appeared in the Post from time to time, and being in a position where I have an eye to the welfare of about five hundred boys, they have interested me greatly. I believe that there is something to be said in behalf of both employer and employee, it having been my fortune to occupy both positions, thus gaining a knowledge of both interests.

The chief error made by the average employer is that he looks upon his help as mere machines which have a stated amount of labor to perform in a given time. He fails to realize that his employees are men, and that the man who can turn off the most work in a day is not always the best man to employ. The employee, on the other hand, too often regards his employer as a bank from which at the end of the week he is privileged to draw a certain amount of money as a compensation for labor he very likely has neglected to perform. This sad state of affairs has in most cases been brought about by the employee, who in his wild search for what is known as a "soft snap," has failed to perform conscientiously the many disagreeable duties which invariably attend upward progress.

It is impossible to write a set of rules which would apply to all young men alike. A group of boys go to work much as they go in swimming. Some strike right out, determined from the beginning to succeed. Others go in a little way, then retrace their steps; in this way they cover much ground but never progress. Others simply sit down and let the tide come up to and finally surround them, trusting to luck that they will float. These represent the drones which may be found in every walk in life. Still another class have to be thrown overboard and made to swim.

There are two rules which, if followed rigidly, will help any boy to succeed: the first, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you;" the second, Be a gentleman.

Boston, Massachusetts. Francis Everett Pearson.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

"Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

With this divine command of the Holy Son of God ringing in his ears, how can any man presume to say whether his brother man has lived a successful life or not? He may accumulate his pile of filthy lucre, but money, thank God, is not the only thing in this world, or the next, either. Some of the rankest failures this old Earth has ever seen have been millionaires. If money were the only thing that we had to live for some of us would be poor indeed, and life, I think, would hardly be worth living. Yet how many we see around us every day that seem to make the Almighty Dollar the one end of their existence. Idolatry is as prevalent to-day as it ever was. The worshipers of gold and silver (in the shape of dollars) are as numerous as they ever were, and they seem to be increasing at a rapid rate.

Do not think for a moment that I am a pessimist, for there is none more optimistic than I am, yet these are facts and we must take account of them. S. H.

Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

Digitized by Google

The Education of a Woman of Fashion

By Mrs. Burton Harrison

THIS is the age and country of the young, and elders who look on are sometimes tempted to wonder whether the immense variety and complexity of the methods used in the present process of developing a generation to succeed ours will produce higher results than we are able to show. In no direction is original effort more liberally expended than in the education of young girls. I pass over the question, so pregnant with interest, as to whether the future wife and mother of the average American wage-winner—she who will have been graduated from the common schools of our great cities—will be a better and a happier woman for all the higher culture bestowed upon her through the generosity of our taxpayers. Observation of the "career" of several young girls thus launched upon the troublous sea of womanhood has not, so far, warranted an indorsement without qualification of what certainly appeals to the imagination as a noble and beautiful idea. And yet who would venture in these days to close any door opening out of the humdrum, the commonplace, the old-fashioned routine of woman's life?

It is with the education of the girl of the wealthy leisure class which is supposed to illustrate to the world the highest fruition of American civilization that I propose to deal—lightly, of necessity—and from the standpoint of a looker-on, not of an educator.

Old and New Educational Methods

From her cradle, the question of how to train, and for what to train the daughter agitates the parental mind. In old days the affair was simple enough. The governess and the finishing school, the début in society at eighteen, followed (or not) by speedy marriage. Her destiny was achieved. Now she has the kindergarten, visiting masters, athletics and physical culture, private classes at the house of some lady who assembles with her own child the children of her friends, thus insuring exclusiveness; and so on, till the young lady considers herself fitted to demand, if she so desires, a course of higher education in any one of the several forms in which it is procurable. The vital question of marriage and the old-time natural habit of counting upon a permanent companion, protector, defender and friend in the guise of a husband are now quite secondary considerations. Our modern, highly cultured maiden not infrequently looks about her for a wage-earning business or profession, or, more often, settles into the pursuance of an endless round of luxurious pleasures, and between these two stools the idea of a husband is likely to fall to the ground.

For ages, wise men have discussed the best method of educating man. What wonder that the same problem, as applied to women, should be still unsolved?

—she has been nurtured with exquisite care

In this epoch of experiment in modes of mental discipline for the young, the child of a well-to-do family has, from the beginning, no sense of grind or boredom at her work. They have gone out of vogue, along with the birch and the hornbook, the dunce cap and the stool of penitence. Her kindergarten experience is made so charming and enticing that the little scholar is wooed, without knowing it, along a primrose path to drink at the fount of human experience; to adapt the great doings of history to her baby comprehension, and, beyond all, to acquire the self-control that gives enduring happiness. I am firmly convinced that these blessed training schools for the very young idea have done more than anything else to make our children companionable with their parents, and, from an outside point of view, to remove from us the national reproach of the typical American child, which bogie is fast vanishing into the realm of all evil spirits.

The little person who, in her own nursery, might have continued to be self-assertive, arrogant and fretful, emerges from a good kindergarten, quiet, modest, appreciative of ideas and biddable. Lucky the father and mother to whom Froebel's educational ideal for children has become reality!

Homely Precepts that Must Never Undergo Change

Not for a moment, however, may this class work of the child do away with the indispensable home training that should go hand in hand with it, nor can the best equipped, most successful, most brilliant of teachers convey to a youthful listener those immortal lessons learned only at a mother's knee—the dear, homely precepts that are to accompany her through life, to be transmitted by her, in all reverence, to her own children, to haunt her brain and guide her movements in many a difficult situation of her adult career, finally, perchance, to ring with quaint pathos in her dying ear, deaf to appeals from thoughts of later days!

Whatever the method adopted for the little girl's training at this important time—although when is a girl's training not of supreme importance?—the mother should be the comrade, par excellence, the arbiter, the confidante, the teacher of lessons no school can teach. In the present advanced and general condition of knowledge on the subject of school instruction, it were needless to suggest more than that each child should be given whatever form of it her health and individual peculiarities demand. But, wherever possible, an American girl ought to have some experience of school life. It is not only what her mind will gain from the contact with other minds—flint striking steel to bring forth a spark divine—but, as a corrective equally of self-distrust and self-conceit, school is invaluable. What can be better in formative effect than the lesson there acquired promptly and convincingly that she is what she makes herself?

It is at this time of early maidenhood, before the bud has uncurled its petals and while yet the nursery dews are lingering upon her, that the young girl of this order of society, depending so largely upon externals, is seen at her best. From the time of birth she has been nurtured with exquisite care and forethought. Her very simplicity of manner is the result of continued training and repression of the ruder instincts of the growing animal. Her politeness when spoken to by strangers, her blushes, her low-pitched voice, her little curtsy when greeting her elders and superiors, her unadorned dress, all represent high art in her bringing up. Mentally and bodily she has been guided, restrained or stimulated by the combined forces of parental devotion, easy circumstance and command of the best skill.

Setting Up False Standards of Gentility

Then, alas, begins a species of decadence. Too often it is the immediate result of the training for society, considered needful by all modern mothers of her kind. The evening parties, dancing-classes and luncheons, followed by theatre or opera matinées, are mere imitations in miniature of similar diversions among adults. In an astonishingly short time these children of twelve to fifteen acquire the whims, customs, habit of criticism and affectations of a society not like themselves blessed with early training.

At school and at dancing-class they set up false standards of gentility, based in chief upon what one girl's family is able to afford to give her, and another girl's family chooses to withhold or cannot compass. Poverty or small means is an insuperable bar to admission into their set. Not infrequently, to their shame be it said, these mothers who have endowed their young daughters with all the good gifts of education and training, instruct them specifically to cultivate at school only such wealthy or stylish girls as they will be apt to "want to know" after leaving it.

Model Exponents of the Best Modern Culture

I have been told by a refined and well-bred teacher at a fashionable day-school in New York that her daily bread was embittered through earning it in the service of some of these pretentious little snobs. She reported that their conversation, when off duty with lessons, was a rehash of cheap gossip, and worse, concerning what they had overheard of "society" at home; and that their aim, upon leaving school, was entirely directed toward active participance in dinners, calls and evenings at the opera in a certain set; while remonstrance on her part was met by chill stares of contempt and assumed superiority. Here, surely, is opportunity for education by mothers; a missionary field of the widest, beside which philanthropic effort and charities abroad dwindle to insignificance.

Another teacher tells me that her efforts with her pupils are continually thwarted by the mother's eagerness to give her girl pleasures that will prepare her for society. The excuse is that in a year or two the young lady will be expected to shine in a very exclusive social coterie, and that she must be trained to occupy her designated place!

A pleasant contrast to this egregious folly is the fact that many young women conspicuous in society have carried on their efforts at self-culture long after quitting the schoolroom. I know a number of girls belonging to the best circles who habitually devote themselves to reading and criticism of books, out-of-door studies, work in college settlements, kindergartening and supervising cooking-classes among the poor, visiting in hospitals and tenement houses, helping to maintain day nurseries and summer homes for poor children, and entertaining clubs of working-girls, in addition to each carrying out whatever bent for art may individually possess her. Some have obtained the distinction of college degrees; others have painted good pictures, modeled creditable busts, written clever stories and poems. One young lady has achieved success as a landscape gardener. If they were a little more restful in general effect, a little softer of speech and more sympathetic in manner, I should think these accomplished daughters of high society in New York model exponents of the best American culture. But the strain of accomplishing so much that makes them shine in the eyes of lookers-on robs them of a little something the old-fashioned girl used to possess—a something that, for want of a better phrase, we may call "charm."

When one thinks, however, of the limited possibilities for the achievement of aid to her generation in the power of that old-fashioned girl, of her pallid occupations and paltry accomplishments, the new workers in the new field seem rich in privilege. In these

DEFENDER

MFG. CO.'S

READY-MADE

Sheets and Pillowcases

Every article is made on our own premises, and under the most sanitary conditions—no sweat-shop work.

Our goods are measured after they are hemmed and finished. NOT before.

PRINCIPAL BRANDS

MADE OF

Defender Mills Sheeting

A popular and well-known brand. This brand of sheets and pillow-cases is in universal use, and for all ordinary conditions is the most popular and economical.

MADE OF

Palma Mills Sheeting

A beautiful, fine and soft sheeting—improves with laundering. This sheeting finds favor among people who are sensitive to the touch and desire an article that is soft and smooth. A great favorite.

MADE OF

Selkirk Mills Sheeting

Very heavy and durable, resembling linen. In special favor with hotels, steamships, hospitals, etc., where quality and hard service are required. Has the effect of linen and can be used with advantage in its place.

MADE OF

Wexford Mills Sheeting

The most beautiful sheeting manufactured. This fabric is both strong, durable and fine in texture. It is considered as the ne plus ultra of sheetings.

BE SURE When you buy Sheets or Pillow-Cases to ask for one of the above brands. The guaranteed label branded on every article and can be removed at pleasure. Cut out the brand you want, put it in your purse and show to your dealer.

All brands made in plain hemmed and hem-stitched, and include a large assortment of Fancy Hem-Stitched and Inserting-Trimmed Sheets and Pillow-Cases.

A booklet about Sheets and Pillow-Cases sent FREE on application to your dry-goods dealers.

Digitized by Google

The improved Shingle Stain and preservative. Imparts an artistic finish to shingles and prolongs their life by penetrating the pores of the wood and retarding decay.

Shingletint is made in all desirable shades, is easily applied, the colors are permanent, and money is saved by its use.

Full information and finished samples of wood mailed free for the asking.

BERRY BROTHERS, Limited
Varnish Manufacturers. DETROIT, MICH.

NEW YORK, 232 Pearl St. CHICAGO, 18 and 17 Lake St.
BOSTON, 530 Atlantic Ave. CINCINNATI, 304 Main St.
PHILADELPHIA, 30 and 28 N. Fourth St.
ST. LOUIS, 313 N. Fourth St. BALTIMORE, 11 E. Lombard St.
SAN FRANCISCO 137 and 139 Market St.

BACK RESTERS

For Stenographers, Bookkeepers and Office Men

McCloud Adjustable Spring-Back Chair

Gives delicious comfort. You can work three times as long without fatigue, because the back can be adjusted forward or backward at any angle over the seat to give support where it is most needed, between the shoulders or at the small of the back.

It is superior to all other Chairs for use at Typewriter, desk or piano. Made in wood, cane, leather seat or back, including high chair for standing desk. Is endless variety, all combining grace and elegance never before realized. Send for free catalogue and get one that will please you.

THE DAVIS CHAIR COMPANY
S. S. McCLOUD, Manager. Marysville, Ohio

B. Eldredge AUTOMATIC

The Best All-Around Family Sewing Machine Made.

Easy Running, High Speed, Simple and Silent.

SOLD AT A REASONABLE PRICE AND FULLY GUARANTEED.

Send for Circular.

NATIONAL SEWING MACHINE CO.
BELVIDERE, ILL.

Chicago House, 49 JACKSON BOULEVARD. New York House, 82 READE STREET.

The IDEAL Steam Cooker

Cooks a whole meal over 3 burners, on gasoline, oil, gas or common cook stove.

Reduces Fuel Bills One-Half

MAKES TOUGH MEATS TENDER. Preserves vegetables. WHISTLE blows when cooker needs more water. DINNER SETS, BICYCLES, WATCHES AND OTHER VALUABLE PREMIUMS GIVEN WITH ORDER FOR COOKERS. Send for illus. cat. We pay express. Agents wanted.

TOLEDO COOKER CO., Box 11, Toledo, Ohio

PURE WATER

How to Obtain It. 40-page Catalogue FREE.

WRITE THE

NATIONAL STILL CO., Columbus, Ohio, U. S. A.

matters, as in all concerning women, it must be the environment, means and responsibilities that determine the wisdom and fitness of a girl carrying her labors away from home.

Private Classes, Boarding and Day Schools The question of boarding-school as opposed to day-school is, of course, hardly considered in the life of our large cities. Unless domestic reasons make it desirable to exile the daughter from the home circle for a time, she is generally sent to one of the admirably equipped day-schools, some of which, in New York especially, leave no room for criticism of their methods and surroundings. The principals—always women of enlightened intelligence, strength of purpose and refinement, or such schools would cease to be—are continually alert to catch the note of the times, to apply new ideas to the machinery of their institutions. The rivals to these shrines of education for home-staying pupils are the private classes before mentioned. This method is considered by its patrons to strike the golden mean between the old and exploded governess system at home, and the risk of undesirable contact in a large school. That it is open to the reproach of "exclusiveness" and "cliquishness" does not appear to detract from it in their eyes.

Young girls whose families are friends meet daily in the schoolroom in the house of some one of their number

The modern boarding-school for girls in its efflorescence of home comfort and scientific apparatus for the conveyance of ideas and the maintenance of health is more than a century in advance of Miss Pinkerton's Select Establishment for Young Ladies, where Becky Sharp won her "Dixionary."

The Taming of the Rural Rara Avis The especial help of such schools to girls born far from the social centres of the East, some of whom are traditionally entitled to a refined culture, others eager to acquire it, is incalculable.

The girl who arrives at boarding-school inflated with her own importance as a provincial belle or rara avis of cheap accomplishment in so-called "art" or music; ignorant of all but a smattering of knowledge that comes from books; trained to disregard the conventionalities of her age and sex as exacted by standards here; with a conscience void of offense mayhap, but yet continually offending; innocent, reckless, half-bred, soon undergoes transformation. In six months' time she learns to adapt herself to accepted customs; to check her speech in public, to restrain the exuberance of her dress and ornament and pose before the world.

Under the training thus judiciously bestowed hundreds of wives and mothers of the future manhood of our country are being yearly sent back to their homes with expanded hearts and intellects, with juster knowledge of men and things, with an understanding of books and art and music that they will in turn diffuse among those less fortunate than themselves in opportunity.

The Cost, Worth and Limits of Education The crying question of the hour, Shall the daughter of the house receive a college education with her brothers? must be answered by each individual for himself. In what is called fashionable life, this temptation to an ambitious girl is so rare as to leave few examples in memory. But if a girl of any station desires to follow any path leading to higher intellectual altitudes and is fit to walk in it, why, I say, let her do so. But not "with" her brothers. Apart from them with her own sex, not in the abnormal condition of striving, neck to neck, with young men for mental supremacy at a time of her life when her nerves and emotions are ready at a touch to play her false and rob her of her usefulness.

There is no reward to be won in intellectual tourney that could compensate the girl and her family for an overstrain of nerves, reacting upon the body, in her early womanhood. If she can stand it, and persists, Heaven speed her on her way.

Certainly the standard maintained by women's colleges in America of recent years proves that the highest education we know of is procurable by faithful work in their ardent atmosphere. The records also of those annexes to universities, where young women may glean in the same fields with men, yet apart from them, have been surprisingly brilliant. Home culture and school culture of the ordinary kind pale beside the results attained, like candles under electric lights. It makes even the average observer concede that "higher education" is no longer a mere war cry of ambitious souls.

The Deeper Sources of Woman's Power How is it—one pauses to wonder—that the women who intellectually have done most to gladden, console and witch this weary old world of ours into a better humor have had no college training whatever, and, in many cases, little of any sort save what they got for themselves from books. The reason one need not go far to seek. A woman's chief power over men, and in a lesser degree over her own sex, lies in the emanation of her feminine personality; in her ability to convey human emotion; to stir the deep currents of the heart; to touch hidden chords of sentiment; to evoke patriotic ardor; to soothe or to amuse; to charm; to lighten care. There is not much time for the cultivation of such sympathy with such an intimate knowledge of poor, weak human nature in the hard grind of college study. The very quality of the necessary pursuits is opposed to it.

A Handsome Book

ABOUT MATTRESSES PILLOWS AND CUSHIONS

MAILED FREE

Cleaning a Hair Mattress

Is not a pleasing occupation—think what you have been sleeping on so long! Conquer prejudice (if you have any), and send for our book, "The Test of Time," and you will at least learn, at our expense, about

The Ostermoor Patent Elastic Felt Mattress, $15.

2 feet 6 inches wide, 25 lbs.,	$ 8.35	ALL 6 FEET 3 INCHES LONG
3 feet wide, 30 lbs.,	10.00
3 feet 6 inches wide, 35 lbs.,	11.70
4 feet wide, 40 lbs.,	13.35
4 feet 6 inches wide, 45 lbs.,	15.00

Express Charges Prepaid Everywhere

We make the best mattress in the world. This we KNOW, but it is hard for us to convince YOU, individually, of it without a trial. Perhaps you don't need a mattress now. Don't let that keep you from sending for our Free book, "The Test of Time."

SLEEP ON IT 30 NIGHTS

And if it is not even all you have hoped for, if you don't believe it to be the equal in cleanliness, durability and comfort of any $50 hair mattress ever made, you can get your money back by return mail—"no questions asked." There will be no unpleasantness about it at all.

Take care! Don't be deceived! There is not a single store in the country that carries our mattress; almost every store now has an imitation so-called "Felt," which is kept in stock to sell on our advertising. Our guarantee on every mattress.

Send to-day for our book, "The Test of Time."

OSTERMOOR & CO., 101 Elizabeth St., New York

We have purchased 25,000 churches. Send for book, Church Cushions.

Tough as Hickory

Than hickory no wood is tougher.

Than Old Hickory Chair Comfort

Nothing is more comfortable. Our rustic furniture is stylish and luxurious. The chair here pictured is as restful as it is simple. Its price, freight paid east of Rocky Mountains, is $2.75; two for $5.00. This furniture is hand-made, of white hickory saplings, with the bark on; smooth, pretty, durable. Not harmed by weather. If your dealer does not keep them, write for illustrated catalogue, free, showing 65 patterns and unique Twentieth Century styles of Rockers, Settees, Tables, and all varieties of Rustic Furniture for Lawns, Verandas, etc., for Homes and Clubs.

Pretty Settee for $7.50.

THE OLD HICKORY CHAIR CO., Martinsville, Ind.

HOPPER'S CAN OPENER

Is the Best

Does Perfect Work
Easy to Operate
No Jagged Edges

Sample 25c, postpaid

Correspondence solicited by the trade. Money refunded if not satisfactory.

CHAS. G. HOPPER, Mfr. Germantown, Pa.

Save Your Old Carpets

We can weave them to order into handsome rugs of any size. Write for particulars. We pay the freight.

AMERICAN RUG CO., Dept. S, 30 La Salle St., Chicago

Digitized by Google

HOOKON HOSE SUPPORTER

Holds the Stockings Up

Holds the Corset Down

Does away with Safety Pins

Being hooked on the lowest corset clasp it keeps the corset down and close to the body, preventing the point of the corset from protruding, thereby greatly reducing the prominence of the abdomen.

The HOOKON cannot become unfastened; always comfortable, no matter what position the wearer may assume. Made of best materials, and will wear longer than other hose supporters. For sale at leading stores.

Send 50c for sample pair—silk
Send 25c for sample pair—cotton

L. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
721 Broadway, New York

"Tyrian"

On RUBBER GOODS is a Guarantee of Quality

Bulb Syringes

No. 5 (like cut), with 6 Hard Rubber Pipes, heavy bulb and tubing, handsome wood box, $1.50, sent postpaid.

No. 21, a good Family Syringe: 3 Hard Rubber Pipes, pasteboard box, 75 cents, sent postpaid.

Sold at Drug and Rubber Stores

OUR SPECIALTIES: Syringes, Atomizers, Nipples, Plant Sprinklers, Hot-Water Bottles, Air Cushions, Rubber Gloves, Sheeting, Letter Bands, etc. Our pamphlet, "Worth Reading," free.

TYER RUBBER COMPANY, Andover, Mass.

Snap-Fast

Skirt Supporter

Does support and stay fast. Waist and skirt must stay together. It's a belt clipped fore a strap behind, holding waist down all around, permitting stylish adjustment at fullness. A strap at the back holds skirt up close and tight. Can't sag, rear nor gape. One enough for many waists. Heavy or thinnest gowns. With or without corsets. Just right for athletic women. Price 25c, 30 to 40 in. waist measure. Black, white, drab. Agents who can earn $15 to $30 per week, send 15c for sample. Spencer Novelty Co., 5 S. Ottawa St., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Ladies' Watches

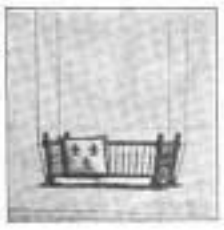
OUR BLUE BOOK

Shows the Latest Fashions in Watch Designs, Enamels for Toilette Effects and Harmony with Dress Colorings.

The Blue Book sent free.

New England Watch Company

37 and 39 Maiden Lane, New York. 149 State Street, Chicago
Spreckels Building, San Francisco



Luxurious

Swinging Seats

For

Porches, "Dens," Hallways and Cozy Nooks

Ask for free catalogue and prices.

COLFAX SWINGING SEAT CO.
South Bend, Ind.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, May, 1900.

I HAVE always had a hazy idea, bred no doubt of my unfashionable Spruce City training, that with the budding of the leaves Washington would at least have one touch in common with the rest of the world, and that with spring everywhere in the air, the housekeeper's instinct would come to the fore and politics and gayety would give place, at least for a time, to spring house-cleaning. Page declares that such ideas are hopelessly obsolete, and that if I hope to keep my place in the smart world I must not let such a word as "house-cleaning" pass my lips.

Quarles advanced some rather effective views against the constitutional right to seat Quay

"Goodness me, Page," exclaimed Cousin Melinda, whose housewifely notions were outraged by such an idea, "don't you clean house down here ever?"

"Ah suppose so, Miss Melinda, but we don' have to do like you do up No'th where you turn everythin' topsy-turvy; we jus' tell the housekeeper to see that the house is put in summer shape, an' it's done."

"But if you don't have a housekeeper?" asked Cousin Melinda with thrifty persistence.

"Oh, then the butler will know what is meant by summer shape," innocently returned this little lily of the field.

"And what is 'summer shape'?" demanded the old lady, gazing around inquiringly upon the lavish household gods which adorned my showy Schneider house.

"Well, every hangin' an' every curtain an' rug is sent to col' storage for six or seven months. Every bit of bric-à-brac is done up in tissue paper or in muslin bags. Screens are put in the windows, an' the whole house is lef' bare an' plain. You see," continued Page, who enjoyed drawing extreme pictures for the sake of the originality of Cousin Melinda's comments, "we don' have any spring. We go right into summer weather, with the the'mometer at ninety as like as not, an' the pavements all sof' an' runnin' into the sewers, an' we have to put up electric fans, an' stay in the house an' eat frozen things, an'——"

"And plenty of flies and mosquitoes?" interrupted Cousin Melinda, not heeding how or where her question fitted in Page's narrative.

"Oh my, yes! as big as beetles, an' everybody gets out of town, an' you won' even see a butcher's cart on mos' of the streets, an' the dogs even stop runnin' about an' only limp along on three legs, an'——"

"Well, then, I think I shall go straight back to Spruce City. I don't think I could live with no carpets on the floors, no curtains at the windows, and with flies and mosquitoes as big as beetles. Why, I never in all my born days heard of such a climate."

And the dear old lady hustled out of the room as though to begin immediate preparation for her journey to Spruce City. I asked, doubtfully, with every bone in my body aching from the effects of the dance at the Country Club, and the reception and dance at Corcoran House, and a score of other dissipations:

"But, Page, in all seriousness, do people never stop their dinners, and their dances, and their teas, and their recitals?"

"Oh, yes; you jus' wait till the weather is sizzlin' hot, an' then the curtain will ring down with a bang that will make you jump. When that happens there won' be but one thing lef' goin' on."

"And that one thing?" I asked.

"Politics," she said dryly.

"But don't politics die a natural death when Congress adjourns?"

"My, no! They never stop here in Washin'ton, for instead of dyin' a natural death they take on an unnatural impetus, and when Congress ain' here then people go an' snoop aroun' the State, War an' Navy buildin', an' even the White House, an' poke their noses into official affairs, an' stir up scan'als an' make sensations, an' accuse the Government of all sorts of double-dealin' like they're doin' now."

I smiled at her vehemence, and thinking to lead her into a trap I said:

"But, Page, the very people who are doing the 'snooping,' as you call it, at present, are the very men of your own party. I shouldn't think you'd find fault when they hope to make campaign capital out of it."

"What good will it do 'em?" she demanded contemptuously.

Then she added reflectively and with a shrewdness which I should never have supposed she possessed for politics:

"My party, Mrs. Slocum, is always watchin' out for crows. They are often on the right side of a thing, but instead of meetin' it straight out they go pokin' into your party's doin's, an' if they fin' a crow they let go the main thing an' shout crow. Ah can't help thinkin' of somethin' Charles Kingsley said once of a certain great man. He said that this great man possessed all the gif's under the sun save one, an' that one was the gif' of the power to use them. An' so it is with the Democratic party. They possess lots of great gif's, an' they mean to make campaign capital out of your party's mistakes, an' goo'ness knows there are a plenty, but bless you, the Democratic party don' possess the gif' to use their power, nor possess the power to use their gif's, an' there you are!"

This was all new light to me on the Democratic party, and, coming as it did from this little Virginian, it struck me as being unusually original and shrewd, and not long after I repeated it to Robert and Senator P——.

"And to think that such a clever little American should be wasted on a Frenchman!" exclaimed the Senator, his antipathy for everything diplomatic springing to the front.

"How much truth is there in her observation?" I asked.

"It is just as true as it is shrewd," said the Senator. Then he continued:

"You see, this talk in the Senate about the Cuban funds and our army officers has been sprung for no other purpose than for campaign material, and, as Miss Page would say, in order to 'shout crow,' and——"

One interesting figure on the floor all during the afternoon was that of ex-Governor Taylor, of Kentucky

"Oh, but do you mean," I interrupted, "that with you it is a case of 'believing a story false which ought not to be true'?"

"By no means," returned the Senator earnestly, "but I will believe nothing until more light is brought to bear upon it. I always think of Cotton Mather, who used to say, when anything of consequence was on hand, that there was a gentleman mentioned in the nineteenth chapter of Acts to whom he was more deeply indebted than to any one else, and that was the town clerk of Ephesus, whose counsel and wisdom in managing an angry assembly were masterly. And I feel like suggesting to my brethren of the Senate not to do anything rash, but to consult with

THOMSON'S "Glove-Fitting" CORSETS

Require no "Breaking in." The seams fit so accurately over the lines of the body that you do not realize you have changed the old corset for the new.

Turn them over and see how they're made

All seams run around the body

This shows

Our Ventilating Corset

(Trade-Mark Registered), made of imported netting, stripped with coutil, and trimmed with lace and baby ribbon. $1.00 a pair at all dealers'. Light as a feather yet strong as the strongest. Handsome illustrated catalogue mailed free.

GEO. C. BATCHELLER & CO., 345 Broadway, New York

Rich's Patent

"JULIA MARLOWE SHOES

THE MOST PERFECT FITTING FOOT WEAR EVER MADE

Proclaimed by thousands of wearers to Combine Comfort and Grace

Not equaled in any other style, owing to the Panel of "Rub Stays." The high shoes, as well as the Oxfords, Fit either High or Low Instep perfectly, at the same time yield and adjust themselves to every action of the foot. They are made of the Choicest (all) Kid or with Fancy Vesting tops in Black or Tan, at the same prices, in all sizes, latest styles of toes and all widths from A—EE.

Write for Illustrated CATALOGUE

McKay Sewed Lace Boots, $3.25; Oxfords, $2.25
Hand-Turned Lace Boots, $3.50; Oxfords, $2.50

Neat, Express prepaid, upon receipt of price and 25 cts.

THE RICH SHOE CO.
Dept. O, Milwaukee, Wis.

Wedding Invitations,

Announcements and At-Home Cards engraved in absolutely correct form on finest stationery. Prices very moderate.

SAMPLES FREE ON APPLICATION

Samples of Engraved Visiting Cards FREE

Send 10 cents for catalogue of monogram stationery.

ROYAL ENGRAVING CO.
17 S. Ninth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

For Summer, Porous

Jaeger

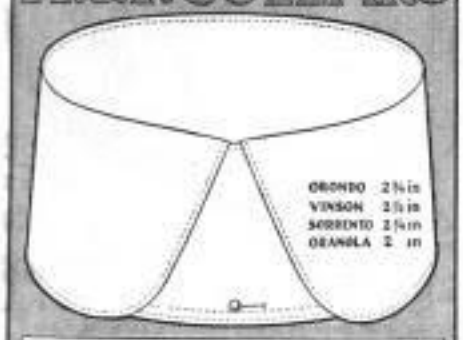
PURE WOOL UNDERWEAR

Send for Illustrated Catalogue

New York: 16 West 23d St. / 166 Broadway.
Brooklyn: 504 Fulton St.
Boston: 159 Tremont St.
Philadelphia: 924 Chestnut St.
Chicago: 74 State St.

Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry.

FOUR DAILY TRAINS



CINCINNATI to CHICAGO

"Over the Manos"

Leave CINCINNATI, 9.30 A. M., 8.30 A. M., 12.50 Noon, 8.45 P. M.
Arrive CHICAGO, 12.00 Noon, 5.55 P. M., 8.40 P. M., 7.25 A. M.

Digitized by Google

H.&I. COLLARS

FOR comfort, style and economy wear H. & I. Collars. They are the collars for fastidious dressers—the collars which make that detail of dress absolutely correct.

They are always right abreast with the very latest styles; are made of good, carefully selected and reliable linens in one of the largest and most modern factories in America.

We have had over thirty years' experience in the manufacture of collars, and we know how to get the most style, comfort, fit and long wear into a collar at the lowest possible price.

If you do not find the H. & I. brand at your dealer's send us 25c., giving the style, height and size you desire, and we will send you two collars of perfect satisfaction.

Ask for our "Style Book for Men," our "Style Book for Women," or both if desired.

HOLMES & IDE, Dept. S, Troy, N.Y.

2 For 25¢

KLEINERT'S
OLYMPIA
Dress Shields

The Olympia is the only perfect shield, and the shield that gives more satisfaction, wear and comfort than any other. It is the only shield that can be

WASHED and IRONED

It is Odorless

And will not rot or deteriorate with age. Our guarantee with every pair.

Send 25c

For sample pair and be convinced.

I. B. Kleinert Rubber Company
721 Broadway, New York

9 for 10 Cents

We will send to any one 9 handsome 7 in. Battenburg designs, all different, stamped on colored cambric. Also our new 100 page catalogue of Fancy Work Novelties and Handkerchiefs. All for 10 cents.

C. S. DAVISSON & CO.
891 Broadway, N. Y. Dept. 69

the town clerk of Ephesus before they commit themselves."

"Well, it seems to me that the world is full of rubs, and that our Republican fortune seems to be 'running against the bias' just now," I said croakingly.

"Oh, pshaw!" said Robert. "It's all nonsense to talk about 'running against the bias.' We're running straight with the grain. There may be some blunders, of course, and there may be some occasions when we can't answer all the questions concerning the truth, but that does not signify that the truth has been let go of. Some political writer has said apropos of just such a case as this, 'The capacity for occasional blundering is inseparable from the capacity to bring things to pass. The only party that is past the danger of making mistakes is the party that is dead.' By the way, how do you feel about the loss of the Quay case?" asked Robert of the Senator.

"Well, it was a surprise all around. I was in hopes that my quiet work in behalf of Quay would have had its effect, but, you see, Quarles made a speech and advanced some rather effective and novel views against the constitutional right to seat him, and then Burrows' speech, coming as it did with its trip-hammer blows, shook the confidence of at least two of Quay's friends; and then it was whispered around in the cloak-rooms and lobby that Clark, of Montana, would vote for him, even though under the circumstances it would have been an extraordinary proceeding considering his position, and this turned one or two men's votes. But the solar plexus blow to Quay was Hanna's desertion at the last moment. This was construed as a blow direct from the Administration. Altogether, it was as close a bit of work as has been done in the Senate in years. The only funny episode throughout the day was Hale's nervousness which made him answer 'Aye' to the roll-call instead of 'No' on the final vote."

DEPEW WOULD NOT HURT ANYBODY'S FEELINGS INTENTIONALLY FOR THE WORLD

"I am rather surprised that you, a conservative man, should have espoused so openly Mr. Quay's cause," said I tentatively.

"Oh, come now, Mrs. Slocum," spoke up the Senator almost testily, "you may call me anything you like except conservative. A conservative man in the Senate nowadays has come to mean a sort of nebulous being without strong convictions or nerve—a man, in short, who is 'afraid to look at the new moon out of respect to that ancient institution, the old one.'"

We all laughed at this idea, and I dropped the Quay matter. After a moment the Senator said:

"One interesting figure on the floor all during the afternoon was that of ex-Governor Taylor, of Kentucky. He was the guest of Deboe, who brought him into the chamber through the cloak-room. It was thought that possibly he might have been denied the privilege of the floor if he had had to pass the doorkeepers, but he was not challenged."

After a moment the Senator asked abruptly:

"How about that claim from your State, Slocum? How are you getting on with it?"

"Oh, well, rather like a crab; I seem to be going backward. This claim passed the Supreme Court and the Court of Claims, and finally passed Congress without dissent; then it went to the Department and got into the hands of the Auditor, and he holds it up week after week while he mulls along between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum. Meanwhile my people are fuming around and making my life a burden with complaints that I am not pushing it. The Government's way of doing business seems to me to be the most extraordinary thing I have ever run up against. Why, there is no corporation or private business concern in the country that could live or exist twenty-four hours run on the same lines that the Government runs its business."

"That reminds me," laughed the Senator, "of a claim that I was once interested in, and when it had dragged along, and finally looked as if it would fail, and finally did fail before the Comptroller, I carried it to the Supreme Court and got Joe Choate to come down and argue it for me. Well, the day that Choate made his argument the Comptroller of course was present to represent the Government, and Choate was firing away in his usual brilliant fashion and was making a strong, clear showing and claiming everything under the sun for our side, when one of the Justices interrupted him and asked:

"'If this claim is as clear as your argument and your brief would show, why has it come before this court?'

"'Why, Your Honor,' replied Choate with all the suavity of manner of which he is possessed to an unusual degree, 'it has been brought before this honorable body because,' and here he swept his eyes over the Comptroller, 'a small-headed tack,' and he measured off on his finger an infinitesimally small space, 'got into the wheels of Government and clogged them, hence——'"

And the Senator finished with a hearty laugh at the recollection of that claim, and we laughed with him.

"Did the court laugh?" asked I.

"No, but there was a suspicious twitching of faces and a restless movement among them which betrayed that the point was not lost upon them. Neither was the case lost," wound up the Senator.

"Well, then, I must have struck just such a tack as Choate described," said Robert.

"You'll strike plenty such in the Treasury Department. Why, I have known a whole appropriation to be held up over an item involving a quarter of a dollar, and once the entire account of the Commissioners' office of the District was held up for several weeks until a broken window-pane could be accounted for, and finally was only passed when the attorney for the District filed a brief to show that the breaking of the pane of glass had not been the work of the elements," said the Senator.

"Well, at least it argues a certain kind of faithful honesty which is refreshing," said I.

"Oh yes, but that penny-wise honesty can often be a menace to the public good. A bee is no busier animal than a blockhead, but it is not always comfortable or profitable to have it around all the same, and Schiller says that 'Heaven and earth fight in vain against a dunce,'" replied the Senator. Then he added:

"If I were you, Slocum, I'd bring a little pressure to bear. I'd go to the Secretary himself and get a hearing, and, if need be, bring in Senator Blank. He has a tremendous pull with the Secretary and with the Department. Of course, I suppose, you have already used your entire State delegation?"

"Of course," replied Robert. Then he explained frankly:

